Still one prayer, one wish, one moan,
Life-long, sighing, "All alone!"

THE DAILY GOVERNESS.

(See Steel Plate.)

BY MARY FORMAN.

"HERE I am, dear mother, a finished article!"

She was standing in the parlor of the cosiest little cottage you ever saw, and as she spoke she drew herself up, and with a supremely ridiculous burlesque of importance, she suddenly dropped a low, graceful courtesy. Upon the floor at her feet stood a large trunk, and as she spoke she rapidly pointed out the objects she mentioned.

"There's my French classics, over which I have pored till my hair felt prematurely gray; there's my geometry, every question and answer within its covers being painted indelibly upon my memory; there are my drawing tools, my music, my slate, grammar, histories, and in short all the mine of learning which I have been working for the last eight years, and last, not least, here is dear Mrs. Grey's letter of recommendation!"

"But you will not want that just yet. You are to rest for a month or two. Come here, and let me look at you."

The young girl tossed down an armful of clothes she had just lifted from the trunk, and went to her mother's side, gravely standing erect for inspection. With a quick perception of the joyous happiness of coming home that lighted her child's eyes and brought the rich glow to her face, her mother said, scanning her critically: "Tall, good figure, well carried; fair complexion, plenty of color, dark, curling hair, huge black eyes, good features, pretty feet and hands. Well, Miss Watson, I think you'll do!"

Too impulsive and too happy to keep a grave face long, Miss Watson was already on her knees, her face resting on her mother's breast, her voice trembling with its burden of love.

"You darling! I am so glad to come home, though Mrs. Grey was very kind, and there were lots of nice girls in the school. I have studied hard, and now we will have a real cosy, lazy time till I find a situation."

"Lazy! You could not be lazy if you tried. There, you are off again!"

"To get this mess out of the parlor. Ah! here comes Maggie!"

The mother's welcome was scarcely more cordial than that of the middle-aged respectable servant, who now came to welcome the young girl home. She had been to the village for some little luxury for tea, in honor of the occasion, but she let the basket go, and gave her "dear child" both hands in welcome.

"Maggie, you shame us all with your roses," said the dear child, kissing her heartily, "and you are ten years younger than you were last holidays."

"Always at your fun," said the gratified woman; "now you just sit down by your mother, Miss Bertha, and I'll unpack your things. Dear, dear, here's all your pretty things, no use at all."

"Oh, they keep," was the answer, as Miss Bertha looked at the colored dresses in the trunk, and then at her own deep mourning. "I suppose I ought to be quieter in this dress, mother."

"Why, my dear, I don't see how you can feel your grandfather's death very much. To be sure he left you a ring, and enough to buy our mourning, but he has never been to see me or you since your father died. He did not like your father's marrying an American, and never felt very cordial to me. Still he was your grandfather, and so we will wear this dress for a year, though we can scarcely say we mourn for him. Your Uncle Rodney was here yesterday."

The pucker in Bertha's face did not speak of any enthusiastic love for the uncle in question, but she began a history of her last quarter at school, with all the lively grace and wit that characterized her descriptions.

Bertha Watson was the only child of an English officer, who died when she was a wee baby, leaving his widow nothing but a pension for her support, and the baby Bertie for her comfort. She was an American lady, of good family, and one of several daughters, whom he had met while on a pleasure trip to the States, and won to accompany him to his European home. There was not much romance in the story, but after Captain Watson's death, his father had rather ignored the widow and child, sending them occasionally some game or fruit from his country seat, and allowing them the use of their cottage rent-free, but otherwise holding them as rather beneath his notice. Rodney, his eldest son, was his favorite, and having never married an American lady, but, on the contrary, patiently accepting the rich wife his father himself selected for him, he had centred all the love left from his money bags on his heir.

As Bertha grew from infancy to childhood, her grandfather offered to defray the expenses of her education, that in time she might be able to teach for her own support, and placed her, when ten years old, in a first class boarding-school, with all the "extras" at her command. Graceful, animated, and intelligent, the child soon won her way to the hearts of her teachers, and for eight years studied faithfully, striving, as she grew older, to win praise and prize at each half-yearly examination, till at eighteen she was returned home, having passed through the school routine creditably, and with more than an average share of honor.

Warm-hearted, loving, and cheerful, she was not one to pine over the prospect of being a governess, or to bring a whine or sigh to grieve her mother, but with the ready pencil of youth painted such a life of toil abroad, and love at home, as made the mother's heart throb exultingly over her only, darling child.

They were still talking over past and future, content to let the present rest in the fact that they were together, when a quick, heavy tread on the frosty ground outside, made Bertha's fair forehead contract in a frown, and her mother give her a half-laughing, half-reproving shake of the head.

"Now for a lecture, mother," whispered the young girl, as the step came up the wooden steps, and into the entry. "How are you, Uncle Rodney?" and she submitted to be kissed by the portly, red-faced man who entered the parlor.

"Well, my dear, so you are at home again! Tired of school, eh?"

"Not particularly!"

"Humph! Glad of it, for you will begin to teach on Monday!"

"Monday!" cried both mother and daughter in dismay.

"Yes, Monday!" was the emphatic response, in a very gruff tone. "One of my clients came to me to inquire about a teacher, and I recommended you."

"Who is it, Rodney?" inquired Mrs. Watson half peevishly, for she thought he was taking an unwarranted command of Bertha's affairs.

"Mrs. Loulan, the General's wife: she was Miss C——, the rich banker's daughter."

"The large brown house on the road to P——. Why, Bertie, that's only half a mile from the village; you can often come home."

"Come home every evening: she is only wanted for a daily governess."

"How many children, uncle?"

"Six! All little girls except Harry, the only son, who is about four years old; the others run up to Hattie, who is fifteen and the oldest. You are to teach them everything, and the salary is good, £50 a year."

"Enormous!" said Mrs. Watson, bitterly.

"Quite enough for comfort, with your income. I will try to meet you Monday, Bertha; if I cannot, you have only to introduce yourself as my niece, and you will find it all arranged." And having accomplished his errand, Mr. Rodney Watson inflicted a second kiss on his pretty niece, and walked off.

"Well!" said Mrs. Watson, as she watched him out of sight, "if his majesty has any other commands!"

"Now, mother," said Bertha, "don't get angry. See how nice it is. Instead of being off in some remote corner of England, or perhaps in London, a resident governess, here I shall be near you, at home every night, and can commence with all my studies fresh in my mind, instead of waiting till they get all mixed up with other matters, and I don't know a German poem from a French essay, or a minim from a semibreve."

Spite of her brave speech, there was a little fluttering at Bertha's heart as she recalled all the dreary stories of governess life that she had read or heard, and pictured the tall girl of fifteen with purse-proud insolence, or worse, dull stupidity. As she knelt by her bed that night the prayer of thanks for her safe and happy return home was followed by a most earnest petition for guidance and strength to meet her new responsibilities; and the mother, peeping in later at her newly recovered treasure, saw a face as calm and peaceful as a sleeping infant's.

Monday morning was by no means so cheerful a one as could carry encouragement to the young teacher. It was the first Monday of the year, and the snow fell thickly, while a sweeping wind threatened to carry daring pedestrians off into the clouds. Mrs. Watson wished to keep Bertha at home, but she laughed at the idea of a daily governess minding the weather; and with stout boots, a big umbrella, and her music well protected in a leather cover, started out. The walk was a long one before she reached the stone posts that rose up heavy and tall beside the gate, and she looked vainly up and down the wide road for her uncle. He had evidently determined to leave her to find out her new position alone.

"Now I wonder," she soliloquized, eyeing with a half comical look the two bells that adorned the gate, "if I am a servant or a visitor. Dubious! I don't like to be snubbed on my first entrance for presumption, and yet I am not inclined to place myself on the footing of a servant. I'll guess!" and, letting the white eyelids fall over her dark eyes, she put out her hand, groping till it touched a handle. Then she opened them. "Servant!" she said, laughing, and gave the bell a pull.

She had not long to wait before the footman strode down the avenue and opened the gate.

"Mrs. Loudan! Oh, you are Miss Watson, are you not? This way. Why"—and he stopped short—"why didn't you pull t'other bell?"

"I will to-morrow," she said, blushing under his gaze of respectful admiration.

"Miss Watson!"

The door of a cozy sitting-room was thrown open, and Bertha came into the presence of her new mistress.

"My dear child, I never thought of your coming in this storm. Come to the fire!"

This was her cordial greeting, and looking in her face Bertha met a pair of kindly gray eyes, a sweet, motherly smile, and such a look of kindness without condescension as made her heart throb with grateful affection.

"I am not very wet," she said, cheerfully, shaking down her skirts; "the snow was dry. I expected to meet Uncle Rodney here."

"He called last evening to tell me you were coming; and the children are very anxious to make your acquaintance, I assure you. Sit down there, in that arm-chair, till you are rested and warm, and I will tell you all about them before you go to the schoolroom."

Long before the mother had told the young teacher all the little traits of character, the talent, the dislikes and partialities of her children, Bertha had inwardly given Heaven thanks for her pleasant lot. The perfect ease of manner, the motherly kindness that was as far from patronage as it was from insolence, the evident consideration for her comfort as well as the children's welfare in the arrangements, were too grateful to be unnoticed, and the return home in the evening brought such a bright face to Mrs. Watson that she wondered.

"Such pretty children, mother; and Hattie has a great talent for music. She plays almost as well as I do now. Harry don't know his letters, but he is such a dear little lump of good nature that I am sure I can soon teach him. Now don't laugh, please. I know all my geese are swans, but I don't want to make you think they are six paragons. They are well behaved, obedient, and respectful, and surely for a foundation no teacher can ask more."

With but little variety save that the snow storms were replaced by budding trees and summer sunshine, a year glided past, and the winter returning found Bertha still taking the walk from the cottage to the Hall morning after morning; but often walking beside her, his head bent low, his tones eager or cheerful as the mood moved him, her cousin Rodney was her frequent escort. They had been good friends and playfellows in all their holidays, and now, when he was at home studying his father's profession, they were friends and companions still.

He was a tall, shy man, just attained to his majority, awkward in company, reserved in speech, but full of chivalry and love for his pretty cousin, whose most fascinating amusement was to torment him. They were walking home one dark evening, when Bertha had been kept to dinner at the Hall, and there was some impatience in the young man's tone as he conversed.

"Then you won't tell me this mighty secret that is laughing in your eyes and quivering round your lips."

"What a pretty speech! Really, Rodney, I think you are improving in constant intercourse with me!"

"Pshaw!"

"Here we are at home. Now come in, Rodney, and you shall hear the wonderful secret. I must tell mother first."

"After you have had tea?" said Mrs. Watson.

"No, now! Come, sit down. My little pupil, Hallie, is going to have a birthday next month!"

"Well?"

"Well, Mrs. Loudan is going to have a grand party, and a whole troop of young cousins from London are to come down the week before to help get ready, for, this is the delicious part, we are going to have charades, and I am to write and act in them. Won't it be splendid?"

Rodney only grunted, but Mrs. Watson could not look at the beaming face claiming her sympathy and withhold it. It was a busy evening. Bertha would plan out all her scenes, and forced Rodney to promise to copy out the parts, while the cottage rang with her merry laugh over her mother's attempts to fit words to the scenes.

For a whole week before the party, lessons were entirely neglected, and the schoolroom was the drill room for fifteen of the merriest young folks who ever formed a dramatic company. Captain West, the young soldier cousin of Hattie's, who was in the Horse Guards, would make fun of all Bertha's attempts at slang, and altered his part till the fair authoress declined to run it at all, and his romping sister Jennie made the young teacher write her a part that her brother declared was perfectly "horsy!" Mr. Jarvis Loudan, another nephew, declared nothing but an Irishman was suited to his genius, while Mollie, his sister, wanted to try a real American negro. So the short days were lengthened into pleasant evenings, and the gallant Captain was only too happy to be Miss Watson's escort to the cottage, where animated discussions of posture and costume often detained him till late into the night.

And Rodney watched bitterly all this gayety, holding himself aloof from any part in it. In vain Mrs. Loudan urged her kind invitation to him to form one of the corps dramatique, he was too shy, too well aware of his own deficiencies in figure and fluency to venture within the bounds of the gay party, so he moped jealously, half inclined to wish there was no pleasure in the world if it threw a bar between him and Bertha.

The eventful night came at last, and our heroine found herself dressed for her part, waiting behind the scenes for her cue. The Captain was already on the stage, with Hattie playing fine lady to his dandyisms, and Bertha, in a pretty peasant's dress, was waiting for the country cousin's cue to appear. Excitement had tinged her cheek with a deep crimson, her eyes were dark with a feverish light, and her dress heightened every charm. From the soft, floating curls, to the tiny slippers, she was piquant and bewitching. The arch grace of her acting drew down the approbatory applause of the audience, and the wit of her dialogues found an able interpreter in their representatives. As the last charade was guessed, the authoress was called for. She was standing in the dressing-room, just ready to mingle with the guests, when the Captain knocked at the door, and told her of the compliment.

"Oh, I can't, indeed!"

"But you must. Everybody expects it."

"But to face all those people."

"You have been before them all the evening."

"Oh, that is very different; I was not before them in propria persona."

"Come, hear how they are calling."

And she found her hand prisoned, and herself led away. The curtain rolled up, and she was standing, blushing, before the well-filled room. Somebody was audacious enough to call for a speech, but the gallant Captain, with a few well-chosen words, closed the scene and rescued the heroine.

The curtain fell with a heavy dump, and they were alone behind it.

"Thank you," said Bertha, holding out her hand, "you got me out of that scrape nicely."

To her surprise, he clasped her hand tightly, and leaning over her, said in a low, passionate tone:—

"I wish it were my privilege to stand between you and all trouble and annoyance, Bertha!"

And here a chorus of merry voices announced the arrival of the whole company, and she sprang from him with hot cheeks, and a nervous laugh to meet the congratulations of her friends.

Again the daily routine of life was resumed, and the merry week was like the memory of a dream when the London party returned home. The Captain tried in vain to secure a parting word in private, and could but blame his own impetuosity for the chilling farewell that Bertha accorded him. And Rodney was growing pale and morose over Bertha's change of conduct.

Some finely strung chord of the young girl's heart had answered the Captain's passion, and she knew that she had learned the woman's lesson of love. No longer the same thoughtless, merry child, she was becoming a cheerful but more sedate woman. The gay laugh that had mocked him so often fell but seldom on Rodney's ear, and he marked well that Bertha was no longer the frank, sisterly friend of old. He had seen, even before Bertha learned it, the Captain's love, and now his absence accounted for all this change. So he avoided the cottage, and tried to believe he did not worship madly his cousin Bertha.

And now, over the whole island there rose a farewell cry. The Crimean war was opening, and the lounging dandies who had drawled out their word of command to lazy guards, woke to the manly soldiers whose deeds made the world admire. The guards were ordered off, and the Captain came to bid farewell to Bertha. To bid her farewell, but to tell her his manly love for her, and to crave her promise to be his wife when he returned. It was a painful interview, for she could grant him nothing of what he asked, and when he stood before her trying to give her a brave smile, her eyes were full and her lips quivering with emotion.

"You will give the soldier a prayer sometimes," he said, bravely.

"Always, and a sister's loving interest," she said, letting him take both her hands in his.

"Little sister, then God bless you, and farewell," and he drew her to his arms, printed a kiss on her forehead, and was gone. And Bertha looking up, through her blinding tears, saw her cousin Rodney in the doorway.

"I have seen," he said, hoarsely, "God grant he is worthy of your love, Bertha. I—I—" and then it burst from him impetuously, "I cannot bear it," and he turned quickly from her and strode down the road.

Day after day she watched for him, as she trod her lonely walk, but the quick tread echoed no more on her walk, and she looked in vain for the tall, stooping figure. Two long weeks passed, and then: "Bertha," said her mother, "your Uncle Rodney was here to-day, to tell us that your cousin Rodney sailed last night for the Crimea."

The room spun round her, and for the first time in her young, active life Bertha Watson fainted.

Can I write of the months of agony, the weary pain of watching, the bitter loneliness that fell over her once bright life. Misunderstood, blamed perhaps for coquetry, she waited in vain for a word or line of love and forgiveness.

And far away on the plains of Alma lay Rodney Watson, while kneeling over him, pale and anxious was Captain West, who spoke:—

"For me! Oh, Lieutenant Watson, it was a mad thing to do, but you saved my life."

"For Bertha," whispered the fainting man.

"Bertha!" the frown gathered on the handsome face, but then the chivalry of the English soldier beat down the unworthy feeling, and bending low he told Rodney the truth.

Bertha's face had grown pale, and her dark eyes sad, her step listless, and her manner gentle but weary, when the news of the return of Rodney met her. She was coming home from her day of teaching, but she passed the cottage with quick steps, and gained the big house that owned her uncle, master.

"Aunt Belle! Rodney!"

"Yes, dear," said her aunt, kindly; "he has lost his right arm, and his breast is badly wounded, but the sea air has done him good, and the doctor says he will do nicely! You are not going?"

"Yes, I wanted to know—" the tears were dropping fast.

"You know, dear," and the mother took her in her arms, "he has told me, Bertha, how he loves you. You will see him! Come! Think how long it is!" And her heart sighed.

"Long! Oh, it is a long, long time since he went."

And so, his mother's arm around her, she went to his sofa, to kneel down beside him, and whisper loving words of comfort, to combat the generous impulse that would not burden her young life with a crippled husband, to hear with a glad heart, his tale of faithful love, and promise to come to his home, to take her place there as his honored, loving wife.

But Mrs. Loudan thinks it is all in vain to try to quite fill the place of her Daily Governess.

WHY DON'T HE COME?

BY CATHARINE MITCHELL.

WHY don't he come?

Bright Phœbus, now enrobed in golden light,
Has curbed the fiery spirit of his steeds,
And stay'd his chariot wheels: his journey done,
He bids the world adieu with radiant smile,
And sinks to rest behind the western hills;
His crimson canopy is drawn around,
And he is lost to view. In dread suspense
I watch the tints of the empurpled clouds,
Till the last faint tint expired, and day is gone.

Why don't he come?

Dim twilight's shadowy form now floats in air:
The lowing herds now homeward bend their steps;
The bleating sheep are shut within the fold,
And my Canary sings his vesper hymn,
Then 'neath his downy pinions hides his head,
And in his willow cage in quiet sleeps.
Night's sable mantle, too, envelops all;
The azure vault above is spangled o'er
With twinkling stars; the silver moon is up—
A holy silence reigns, and all is calm
But my poor throbbing heart, alas, alas!

Why don't he come?

In bitter grief I've watched the moon go down;
Nature is hushed save when I heave a sigh—
The whispering winds give a responsive moan,
My soul is sick, my misery is complete.
Why does he leave me thus in dark despair
To mourn and weep alone?

Hark, 'tis the midnight chime!

No, 'tis his step I hear—thank Heaven he comes!
Begone, reproach, be calm each beating pulse;
My fluttering heart be still, away my fears—
What ecstasy thrills there! my trembling frame.
Come, rosy smiles, play o'er my blanched cheeks,
No crystal teardrops shall bedim my eyes,
For now at length when hope had almost flown,
To cheer my heart he comes.

THE CHRISTMAS GIFT.

BY MELLICENT IRWIN.

ANNIE MERRILLUS sat industriously stitching away on an article which, when finished, was to be the embodied expression of her "merry Christmas" to "dear Fred." Annie Merrillus had been two years a happy wife. As she sat with busy fingers and as busy thoughts in her pleasant sitting-room, a comer-in from the keen, frosty air would have had a charming picture before him. The bright glow of the anthracite coal, which diffused a friendly summer warmth; the stand of flowering plants, and glimpse of a golden pair of canaries through a half-open door; the polished piano with its rich spread and uncovered keys, and a few beautiful pictures on the wall, were some of the surroundings of the tastefully attired little woman, sitting in her low rocker, and working so busily with the bright colored materials lying in pretty confusion about her. Whether a crimson here and a drab there would harmonize best, or a black or a brown be a prettier contrast, were reflections which were interruptions now and then to loving thoughts, and a cheerful retrospect of these same last two years which the pretty lady was indulging in. Presently she worked more slowly, laid aside her needle, and held up her work with a perplexed air; then resumed it, set a few more stitches, and finally, slowly and with care not to injure the fabric, took them out again.

"I cannot trust my eye! I must have a pattern for this vine surely! It looks stiff in spite of me! Fred was saying something about impression paper when I was finishing Ellen's pattern—that there was some in the secretary, I believe. I shall have to make a pattern. I will see if I can find it." Thus thinking, still surveying the refractory vine with her head critically and not ungracefully on one side, she came to the above conclusion.

"Fred" had furnished a room in his boarding-house days, and "the secretary" had been one of the articles of furniture of his bachelor time. Mrs. Annie opened one drawer after another in quest of the desired paper; the taking out of stitches reminded her the Christmas was at hand, and brought a thought, too, of the long evenings when the gift work must be banished, for Fred as seldom spent his evenings from home as in the first glad months of their married life. She looked in vain for the impression paper her husband, in his habitual thoughtful interest for her convenience in whatever she might chance to be doing, had suggested as a help in tracing. She was on the point of giving up the search. "I wonder if this isn't a drawer, or what the space is left for," thought she as she was about to turn away. A little exercise of ingenuity did indeed discover a drawer, and within it, neatly made up with taste and care, was a package of letters. She recognized her own handwriting. "My old letters!" she exclaimed. "Fred has kept them like precious things indeed," and the pretty lady took them in her hand, and looked at them through a sudden tear mist in her soft, brown eyes. "Stansbury! these were dated while I was away on my visit last fall; and these—Hopeton Burns—are of the old, old time; dear Fred! and dear home!" and her head was bowed for a moment, and a little shower of pearly tears—as old time memories at sight of her girlish hand came clustering back, pearly drops refreshing as a summer shower, the sun shining through all the time—fell thick and fast a brief moment. She had been such a sheltered flower all her life long, she had not learned the need, and so the habit of self-restraint.

Mrs. Merrillus put back the dainty package. As she did so, a folded paper and a picture-case met her glance. A tress of golden-brown and curling hair the folded paper disclosed to view; and daugerrotyped before her, when she had unclasped the case, was a lovely girlish face, with flowing curling hair. She looked upon it in mute surprise.

"Fred never had a sister—he has told me I was first and only in his love;" and she sat and gazed upon the soft contour, and conjectured in vain. The eyes at length seemed to look into hers in a strange familiar way, as though she had gazed into their sweet depths of serenity in dreamland, but now again they began to look mockingly at her; the mouth too seemed to frame mockingly the words "first and only love!" And Annie Merrillus sat and gazed.

"With my letters, my letters! in a secret drawer I was never even told the existence of," at length she exclaimed. As she bent her head and turned the picture in a better light, a coil of hair that had been unloosened fell to her shoulder. She compared its dark shade with the gold-brown curl the original of the picture had undoubtedly parted with to give.

"I wonder if she died," said Annie; and then—"It was sweet to be first and only; yet had Fred but told me—could I but have felt he was still ingenuous with me—I could have borne to have been not first. What need that he should have deceived me?" Her voice died away on the word "deceived." "Oh, Fred! I thought you soul of truth!" Another kind of tears were very near coming here. I think it would have been better for her to have let them have their way. But her mind returned to the reflection, "With my letters too, and so carefully preserved!" and this she did not, would not do. From all the tenderness of the afternoon's retrospect, from the little surprise of the carefully cherished letters, there had found and sprung up in some congenial soil—though it would but half support it—a little root of defiance; the proper name perhaps would be pride. There are many different kinds of pride. Pride is very good for us sometimes. It gives, like stimulants, an artificial strength that serves to carry us safe through trying places. At the same time, pride may be sometimes very much out of its place. I think it is.

Mrs. Merrilus had lost all inclination for needle-work. She passed an hour or two rather wretchedly. But this would not long do. It was not her habit. She began practising vigorously an exceedingly difficult selection from an opera she had never liked; a piece which had been presented by a person who was no favorite of Mr. Frederick Merrilus, though that gentleman always treated the obnoxious individual—there being in his conduct nothing morally wrong—sufficiently well to justify through him the compliment to his wife. Mrs. Merrilus was really too well-bred at heart to admit any justification of "the sulks" per se; nevertheless, it was in vain when the evening came her husband made kindest inquiries for her health, and when he found attempts at conversation useless, tried to find a clue to her changed manner. He cut the leaves of a new periodical and read aloud. He began, too, with the utmost humor narrating a laughable experience of the day. Annie felt she should laugh in spite of herself, and then alas for her resolution! There is something that breaks down all cobweb barriers in a downright hearty laugh. She knew, at least felt this. She commanded herself sufficiently to appear to suppress a yawn, and interrupted the narration with something about retiring for the night, though it wanted yet a half hour of the usual time. As she turned away she blushed for her rudeness, which, however, seemed unnoticed save by renewed inquiry if "she were sure that she felt indeed quite well."

The next day was no better; embroidery had no interest. The heart-strings were too much out of tune for music. She was obliged to make exertion to appear herself to callers the afternoon brought in with smiles, and news, and pleasant chat, and in the very effort she felt the mist breaking away; but when the necessity was gone for acting as though they were not, sitting down idly, she called them all back again, and enveloped herself in them for her husband's return. Mr. Frederick Merrilus began to be seriously troubled.

"I've been trying every day for a week, Annie, to get time to come up and take you out for a drive. And now, these two days past, I am sure you have needed it. Staying indoors too steadily is not good for anybody. I feel it myself, since Alden's being away from the office has kept me more confined. Dear wife, you must not get sick; and I'm sure you are not well, though you keep back one complaining word."

This, the second morning, why did not Annie answering tell him what it was that was casting a shadow in their bright home. At one moment, when she had thought of it, she had feared to give him pain by—as she said in her mind—"reviving associations perhaps long buried;" at another, it is possible there may have been a shade of satisfaction in the contemplation that when she should reveal her knowledge of his withholding of the truth from her, thus bringing to mind the falseness of his deliberate assurance, he would, though differently, feel as keenly as she had done. I say it is possible she may have derived a moment's satisfaction from the passing reflection. But now in that pleasant breakfast-room, with the broad sun shining so cheerily in, and with her husband's trust-compelling eyes beaming down upon her—in answer too to his cheerful tones, "Dear wife, you must not get sick," and "I'm sure you are not well, though you keep back one complaining word"—how could she? and she did not, and he was gone again.

I think, on one point, however much in the dark he may have been on others, Mr. Frederick Merrilus was very much in the right. I think his wife had stayed indoors altogether too much. To be sure, those exquisitely made shirts and sundry other articles might not have been in such a beautiful state of completeness had the glad sun and clear air successfully invited her out to their healthful influences; but neither, I venture to say it, would too close confinement in heated rooms, no less bad in its influence on mind than body, have unnerved and predisposed to unhealthy action. The knowledge of her husband's character, and of his uniform tenderness, might have lifted itself in opposition, even in the very face of "proofs" so considered; to heart suggestions cherished of Mrs. Merrilus.

However, the days went by—the days, too, of the Christmas greening of the chapel. Very tasteful and dexterous in the twining of the wreaths, the design of the sacred beautifying of the altar was entrusted to Mrs. Merrilus. Gentle thoughts and holy feelings, no stranger guests at any time to her loving nature, came, breaking away the unhealthy vapors. Mr. Merrilus was called from home during the process of the work; otherwise I think Annie might, in her gentle way, have led him to speak of that which was exaggerated in her mind by the apparent secrecy thrown about it. I think, as it was, she might have done so when he was at home again, had it not been that, unfortunately, the very day of his return, having occasion to go to the secretary, other feelings were revived again.

"I'm so glad you are come, Aunt Annie!" little Kitty Meyers exclaimed, one day, when Annie entered the house. And she noiselessly closed the door that no tone might by any means reach mamma's ear. "You know my curls I had cut off," proceeded the little girl, "they're all in a box just as they were cut; and don't you think I could make a cushion of them some way with black lace, and have them show through, for mamma, you know, for Christmas? Make it round, I think, and have one curl in a kind of ruche around it, and a fall of lace; couldn't I some way, Aunt Annie?" and the eager, animated little face looked up with a whole brace of interrogations in her bright eyes. "I began a collar long ago, but it is so much work I cannot finish it now, and arithmetic is so dreadfully hard I have to study out of school, and I don't get any time. And mamma thought so much of my curls, you know. And you make things so pretty, dear Aunt Annie; won't you help me?"

Annie Merrilus kissed the eager face, and promised aid. And in the evening she sat planning Kitty's gift, making the work ready for the inexperienced fingers that gave Kitty so much trouble in not being competent to execute half the designs of her busy little brain.

"Are you not too tired with all day at the chapel to be at work this evening, dear?" said Mr. Merrilus, drawing a chair near her work-stand. "I'm glad to rest," he added. "What pretty work are you at now, wife!" and he took up one of the long golden curls.

"They are beautiful," he said, when Annie had told him of Kitty's design. "It's a long time since my admiration first awoke for curling hair," he continued, lifting an intelligent glance upon her as he spoke. "I remember curls; they were not so golden as these"—he went on musingly, with light, almost caressing touch smoothing the bright tress—"not so golden as these. I was little more than a mere boy then"—

"Don't, Fred! you're spoiling it!" exclaimed Annie, in an apparent quick, sharp petulance, that, in his surprise, nearly made the gentleman drop it. Her cheek crimsoned at the jarring sound of her own voice. Such a tone had never passed between them before.

Mr. Merrilus walked to the fire. Setting in silence a few minutes, he presently recollected he had a little commission to execute, and might as well attend to now as any time, put on his overcoat and went out, conjecturing within himself "what it was that ailed Annie!"

The lady was rather chagrined at her own want of self-command, and wondered "what would Fred think of her!" If she had only waited, when perhaps he was about to speak of the very subject so near her thoughts. She was very miserable from a variety of views of what had just passed between them. She worked busily, biting her lip nervously at the thoughts that would come, and finishing her part of Kitty's present retired early before her husband's return. When had he ever been out before, and she had not waited his return?

The next day was a busy one, in that it had for its to-morrow the Christmas. Annie Merrilus was again at Mrs. Meyers. The ladies had been schoolmates and friends, and the pleasant intimacy had scarcely had an interruption.

"I must show you the photograph Edgar has had taken for mother," said Mrs. Meyers. "It is more perfect I think than any he has had taken before. What improvements have been made in picture art, Annie, since your and my remembrance. I wonder, by the way, if Fred has that old daguerreotype of yours, taken so long ago. Do you know if he has?" and not waiting for an answer—Annie's face wearing an unmistakably inquiring expression—"I wonder if he never told you about it?" And then "Do you think these tassels are the right length? I declare, there are so many finishing things to do to all these articles for the tree! Did you say they were long enough? do you think so?" And the opinion being duly given, though rather mechanically, perhaps—"Did you really never know before you were married Fred had that picture? I wonder if you would know it was your own if you were to see it now!" and the lady laughed merrily. "It was that summer vacation I spent with you, you remember. Father and mother being gone to see Frances, and home not like home, your kind mother made me so happy by her warm invitation to spend the vacation with you, or at least the part of it that should pass before their return. What a dear delightful time that was! what a blessed home yours was! Dear Annie, much as I loved you, and happy as I always was with you, when the Goldings told me that your relatives were Friends, I had so different an opinion of them from what my after experience justified. I was a little afraid to venture. And when I found every one so kind and thoughtful for my comfort and enjoyment, the only check to my delight was rather a remorseful fear lest I had been unjust in thought towards those I had never seen. The one instance, when my private individualism came into any antagonism with the views entertained in your dear household, was, when your good grandpa was so grieved because you wanted to give me a daguerreotype of yourself I was so anxious to have taken." Mrs. Meyers looked up from threading her needle in time to catch the mystified yet absorbed expression on the face of Annie Merrilus. The lady laughed. "This reminds me of old story-telling times when we were children, and each turned narrator in turn for the other's edification. But don't you remember, Annie, how shocked grandpa was? how he said 'it all came of your being sent away to a fashionable school; things were turning out just as he had prophesied!' Your curls, too; you know after your long illness your hair came in so fast and curling, and I could not bear to see them gathered up, though it was only seldom I prevailed upon you in letting them fall their own free way. I'm afraid grandpa thought my influence rather bad over you. Though I remember when his talk, as we were together in the garden or he sat on the porch in his easy chair, was rather a reflection on my light-hearted follies, as he termed them, he would conclude with "Ellen, I believe thee to be a good girl at heart, my dear!" But when grandpa learned by the children's talk that we had gone to the new Daguerrean's to have our pictures taken, it was so much of a grief to him that your mother sent us word down to the artist's rooms not to have them taken. It was a little too late, however; you had set for the picture. You ordered it should not be finished. And this I suppose you thought the end of it. But not so. As I could not have your picture I determined I would at least obtain one of your curls, and as your mother proposed you should have them cut—Oh, Annie, I was rebellious then!—I selected a beautiful one, though you could arrange the others so as to hide the deficiency, and just having secured my treasure displayed it to Fred as I met him on the stairway.

"'Divide with me, Ellen!' he said, with a trepidation quite unlike his usual manner, 'give me part of this curl, and I will tell you what a daring boy I have been!'

"For Frederick I could do much, and I separated the curl. He had been to the Daguerrean's, he told me, and as he had hoped, the impression had not been effaced, and he succeeded in getting the picture. 'Ellen, I confess,' said he, 'I have some scruples about obtaining it in this manner, and as Annie's friend, I submit to you whether or not I may consider it as mine. I assure you it shall be sacred from every eye but my own. And as to my motive, my wish for its possession, I would not startle Annie's blessed little heart for the world, nor justly incur her parent's disapprobation by one premature word, but'—and you know Frederick Merrilus' look, dear, when he has made up his mind—"if little Annie Snowden is not my wife at some future day, no other woman shall be.'

"Frederick," continued Mrs. Meyers, "would have obtained a duplicate for me had I wished, but I knew I should have to keep it secret from you or betray Fred, and beside it seemed not quite right, and I preferred to wait till some time when your father might be in the city. The curl and the picture we never either of us alluded to after. How much darker your hair has grown since then, Annie! Ah, baby is waking! he's had a beautiful nap, and my work is just finished." And Mrs. Meyers left Annie, to appear again in all a mother's fondness with the little fellow in her arms.

Annie Merrilus was very glad to occupy herself with Master Eddy, to talk to the young gentleman in as unconnected a style as might chance to suit her feelings, and in making him the central object of interest, withdraw notice from herself as much as possible. All which pleased the little gentleman very much, and was in no way disagreeable to his devoted mamma. Altogether I think it was very opportune for Master Eddy and all concerned that he chose to take that particular moment to wake up in.

Fred came and took tea at Mrs. Meyers'; he remarked the change in Annie.

"Ellen, I believe Annie has not had half enough of your society lately. She has drooped for it. She has not looked as well in weeks as she does to-night. You have 'done her good as a medicine.'"

A sweet festival indeed was the sacred and beautiful service of the evening. The joyous chaunts and deep quivering organ tones bore Annie's glad and softened spirit into purer, clearer, higher atmosphere. And if we do not intrude upon the quiet home hour after church, there were truer picture element there than in the easy room when we first looked in upon it.

When Annie had told her husband something of what had been passing in her mind; when she had cleared up all those misty mornings and cloudy evenings to his mental vision; he did not call her "foolish little puss," nor yet laugh, that though he had heard of being afraid of one's own shadow, he had never known till now of the little woman that was jealous of her own picture. Though he smilingly looked into her eyes in rather an amused way when they talked the matter over, and those early days, yet he did none of these things.

"And so you went to Ellen with it!" he exclaimed, "the very person, since you chose to be unwilling to come to head-quarters, who could—"

But Annie interrupted him. "To Ellen! indeed no, my husband! Do not suppose I could ever go to a third person, however truly a friend, with anything affecting or relating to our perfect confidence in each other."

Which interruption gratified the true feeling of Frederick Merrillus very much.

In the beautiful light of the Christmas morning, Annie stood by a beautiful white rose tree, rich in abundant bud and bloom, one of her husband's Christmas gifts. She displayed the bright blending colors of the elegant trifle yet unfinished, she had intended for presentation this same day. "I am so sorry," she said, and a conscious blush overspread her features as she remembered how it was it had not been completed. "I am so sorry I did not get it finished for to-day."

"It is beautiful as it is, dear Annie; and if it were possible for it to be yet prettier than it is, and if it were finished, I should ask for a more precious gift still than even the exquisitely wrought piece of your always faultless handiwork. You have given me back yourself, given me what for a time I did not know how to find. I felt as though with you yet before me, in some unaccountable way I had lost you. Now give me a Christmas gift of perfect confidence, never again to be withheld. Do not conceal from me anything, whether of moment or however trifling, which gives you one moment's disquiet, and which by any possibility I could remove or explain. And I promise you the same. Concealment, or want of perfect ingenuousness is one of the most fruitful sources of dark hours and misapprehension, and in some cases may prove one of the greatest wrongs that could come between two loving hearts. And now, since I've been so bold as to make my own selection of Christmas gifts, dear wife, may I have it?"

A PENSIVE ODE FOR PENSIVE HEARTS.

BY FREDERICK WRIGHT.

SWEET is the voice of morning—sweet
The mellow notes that evening greet,
And sweet the song that noontide pours
From the recess of June-clad bowers;
Sweet to the warrior's ear the clank
Of marshall'd lists, as rank on rank
With thund'ring tread they seek the fray
That ends with life—or victory!

To hearts unbackney'd in the phrase
Of flattery, how sweet the praise
Of good men's homage, as it falls
Like sunlight on timeshatter'd walls!
And oh, the deep impassioned thrill,
That doth the yearning bosom fill,
When years of doubt, of toil, and shame,
Are blazoned on the scroll of Fame!

Yet neither morning, noon, nor eve—
All, all combined—a song can weave
As sweet as that which Friendship pours
Along life's joy-deserted hours!
Nor warrior's clank, nor trumpet loud,
Nor shout of hearts with glory proud
Can move the soul like Friendship's tone
As whispered to one ear alone!

The blazon'd scroll of fame may be
An altar of idolatry!
But that, nor praise however sweet,
With friendship's love can e'er compete—
That voice so blest! that love so rare!
Thank God! has been my lot to share
Through storm and tempest, pain and grief,
That heart's pure sunshine! brought relief!

SKATING FOR LADIES.

BY J. M. L.

WHY LADIES OUGHT TO SKATE, AND WHY THEY DO NOT.

Learn to skate, and the ice will give you a graceful, sweet, and poetic motion.—Emerson.

I LEARNED to skate very early ; I cannot now remember my precise age, but I know that about the time I mastered the "spread-eagle," and the "outside," my Latin grammar was the most serious difficulty of my existence, and I used to wish I could skate through it. Since that time—it is several years ago—I have seldom failed to use my skates on at least one day during each sufficiently severe frost to make sound ice. To my skates I am indebted for many a day's enjoyment—days that might, but for them, have been dull and uninteresting. But this is the least of the advantages I have derived from them ; confidence and strength are among the others. Emerson says, continuing the passage from which I have quoted above—"The cold will brace your limbs and brain to genius, and make you foremost men of time." A "foremost" man himself, and a great lover of skating and all motions and exercises that give grace and strength, he sets upon skating its real value—a very high one. I remember a good doctor saying—"Cricket-balls and skipping-ropes, skates and hoops, are the best physicians in the world if used with moderation, and early enough." He was right. If the people of a country are effeminate, it arises from the luxuries and restraints that are practised, and it is only necessary to extend the circle of outdoor exercises to counterbalance these. This brings me to the consideration of my subject—"Skating for Ladies."

Personally speaking, I have always regretted that more ladies do not skate, and considered that ladies ought to learn, because there are really so many reasons why ladies should skate, that I cannot decide which is the most important and entitled to the place of honor ; let me therefore select the one which will admit of no refutation, and is most agreeable—let me say because it is a pastime in which they would greatly excel. I am not quite sure that my regret has always been of the most disinterested kind. In cold Christmas weather, when a merry party was gathered in my father's house, it would have been much pleasanter not to have had to leave the young ladies at home while we went to the pool. Does the dear reader say, "Then why go at all?" I answer, "because the opportunities for skating are few and precious." How had the ladies used to beguile those hours that were so merry for us ? Let me draw you two pictures.

It is a bright, keen winter morning. Those of us addicted to the wholesome cold-water bath have to break the ice in our bath-tubs. Little Charlie has to breathe on the window-pane a long time before he can disperse the pictures of Arcadian dells and rough mountain passes which the fairy Frost has traced thereon in the silent night ; and almost before he has looked out the business of a new picture is commenced. The postman brings up the letter and tells us, "Yes, the lads are on the pool, and it would bear a wagon loaded with hay, or an army." The important business of breakfast is speedily dispatched. Skates are rubbed, and, gimlet in pocket, off we go, with—forgive us ladies—an impatient answer to your questions: "Is it quite safe? and how long will you stay?" "Stay? why, till dark, if the ice is good, of course."

After the warm breakfast-room the air is keen and sharp ; but it has a delicious freshness all its own, a briskness unknown to other mornings, that imparts itself to us as we anticipate the delights of a day on the ice. The trees are all draped with lace, to which the most exquisite manufactures of Valenciennes or Nottingham are nothing. The fieldfares and blackbirds are congregated in them, chattering as they make a scanty breakfast on the few frozen hips and haws that remain. The larks start up in a huge flock from the stubble, and utter their winter notes over our heads ; we remark that they have probably had no breakfast, the frost has robbed them of their food ; but then it has made the pool bear. This is to us sufficient, and so we pass on, feeling—if we are not in too great a hurry to reach the pool to feel—that, after all, it is Nature's doing, and not ours, if they are robbed of their breakfast.

At the pool we find the lads from the village, and not a few girls, too, sliding bravely up and down the smooth surface, and greatly exhilarated by the motion. Our skates are soon on, and ten minutes after we are "all a-glow," and in the enjoyment of the most delicious motion

I know. A graceful succession of circles or semi-circles, made with scarcely an effort, to which all the waltzes in the world are "as moonlight unto sunlight." The morning wears on, in the happiest way, and the delicious movements set every generous and pleasurable emotion vibrating.

Meanwhile, how does the morning wear with the ladies whom we left at the breakfast-table? They cannot ride; it would be cruel to the "poor feet" of the horses, to say nothing of the danger of slippery roads. They read and write letters, they gather around the fire and indulge in "small talk"—I beg pardon—or they knit, crochet, or embroider. I am not going to say one word against these pretty occupations. (I may remark, en passant, that therein ladies have a great advantage, being able to make nimble and good use of their fingers while carrying on the most animated conversation, whereas the most gentleman can, or, at least, the most they do do, under similar circumstances, is to smoke.) But are these the best occupations ladies can have on bright winter mornings? All days and nights answer for the purpose of embroidering; how very few afford an opportunity for skating! Do the fingers never grow tired, and is not the warmth of exercise out in the bracing air more pleasant than the artificial heat of burning coals? Ladies, try it.

I am drawing these pictures from a real experience; for me, the ladies, and the pool, and the frosty mornings to which I have referred, quite incidentally, and by way of illustration, have a real and tangible existence, and some of those ladies are now my happiest skating companions, and look, on a frosty winter evening, when the sun is setting, up to the church vane with as much interest as I do, to see if the wind is still easterly, and the frost likely to make sound ice.

It seldom happened that after luncheon they did not pay the pool a visit, and, thoughtful and charitable as ever, bring some pretty bags well stored with sandwiches. It was then that I felt most keenly what a great loss of pleasure ladies suffered by not skating. To me the cold air was exhilarating, delightful; as they stood upon the banks, it was to them painful, and they hurried back to the fireside for the remainder of the bright day. Perhaps an old arm-chair with runners—say a superannated rocking-chair from the nursery—was produced, and they, in turn, enjoyed being pushed before me round the pool. Still, that was not self-motion, not the airy, joyous, graceful exercise that dispersed the blood rapidly over my frame.

It was after such a visit that I determined to teach my sisters to skate. They tell me now that making a figure of 8 is the pleasantest occupation and the most enjoyable amusement that the whole year brings them. Clara says: "Walking is like prose, skating is like poetry," and really on the ice one does seem to move in rhythmical numbers. I never had a day's skating that I did not feel benefited mentally as much as physically, and, I believe, morally, too, for the action produces vigorous health, and a new, strong current of generous emotions.

There is no danger in skating, always providing that due precaution is taken relative to the soundness of the ice. Of the difficulties of learning, which by the way are always greatly exaggerated, I shall have more to say anon. The only real ones are the first step—perhaps I ought to say stroke—and the access to a place suitable for learning. I think I shall be able to show that neither of these are obstacles of sufficient importance to deprive ladies of what I am sure they would find as delightful an amusement as dancing, with this advantage, that the one would add to their strength and health as much as the other, by the late hours at which it is practised, impairs it. If I can do this, and can induce ladies generally to follow the excellent example set by a few of their number, I am confident they will be thankful for the addition to their somewhat limited number of amusements, of one of the purest and best sports practised by men. Experience has proved, in cases where ladies have adopted skating, that in it, as in dancing, they greatly excel, and are, if less adventurous than their brothers, far more graceful. But it is not only as an amusement that skating would benefit them, but as a wholesome and highly profitable exercise, which offers itself at a time when others cannot be had, and which will develop their strength and powers of endurance.

Ladies, then, ought to skate. Let me now proceed to consider why they do not.

I shall first of all deal with the weakest objection raised against it; but it is one, though puerile and paltry, which I feel to be very general. Paterfamilias objects to his daughter's skating, because he thinks it is unfeminine. This is one of those deplorable notions with regard to "proprieties," and what women may and may not do—

That seem to keep her up, but drag her down.

Is it unfeminine for ladies to be healthy, good walkers, with an upright gait, and a frame that is physically able to endure as much watching and working, if need be, as they are willing to undergo? Nothing I know is more conducive to these qualities than skating. Yet, say how many fathers, it is "unladylike," and the very same men do not object to their daughters dancing till long after midnight. When the skipping-rope has become too childish and hoop-bowling has lost its charm, there ought to be some substitute found that will do their work, and for the winter days a pair of skates offers the very best.

The real difficulties are the access to a sufficiently private place for learning, and the friendly initiation. It is, for obvious reasons, very desirable that a lady's first day on the ice should be only in the company of some few friends upon a pond not frequented by others. To ladies residing in provincial towns and villages, this difficulty is but slight. Half an hour's walk, at most, will bring them to some suitable place—some little pool (a large one is not required) where they may practise. The railways, too, offer ladies residing in the metropolis itself almost as great facilities. A day, aye, even the first day upon the ice will be delightful; and the second and third days will bring with them a degree of proficiency that will afford a new and pure enjoyment, and the cold weather will have a charm it has never had before. An occasional fall during the early days—and by no means a violent one—is the very worst that is to be anticipated by a lady who has a brother or friend, used to the ice, to accompany her. I have known ladies so attended learn without falling at all, and make fine, dashing figure-skaters in an almost incredibly short space of time. Confidence is the most essential quality; and here is another reason why the first attempts should not be made on crowded ponds, for it is impossible, where skaters are darting about, and many people are looking on, that any one should have confidence unless it has been acquired by experience. I have known strong, sturdy schoolboys so talked to about the difficulties of skating, and the falls they would have to undergo, that they have been timorous on the ice for days, and consequently tumbled about in every direction. This ought not to be. Another mistake is that it needs strong ankles. That is all nonsense; there is more stress upon the ankle in ten minutes' dancing than in an hour's skating.

Another reason why skating is not general among women is a natural objection each one feels towards taking the first step. That is, the first step among her own circle of friends.

A few, a very few, ladies do skate, and have done so now for many years. I have said that the pool to which I have referred has a real existence. It was there I first saw ladies skate, and they were, without exception, the best skaters I ever saw.

I would earnestly exhort fathers to buy their daughters each a pair of skates, and their brothers to teach them how to use them, with the full assurance that they will ever after be their pleasantest skating companions, their vis-a-vis in many an eight. It is a great folly, to say nothing of the positive wrong, to narrow the straitened limit of out-door amusements in which ladies are privileged to indulge. Here is one, offering a graceful occupation for days that are spent by them at the fireside, offering itself at a time when riding is generally impracticable, and walking insufficient for warmth; embrace it, and the interest of the scenes of our ponds and rivers during the frosts will be greatly increased, and skating will have a greater attraction, and be productive of more good than it ever has been in England.

MY CASKET OF GEMS.

BY MRS. WOLVERTON.

For thee I'll ope my casket lid,
 And thou shalt view my treasures hid;
 Here's thought, and feeling, fancy fair,
 And rich experience folded there.
 And memories too, in golden hours—
 Some woven were 'mid dreaching showers,
 Look closely down and thou wilt see
 Each raindrop wove a pearl for me.
 And roses fair, and mossy stone,
 I gleaned them o'er a pathway lone;
 So bright they seemed amidst the gloom,
 My casket gave them welcome room.
 And sunny hopes to cheer the way,
 When through the dark my feet must stray;
 And faith and trust, by angels given,
 To light me through the doubt to heaven.
 And gentle words for those I love,
 Sweet as the speech they use above;
 And friendship's smile, affection's tear,
 And pity's tone are garnered here.
 And happy love, so true, so bright,
 'Twould break the darkest, deepest night!
 By many friends the chain was twined,
 Around them all my heart-strings wind.
 They share my tear, my smile they claim,
 Each joy, each grief to me they name;
 'Mid sorrow dark upon my breast,
 They soothe the aching heart to rest.
 Yes, true, to me are treasures lent,
 To weave of life the sweet content;
 And one has said, "Where'er you go,
 Along your way you sunbeams strew."

NOVELTIES FOR DECEMBER.

SACQUE, DINNER DRESSES, WAIST, ETC.

FIG. 1.

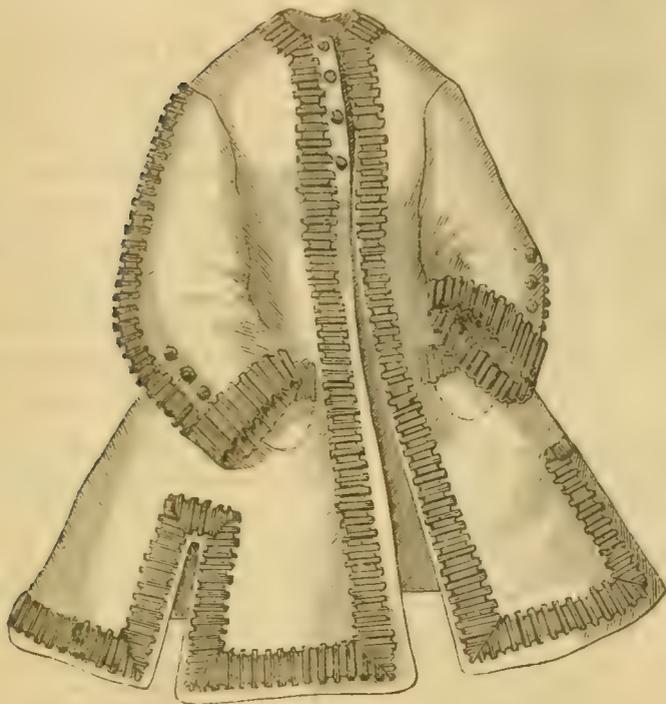

Fig. 1.—Fall or winter sacque. This style of wrap is very pretty for misses. It can be made of silk, or of any kind of cloth. It is trimmed with a ruching of velvet, silk, or cloth, either of the same shade as the material or darker. The latter has the more stylish appearance.

Fig. 2.—Dinner-dress of cuir-colored silk, made square both back and front, and trimmed with bands of black velvet, edged on each side with quillings of cuir-colored ribbon. Tassels of black chenille are placed both on the back and front of the corsage, as well as on the sleeves.

Fig. 3.—Dinner-dress of mauve silk, with a pelerine and plastron of black guipure, edged with a ribbon quilling. The sleeves are open from the elbow, and caught together by bands.

Fig. 4.—A new style of white muslin waist. The front has the appearance of a Garibaldi shirt, and the back is trimmed to resemble a jacket. The cuffs are composed of tucks, fluted ruffling, and fancy buttons.

Fig. 5.—Amazon collar, made of white linen, with one row of stitching on the edge. The tie is of black silk, doubled, with the ends embroidered in the new color called Blé de Turquie.

THE PSYCHE BUTTERFLY.

Materials.—Three yards of narrow gold braid, a skein of fine gold twine, one yard of gold spiral wire, and a skein each of white, light blue, and cerise fine silk.

This elegant ornament is now much used in ball-room costume, either as a headdress, when it is attached to the hair in the centre of the forehead, or on the left side of the head nearly at the back; it is also placed on the skirt of the dress to loop up the tunic or drapery, and it may be applied to a variety of articles, as pen-wipers, paperweights, screens, etc.

The sections of the wings are given, one showing the braid outline only, and the other the stitches, which are worked to attach the braids together. The wings and body are made separately, the latter being formed of plain crochet.

Commence by tracing the braid outline of one of the sections, and with a fine sewing-needle and thread tack the gold braid on the outline. These stitches should be taken across the braid, and not through it; then, with the blue silk and a sewing-needle, begin at the narrow part of the wing, and run the silk across the braids, darning it in and out of them eight or ten times; then work up the braids, joining them with rows of hem-stitch. The network above them is of the cerise silk, and formed of a succession of open button-hole stitches.

The rosettes in the centre of the circles are made of white silk, and to form them see the braid pattern in the preceding direction; the space between the two straight lines at the edge should be filled with blue silk.

When the work is finished, sew the gold wire round the edge of the braid, using the cerise silk, and at each side leave about two inches of the wire to form the legs. Commence now on the body.

THE BODY.—Work with the gold twine and Penelope crochet needle, No. 3. Commence with 4 chain stitches, and work a single stitch in the first chain to make it round.

Work 2 plain stitches in each of the 4 stitches, then 2 plain both in one stitch, and 3 plain in successive stitches, 8 times; it will now be 16 stitches round. Work 80 plain; stuff the work with a little piece of wool. Decrease by taking two stitches together and working them as one stitch; then 5 plain, and decrease again, 8 times; and for the head, work 2 stitches in 1, 5 times; then 6 plain; and for the antennæ, take 3 inches of the gold wire, and, leaving half of it in front, place it along the last round, and work it under for 3 plain stitches. Leave the other end in the front, work 4 plain, then 4 single, take 2 together 5 times, miss 1, and 1 single, 3 times; then 3 chain, miss 1, and 2 single on it; 3 chain again, miss 1, and 2 single on it, 1 single on the head, and fasten off. Sew two beads above the antennæ for the eyes; then sew the wings to the sides of the body, leaving the wire for the legs.

MUFFATEE.—DIAMOND PATTERN.

KNITTING.

Materials.—Half an ounce each of scarlet, black, and white single or double Berlin wool, according to the thickness required; a pair of knitting pins, No. 15 Bell gauge, measured in the circle.

With the black wool cast on 39 stitches.

1st row.—Make 1, by bringing the wool forward, slip 1 and knit 2 together; repeat to the end. This stitch is used throughout the pattern. Every three stitches form one rib. Join on the scarlet wool, and for the Scarlet half diamond, 2d row, make 1, slip 1, and knit the 2 stitches which cross together; repeat 5 times more, that is 6 ribs; turn back, leaving the 7 black ribs on the other pin.

3d.—Knit the 6 scarlet ribs.

4th.—Knit 5 ribs, turn back, leaving a scarlet rib.

5th.—Knit the 5 ribs.

6th.—Knit 4 ribs, turn back as before.

7th.—Knit the 4 ribs.

8th.—Knit 3 ribs, turn back.

9th.—Knit 3 ribs.

10th.—Knit 2 ribs, turn back.

11th.—Knit 2 ribs.

12th.—Knit 1 rib, turn back.

13th.—Knit 1 rib.

14th.—Knit 1 rib, then knit each of the 5 ribs left at the end of the previous rows, and on the black row knit the 7 ribs; then, commencing again at the 2d row, work to the end of the 13th row, so as to make a second half diamond at the other side. Join on the black wool.

15th.—Knit all the 13 ribs.

16th.—As the last row.

17th.—Knit 1 rib. Join on the white wool, and for the centre diamond knit 11 ribs; turn back, leaving one black rib.

18th.—Knit 10 ribs and turn back, leaving another rib; knit 9 ribs, turn back; knit 8 ribs, turn back; knit 7 ribs, turn back; knit 6 ribs, turn back; knit 5 ribs, turn back; knit 4 ribs, turn back; knit 3 ribs, turn back; knit 2 ribs, turn back; knit 2 ribs; then knit the 4 white ribs which were left at the previous rows. Join on the black wool, and knit the remaining rib.

19th. Black.—Knit all the 13 ribs.

20th.—As the last.

Join on the scarlet wool. Commence again at the 2d row, and repeat the pattern until 5 or 6 diamonds are made, according to the size wished: then cast off, and sew the first and last rows together.

KNITTED GAUNTLET.

Materials.—Some single Berlin wool, of any shade that may be preferred; one-eighth of a yard of plush; one-eighth of a yard of silk for lining; one yard of ribbon.

The season has now arrived for making these useful articles, which are so comfortably worn over a pair of kid gloves, when the weather is intensely cold. The portion of the gauntlet that covers the glove is knitted, and the gauntlet is made of plush, lined with silk and wadding, ornamented with a bow and ends of ribbon. Having only the glove to knit, a pair of these gauntlets would be quickly executed. The glove is knitted backwards and forwards (not round) in the following manner: Cast on 62 stitches. 1st row. Slip 1, *make 1, purl 1, knit 1, repeat from *, knit 1. 2d. Slip 1, *make 1, purl 1, knit 1, repeat from *, knit 1. It will thus be seen that the stitch that was purled in the preceding row will be knitted in the next, and so on. After having knitted 30 rows in this manner, the thumb must be commenced. This is made by casting on 10 stitches at each end of the knitting, making altogether 82 stitches. Fifty rows are required to make the thumb; and in knitting the extra 10 stitches at each end they must be diminished every now and then by knitting together the 4th and 5th stitch at the beginning and end. This diminishing must be done gradually, and at the end of the 50 rows there should be on the needle the same number of stitches as was commenced with; 20 more rows have now to be knitted, and the mitten is finished. The thumb is neatly sewn up, leaving the small opening at the top seen in the illustration. Our model is further ornamented on the back of the hand with 3 stripes of embroidered silk. This is very easily accomplished by taking 2 ribs of the knitting and working over them in coarse herring-bone stitch. The depth of the plush cuff is 4 inches, the length round 14 inches. This cuff should be shaped a little towards the glove portion, to suit the size of the bottom of the knitting.

FANCY PATTERN FOR PERFORATED CARD-BOARD.

WORK according to the patterns on perforated card-board, with split zephyr of any bright color. The first letter is "K," half of which is worked on one piece, and half on the other. After working each piece, join them back to back. Make two small cords and tassels of your zephyr, and place one in the centre of each end. By turning these cords quickly in the fingers, the words "Kiss Me" will appear."

GENTLEMEN'S DRIVING GLOVES.

Materials.—Black or white worsted, and seven knitting needles, Nos. 13, 14, or 15, according to the size of the hand. (The seven needles are used only in making the fingers.)

CAST on each of these needles 16 stitches, and close them into a round; after which, do one and a half or two inches of ribbed knitting, alternately knitting two and purling the same number. Do one plain round, and begin the pattern. 1st. round. * knit 3, purl 1, * all round. 2d. Plain knitting. 3d. * knit 1, purl 1, knit 2; * all round. 4th. Plain knitting. By continuing to work these four rounds, as directed, the purled stitches will always come over each other, at the distance of every fourth round, every alternate stitch being quite plain throughout the glove. After eight rounds, begin to raise the thumb, thus: purl 1, knit 1, bring a thread through and make another, purl 1. Continue the round as the others, observing that these purled stitches are always to be purled, and the increase for the thumb made between them. Increase at first every third round, then every second, finally every round, until you have got to the separation of the thumb, when you should have fourteen on the thumb, within the two purled stitches. Put all but these fourteen on three needles, and leave them, so as to finish the thumb; divide the stitches on two needles, and cast four on a third; form into a round, and knit round and round (in the pattern) until sufficient is done. Then gradually close and fasten off. Take up the edge of the four stitches cast on, and add to the rest for the hand. Knit about one and a half inches in depth, from the thumb, then the fingers. The little finger has twelve, and four extra cast on to come between it and the third; knit round the needful length, and close. The third finger must have five stitches from the front, and the same number from the back of the hand, with four also that were cast on for the little finger, and five to be cast on between the back and front, next the second finger; this, of course, must be longer. The middle finger has seven stitches from the back of the hand, and six from the front, with the cast-on stitches between it and the third, and also five fresh ones, next the forefinger: this is the longest of all. The forefinger has the remaining stitches, with those cast on between it and the middle finger; and when finished, it completes the glove. The ends are drawn in, and darned down on the other side. The pattern must be maintained throughout; and to make the gloves set well the stitches cast on at the separation of the thumb must run up the front of the forefinger. Sew wash-leather on the thumb and forefinger of the right hand.

CROCHET PELERINE.

Materials.—One-half a pound of white Berlin wool; one-quarter of a pound of blue ditto; two ounces of speckled wool.

WE can recommend our subscribers to make themselves one of these useful pelerines, as they will find them a most convenient and comfortable addition to their wardrobe. They are extremely easy to make, and form a pleasant occupation for the long winter evenings. These little pelerines reach to the waist, and close at the throat, and are worn underneath a mantle out of doors; or they make an exceedingly comfortable wrap, on a cold winter's evening to put on in coming from a theatre or place of public amusement. Being arranged without sleeves, they are easily put on and taken off. Our model is made of blue, white, and speckled wool, arranged in stripes; and the manner in which these stripes are crocheted, whether broad or narrow, must, of course, be left to individual taste. It would be superfluous to give directions for working every row, as the stitches are all the same, and the shape of the pelerine is formed by increasing in every row down the centre of the back, and on each side of the front, as will be seen on referring to our illustration. Make a chain rather longer than the size of the neck (as it diminishes in the working.) 1st row. 5 chain, * 2 treble, 1 chain, miss 1, repeat from * until the middle of the row is reached. Into this stitch make 4 treble instead of 2, with a chain between, and work to the end of the row. 2d. Turn, 3 chain, 2 long into space of previous row. We may here mention that all the treble stitches are worked into the spaces, and not into the chain of previous row. 1 chain, 3 treble, until the middle of the row is reached, when work a double quantity of treble stitches, then 1 chain, 3 treble, to the end of the row. 3d. 3 chain, 2 treble, into the space of preceding row, then 1 chain, 3 treble, to the end of the row, increasing as usual down the centre of the back. From the description of these 3 rows, it will at once be seen how the remainder of the pelerine is worked, always bearing in mind to increase at the commencement and in the centre of every row. When the foundation of the pelerine is crocheted, a row should be worked all round, consisting of 1 chain and 3 treble; this finishes off the sides neatly and nicely. A small collar may be added, if liked (this is, however, not necessary), by crocheting into the foundation round the neck, and working 3 or 4 rows, in the same manner as the pelerine. This little collar is finished off round the edge with a row of double crochet worked into every stitch. The fringe which ornaments the bottom of the pelerine is easily made. It consists of lengths of partridge and blue wool, knotted alternately into every space and treble stitch of the bottom row. A piece of plaited wool, with a pair of tassels at each end, is run round the neck, with which the pelerine is fastened. The arrangement of color in our model is as follows: 10 rows of white, 1 row of blue, 1 row of speckled, 4 rows of blue, 1 row of speckled, 1 row of blue all round. Fringe, blue and speckled.

CARRIAGE BOOT.

Materials.—Three skeins each of black and scarlet double Berlin wool, and needle No. 9, Bell gauge.

Commence with the black wool and make a chain of 50 stitches.

1st row.—Miss the first chain stitch, put the needle into the next chain stitch, take up the wool on a needle and draw it through in a loop; * keep the 2 loops on the needle, put the needle into the next chain stitch and repeat from * until the 50 loops are raised.

Work 9 rows more the same, changing the colors at each end throughout the boot, so that all the loops are raised with black, and worked back with the scarlet. The work should be tight, so that this piece measures 11 inches in length.

Work 5 rows more the same, but decreasing a stitch in the centre of each row. To decrease, two black loops should be taken on the needle and worked as one stitch.

16th row.—Decrease the first two loops, raise the rest, and take the last 2 loops together to decrease; work back.

17th.—Plain, but increasing a stitch in the centre. To increase, the needle should be inserted in the scarlet, between two black stitches, and the wool brought through in a loop as usual.

18th.—Decrease the first 2 stitches, raise the rest to the centre; then increase a loop as before, raise the rest, decreasing the last 2 loops; work back.

19th.—Plain, but increasing a stitch in the centre.

20th.—As the 18th row.

21st.—As the 19th row.

22d.—Decrease a stitch at the beginning and end of the row.

23d.—All plain.

Repeat the last 2 rows until it is decreased to 24 stitches, which finishes the boot; and, it being made on a new plan, it is as well to state that the last row, when joined, forms the toe, the two slanting sides the front, and the first row the back of the boot.

To make up the boot, it will require a pair of cork soles bound with ribbon, and a half yard of scarlet silk or flannel. Cut the flannel the shape of the work, allowing half an inch for turnings.

Double the foundation row in half and sew the sides together, drawing about 6 stitches in the centre close, to form the heel; then sew up the toe.

To join the slanting sides which form the front, commence at the toe with the black wool, and work a row of single crochet, thus: keep the wool at the back, put the needle into a stitch of the right selvedge, and then into the left selvedge, bring the wool through them and also through the loop on the needle; repeat. Then round the top of the boot work 6 rows of plain crochet backwards and forwards very loosely, working 2 stitches in the first stitch of each row; and for the last row, work 1 scarlet and 1 black stitch alternately, continuing the same down the sides of the black rows, and ending at the first stitch of the row. Fasten off.

Turn the boot on the wrong side, place the lining over it, and slightly quilt it to the work; then turn it on the right side, and sew on the sole. The plain rows at the top should be turned down over the boot, and the points fastened with a button.

work one double, in each stitch, and in the centre work 2 stitches in one, work 16 rows, always working 2 stitches, in the centre; work 2 rows of each color.

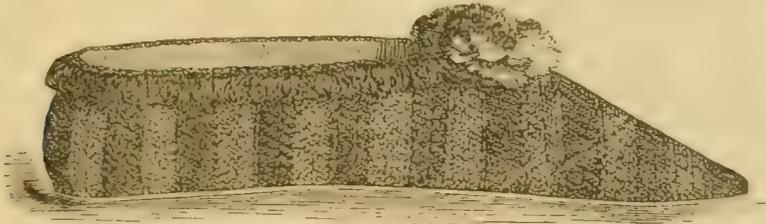

Commence for the sides on the 11th stitch, and work 44 rows, 2 rows of each color; join the 11 stitches on the other side of the front. Work 1 row in single-crochet, with 1 chain, between each stitch, all round.

Make the fringe in black wool (thus), pass the wool round the mesh, and work 1 single stitch, then 1 chain, pass the wool round the mesh, and repeat, until sufficient is made to go round the shoe, then sew it on.

Cut a piece of silk, the size and shape of the shoe, for the lining, turn the edges down, and sew neatly all round; then sew on the cork sole, turn the shoe to the right side, and run

A WARM OVER-SHOE, IN CROCHET.

Materials—1 ounce of black double Berlin wool, 1 ditto scarlet, 3 yards of narrow scarlet ribbon, a pair of cork soles 10 inches in length, a flat mesh half an inch in width; bone crochet-hook, No. 13, Bell-gauge.

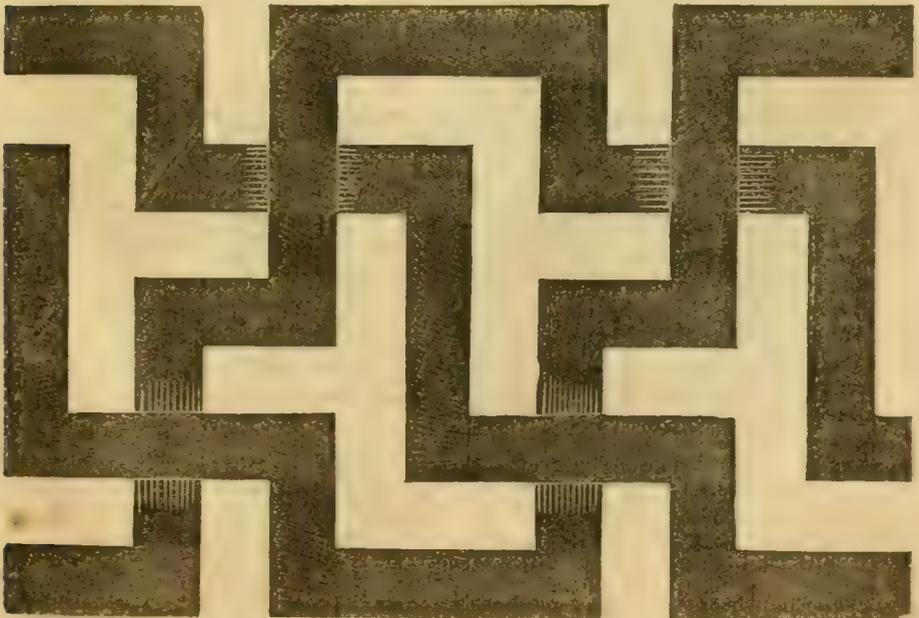

The shoe is worked throughout in double crochet.

in a piece of the ribbon under the fringe, to draw it in a little, make the rosette, and sew it on the front.

Make a chain of 16 stitches, miss 1 stitch, and

PLUM PUDDING AND OTHER RECEIPTS FOR CHRISTMAS.

We give a number of receipts for puddings, pies, cakes, etc., that will be of great use to our lady friends during the Christmas holidays.

A CHRISTMAS PLUM PUDDING, WITH OR WITHOUT EGGS.—Take two pounds of bread crumbs that have been well sifted through a colander; two tablespoonfuls of flour; half an ounce of ground allspice, and one pound of brown moist sugar; rub these ingredients thoroughly well together; chop one pound of suet very fine, and thoroughly mix in with the other things. Wash well in tepid water a pound and a half of raisins, and stone them, or two pounds of Sultan's raisins, which require no stoning, and are equally good, though more expensive; chop these, not too fine, and well mix in; then a pound of well-washed currants, and a quarter of a pound of candied peel, cut into lumps, not slices. Having mixed all this together well, make the whole sufficiently moist with a little milk; well butter one or more large basins; well press the mixture into the bottom of each (or they will not turn out in good shape), and when filled to a trifle above the brim of the basin, spread some flour on the top, and tie the basin down with a well-wetted cloth; place the pudding in boiling water, let it boil up rapidly, and so continue for four hours; then take it up, remove the cloth but do not turn it out of the basin. The next day, or when wanted for use, put the pudding to warm, with the basin still on, for two hours, in a moderately warm oven, then take it out, turn it from the basin on to the dish in which it is to be sent to table. With the handle of a teaspoon, or the blade of a fruit-knife, make incisions in different parts of the pudding, and pour on some sherry wine, then sift powdered sugar over. It is obvious that this pudding must be made the day before it is required for use, and it is much better for being so. Eggs are not necessary to give either richness or flavor, or to "bind the pudding;" the milk and the flour will do that. Eggs render the mass thoroughly indigestible, but if they must still be had—and re-again, put that they are not needed—eight eggs, well beaten and strained, can be used instead of the milk. Great care is necessary in all puddings of the kind, not to make them too wet, or they will be heavy; and to thoroughly mix the ingredients separately.

CHRISTMAS PLUM PUDDING.—A pound of suet, cut in pieces not too fine, a pound of currants, and a pound of raisins stoned, four eggs, half a grated nutmeg, an ounce of citron and lemon-peel, shred fine, a teaspoonful of beaten ginger, half a pound of bread-crumbs, half a pound of flour, and a pint of milk; beat the eggs first, add half the milk, beat them together, and by degrees stir in the flour, then the suet, spice, and fruit, and as much milk as will mix it together very thick; then take a clean cloth, dip in boiling water, and squeeze dry. While the water is boiling fast, put in your pudding, which should boil at least five hours.

Another way.—Seven ounces raisins, seeded and a little chopped; seven ounce currants, well washed and picked; one and a half ounce citron; three ounces of beef suet, chopped very fine; three-quarters of a nutmeg, grated; one-quarter of a (teaspoonful) of cinnamon; five eggs well beaten up; four tablespoonfuls of sugar; five tablespoonfuls of wheat flour; half a lemon-peel, grated; one glass of brandy and one glass of Madeira; a little milk to mix, sufficient to make rather a thick batter. The whole must be well mixed. The above mixture to be put into a well-buttered basin. Tie a pudding cloth over, and pin the four corners over the top. Put into boiling water, and to be kept boiling, without ceasing for five hours. We have tried this receipt, and know it to be excellent.

CURRANT CAKE.—One cup of butter, three eggs, one cup of water or milk, half a teaspoonful of saleratus, nutmeg, cup of currants.

LIGHT CAKE.—Put a small quantity of flour into a mug, mix it with very good milk, with a lump of butter the size of an egg, a little barm, an egg, a teaspoonful of honey, and a little ginger; beat them well, and let them rise before baking.

LITTLE PLUM CAKES TO KEEP LONG.—Dry one pound of flour, and mix with six ounces of finely-pounded sugar; beat six ounces of butter to a cream, and add to three eggs well beaten, half a pound of currants nicely dried, and the flour and sugar; beat all for some time, then dredge flour on tin plates, and drop the batter on them the size of a walnut. If properly mixed, it will be a stiff paste. Bake in a brisk oven.

RICH PLUM PUDDING.—Stone carefully one pound of the best raisins, wash and pick one pound of currants, chop very small one pound of fresh beef-suet, blanch and chop small or pound two ounces of sweet almonds and one ounce of bitter ones; mix the whole well together, with one pound of sifted flour, and the same weight of crumb of bread soaked in milk, then squeezed dry and stirred with a spoon until reduced to a mash, before it is mixed with the flour. Cut in small pieces two ounces each of preserved citron, orange, and lemon-peel, and add a quarter of an ounce of mixed spice; quarter of a pound of moist sugar should be put into a basin, with eight eggs, and well beaten together with a three-pronged fork; stir this with the pudding, and make it of the proper consistence with milk. Remember that it must not be made too thin, or the fruit will sink to the bottom, but be made to the consistence of good thick batter. Two wineglassfuls of brandy should be poured over the fruit and spice, mixed together in a basin, and allowed to stand three or four hours before the pudding is made, stirring them occasionally. It must be tied in a cloth, and will take five hours of constant boiling. When done, turn it out on a dish, sift loaf-sugar over the top, and serve it with wine-sauce in a boat, and some poured round the pudding.

The pudding will be of considerable size, but half the quantity of materials, used in the same proportion, will be equally good.

BOILED PLUM PUDDING.—The crumbs of a small loaf, half a pound each of sugar, currants, raisins, and beef-suet shred, two ounces of candied peel, three drops of essence of lemon, three eggs, a little nutmeg, a tablespoonful of flour. Butter the mould, and boil them five hours. Serve with brandy-sauce.

A GOOD POUND-CAKE.—Beat one pound of butter to a cream, and mix with it the whites and yolks of eight eggs beaten apart. Have ready, warm by the fire, one pound of flour, and the same of sifted sugar; mix them and a few cloves, a little nutmeg and cinnamon, in fine powder together; then by degrees work the dry ingredients into the butter and eggs. When well beaten, add a glass of wine and some caraways. It must be beaten a full hour. Butter a pan, and bake it an hour in a quick oven.

The above proportions, leaving out four ounces of the butter, and the same of sugar, make a less luscious cake, and to most tastes a more pleasant one.

A RICH CHRISTMAS PUDDING.—One pound of raisins, stoned, one pound of currants, half a pound of beef-suet, quarter of a pound of sugar, two spoonfuls of flour, three eggs, a cup of sweetmeats, and a wineglass of brandy. Mix well, and boil in a mould eight hours.

A GOOD CHRISTMAS PUDDING.—One pound of flour, two pounds of suet, one pound of currants, one pound of plums, eight eggs, two ounces of candied peel, almonds and mixed spice according to taste. Boil gently for seven hours.

COMMON CRULLERS OR TWIST CAKES.—Mix well together half a pint of sour milk, or buttermilk, two teacupfuls of sugar, one teacupful of butter, and three eggs, well-beaten; add to this a teaspoonful of saleratus dissolved in hot water, a teaspoonful of salt, half a nutmeg grated, and a teaspoonful of powdered cinnamon; sift in flour enough to make a smooth dough: roll it out not quite a quarter of an inch thick; cut in small oblong pieces; divide one end in three or four parts like fingers, and twist or plait them over each other. Fry them in boiling lard. These cakes may be cut in strips, and the ends joined, to make a ring, or in any other shape.

SOFT CRULLERS.—Sift three-quarters of a pound of flour, and powder half a pound of loaf-sugar; heat a pint of water in a round-bottomed saucepan, and when quite warm, mix the flour with it gradually; set half a pound of fresh butter over the fire in a small vessel; and when it begins to melt, stir it gradually into the flour and water; then add by degrees the powdered sugar and half a grated nutmeg. Take the saucepan off the fire, and beat the contents with a wooden spaddle or spatula till they are thoroughly mixed; then beat six eggs very light, and stir them gradually into the mixture. Beat the whole very hard till it becomes a thick batter. Flour a pasteboard very well, and lay out the batter upon it in rings (the best way is to pass it through a screw funnel). Have ready, on the fire, a pot of boiling lard of the very best quality; put in the crullers, removing them from the board by carefully taking them up, one at a time, on a broad-bladed knife. Boil but few at a time. They must be of a fine brown. Lift them out on a perforated skimmer, draining the lard from them back into the pot; lay them on a large dish, and sift powdered white sugar over them.

CHRISTMAS CAKE.

To two pounds of flour well sifted unite
Of loaf-sugar ounces sixteen;
Two pounds of fresh butter, with eighteen fine eggs,
And four pounds of currants washed clean;
Eight ounces of almonds well blanched and cut small,
The same weight of citron sliced;
Of orange and lemon-peel candied one pound,
And a gill of pale brandy uniced;
A large nutmeg grated: exact half an ounce
Of allspice, but only a quarter
Of mace, coriander, and ginger well ground,
Or pounded to dust in a mortar.
An important addition is cinnamon, which
Is better increased than diminished;
The fourth of an ounce is sufficient. Now this May be baked four good hours till finished.
DOUGH-NUTS.—Take three pounds of flour, one pound of butter, one and a half pound of sugar; cut the butter fine into the flour; beat six eggs light, and put them in; add two wine-glasses of yeast, one pint of milk, some cinnamon, mace and nutmeg; make it up into a light dough, and put it to rise. When it is light enough, roll out the paste, cut it in small pieces, and boil them in lard.

FRUIT CAKE.—Take one pound of butter and one pound of sugar, and beat them together with the yolks of eight eggs; beat the whites separately; mix with these one and a half pound of flour, one teacupful of cream, one wineglassful of brandy and one of wine, one nutmeg, one teaspoonful of mace, one teaspoonful of cloves, two teaspoonfuls of cinnamon, one salt-spoonful of salt, three-quarters of a pound of raisins, stoned, three-quarters of a pound of currants, half a pound of citron; mix with the flour two teaspoonfuls of yeast powder.

WASHINGTON CAKE.—Beat together one and a half pound of sugar, and three-quarters of a pound of butter; add four eggs well beaten, half a pint of sour milk, and one teaspoonful of saleratus, dissolved in a little hot water. Stir in gradually one and three-quarter pound of flour, one wineglassful of wine or brandy, and one nutmeg, grated. Beat all well together.

This will make two round cakes. It should be baked in a quick oven, and will take from fifteen to thirty minutes, according to the thickness of the cakes.

QUEEN CAKE.—Mix one pound of dried flour, the same of sifted sugar and of washed currants; wash one pound of butter in rose-water, beat it well, then mix with it eight eggs, yolks and whites beaten separately, and put in the dry ingredients by degrees; beat the whole an hour; butter little tins, teacups, or saucers, filling them only half full; sift a little fine sugar over just as you put them into the oven.

LEMON GINGERBREAD.—Grate the rinds of two or three lemons, and add the juice to a glass of brandy; then mix the grated lemon in one pound of flour, make a hole in the flour, pour in half a pound of treacle, half a pound of butter melted, the lemon-juice, and brandy, and mix all up together with half an ounce of ground ginger and quarter of an ounce of Cayenne pepper.

SEED CAKE.—Beat one pound of butter to a cream, adding gradually a quarter of a pound of sifted sugar, beating both together; have ready the yolks of eighteen eggs, and the whites of ten, beaten separately; mix in the whites first, and then the yolks, and beat the whole for ten minutes; add two grated nutmegs, one pound and a half of flour, and mix them very gradually with the other ingredients; when the oven is ready, beat in three ounces of picked caraway-seeds.

PUMPKIN PUDDING.—Take one pint of pumpkin that has been stewed soft and pressed through a colander; melt in half a pint of warm milk a quarter of a pound of butter and the same quantity of sugar, stirring them well together; one pint of rich cream will be better than milk and butter; beat eight eggs very light, and add them gradually to the other ingredients alternately with the pumpkin; then stir in a wineglass of rose-water and two glasses of wine mixed together, a large teaspoonful of powdered mace and cinnamon mixed, and a grated nutmeg. Having stirred the whole very hard, put it into a buttered dish, and bake it three-quarters of an hour.

LEMON CAKE.—Beat six eggs, the yolks and whites separately, till in a solid froth; add to the yolks the grated rind of a fine lemon and six ounces of sugar dried and sifted; beat this a quarter of an hour; shake in with the left hand six ounces of dried flour; then add the whites of the eggs and the juice of the lemon; when these are well beaten in, put it immediately into tins, and bake it about an hour in a moderately hot oven.

CLOVE CAKE—One pound of sugar, one pound of flour, half pound of butter, four eggs, a teaspoonful of sal-ratus, a cup of milk, a teaspoonful of powdered mace, same of cinnamon, same of cloves; fruit, if you choose.

MINCHEPAT.—Six pounds of currants, three pounds of raisins stoned, three pounds of apples chopped fine, four pounds of suet, two pounds of sugar, two pounds of beef, the peel and juice of two lemons, a pint of sweet wine, a quarter of a pint of brandy, half an ounce of mixed spice. Press the whole into a deep pan when well mixed.

Another way—Two pounds of raisins, three pounds of currants, three pounds of beef-suet, two pounds of moist sugar, two ounces of citron, one ounce of orange-peel, one small nutmeg, one pottle of apples chopped fine, the rind of two lemons and juice of one, half a pint of brandy; mix well together. This should be made a little time before wanted for use.

MINCHE PIES—Take a pound of beef, free from skin and strings, and chop it very fine; then two pounds of suet, which likewise pick and chop; then add three pounds of currants nicely cleaned and perfectly dry, one pound and a half of apples, the peel and juice of a lemon, half a pint of sweet wine, half a nutmeg, and a few cloves and mace, with pimento in fine powder; have citron, orange, and lemon-peel ready, and put some in each of the pies when made.

MOLASSES PIE.—Four eggs—beat the whites separate—one teaspoonful of brown sugar, half a nutmeg, two table-spoonfuls of butter, beat them well together; stir in one teaspoonful and a half of molasses, and then add the white of eggs. Bake on pastry.

CREAM PIE (à la).—Half pound of butter, four eggs, sugar, salt, and nutmeg to your taste, and two table-spoonfuls of arrowroot wet; pour on it a quart of boiling milk, and stir the whole together. To be baked in deep dishes.

GINGER SPONGE-CAKE.—One cup of molasses, one cup of butter, two cups of sugar, four eggs, three cups of flour, one cup of milk, soda, and ginger.

FRENCH JUMBLES.—One pound and a half of flour, one pound of sugar, three quarters of a pound of butter, three eggs; dissolve one teaspoonful of soda in one-half cup of milk; add this, also one nutmeg, and roll out the dough, and cut into small cakes of any shape, and bake them in a quick oven.

HOW TO COOK POULTRY.

TO BOIL A TURKEY.—Make a stuffing as for veal; or if you wish a plain stuffing, pound a cracker or some bread-crumbs very fine, chop raw salt pork very fine, sift some sage and any other sweet herbs that are liked, season with pepper, and mould them together with the yolk of an egg; put this under the breast, and tie it closely. Set on the turkey in boiling water enough to cover it; boil very slowly, and take off the scum as it rises. A large turkey will require more than two hours' boiling; a small one an hour and a half. Garnish with fried forcemeat, and serve with oyster or celery sauce.

Or: Fill the body with oysters, and let it boil by steam without any water. When sufficiently done, take it up, strain the gravy that will be found in the pan, and which, when cold, will be a fine jelly; thicken it with a little flour and butter, add the liquor of the oysters intended for sauce, also stewed, and warm the oysters up in it; whiten it with a little boiled cream, and pour it over the turkey.

TO ROAST A TURKEY.—Prepare a stuffing of pork sausage-meat, one beaten egg, and a few crumbs of bread; or, if sausages are to be served with the turkey, stuffing as for fillet of veal; in either, a little shred shallot is an improvement. Stuff the bird under the breast; dredge it with flour, and put it down to a clear, brisk fire; at a moderate distance the first half hour, but afterwards nearer. Baste with butter; and when the turkey is plumped up, and the steam draws towards the fire, it will be nearly done; then dredge it lightly with flour, and baste it with a little more butter, first melted in the basting ladle. Serve with gravy in the dish and bread sauce in a tureen. It may be garnished with sausages, or with fried forcemeat, if veal stuffing be used. Sometimes the gizzard and liver are dipped into the yolk of an egg, sprinkled with salt and Cayenne, and then put under the pinions before the bird is put to the fire. A very large turkey will require three hours' roasting; one of eight or ten pounds, two hours; and a small one, an hour and a half.

TO ROAST A GOOSE—Geese seem to bear the same relation to poultry that pork does to the flesh of other domestic quadrupeds; that is, the flesh of geese is not suitable for, or agreeable to, the very delicate in constitution. One reason, doubtless, is that it is the fashion to bring it to table very rare done; a detestable mode!

Take a young goose, pick, singe and clean well. Make the stuffing with two ounces of onions (about four common sized), and one ounce of green sage chopped very fine; then add a large coffee cup of stale bread-crumbs and the same of mashed potatoes; a little pepper and salt, a bit of butter as big as a walnut, the yolk of an egg or two; mix these well together, and stuff the goose. Do not fill it entirely; the stuffing requires room to swell. Spit it, tie the spit at both ends to prevent its swinging round, and to keep the stuffing from coming out. The fire must be brisk. Baste it with salt and water at first, then with its own dripping. It will take two hours or more to roast it thoroughly.

A green goose, that is, one under four months old, is seasoned with pepper and salt instead of sage and onions. It will roast in an hour.

SAUCE FOR A ROASTED GOOSE.—Put into a saucepan a table-spoonful of made mustard, half a teaspoonful of Cayenne pepper, a glass of port wine, and a gill of gravy; mix, and warm, and pour it through a slit in the apron into the body of the goose, just before serving.

CHRISTMAS IS COMING.

This is the month, and soon will come the morn
Wherein the Son of Heaven's eternal King,
Of wedded maid and virgin mother born,
Our great Redeemer from above did bring.

MILTON.

For many, many years, we have greeted our friends from this our place in the Lady's Book with our warmest Christmas wishes for their happiness, and offered our sincere thanks for their many and long-continued favors.

In the midst of the cheering influences of this blessed season, sad thoughts must press on bereaved hearts and households, and over the bright hopes which have been, in our circle of friends, dimmed during the year! How many mourners have wept since we last offered our merry Christmas greeting! But God is good; for every grief he has given a balm; for every trouble a hope; and the benevolent order of His laws casts a softening veil over sorrow, while new delights and new enjoyments are ever offered to the bright young hearts that are coming out to gaze at the new Christmas sun, and wonder that there can be care or sorrow in such a beautiful world.

To all these happy hearts we commend our ornamented FRONTISPIECE, which portrays very truthfully the different pleasures of the Christmas anniversary. In the country we see the gathering of pine branches by a joyful company of merry lads, and the sledding through the brisk, snowy atmosphere. In the next compartment we see the happy, loving family gathered to hear the Christmas story of the wondrous Babe of Bethlehem, and of the bright angels that came down from heaven with the news of "good-will to men." Then the little pet of the family, dressed in holiday finery, with arms full of the treasures brought by Kristkinkel, has her place. Opposite her see grandmamma, about to put on her glasses for the enjoyment of a Photograph Album adorned with the faces of her dear ones.

All these are pictures of Christmas enjoyments realized, not in one place, but in thousands; ay, millions of households will this month taste the bounty of our Heavenly Father, who has provided these various pleasures for us, and has fitted our dispositions and minds to draw happiness from the gifts of His goodness.

Is it not a cheering thought that the anniversary of the message of "good-will to men" is near, that Christmas will reannounce the glorious promise of salvation and eternal blessedness to all who love the Lord Jesus Christ and do His will? The love is treasured in our hearts, and known, in its truth and purity, to God only; but it is seen in the world and known as it goes out in good works.

The great question for each to answer is, "What good work have I done since last Christmas?"

When our duties are useful and are defined, if we have faithfully performed them, have we not done good? The Editors of the Lady's Book have faithfully endeavored to benefit those for whom their work is prepared, and now, as the year is closing, we offer our cordial congratulations to our happy friends, and our sincere sympathies to those who are sorrowing, hoping to meet them all and welcome in the important year of 1864.

LITERARY WOMEN DURING THE YEAR 1863.

In this brief notice we can mention only one race, the Anglo-Saxon. The American branch has done very little. Who plants flowers or gathers fruits while the earthquake or the whirlwind is upon them? War is a terrible evil to women. Even their works of love and mercy seem done under a pall, and are sad, because the need of these services for the victims of battle is woful, and has been caused by wrong-doing.

"The poor ye shall always have with you," said the Divine Saviour. Poverty is the appointment of Providence; but wars are to cease when righteousness reigns. Let us pray that the blessed time may soon come. Not till then will the genius of woman have its proper cultivation, its perfect development, and its purifying influence on humanity.

In the old country of Anglo-Saxondom British women have, during the past year, been greatly distinguished by their literary productions, chiefly biographies and works of fiction. We are sorry to add that a great portion are what is termed "sensation novels." Among these, three hold pre-eminence in their distinctive class; as the passionate in "LOST AND SAVED," by the Honorable Mrs. Norton; the intellectual in "ROMOLA," by Miss Evans; and the domestic in "SQUIRE TREVLYN'S HEIR," by Mrs. Wood.

Next to newspapers, novels are now probably more read than any other kind of literature. Demanding no stress of thought, no weary wear of brain, they afford amusement in one's chair, without the trouble of going abroad to seek it. With book in hand, we feel as if we had some semblance of intelligent employment; and thus the months go by, and novel reading has become the fashion, and new novels the want of every-day life. Whether the habit will be baneful or beneficial depends much on the character of the books that become popular.

"LOST AND SAVED" is, we are sorry to say, unworthy of the genius and fame of its authoress. Mrs. Norton, as a poetess, is now in the first rank of living writers of her sex. It is a great pity she should have stooped to imitate the sensation school of French writers, who seem to say, "Evil, be thou my good." If the British aristocracy be faithfully pictured in these volumes, the nobles of that proud land must have stepped into the bog of corruption beyond the French of the old regime.

MISS EVANS is a very different writer; she has genius of a loftier kind, but not the elegance nor the polish of Mrs. Norton. Belonging to a different order of English society, Miss Evans very properly and sensibly describes what she knows, and with a mastery skill paints the manners and character of the middle classes. In analyzing the emotions of the human heart, which throbs with the same impulses in the laborer and in the lord, she is unrivalled as a writer of fiction, and thus in the delineation of character she excels all her sister novelists. In this last work, "Romola," she takes a high place in the historical romance, showing great knowledge of Italy in her antiquities and mediæval celebrities. We prefer her striking pictures of English life. Still, this last work possesses much merit, and its moral tendency is right and elevating, as is seen in the contrast between Romola and the selfish Tito.

But the great heart of the people is more moved by the homelier pictures of Mrs. Henry Wood, who has shown herself mistress of the art of story-telling. She might be a rival of Scheherazade herself in the rapidity of her compositions. Her language is often incorrect, and her style far from elegant; yet the first is significant, and the last clear; and she has the art of wonderfully sustaining the attention; even fastidious people find themselves compelled to read her volumes to the end and to acknowledge their interest. Therefore, that she is always on the side of right and duty we consider a great good to her readers and a great honor to her. She never throws fanciful interest around vice; her heroes are not manufactured out of "misericordias;" nor does she interest our feelings on the side of sentimental woes while the real but humble sufferer is forgotten. She has, we must own, an ardent leaning to the supernatural, and sometimes manages her machinery very cleverly. On the whole, we think her novels of this year are worthy of much praise, and that "Squire Trevlyn's Heir" and "Mrs. Halliburton's Troubles" are works that will live till another Christmas.

DEACONESSES' INSTITUTIONS AND PROTESTANT SISTERHOODS.

INFORMATION concerning these modes of doing good has been much needed in our land; we rejoice that it is now furnished.

In a pamphlet* remarkable for its close research and clear reasoning, and also for the integrity with which it sets forth the Bible way of woman's work as a helper in the Christian Church, the idea is advanced and sustained that "a parochial order of deaconesses is what is wanted for our age and country." By this is meant "a womanly ministrations, responsible to the clergy, stimulating and gathering together the working elements of the Church, looking after the poor, sick, and fallen, supervising the Mothers' Meeting, visiting at the Widow's Home and the Orphanage, suggesting (where these are needed) the erection of such asylums, by the very provision of an agency to care for them, and by dwelling, if possible, in a house of its own, into which the destitute may be received for nursing, care, and medicine, and from which there can be sent out proper comforts for their need."—See Report, page 23.

Thus, clearly and consistently with God's Word, are shown the duties of the Deaconess. The Committee are also careful to point out the natural endowments of woman for her office.

"There can be no doubt among believers in the Bible that woman was created to be the 'helpmeet for man,' to be his companion and comforter, to supplement his state, to make that complete which was most imperfect without her. By the peculiarities of her nature in delicacy, tenderness, intuitive perception, and tact; by her patience, fidelity, and devotion, by her power of suffering and her elasticity of temperament, and by her deep and all-absorbing love, she lends that to society in which man, as such, is deficient. In whatever contributes to the happiness of life, she bears the foremost part, and especially in hours when sickness and exhaustion overtake the body, or the daily needs of the creature call for help. We cannot but think there was something significant and suggestive in the accompaniment by holy women of our Incarnate Lord, and in His receipt from them of substantial benefit. It was meant to teach His Church their relation as helpers.

"In the Providence of God, women have generally been first to respond to the word of the Gospel. Their hearts have been soonest opened to attend to the things which have been spoken by the preacher, and they have earliest offered themselves to the Master's service. By their excess in point of numbers (in the churches), by their comparative freedom from engaging ties, by their frequent orphanage and more frequent widowhood, and above all by the readiness of their consecration of self to the cause of grace and mercy, there has always been provided, as there always will be found, a band of 'ministering angels' on the side of the Church, from which she can draw, as she has done already, servants to her aid." Pages 7 and 8.

The order of Deaconesses has already been partially restored in Germany. That this order was instituted by the Apostles is clear, from the Bible and ecclesiastical history; therefore it is no newly devised plan, but woman's rightful place in the Church. Its revival seems to be blessed in a remarkable manner in the churches in Germany, Switzerland, and France, where the greater number of this noble order of ladies are working. In England the communities of Protestant Christian Women are doing so much good that "the most marvellous change in the mind of the Anglican Church has taken place in their favor in the course of the last five years."

We should like to give many extracts from this admirable pamphlet, but have not room. If any lady desires more information, we refer her to the Committee who prepared the Report, as their names* alone will be a guarantee of the importance of the efforts now being made to restore to the true Church its primitive order of faithful women as Deaconesses.

MEMORY'S SONG.

FULL well do I remember, love,
Those golden autumn eves,
When, full of new-born hopes, we watched
The falling maple-leaves;
When, clinging to the withered grass,
The dewdrops sparkled bright,
And stars, like eyes from heaven came out
Amid the fading light.

It seemed as if the skies leaned down
With a softer, deeper blue,
And oh! to our young, trusting hearts
Did not the world seem true!
What thoughts of coming days we kept Within our throbbing hearts!
Little we knew and little cared
About these worldly arts.

Perhaps we've grown some wiser since,
And learned more courtly ways,
But yet we still have kept unchanged
The love of other days.
We heed not now the wintry storm
That howls without our door,
Except to pray that God would guard
The houseless, shivering poor.

For once again our thoughts go out
Into those halcyon days,
And Hope, bright bird, sings joyously
Her sweet, enchanted lays;
And we are dreaming of the time
When, through that forest wild,
We two shall guide the welcome feet
Of our own little child. CLIO STANLEY.

MISTAKES IN LANGUAGE.

ONE of the most common vulgarities in our literature is the use of the adjective FEMALE for the noun woman. In the Bible this phraseology is never used; female designates sex, but not personality. In a notice of Mr. Rhind's work on the recent excavations in Pompeii, the following sentence occurs, which will illustrate the mistakes we mean. The writer had been telling of the manner of taking busts from the dead figures, and says: "Afterwards the remains of two females, a woman and young girl, were, preserved in the same manner; in the elder female the left hand is shut," etc.

Here three superfluous words are used (two females and elder). It should have been written "the remains of a woman and a young girl; in the woman the left hand is shut." The writer felt that females would not accurately express his meaning, yet he has left these words in his article, and thus vulgarized the style.

Female means the sex that produces young, and can, as a noun or name, only apply to animals. WOMAN was the Eden name given to the feminine of humanity; that name and its equivalents, girl, maiden, lady, etc., words never used for animals, are the only proper terms of language to designate in the human species the feminine characteristics.

MRS. MASON, AND WOMAN'S MISSION TO WOMAN.—We are happy to say to those who took an earnest interest in Mrs. Mason's plan of missions that her course is sustained by the highest courts of British Burmah. The Chief Commissioner* has not only cleared her of all blame in the charges made against Dr. and Mrs. Mason, but has triumphantly placed these devoted missionaries before the world as exemplars of remarkable success in doing good to the poor heathen. He says:—

"I have had ample opportunity personally of observing and of learning from former cases, as well as the present, what the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Mason have done for the Karen mountaineers in the Toungoo district. They found them in a state of savage barbarism. There are now twenty-five thousand of them, either Christians or under Christian teaching and influence. They found them split up into tribes and clans, warring against each other, and taking captives to sell as slaves.

"Wherever the Gospel has been spread, such acts no longer prevail. They have ceased not only amongst the Christian tribes, but also among the heathen tribes, except those on the extreme border. Now, I confidently assert that this great and beneficial change has been accomplished mainly, indeed almost entirely, by the labors of Dr. and Mrs. Mason and of the Karen Minister Sau Quala. I assert, from long experience among similar tribes, that such results could not be obtained by the Civil Administration unaided by Missionary teaching.

"The Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Mason have my entire confidence, and I trust they will continue the noble work among the Karen tribes, in which they have been so eminently successful."

TO OUR FRIENDS AND CORRESPONDENTS.—Another year is gone, and Christmas, the season of thanks and good wishes, as it draws near, reminds us of the many favors and warm-hearted compliments we have received from our Editorial friends. Allow us to express our sincere thanks for your constant and willing support. We trust that the New Year will find you all in the circle of those who are pledged to the "Lady's Book." It shall be our endeavor to make the volumes for 1864 worthy of your approval.

The following articles are accepted: "Long Ago"—"Persevere, or Life with an Aim"—"My Ideal"—"A Vision by Moonlight"—"Out of Town"—"Grandmother Meridith"—"Port-folio Dottings"—and "To Mary on her Birthday."

These articles are necessarily declined: "November"—"Bereavement"—"The Harvest Moon" (the writer can do better)—"They will be done"—"Amazons"—"Cannonet"—"Oh! where is my boy to-night?"—"An appeal to Time"—"Give me a Rose"—"Broken-hearted"—"Song"—"A long Road"—"My first Love and my last"—"The worth of a Dollar"—"The Art of talking nonsense"—and "My Watch."

We have other articles on hand; next month these will be noticed.

Will Mrs. C. C. H. of Panama, Chautauque County, New York, send us the title of her last story?

"Henry Drummond's Choice" has been received, but no letter. What is to be done with the MS.?

Health Department.

In this season of physical health, we will, omitting the usual detail of diseases and remedies for bodily complaints, give a few suggestions for the better conservation of family life and domestic happiness. It is in unison with the season to be careful of our home resources; if the chief means of enjoyment and improvement are not found in the places where we dwell, our hopes of real comfort may be at once relinquished; life will be only a "winter of discontent." We are not intending to read a homily on the subject of domestic miseries. The season of Christmas should be cheerful with hope; so we take our suggestions from a cheerful writer and good adviser.*

"Every farmer and every husband owes it to himself, in a pecuniary point of view, and to his wife and children, as a matter of policy and affection, to provide the means early for clothing his household according to the seasons, so as to enable them to prepare against winter especially. Every winter garment should be completed by the first of November, ready to be put on when the first winter day comes. In multitudes of cases valuable lives have been lost to farmers' families by providence as to this point. Most special attention should be given to the under-clothing; that should be prepared first, and enough of it to have a change in case of an emergency or accident. Many farmers are even niggardly in furnishing their wives the means for such things; it is far wiser and safer to stint the members of his family in their food than in the timely and abundant supply of substantial under-clothing for winter wear. No money is better spent on a farm or anywhere else, than that which enables the wife to make herself, her children, her husband, and her house appear fully up to their circumstances. The consciousness of a torn or buttonless jacket or soiled dress degrades a boy or girl in their own estimation, and who that is a man does not feel himself degraded under the consciousness that he is wearing a dirty shirt? The wife who is worthy of the name will never allow these things if she is provided with means for their prevention, and it is in the noble endeavor to maintain for herself and family a respectability of appearance which their station demand, with means and help far too limited, which so irritates, and chafes, and annoys her proper pride, that many a time the wife's heart, and constitution, and health are all broken together. This is the history of multitudes of farmers' wives (and other men's wives also), and the niggardly natures which allow it, after taking an intelligent view of the subject, are simply beneath contempt. What adds to the better appearance of the person, elevates; what adds to the better appearance of a farm, increases its value and the respectability of the occupant; so that it is always a good investment, morally and pecuniarily, for a farmer to supply his wife generously and cheerfully, according to his ability, with the means of making her family and home neat, tasteful, and tidy. A dollar's worth of lime, a shilling ribbon, or a few pennies' worth of paint may be so used as to give an impression of life, of cheerfulness, and of thrift about a home altogether beyond the value of the means employed for the purpose.

"Finally, let the farmer always remember that his wife's cheerful and hearty co-operation is essential to his success, and is really of as much value in attaining it, all things considered, as anything that he can do; and as she is very certainly his superior in her moral nature, it legitimately follows that he should not only regard her as his equal in material matters, but should habitually accord to her that deference, that consideration, and that high respect which is of right her due, and which can never fail to impress on the children and servants, who daily witness it, a dignity and an elevation of manner, and thought, and feeling, and deportment which will prove to all who see them that the wife is a lady and the husband a man, a gentleman; and a large pecuniary success, with a high moral position and wide social influence, will be the almost certain results."

Literary Notices.

Owing to the immense increase in the price of books, we will not receive further orders to send by mail. It never was a source of profit to us, but generally a loss, on account of the postage we had to pay.

From PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

THE SHADOW OF ASHLYDYAT. By Mrs. Henry Wood, author of "The Castle's Heir," "Squire Trevelyan's Heir," etc. Mrs. Wood is one of the few who excel in the writing of domestic novels. She takes commonplace characters and everyday events, and invests them with a dramatic interest that proves most attractive to the reader. "The Shadow of Ashlydyat" we have found time only to examine most hastily, but its author is too old an acquaintance of the public to need special recommendation from us now. We will vouch for the story being equal in merit to her former ones.

THE GOLD SEEKERS. A Tale of California. By Gustave Aimard, author of "The Prairie Flower," "The Tiger Slayer," etc. As a writer of tales filled with romance and perilous adventures, Aimard has few rivals in his special field.

From J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

CHAMBERS' ENCYCLOPEDIA. Parts 66 and 67.

THE BOOK OF DAYS. Part 17.

We have so often commended these valuable works to our subscribers that they ought now to know their value as well as we do. They are only 20 cents a part; and each part is well worth the money, independent of its connection with the whole work.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

ELEANOR'S VICTORY. A Novel. By M. E. Braddon, author of "Aurora Floyd," etc. In this work, Miss Braddon has left her beaten track and surpassed herself. If "Aurora Floyd" was sufficient to give its author reputation, "Eleanor's Victory" will do much towards perpetuating that reputation; as, in our opinion, it is written far better. There are a wider range and greater individuality of character than in any of her previous works; and, having forsaken her threadbare theme of bigamy, she has produced a really original plot.

DAILY WALK WITH WISE MEN; or, Religious Exercises for Every Day in the Year. Selected, Arranged, and specially Adapted by Rev. Nelson Head. As a daily help to Christian meditation, devotion, and holy practice, this is a most excellent work. Nearly all the authors whose writings have been used in its preparation, lived during the seventeenth century, or at an earlier period. The selections have been made with judgment, and are such as will meet the approval of Christians of whatever creed.

CHRESTOMATHIE FRANCAISE. A French Reading Book. By William I. Knapp, A. M., Professor of Modern Language and Literature in Madison University. This book cannot fail to be of service to the French student, not only as regards a knowledge of the French language, but in making him familiar with the best literature of that language. Its contents are made up of selections from Rousseau, Molière, Fénelon, Beranger, Lamartine, and other well-known French authors of the past and present. A vocabulary of concise definitions, giving the correct pronunciation of the words, adds to the completeness of the book.

From D. APPLETON & Co., New York, through W. P. HAZARD, Philadelphia:—

PALMONI; or, The Numerals of Scripture. A Proof of Inspiration. A Free Inquiry. By M. Mahan, D. D., St. Marks-in-the-Bowery, Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the General Theological Seminary. Though religious in tone, this work will attract more especially those individuals who delight in the curious, the coincidental, and the mystical, rather than such as look only for simple or even controversial religious reading. There are many interesting points in chronology and numerals brought forward by its learned author.

A CLASS-BOOK OF CHEMISTRY. A new Edition, entirely rewritten. By Edward L. Youmans, M. D., author of "The Chemical Chart," "Hand-book of Household Science," etc. This book, designed especially for the use of schools and colleges, contains the latest facts and principles of the science of chemistry, explained and applied to the arts of life and the phenomena of nature.

From TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston, through T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

FREEDOM AND WAR: Discourses on Topics suggested by the Times. By Henry Ward Beecher. This book comprises some eighteen sermons, preached at various times, from the autumn of 1859 to the winter of the present year, all of them relating to political subjects. Embracing the best specimens of their author's vigorous and original style, they will find numerous readers among his hosts of admirers.

GALA DAYS. By Gail Hamilton, author of "Country Living and Country Thinking." The author of this volume being desirous, as she tells us, to write a book of travels, resolves to travel in order that she may write. We have, as the result, a very readable book, highly tinged with its author's personality, descriptive of her journeying, from her descent from the garret with her trunk, onward, to Saratoga, Canada, the White Mountains, etc. She is sprightly, vivacious, original, and occasionally poetical, though one sometimes wearies of a certain straining after "style."

OUR OLD HOME: A Series of English Sketches. By Nathaniel Hawthorne. This volume is not a record of scenery and events hastily witnessed and jotted down by a tourist. It is a collection of sketches narrating the experiences of a man who, during a residence in the country and among the people he describes, had ample opportunity for observation, and leisure for digestion of ideas and prejudices. It is an American's view of England; and, proceeding from Hawthorne's graceful pen, it will be found both pleasant and instructive reading.

METHODS OF STUDY IN NATURAL HISTORY. By L. Agassiz. It has been the intention of the author of this book to present in popular form the views expressed in a previous work—his "Essay on Classification." He gives, within its pages, great emphasis to his opinion unfavorable to the transmutation theory, which certain naturalists are now strenuously advocating.

MEDITATIONS ON LIFE AND ITS RELIGIOUS DUTIES. Translated from the German. By Frederica Rowan. This is a companion volume to "Meditations on Death and Eternity," recently translated by the same lady, and reprinted in America by the same publishing house. It is filled with pure and beautiful religious sentiment, the perusal of which cannot fail to benefit mind and heart. The book is dedicated to the Princess Louis of Hesse.

LEVANA; or, The Doctrine of Education. Translated from the German of Jean Paul Friederich Richter, author of "Flower, Fruit, and Thorn Pieces," etc. "Levana" is written in Richter's peculiar style, and is perhaps the most perfect specimen of metaphysical German literature which we have ever examined. There is much truth and many wise suggestions within its pages, but it requires a clear head and well cultivated mind to perceive and understand them through all the obscurities of diction.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

OUR DECEMBER NUMBER.—Four fashions from the great importing firm of Messrs. A. T. Stewart & Co., not accessible by any other magazine. This is a privilege that the Lady's Book is allowed, exclusively, to publish the fashions from this celebrated house, which gives the tone to the fashionable world throughout the Union. They are prepared expressly in Paris for this establishment only, and the only magazine privileged to produce them is Godey's Lady's Book.

Our Title-page. Godey first led in this plan of giving vignette title-pages. Others have copied them. No matter. If we were to put our plates in the back of the Book they would do the same. First-class poetry only is parodied; it is a sign of merit. Therefore the compliment is paid the Lady's Book by inferior publications, by copying everything we do. Inferior, of course; but as they have no ideas of their own, they must have a guide. Those who do not see the originals are satisfied by the humble imitation; but it is the penalty that greatness has to pay. To resume: Our vignette Title-page for December comprises five separate and distinct pictures, the principal of which is "A father telling Christmas stories to his children," "Gathering Christmas greens," "An old-fashioned sleighing party," "Youth," and "Age," the whole embraced in one picture by a beautiful tree covered with snow. One of the handsomest designs we have ever given.

Our first plate is "The Daily Governess." Of this we can only speak of the beauty of the engraving, leaving other description to the very excellent story that illustrates the engraving.

Godey's Fashions for December. See the bride and her attendants—seven figures in all, a splendid variety. "A False Alarm." A sweep descending the wrong chimney. Such things have happened.

"Spanish Opera Hood," printed in colors. A very comfortable article for the present season. See description in the Fashion department.

In a small portion of our edition a mistake occurred in printing this "Spanish Opera Cloak."

This number contains stories by Marion Harland, Miss Frost, and Miss Townsend.

A MERRY CHRISTMAS and a HAPPY NEW YEAR to our numerous and never tiring friends. We cordially wish that all the blessed and genial influence of the season may be theirs. They will be pleased to hear that never were the prospects of their favorite "Godey" brighter. We now publish the largest list ever published by any magazine in the United States.

THIS number is the 402d number of the Lady's Book that we have published. If our readers will divide 402 by 12, it will give 33 years and 6 months. From the first number to the last, solely under the control of the present publisher, without change of any kind from the commencement, and a gradual increase of subscription from the first year of publication to the present time, and now publishing the largest monthly list of any magazine in the United States.

LITERARY NEWS.—Our readers will be pleased to hear that we have made arrangements with Marion Harland, the well-known author of "Alone," "Hidden Path," "Moss Side," "Nemesis," and "Miriam," for a series of stories. We will commence in January a novel from her pen, entitled "Nobody to Blame." Every number for 1864 will contain a story from her pen. This is a compliment to the Book, as she writes for no other magazine. The stories will be copyrighted, so that they may not be found anywhere but in the pages of the Lady's Book.

YOUNG LADIES' SEMINARY FOR BOARDING AND DAY PUPILS.—Mrs. Gertrude J. Cary, Principal, South-east corner Sixteenth and Spruce Streets, Philadelphia, Pa. The nineteenth session of this school commenced September 14th, 1863.

The course of study pursued embraces the fundamental and higher branches of a thorough English education. Particular attention is given to the acquisition of the French language, and a resident French Teacher furnishes every facility for making it the medium of daily intercourse. Mrs. Cary gives personal attention to the instruction of her pupils, aided by experienced lady teachers, and the best professional talent in the city. It is her constant endeavor to secure an equal development of body, mind, and heart, and the formation of habits of neatness and industry.

Mrs. S. J. Hale, Rev. H. A. Boardman, D. D., Rev. J. Jenkins, D. D., Rev. M. A. De Wolfe Howe, D. D., Louis A. Godey, Esq., Philadelphia; Rev. J. N. Candee, D. D., Galesburg, Ill.; Louis H. Jenkins, Jacksonville, Ill.; Rev. George Duffield, Jr., Adrian, Mich.

Circulars sent on application.

WE ask attention to our advertisement for 1864, published in this number. It is but a faint outline of what we will do, but will give some general idea of what the Lady's Book will be. In fact, it is hardly necessary for us to publish any advertisement. Our subscribers and the public know that we will publish the best lady's book in the world; and they have known us so long that they are willing to trust us, even without any promises on our part. We are thankful, very thankful for the patronage we have received for the last thirty-four years; and we can only add that, having found that fulfilling every promise made has been the best policy, that plan we shall still continue to pursue.

MRS. HALE is anxious to procure a copy of "Sketches of American Life," and "Traits of American Character," two works of which she is the author. A year's subscription to the Lady's Book will be given for either work.

PARTICULAR notice to the binder of the Lady's Book. Please give the fashion-plate a double fold, as shown in our December number for 1862.

MAKE UP YOUR CLUBS.—Remember that the Lady's Book is the best work for ladies published in this country. We have more than one thousand private letters testifying to this fact, and the press throughout the country is unanimous in saying that the Lady's Book is the best magazine of its kind in this or any other country. The difference in the club price of the Lady's Book and that of other magazines is only a few cents, and for those few cents you get nearly one-third more reading and engravings, besides other more expensive embellishments that a low-priced magazine cannot afford to give. Clubs must be for the Lady's Book alone, with one exception, and that is "Arthur's Home Magazine." One or more of that work can be introduced in a club in place of the Lady's Book, if desired.

Any person, with a very little trouble, can get up a club for the Book; we have frequently been so informed by ladies—the work is so popular. It is but to call and get a subscription. Clubs are always in time, as we are able to supply numbers from the beginning of the year; yet we like them sent in soon, to know how many we shall print. Remember, that a work with five subscribers can give five times as much as a work with only half that number, and the embellishments can also be made of a very superior character.

Our terms are made plain and explicit, so that they may be easily understood. We are often asked to throw in an extra copy. In no instance can this be done, as our terms are so low to clubs that it cannot be afforded. A shop-keeper would look amazed, if a purchaser should ask him to throw in an extra yard because she had purchased twelve. And yet we are asked to add an extra copy because twelve have been ordered. It cannot be done.

80 CLUB.

For three years I have taken your Book, and feel that I must still have it. The getting up of this club is my first attempt, and I am happy to say I have had good success. Words are inadequate to express the happiness I have enjoyed in perusing your Lady's Book; and I can say to all lovers of choice literature that Godey's is the best. It should be in every family, as it cannot fail to suit the most fastidious. MRS. G., Mass.

82 CLUB.

The Lady's Book is very necessary for us, and we welcome it each month with increasing admiration. How any lady can do without it is a wonder to me! When I tell you that the club I send you for the Book is the largest one sent from our office this year, it will prove to you that we appear to appreciate the efforts you are making to please and improve us. Miss E. H., Mich.

85 CLUB.

Allow me to congratulate you on your success in rendering Godey's Lady's Book so rare a gem. I for one cannot do without it, and should I live to be a centenarian shall desire at least to clip the leaves and peruse the pages of Godey's incomparable Lady's Book. E. E., Ind.

82 CLUB.

I have now much pleasure in sending you a club for your Book, which is perused by all here, and indeed we cannot do without it. R. J. S., Canada.

I AM an enthusiastic admirer of your Book, and have, since my earliest remembrance, been a constant reader, and feel that I have been much benefited by it. A. B., Mo.

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER FROM PARIS:—

A grand review of the Garde Impériale, now in Paris, took place yesterday at the Bois de Boulogne, by the Emperor in person. The Empress drove there this time in a carriage. She astonished the English and other foreigners present, accustomed to see her Majesty always attired in the most elegant manner, by the extreme simplicity of her costume, which consisted of a light brown dress and cape, with a very simple fancy straw bonnet, and ribbons to match her dress.

The comb is henceforth an obsolete article in fashionable circles, and ladies are reverting to the lady Godiva style of wearing the hair; that is, letting it flow down over the shoulders. Little girls, having abandoned the once popular net, now have their hair crimped, and then allowed to flow loosely down the back. When the hair is of a light auburn or golden hue, it has a pretty effect, reminding one of early English maidens with names like Maude and Mary, who used to live in the days of the Round Table.

Older girls, and young and even middle-aged ladies, have, however, made a compromise in the matter which is perfectly frightful. The hair is rumped up so as to stand out on the head, as if it had not been combed for a week, and then the back hair is also carefully rumped—is loosely fastened up by a comb. The head is then considered arranged for the opera or ballroom; and, as seen then and there, suggests "Tilly Slowboy" after one of her "cow-like gambols" around the cradle of "Dot's" baby.

The English ladies dress far more elaborately at the opera and concert-room than the Americans. Even in the second-rate theatres—dim, dirty, mean-looking places (there is not such a place as your neat little Chestnut Street Theatre!—they come in "gorgeous array," which would have proved very gratifying to the feeling of the parent of the "Dinah" of the lamented "Mr. Villikens." Opera cloaks are of different styles, and colored cloaks, corded with gold, are becoming popular. Combs are an important article of head gear, for the theatre, being usually of gold, ornamented with rubies and emeralds. Of course, artificial flowers are in great vogue, and happy is that matron who can perch a bird of paradise on top of her head. Dresses are worn very low in the neck, and at this season white is the prevailing color at opera and theatre, as well as in private assemblies.

A PRESENT FOR A LADY.—Did it ever strike any of our young friends that they could not make a more agreeable Christmas or New Year's present to a young lady than a year's subscription to the Lady's Book? Will it not monthly call the donor to their remembrance, and will they not be particularly gratified in receiving so useful a present?

MESSRS J. E. TILTON & Co., Boston, have for sale all materials for the different styles of Painting and Drawing taught in their book, ART RECREATIONS. They will send a price list, if requested, and answer necessary questions, and will furnish, post paid, the book for $2.00. It teaches Pencil and Crayon Drawing, Oil Painting of every kind, Wax-work, Leather-work, Water Color Painting, and hundreds of fancy kinds of drawing, painting, etc. etc.

"NOBODY TO BLAME," is the title of the new novel by Marion Harland, to be commenced in the January number. It is worthy of her pen.

WILLARD'S HOTEL, WASHINGTON, D. C., Sykes, Chadwick & Co., Proprietors.

This time-honored establishment, the head-quarters of everything in the great city, has been entirely renovated for the approaching season. Very few of our good citizens have any idea what a splendid establishment is Willard's. It occupies nearly a square of ground, and Washington squares go a little ahead of Philadelphia squares in size, as everything in Washington is on a large scale. It has a dining-room, 250 feet long, beautifully and freshly frescoed, whence ascends the grand staircase to the upper rooms, giving the ladies an opportunity of entering the dining-room without coming in contact with the general sojourners in the house. The sleeping apartments are admirably arranged, having gas and water in each room. The ventilation has been well attended to. Six hundred persons can find accommodation; but during the winter season, more than 1000 persons have dined in the spacious dining-room. There are four spacious parlors fronting the grand avenue, from the windows of which may be constantly seen the out-door life of the metropolis. The hotel is in the immediate vicinity of the public offices, the President's house, the public squares, and the residences of the foreign ambassadors. A telegraph office is in the house. We have said that this is the head-quarters of Washington. Let any one take a position in the main entrance for an hour or so during the season, and he will in that time see almost every person of note in the city, for it is an understood thing that if you want to find any person Willard's is the place. We have as yet said nothing of the proprietors. Every one knows them, especially "Chad," as he is familiarly called. All Philadelphians know him, and it won't take long for any proper person to make his acquaintance. It is well known that in all machinery there must be a main spring, a governing power—in all departments a head. In some cases this is conspicuous; in others it is felt, not seen. There is at Willard's a person without whom matters would not go on as well, even in so well conducted an establishment. We allude to Mr. Peter Gardner, late of the New York Hotel. Here is a man that can "keep a hotel." Great inducements have been offered to Mr. Gardner to secede from this establishment, but he will not leave that place which he has brought to such good working order. Peter is a modest man, which for so good-looking a one is rather a peculiarity. But it is even so, and he will be surprised to see his name in print. The proprietors of the New York Hotel did not know his worth until he had left them, and would most willingly give carte blanche for his return. But it is too late. He is now where he is appreciated by both proprietors and guests, and may he long continue his administration at Willard's.

OLD TERMS.—It will be seen by our advertisement that we have gone back again to our old terms. We were forced to make a slight advance during a portion of this year, on account of the great rise in paper, and of every article connected with our business; and although but little change has been made in the cost of the same articles, still we return to our old terms, which have always been so well understood by the public.

ARTHUR'S HOME MAGAZINE.—This very excellent and best of the $2 magazines is the only magazine that can be introduced in a club in place of a copy of the Lady's Book.

OUR MUSICAL COLUMN.

Miss Richings and English Opera.—Opera at any place but the Academy—the Temple of Music—has always appeared to us a flat contradiction of terms, but a six weeks' successful run of the new Richings' troupe at another house has made us less skeptical. This new troupe is the best we have had in English Opera since the era of the Seguinis; and we are glad to record the fact, since the troupe is a Philadelphia troupe. Miss Caroline Richings, in her new sphere of prima-donna, has developed a capacity and talent unequalled by any of her predecessors since Mrs. Wood. The stiffness and coldness of her manner have been toned down, while her voice has developed a degree of power and sweetness which really astonished us. We never anticipated so pleasing a result. The role of Madeline, in the Postillion of Lonjumeau, is one of her best parts, but its effect was marred by the insufficient rehearsal of the remaining parts. Mr. Hill has a fresh, full tenor voice, and with hard study will make quite an acceptable primo tenore, but he must eschew Brignoli's faults. Young Mr. Seguin's buffo contains promise of merit. With Mr. Peakes we lost all patience; his friskiness was unpardonable. The troupe is now fairly established in the line of regular English opera, and we wish it every success.

The Musical Monthly.—The final number for the present year of this very successful periodical is now ready, together with a title page and complete index for the volume, for gratuitous distribution to subscribers. We have the continued testimony of our friends that a more delightful variety of music has never been published, while the beauty of the publication still commands universal praise. The work has been pronounced a "musical necessity," and one that "no piano-player, lady or gentleman, should be without." For the accommodation of our friends who have incomplete sets we will furnish what back numbers they may wish, for the present, at 25 cents each, and a three cent stamp on each number ordered, for postage. This offer will remain open but a short time, and our friends should send in without delay for what numbers they want. A list of the contents of the numbers will be forwarded to any address on receipt of a three cent stamp.

Christmas Double Number.—We shall open the new volume of the Monthly with a splendid number, containing nearly double the usual quantity of music. About two dollars' worth of music will be given in this one number, and all for 25 cents, as part of the yearly subscription of three dollars. The number separately will be sold for 50 cents. The contents will all be appropriate to the season, and will include Christmas Chimes, a splendid new nocturne by that favorite composer, Brinley Richards; Happy New Year's Schottische, by Ascher; Around the Fire, new song and chorus by the author of At the Gate, etc.; Under the Mistletoe, a beautiful new ballad; and Kris Kingle, a charming divertimento. Each piece will have a separate title page, and the whole will be done up in illuminated covers. Copies will be ready by the first of December. It will make a splendid Christmas present, and thousands of copies will no doubt be sold for that purpose alone.

Bound Volumes.—A few copies of the Monthly, complete for the year, are ready, neatly bound, at $5.00 sent free by mail, or $4.36 by express. It makes a splendid gift book. Address all orders to J. Starr Holloway, Publisher, Box Post Office, Philadelphia.

Sheet Music.—The newest and best pieces are named in recent columns. J. STARR HOLLOWAY.

We publish two of the anecdotes our "Little Subscriber" sent us; the third we omit, as we will not publish any child anecdotes in which the name of God is irreverently used.

NEWARK, OHIO.

DEAR MR. GODEY: Spring your request for jokes I send you three, which I consider very good. My five year old cousin was cracking hazelnuts one day, and holding one up he said, "Ma, did you know this is a soldier?" "No, Johnny, why?" "Because it's a kernel!" (Colonel)

Another little relative, about four years old, was walking with his brother when he spied the skeleton of a rat. "O George!" said he, "look, there is the hoop skirt of a rat." I send you these with many kind wishes. Your little subscriber and constant reader, ALICE H. C.

And here is another anecdote furnished us by a subscriber:—

MILWAUKEE, WIS.

DEAR MR. GODEY: As requested to furnish anecdotes, I can accommodate you with one, at least, which happened within my own household not over two weeks since. My last servant, Miss Deina, was instructed how to prepare some India-rubber nipples for baby's bottle, by pouring boiling-water over them and letting them stand until they got cool, and then drying them well. These instructions were given at 2 A. M., and about 7 P. M. I was in the kitchen, when Miss Deina, taking up a dipper of boiling water from a kettle, said: "I guess, ma'am, these have cooled enough." And to my astonishment, I found that the nipples had been boiling over nine hours. When questioned what could be her intention for doing so, she said: "She wanted to make them soft for the baby's mouth." And, sure enough, they were soft enough to stretch from Milwaukee to Philadelphia. If you have any one in your neighborhood that knows less on the India-rubber question, let us hear from them. Yours, etc., Mas K. D. P

FIRE-PROOF DRESSES.—Scarcely a week passes but we read sad accounts of young ladies being burnt to death, owing to their light muslin garments catching fire. It ought to be generally known that all light dresses may be made fire-proof at a mere nominal cost, by steeping them, or the linen or cotton used in making them, in a dilute solution of chloride of zinc.

MESSES. A. T. STEWART & Co., of New York, the celebrated importers, have furnished us, through the kindness of A. D. Letson, Esq., four subjects for this number. No other magazine can have these subjects, and they are the latest styles. BRODIE, who stands at the head of his business, with whom no one attempts to compete, continues to furnish for the Book one of his latest patterns monthly.

CLUB RATES WITH OTHER MAGAZINES.—Godey's Lady's Book and Harper's Magazine, one year, $4.50. Godey's Lady's Book and Arthur's Magazine, one year, $3.50. Godey's Lady's Book, Harper's Magazine, and Arthur's Magazine, one year, $6. No cheaper club than this can be offered. Godey's Lady's Book and Holloway's Medical Monthly, one year, $5. For Canada terms, see cover.

READ "What a Jealous Man saw on Christmas Eve," by Marion Harland. Miss Frost, Miss Townsend, and W. E. Pabor also contribute to this number.

A MEMOIR of the late Mrs. Alice B. Haven, promised in our last for this number, we have been obliged, owing to the crowded state of our columns, and the lateness of the receipt of the MS. to postpone to the January number. A sketch of the life of this truly good woman will then and there appear.

VOL. LXVII. — 47

POSTAGE on the Lady's Book, according to the late law passed last winter.

Section 36.—Postage on Godey's Lady's Book, 24 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly in advance.

News-dealers may receive their packages at the same rates, that is, 2 cents for each copy of the magazine, and may pay separately for each package as received.

ON page 158 of our November number, we published an account of the finding of a photograph in the hands of a Southern soldier. It should have been a Federal soldier. We have seen the photograph, and beautiful children they are. B. Shriver, P. M. at Grafenburg, Pa. is the holder of the picture.

A GOOD HOAX.—That joking paper, the London Punch, published the following. Very many of our papers have published it as if emanating from Queen Victoria:—

THE QUEEN ON CRINOLINE.—Her Majesty has addressed the following remonstrance to the ladies of England.

WINDSOR CASTLE, Aug. 1, 1863.

LADIES: The Queen has commanded me to express the pain with which Her Majesty reads the accounts of daily accidents arising from the wearing of the indelicate, expensive, dangerous, and hideous article called crinoline. Her Majesty cannot refrain from making known to you her extreme displeasure that educated women should, by example, encourage the wearing of a dress which can be pleasing only to demoralized taste. For the miserable idiots who abjectly copy the habits of those conventionally termed their betters, it is impossible to entertain anything but pity. But to the ladies of England this appeal to abandon the present degrading, dangerous, and disgusting fashion is made in the belief that they will show themselves the rational and decorous persons which they are supposed to be. I have the honor to be, ladies, your most obedient and humble servant, C. B. PHIPPS.

MUSIC RECEIVED.—We have received the following music from Horace Waters, of New York, and D. Ditson, of Boston:—

The O. F. March.
The Evacuation. A comic song.
The Blind Girl's Lament. A ballad.
Christ will care for Mother now, in answer to "Who will care for Mother now?"
Lantern's Popular Songs and Duets: Meet me, Dear-est; Glowing Stars of Gentle Evening; The Rose of Clifton Dale; The Sunny-side, set for piano, by Bellak; When This Dreadful War is Ended; Sweet Evolving.
Variations, Brilliants, Chants, composed by Misner.
The Bonnie Old Flag, from Father Reed's collection.
The Voice of the Heart. By O. Comstant.
Flirtation. Composed by H. Tucker.
Dear One, I think of Thee. Music by S. Laurence.

A NEW ZEALAND CHIEF had taken up his residence upon a piece of land, his right to which was contested. "I have an undeniable title to the property," he observed, "as I ate the preceding owner."

HOW TO COLOR THE PHOTOGRAPH.—MESSES. J. E. TITTON & Co., Boston, have just published a little manual on the art of painting the photograph, which is for sale at the book-stores, or will be sent by them, post-paid, for 10 cents.

THE Skating "game in this number is an ornamental and useful article.

JUVENILE DEPARTMENT.

MOTHER GOOSE TABLEUX.

THESE tableaux are intended for the amusement of very little folks, who must act both as performers and guessers in the audience. For the holidays, either in the afternoon or evening, they will be found very amusing even for the older folks, who will doff their seniority for a time. One of our most scientific physicians was at such a performance some evenings ago, and owing to his well-known learning and dignified manner was condemned to sit in an upper room with some of the elder members of the family. After fidgetting for some time, and evidently listening to the gleeful laughter below with more interest than to his host's polite conversation, he suddenly turned to one of the ladies present—

"Pray, madam," he said, "how old are you?"

Seeing the fun in his eyes, she promptly replied: "Six!"

"Well," he said, "I am ten. Let's go play with the rest of the children." And for the remainder of the evening he was the life of the entertainment.

So, you who read these articles, put your years in your pocket, and remember they are written for "you and the rest of the children."

No scenery will be required, no curtain but the folding-doors, no properties that your housekeeping apparatus will not supply, no wardrobe but the nursery bureau, and no orchestra but the laugh and applause of your little folks.

TABLEAU I.

"Humpty, dumpty, my mammy's maid,
She stole oranges I am afraid;
Some in her pocket, some in her sleeve,
She stole oranges, I do believe!"

The stage is arranged as a dining-room. Upon the table (centre of stage) are the remains of the dessert, half-eaten pies, saucers, tumblers, bottles, and plates, and, near the edge of the table toward audience, a large dish of oranges. "My mammy's maid" stands between the table and the audience, profile to each. The little girl who takes this part must wear a chintz dress with full sleeves, fastening at the wrists, a large apron with pockets, a white cap and kerchief. The apron pockets are full of oranges, and she is stuffing two into her sleeve. Just entering the door is a little boy, who points triumphantly to the maid (he must be behind her). He looks very mischievous, and appears to be advancing on tip-toe to catch her. If the audience do not guess the rhyme, let the little boy sing it before the curtain falls.

TABLEAU II.

"Little Jack Horner
Sat in a corner,
Eating a Christmas pie,
He put in his thumb,
And pulled out a plum,
And said, 'what a good boy am I!'"

The stage is arranged as a family sitting-room. In the centre is a table. One little girl, with spectacles and cap, is the nurse, sitting at the table sewing. The baby lies asleep in a cradle. In the right hand corner of foreground, facing audience, his feet stretched far apart, Jack Horner is seated on the floor, with the pie between his knees. He wears short socks, and short trousers, a blouse and large collar. One hand holds up the crust of the pie, while the other holds over his head a large raisin. A very small boy, with a very large pie, has the best effect.

TABLEAU III.

"There was an old woman
Who lived in a shoe;
She had so many children
She didn't know what to do;

She gave them some broth
Without any bread,
She whipped them all soundly
And sent them to bed."

Some little ingenuity is here required to make the shoe, but let the manager keep up a brave heart, and make the boys useful. First have a frame work made of wood in the shape of a shoe, standing up on end, the opening and instep toward audience. Cover this with black cambic, and make an immense white paper buckle. Between the sole and upper, thrust the heads of all the "crying babies" in the house, as it is too elevated a position for the "live stock." The old woman, a girl about fourteen, must wear a white cap, a pair of spectacles, a petticoat of red stuff, with the skirt of her chintz dress looped up over it, a white shawl pinned over her shoulders, and heeled shoes. In her hand she has a large bunch of rods. She stands centre of stage, in front of the shoe, holding her bunch of rods over the head of a little boy "just caught." He is night-gowned, and capped, and barefooted, and is rubbing his eyes with his clenched fists, his face "made up" for a yell. All the children wear their night-gowns and wraps. One, right of foreground, is seated on the floor with a big bowl of soup between his knees, raising a spoon to his lips. One behind him, is leaning over with open mouth, as if waiting for his turn. Two are stealing into the shoe to escape the whipping. In short, have on the stage all the children you can muster, in various attitudes—some running away, some crying, some eating broth, and some hiding and peeping out behind the mammoth shoe.

TABLEAU IV.

"To market, to market,
To buy a plum bun,
Home again, home again,
Market is done."

Here a very pretty market scene can be made. Have five empty tables for stalls, two on each side of the room, one centre of background. In front of these put bushel baskets, empty tubs, and trays all empty. To the left of foreground, have a procession of the market people going home; one little girl in the high cap, stuff gown and white apron of the Dutch huckster; a little boy with a big butcher's apron; a little girl in a straw hat and striped dress for a flower-girl, a little boy in a countryman's dress; as many children, in short, as can be dressed up for hucksters, butchers, buttermen, pie and cake men. They are all leaving the empty stalls. Right of foreground, profile to audience, as if just entering the market, is a very little boy, with straw hat, blouse, and short trousers. In one hand he holds a penny. On the other arm is an enormous basket. He sings gleefully the first two lines of the verse. In deep tones, the market people, turning suddenly round to face him, sing the second, and then wheel into their first positions. The little boy's face changes to a look of dismay, and all stand motionless again until the curtain falls. The moving tableaux require rather expert performers to give the peculiar automaton jerks, like jumping Jacks moved by a string, but they can be made very funny. In this scene let every one of the market people raise the right arm, and drop it at the end of the verse. Raise it at "home," turning to face the child, drop it at "done," turning from him.

TABLEAU V.

"Ride a cock horse to Banbury Cross,
To see an old woman ride on a horse;
With rings on her fingers and bells on her toes,
She shall have music wherever she goes."

In the centre of background stands a large white paste-board cross, with Banbury upon it in large black letters. About the centre of the stage, a little to the left, stands the rocking horse. Upon this is seated the old woman, who wears a high pointed black hat, with a white cap under it, spectacles, heeled and buckled shoes, a short gown of chintz, and petticoat of red stuff. Her right hand falls down showing the number of rings, and from the toes of her shoes hang small brass bells. Between her and the cross, and between her and audience, are a number of children, astride of sticks or stick horses, with whips in their hands, who stand perfectly still, staring at the old woman.

In our January number we will resume these Tableaux. They will be found a very interesting pastime for the Christmas holidays.

SOME HINTS.

In remitting, try to procure a draft, and don't fail to endorse it.

Address L. A. Godey, Philadelphia, Pa. That is sufficient.

If a lady is the writer, always prefix Mrs. or Miss to her signature, that we may know how to address a reply.

Town, County, and State, always in your letter.

If you miss a number of any magazine, always write to the publishers of the magazine. If Arthur's, address T. S. Arthur & Co., Philadelphia; if Harper's, address Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York.

When a number of the Lady's Book is not received, write at once for it; don't wait until the end of the year.

When inclosing money, do not trust to the sealing matter on an envelope, but use a wafer in addition.

Mrs. Hale is not the Fashion Editress. Address "Fashion Editress, care L. A. Godey, Philadelphia."

When you send money for any other publication, we pay it over to the publisher, and there our responsibility ceases.

We can always supply back numbers.

Subscriptions may commence with any number of the year.

The postage on the Lady's Book is 24 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly in advance, at the office where it is received.

Let the names of the subscribers and your own signature be written so that they can be easily made out.

PHILADELPHIA AGENCY.

No order attended to unless the cash accompanies it.

All persons requiring answers by mail must send a post-office stamp; and for all articles that are to be sent by mail, stamps must be sent to pay return postage.

Be particular, when writing, to mention the town, county, and State you reside in. Nothing can be made out of post-marks.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

HAVING had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editress of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Spring and autumn bonnets, materials for dresses, jewelry, envelops, hair-work, worsteds, children's wardrobes, mantillas, and mantelets, will be chosen with a view to economy, as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godey, Esq.

No order will be attended to unless the money is first received. Neither the Editor nor Publisher will be accountable for losses that may occur in remitting.

The Publisher of the Lady's Book has no interest in this department, and knows nothing of the transactions; and whether the person sending the order is or is not a subscriber to the Lady's Book, the Fashion editor does not know.

Instructions to be as minute as is possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice. Dress goods from Evans & Co.'s; mourning goods from Besson & Son; dry goods of any kind from Messrs. A. T. Stewart & Co., New York; cloaks, mantillas, or talmas, from Brodie's, 51 Canal Street, New York; bonnets from the most celebrated establishments; jewelry from Wriggins & Warden, or Caldwell's, Philadelphia.

When goods are ordered, the fashions that prevail here govern the purchase; therefore, no articles will be taken back. When the goods are sent, the transaction must be considered final.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION-PLATE FOR DECEMBER.

Fig. 1.—Imperial blue poplin dress, trimmed with black velvet, run in and out to form checkers. Cloak of black velvet gored, and trimmed with lace and rich gimp. The bonnet is of white uncut velvet, trimmed with ruchings of white silk, falling over the front in the Marie Stuart style.

Fig. 2.—Dress of brown silk, trimmed with applications of black velvet. The corsage is made with a square jockey at the back, and two points in front. The skirt is trimmed the same as the corsage.

Fig. 3.—Child's dress of cuir-colored poplin, trimmed with two fluted ruffles, with a small Grecian pattern in black velvet between them. The corsage is square, with short sleeves trimmed to match the skirt, and worn over a white muslin guimpe. Black felt hat, trimmed with a white pompon and feather.

Fig. 4.—Bride's dress of a striped moiré. The corsage is gored into a very long tunic skirt, and trimmed with appliqué lace headed by chenille cords and tassels. The hair is arranged in a waterfall. The coronet is of white daisies, and the veil of tulle.

Fig. 5.—Pearl-colored silk dress, trimmed with crimson velvet, which forms a long and wide sash at the back. The skirt is trimmed with bands of velvet to match the corsage.

Fig. 6.—Dress of very rich mauve silk, trimmed with deep white chenille fringe, arranged in the shell style, and headed by chenille bows. The corsage is plain, and trimmed with a bertha of white chenille. The colifure is composed of mauve velvet and a white plume.

ROBE DRESSES,

FROM THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A. T. STEWART & CO.,
NEW YORK.

Fig. 1.—The dress is of a new material called Cretonne. The ground is of a brilliant Magenta, and the sash-like stripes of a delicate Tourterelle, or turtle-dove color. They are printed in black to imitate braiding, and the effect is charming.

Fig. 2.—Another style of robe. The material is Cretonne, of a delicate mauve shade. The trimming both on the skirt and body is printed in a deep shade of purple, edged with a graceful braiding pattern in black.

The same style of robes is to be had in all the new colors. We merely describe the colored grounds we have received.

Fig. 3.—A cashmere robe de chambre. The skirt of the dress is a white ground, with a bordering of the richest color. The loose jacket is of mauve cashmere, trimmed with bordering, as represented in the plate.

Fig. 4.—Dress of light walnut-colored Cretonne. The bordering on the very edge of the skirt is of black, above it is a design in deep Magenta, and the braiding pattern is in black. The same style of robe is to be had in various colors.

SPANISH OPERA HOOD.

AS WORN BY THE EMPRESS OF THE FRENCH.

(See plate printed in colors in front.)

Materials.—2 ounces of white and 1½ ounces of Scarlet Andalusian Wool, a pair of Knitting Pins No. 5, and one or two pairs of Chenille Tassels. For the Feather Border, one ounce of White Andalusian Wool and a pair of Knitting Pins No. 16; the pins should be measured in the circle of the Bell Gauge.

THE WHITE BORDER.

The whole of the hood is made in plain knitting, which should be worked loosely and lightly; the principal part of it being double. It is commenced at the border which runs round the shoulders.

With the white wool cast on 263 stitches, with two pins.

1st and 2d rows.—All plain knitting, always slipping the 1st stitch.

3d.—Slip the 1st stitch, knit 31 stitches plain, knit 3 stitches all together, knit 95 plain, knit three stitches together again, knit 95 plain, knit 3 together, knit 32 plain.

4th.—All plain knitting, slipping the 1st stitch.

5th.—Slip 1, knit 30 plain, knit 3 together, knit 93 plain, knit 3 together, this is the centre of the row; knit 93 plain, knit 3 together, knit 31 plain.

6th.—Plain, slipping the 1st stitch.

Repeat the last 2 rows 6 times more, knitting one plain stitch less at the beginning and end of each row, and 2 stitches less on each side of the centre; the 3 stitches knitted together should always be worked over those of the preceding row.

19th.—With the disengaged pin take off the first 24 stitches without knitting them, tie the scarlet wool into the last stitch, and with it and the pin which has 24 stitches, knit 3 together, then 79 plain, knit 3 together, knit 79 plain, knit 3 together; turn back, leaving 24 stitches on the other pin. The stitches left are for the Side Borders.

20th.—Knit all the scarlet stitches plain, except the last two, then knit them and the next white stitch together; turn back.

21st.—Knit 78 plain, knit 3 together in the centre as before, knit the rest of the scarlet stitches plain, except the last two, then knit them and the next white stitch together; turn back.

22d.—Knit all the scarlet stitches plain, except the last two, then knit them and the next white stitch together; turn back.

23d.—Knit 76 plain, knit 3 together, knit the rest, except the last two, then knit them and the next white together; turn back.

Repeat the last 2 rows 21 times more, knitting 2 stitches less each time at the beginning and end of the rows. When these rows are worked all the white stitches will be used.

66th.—Slip the 1st stitch, knit the rest plain to the last 3 stitches, then knit them together.

67th.—Slip 1, knit 30 plain, knit 3 together in the centre as usual, knit the rest plain to the last 3 stitches, then knit them together.

Repeat the last 2 rows 3 times more, knitting 3 stitches less at the beginning and end of the rows each time.

74th.—Slip the first stitch, knit the rest plain, knitting the last 2 together.

Work 26 rows more as the last.

101st.—Knit every 2 stitches together.

102d.—Plain.

103d.—Knit every 2 stitches together.

104th.—Plain. Draw the remaining stitches together to fasten off.

THE LINING.

This is worked exactly the same as the part already made, with the exception that the white wool is used throughout. If it is worked separately, it must be commenced by casting on the 263 stitches; but the neatest way is to raise all the stitches which were first cast on, as this avoids sewing the two parts together. To raise the stitches commence at the 1st row of the work, put the pin into the 1st stitch cast on, keep the wool at the back, and with the point of the pin, bring the wool through in a loop, which raises 1 loop; put the pin into the next stitch, bring the wool through, and con-until the same until there are 260 loops on the pin, then commencing at the 1st row, repeat the whole of the direction, using white wool. When finished, the selvages of the two pieces should be sewed together across the front.

THE SECOND BORDER.

With the white wool cast on 121 stitches, loosely as before.

1st and 2d rows.—Plain knitting

3d.—Slip 1, knit 58 plain, knit 3 together, knit 57 plain, knit the last 2 stitches together.

4th.—Slip the 1st stitch, knit the rest plain to the last 2, then knit them together.

5th.—Slip 1, knit 56, knit 3 together, knit 55, knit 2 together.

6th.—The same as the 4th row

7th.—Slip 1, knit 54, knit 3 together, knit 53, knit 2 together.

8th.—As the 4th row.

9th.—Slip 1, knit 52, knit 3 together, knit 51, knit 2 together.

10th.—As the 4th row.

Join on the scarlet wool, and repeat the last 2 rows 16 times more, knitting 2 stitches less each time, in all, 32 scarlet rows.

Knit 20 rows plain, slipping the 1st stitch and knitting the last 2 together every row.

53d (of scarlet).—Knit every 2 stitches together.

54th.—Plain.

55th.—Knit every 2 stitches together, and draw the remaining stitches close together to fasten them off.

Sew the scarlet selvedge to the front of the hood, so that it may fall back, as in the engraving; the front is then finished with the following feather border, which can, if wished, be continued round the edge of the 2d white border.

FEATHER BORDER.

With the white wool and No. 16 pins cast on 6 stitches.

1st row.—Knit the 1st stitch plain, put the pin into the next stitch, pass the wool between the points of the pins from the front to the back, round the tops of the 1st and 2d fingers to the front, pass the wool between the pins again, and round the fingers to the front as before; pass the wool between the pins again, which will make three turns of wool upon the right hand pin, two turns or loops of which are round the fingers; bring the three turns of wool through the stitch, and take it off the left pin to finish the stitch; take the fingers out of the loops and work the remaining 4 stitches the same.

2d.—Knit the three turns of wool together as one stitch; repeat, knitting the last stitch plain.

Repeat these 2 rows until sufficient length is made, and cast off. The loops of wool should be about three-quarters of an inch in length; and if they appear too long, the wool need only be passed round one finger. It is then to be sewed to the hood.

CHITCHAT UPON NEW YORK AND PHILADELPHIA FASHIONS FOR DECEMBER.

We have the vanity to think that fond mammae are anxiously awaiting the fulfilment of our promise, made when we took leave of them last month, and we hasten to satisfy the expectations we have raised.

Genin's hats, which are always stamped with aristocratic elegance, are this season in great variety of style. The principal shapes are the Ridall, the Spanish, and the Spanish Ridall. The first has a high sloping crown, the brim drooping, both back and front, but not rolled. The second shape has the brim considerably rolled at the sides; and in the last mentioned shape the brim is but slightly rolled. They are made of gray, cuir, and black felt and beaver. The trimming is generally arranged in front en éventail or fan-shaped; and at the sides either a bird or feathers. At the back there is a ribbon bow with long ends, trimmed with a fluting of velvet of a contrasting color; also frequently a leather ornament, so delicate that it resembles a silk embroidery. When leather is used on the ribbons, it is generally mixed with the trimming of the hat. For instance, a spray of beautiful ivy leaves, stamped out of leather, with a few delicate tendrils twining among the leaves.

White felts for infants and small children are in great variety, some trimmed with pure white, others in colors.

All the models are of very becoming and graceful shapes, but differ chiefly in the style of trimming. Scarlet and black feathers are decidedly in favor.

We were shown some very stylish riding hats; they, however, resembled the children's hats in shape, but were entirely of black.

For little boys we noticed a low hat with straight rim, the latter made of corded silk and the rest of the hat of beaver. The trimming consisted of a velvet band with short ends on the right side, with leather ornaments tipping them. Another was a regular Glengary cap of felt, trimmed with velvet.

Hats are daily becoming more popular, and though they are generally very becoming, we think they only set off young faces to advantage; except, however, for travelling, skating, or at a watering-place. Then they are very suitable for children of a larger growth.

Among the novelties in leather we find leather nets. They are formed of narrow strips caught together in diamonds by steel, jet, or gilt beads, and trimmed with ruches and ribbons. Sometimes the leather is of the natural hue, at other times it is colored. Another pretty style has bright silk cords twined in with the leather, which is quite an improvement. Then we have fancy leather cuffs, finished with silk and leather ruching, suitable and pretty for travelling or street wear.

The little bows composed of silk and leather are also very stylish, and are in great variety of shape and color. They are generally mounted on pins, so as to make them exceedingly convenient. Another novelty is the aumônière, a fancy leather pouch or bag, worn at the side, and merely large enough to contain a purse or handkerchief. It resembles the bag on page 298 of the March number.

It has been asserted by some that crinoline is to be abandoned, and we see some hoopless individuals perambulating our streets; and queer oddities they are! Their example is not, however, to be followed at present, for we have the very best authority for stating that crinoline is still worn in Paris, and likely to be for some time to come. Indeed, it is positively needed to sustain the ample dress skirts of the present day. The shape, as we have stated before, is decidedly smaller, and petticoats are being gored so as to have but little fullness about the hips.

Another visit to the Maison Tilman, of 148 East 9th Street, New York, gives us later advices from the Parisian fashionable world. We find, as we stated last month, that the Marie Stuart shape is far from being the universal one. Among the new importations we found a few of that style, though even these were not carried to excess. The majority of the bonnets were of other shapes, shallow at the ears and rather high, though not approaching in height those of last season. All had inside caps, and were fully trimmed, though by no means overloaded.

The toque crown, a flat, soft crown, though not hanging, is one of the prettiest styles. Feathers are but little used, though some few bonnets had the light, airy marabout trimming. Velvet flowers seem to predominate for the heavy bonnets, and we may say the narcissus is the favorite flower, as we saw it, with its lovely golden centre, in almost every shade and color, mounted with black velvet stalks and leaves, and tied in small bunches. Besides these, however, were every variety of forest leaf in velvet, also roses and other flowers.

We noticed a charming bonnet of black velvet with a toque crown, having on it a Maltese cross of black lace. On top of the crown was an exquisite bunch of green frosted leaves, and round the crown were twisted lovely scarlet calla lilies with scarlet stems. This bonnet, though quiet, was exceedingly stylish.

Another bonnet, l'Espagnol, so called from the velvet being pulled up and caught with a large jet clasp, which gave it the appearance of a Spanish comb. The materials were a maize, or rather a light golden cuir velvet, and black lace.

English bonnets presented quite a fairy-like appearance. They were generally of crêpe trimmed with point lace and light flowers, on which and through which were bugs innumerable.

Another very pretty and quiet looking bonnet was an ashes of roses felt, a real French felt, trimmed with velvet and feathers to match. Inside were a few autumn leaves and a rose bedded in black and white lace.

The shapes of the bonnets seemed to us more graceful than ever, and the shades of the velvets particularly lovely. Fashion exists, however, but in change, and we always think the last productions the best. The styles of the bonnets are so varied and peculiar that it is out of the question to describe many of them so as to be understood.

We also saw a number of children's hats. One, of the Buridon style, was of black velvet, the brim turned up on the right side and lined with scarlet velvet; on the other side were scarlet feathers. This was very stylish. An infant's hat was of white felt bound with white, and trimmed with a short ostrich plume, caught in with three of the tiniest of marabouts. On these was a butterfly formed of colored feathers, but so delicate and so lightly poised that it seemed as if the least breath would blow it away. There were many other styles, made of velvets of different colors, trimmed with feathers to match or to form a good contrast.

Coquettish, tasteful caps for middle-aged ladies, or for demi-toilette abounded. Some were of the Corday shape, with coronet fronts, others had long brides or lappets, and others were formed of thulle scarfs, entwined together in front, and falling over the neck at the back.

The ball coiffures were veritable Parisian inspirations. One, La Gloire, was of olive leaves meeting in a high point in front, with wide gold braid twined through it with unstudied grace.

Most of the wreaths were of the coronet style, with long trains or sprays, three-quarters of a yard long, on each side. These could be left to hang or caught up in the hair. Bridal coiffures were of this style. Another pretty wreath was a coronet of strawberries with foliage, branches of wood twisted at the side, and a bunch of berries at the back.

A most charming and novel style of headdress was formed of linked chains of scarlet velvet, caught in with flowers. Some of the pendants had anchors attached, and the whole was original and stylish. With these headdresses, the velvet combs to match should be worn. These are another pretty novelty for the winter.

We were shown a variety of velvet headdresses, studied with jewelled stars, flowers, bugs, crescents, and exquisite butterflies. These jewelled ornaments are very effective, and will be in great demand this winter.

The good taste of the Parisian modiste in everything relating to head gear is an undisputed fact, and in this graceful art Mme. Tilman has no rival, certainly on this side of the water.

We have just seen quite a number of new jackets at the establishment of Mme. Demorest. One was made with a square tail at the back, much resembling a gentleman's coat. The front was made with revers, and the jacket sloped suddenly from where the revers met in front to the square jockey tail at the back. Under this was an extra front resembling a vest, and buttoning up to the throat, made quite long in front and with two square ends. The sleeves were like a gentleman's coat sleeve on the outside, and inside they were perfectly straight and made with a cuff. The whole was trimmed with bands of velvet and buttons. Another style is a corsage cut even with the hips, and pointed at the back. Under this point at the back are two short sash ends, and the fronts are cut in sash-like ends a quarter of a yard long. The whole is trimmed with a narrow fluted ruffle, which is even carried round the hips. The sleeves are rather loose and almost straight.

The Marquise, a riding jacket of the Louis XV. style, is made with a basque three fingers long all round. The fronts of the skirt or basque are turned back like revers, and faced with silk the same as those on the upper part of the waist. Two box plaits are laid at the back and are trimmed to resemble pockets. On the shoulders are knots of cords and tassels. Another style of jacket is cut with an ivy leaf tail at the back, and three long turtlet-like tails in front. The sleeves are one-quarter of a yard wide at the wrist, and trimmed with a gauntlet cuff.

There are various other styles, all gotten up in exquisite taste, both in respect to trimming and shape. It is, however, impossible to do them justice by description. They ought to be seen to be understood. Madame Demorest, whose inventive genius never flags, has brought out a great variety of new sleeves; most of them very simple, but effective and stylish.

In robes de chambre the most stylish from the house of Mme. D. was made of a lilac poplin, open for the space of a quarter of a yard at each breadth, turned over like revers and faced with lilac silk. It was trimmed with a silk ruching which resembled china asters.

A very elegant evening dress from the same establishment was of white silk, embroidered in turquoise blue in the pyramidal style on each breadth. Round the bottom of the skirt was a band of turquoise blue silk, covered with a black lace insertion, and edged with a quilting of blue ribbon. The front was made en tablier, with alternate rows of black lace insertion over blue silk and bands of embroidery. The corsage was high, and trimmed with bretelles and straps, both back and front.

We have seen some very elegant new silks at Stewart's, but we shall be obliged to reserve them until next month. We cannot help, however, giving our readers, as a parting word, the names of the most fashionable colors. They are logwood, rosewood, Spanish café, and Russian gray.

FASHION.

Arthur's Home Magazine for 1864.

Volumes XXIII. and XXIV.

EDITED BY T. S. ARTHUR AND VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND.

The HOME MAGAZINE for 1864 will be conducted in the same spirit that has distinguished it from the commencement, and continue to unite in one periodical the attractions and excellencies of both the Ladies', or Fashion Magazines as they are called, and the graver literary monthlies.

A SEWING-MACHINE GRATIS.

THE PUBLISHERS OF THE SATURDAY EVENING POST will give to any person sending thirty subscriptions to THE POST, and Sixty Dollars, one of

Wheeler & Wilson's Celebrated Sewing-Machines,

such as they sell for Forty-five Dollars. The Machines will be selected new at the manufactory in New York, boxed, and forwarded free of cost, with the exception of freight.

In procuring the subscribers for this Premium, we prefer that the thirty subscribers should be procured at the regular terms of $2 for each, but where this cannot be done they may be procured at our club rates, and the balance of the $60 forwarded to us in cash by the person desiring the machine. The papers will be sent to different post-offices, if desired. Every person collecting names should send them with the money as fast as obtained, so that the subscribers may begin at once to receive their papers, and not become dissatisfied with the delay. When the whole number of names (30) and whole amount of money ($60) are received, the Machine will be duly forwarded.

Among the contributors to THE POST we may mention the following distinguished authors:—

MRS. HENRY WOOD, MARION HARLAND, VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND, ETC. ETC.

CHURCH LITERATURE.

ITS AIM, ITS BENEFITS AND ITS CIRCULATION.

ITS AIM.

CHURCH literature has for its object, directly or indirectly, the advancement of the interests of Christ's kingdom. Though a human agency, it has a divine mission. All the members of the Church, if they would be true to their calling, must be workers together with Christ. They must not only be active and zealous in helping forward Christ's work in their own congregation, or within the narrow limits of their own community, but they must be actively interested in the welfare of the Church throughout the world. Especially must they know and feel the wants of that branch of the Church with which they stand connected. No member of the Church can fulfill his mission, as a servant of Christ, who is ignorant of the Church's needs; who does not acquaint himself with her progress, her trials, and her triumphs.

Just here it is that Church literature serves as the strong handmaid of the pulpit, and meets a want that can in no other way be supplied. It aims to second and support the pastor in all his efforts to build up the Lord's people in faith, knowledge, piety, and devotion to the Church. It brings vividly before the eye of the people the same truths and interests which through the ear are impressed upon them by the voice of the preacher. It seeks to do what the pastor cannot do, viz: visit every family every week, and lay before its members pure food for daily thought; information gathered from every quarter of the globe; and such Christian intelligence as tends to bring the reader into sympathy with every department of Church work. It aims to impress upon the heart of the Christian the truth, that the work of the Church is his work, as well as Christ's work, and that, if he would be faithful to his trust, he must make every interest of the Church his own personal interest,—a care equally important with the care of his own soul.

Church literature has further for its object the guarding of the young and the protection of home morals by putting into the hands of families only such pure, wholesome reading as serves to enrich the mind and make better the heart; thereby affording the only sure remedy against the unchaste, sensational literature which floods the land, and which inevitably tends to poison the minds and corrupt the morals of the young. Church literature aims to do all that it is possible to do within its own proper province to diffuse Christian light, to develop Christian life, and to broaden Christian love.

ITS BENEFITS.

The benefits of Church literature are but the realization of the aims just stated. Experience has proved that no Church can afford to do without the strong, helping arm of Church literature. In the degree that the Church neglects this important agency, does she fail in fulfilling her appointed work. The rule holds good also as applied to the Church member.

Church literature and Christian enlightenment go together; Church literature and Christian activity and benevolence also go together. Ask a pastor who serves a congregation composed very largely of members who do not read the Church periodicals, as to his experience; and he will tell you that his work is very hard and very disheartening; that the members have no interest in the Church apart from the narrow sphere of their own congregation; that the cause of Missions, Home and Foreign, awakens within them no sympathy; that their contributions to benevolent interests are very meagre, and very reluctantly given; that there is no hope of organizing a missionary society; that there are manifest evidences on every hand of indifference and inactivity in regard to the general interests of the Church.

Enter the home that is not visited by a Church paper, and talk to the members of the family about mission work in Japan, or in our home fields; talk to them about our institutions of learning, our Orphan Homes, and the various interests and needs of the Church, and what is the result? You find that they know little of, and care little for, these things; that their hearts cannot be drawn out in sympathy towards them; that the great work of the Church engages neither the thoughts of their minds nor the love of their hearts. That is the negative side of the subject. It is not drawn from the imagination: it is very real; too true.

Ask the pastor who serves a congregation among whose families Church literature is widely diffused as to his experience: and he will tell you that his parishioners, as a rule, are wide awake and active; that they help to bear his burdens; that it is a pleasure to bring before them the general interests of the Church, because of the sympathetic response which they elicit; that they delight to hear of the progress of missions, and of the growth of the Church's literary and charitable institutions; that there is a constant increase in contributions to the Lord's treasury; that there is joy in ministering to a people whose hearts and offerings go out freely in love towards interests which are precious in the sight of God.

A pastor upon being asked who were his most active workers and contributed most liberally to the support of Christian objects, replied, "The working capital of my congregation is to be found among those who read and are interested in our Church literature."

Many there are who will unite in bearing testimony to the truthfulness of this picture, which presents the positive side of the benefits of Church literature.

ITS CIRCULATION.

Such being the high aim and rich benefits of Church literature, it is hardly in place to ask the question, To what extent should it be circulated? Just as the Holy Bible, as a book, is an indispensable aid to Christian knowledge, so is Church literature an indispensable auxiliary to a knowledge of Christ's work in and through His Church. The exclusion of Church literature from a Christian home can find no justification, except upon the plea of inability to read, or most extreme poverty. Every Church member who has the means to subscribe for a town, county, or political paper, should blush for shame at the thought of being unable to subscribe for a Church periodical. Surely, the knowledge of Christ's work should be considered of far greater importance to the Christian than the knowledge of market prices, social gossip, murders, and political news. If both cannot be had, the latter, by all means, should be sacrificed to the former. If Christians once come to appreciate the eternal and priceless blessings that flow to them through the Church, as highly as they do the perishable blessings of earth, they will soon realize the importance and necessity of informing themselves as to the work which is being accomplished by the Church. If parents would but appreciate the formative and lasting influence exerted upon the mind and character of their children by what they read, they would not withhold from them the pure, clean, elevating literature offered to them through the papers and books of the Church.

In view of the great evils that result from a limited, and in view of the incalculable spiritual blessings that attend a wide, circulation of Church literature, every possible effort should be made by all who are interested in the welfare of the Church to diffuse Church intelligence among all the members.

Let the pastors enforce from the pulpit, in the strongest and clearest light, the demands of the case. Let consistories use all their influence in coöperating with the pastor in his efforts to have some form of Church literature—if possible—in every Christian home. Let agents of Church papers and books be kindly encouraged and assisted in their good work by pastors and people.

And let every Christian reader of this tract, who has consciously or unconsciously neglected the duty herein presented, ask himself the question: Can I, who profess to love and serve the Church of Christ, afford to do without that knowledge which can be obtained only through the literature of the Church?

"HUSKS."

"And he would fain have filled himself with the husks that the swine did eat; and no man gave unto him."

BY MARIAN HARLAND.

[Entered, according to act of Congress, in the year 1863, by LOUIS A. GODEY, in the clerk's office of the District Court of the United States, in and for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.]

CHAPTER I.

It was a decided, uncompromising rainy day. There were no showers, coquetted with by veering winds, or dubious mists, that at times grew brighter, as if the sun were burning away their lining; but a uniform expanse of iron-gray clouds—kept in close, grim column by a steady, although not violent east wind—sent straight lines of heavy rain upon the earth. The naked trees, that, during the earlier hours of the deluge, had seemed to shiver for the immature leaf-buds, so unfit to endure the rough handling of the storm, now held out still, patient arms, the rising sap curdled within their hearts. The gutters were brimming streams, and the sidewalks were glazed with thin sheets of water.

The block of buildings before which our story pauses, was, as a glance would have showed the initiated in the grades of Gotham life, highly respectable, even in the rain. On a clear day, when the half folded blinds revealed the lace, silken, and damask draperies within; when young misses and masters—galvanized show-blocks of purple and fine linen, that would have passed muster behind the plate-glass of Gervin or Madame Demorest—tripped after hoops, or promenaded the smooth pavement; when pretty, jaunty one-horse carriages, and more pretentious equipages, each with a pair of prancing steeds, and two "outside passengers" in broadcloth and tinsel hat-bands, received and discharged their loads before the brown-stone fronts—had the afore-mentioned spectator chanced to perambulate this not spacious street, he would have conceded to it some degree of the fashion claimed for it by its inhabitants. There were larger houses and wider pavements to be had for the same price, a few blocks further on, in more than one direction, but these were unanimously voted "less eligible" and "deficient in style," in spite of the fact that as good and better materials were employed in their construction, and they were in all respects equal in external show and inside finish to those in this model quarter. "But our block has a certain air—well—I don't know what; but it is just the thing, you know, and so convenient! So near the Avenue!" would be the concluding argument.

The nameless, indescribable charm of the locality lay in the last clause. "Just step around the corner, and you are in the Avenue," said the favored dwellers in this vicinity, as the climax in the description of their abode, and "that way fashion lies" to every right-minded New Yorker of the feminine gender.

But the aristocratic quiet of the neighborhood, rendered oppressive and depressing by the gloom of the day, was disturbed by a discordant sound—and what was especially martyrizing to refined auriculars, the lament had the unmistakable plebeian accent. The passionate scream with which the pampered darling of the nursery resents interference with his rights and liberty of tyranny, or the angry remonstrance of his injured playmates, would have been quite another species of natural eloquence, as regards both quality and force, from the weak, broken wail that sobbed along the wet streets. Moreover, what respectable child could be abroad on foot in this weather? So, the disrespectful juvenile pursued her melancholy way unnoticed and unquestioned until she reached the middle of the square. There a face appeared at a window in the second story of a house—which only differed from those to its right, left and opposite in the number upon the door—vanished, and in half a minute more a young lady appeared in the sheltered vestibule.

“What is the matter, little girl?”

The tone was not winning, yet the sobs ceased, and the child looked up, as to a friendly questioner. She was about eleven years of age, if one had judged from her size and form; but her features were pinched into unnatural maturity. Her attire was wretched, at its best estate; now, soaked by the rain, the dingy hood drooped over her eyes; the dark cotton shawl retained not one of its original colors, and the muddy dress flapped and dripped about her ankles. Upon one foot she wore an old cloth gaiter, probably picked up from an ash-heap; the remains of a more sorry slipper were tied around the other.

“I am so cold and wet, and my matches is all spilt!” she answered, in a dolorous tone, lifting the corner of a scrap of oil-cloth, which covered a basket, tucked, for further security, under her shawl.

“No wonder! What else could you expect, if you would go out to sell them on a day like this? Go down into the area, there, and wait until I let you in.”

The precaution was a wise one. No servant in that well-regulated household would have admitted so questionable a figure as that which crept after their young mistress into the comfortable kitchen. The cook paused in the act of dissecting a chicken; the butler—on carriage days, the footman—checked his flirtation with the plump and laughing chambermaid, to stare at the wretched apparition. The scrutiny of the first named functionary was speedily diverted to the dirty trail left by the intruder upon the carpet. A scowl puckered her red face, and her wrathful glance included both of the visitants as alike guilty of this desecration of her premises. The housemaid rolled up her eyes and clasped her hands in dumb show of horror and contempt, to her gallant, who replied with a shrug and a grin. But not a word of remonstrance or inquiry was spoken. It was rather a habit of this young lady's to have her own way whenever she could, and that she was bent upon doing this now was clear.

“Sit down!” she said, bringing up a chair to the fire.

The storm-beaten wanderer obeyed, and eagerly held up her sodden feet to the red grate.

“Have you no better shoes than those?”

“No, ma'am.”

“Humph! Nor dress—nor shawl?”

“No, ma'am.”

“Are you hungry?”

A ray shot from the swollen eyes. “Yes, ma'am!”

The lady disappeared in the pantry and presently returned with five or six slices of bread and butter hastily cut and thickly spread, with cheese and cold meat between them.

“Eat!” She thrust them into the match-girl's fingers. “Wait here, while I go and look for some clothes for you.”

As may be supposed, the insulted oracle of kitchen mysteries improved the time of the benefactress's absence by a very plain expression of her sentiments towards beggars in general, and this one in particular; which harangue was received with applause by her fellow-servants, and perfect equanimity by its object. She munched her sandwiches with greedy satisfaction, watching, the while, the little clouds of steam that ascended from her heated toes. She was, to all appearance, neither a sensitive nor intelligent child, and had known too much of animal want and suffering to allow trifles to spoil her enjoyment of whatever physical comfort fell to her lot. Her mother at home could scold quite as virulently as the cook was now doing, and she was more afraid of her anger, because she beat while she berated her. She was convinced that she stood in no such peril here, for her protectress was one in power.

“Have you eaten enough?” said the clear, abrupt voice behind her, as she held two sandwiches in her fingers, without offering to put them to her lips.

“Yes, ma'am. May I take 'em home?”

“Certainly, if you like. Stand up, and take off your shawl.”

She put around the forlorn figure a thick cloak, rusty and obsolete in fashion, but which was a warm and ample covering for the child, extending to the hem of her dress. The damp elf-locks were hidden by a knitted hood; and, for the feet, there were stockings and shoes, and a pair of India-rubbers to protect these last from the water.

“Now,” said the Humane Society of One, when the refitting was at an end, “where do you live? Never mind! I don't care to know that yet! Here is a small umbrella—a good one—which belongs to me. I have no other for myself when I go out in bad weather. I mean to lend it to you, to-day, upon the condition that you will bring it back to-morrow, or the first clear day. Will you do it?"

The promise was readily given.

"Here 's an old thing, Miss Sarah!" ventured the butler, respectfully; producing a bulky, ragged cotton umbrella from a corner of the kitchen closet. "It 's risky—trusting sech as that with your nice silk one."

"That will let in the rain, and is entirely too large for her to carry. You understand, child? You are to bring this safely back to me, the first time the sun shines. Can you find your way to this house again?"

"Oh yes, ma'am, easy! Thank you, ma'am!" Sarah dropped an awkward courtesy, as Miss Sarah held open the door for her to pass, and went out into the rain—warm, dry, and shielded against further damage from the storm.

Unheeding the significant looks of the culinary cabinet, Sarah Hunt turned away and ascended the stairs. She was a striking-looking girl, although her features, when in repose, could claim neither beauty of form or expression. Her complexion was dark and pale, with a slight tinge of olive, and her hair a deep brown, lips whose compression was habitual, an aquiline nose, and eyes that changed from dreamy hazel to midnight blackness at the call of mind or feeling, gave marked character to her countenance. Her sententious style of address to the child she had just dismissed was natural, and usual to her in ordinary conversation, as was also the gravity, verging upon sombreness, which had not once during the interview relaxed into a smile.

The family sitting-room, her destination at present, and to which we will take the liberty of preceding her, was furnished elegantly and substantially; and there, leaning back in lounging-chairs, were Miss Lucy Hunt, the eldest daughter of the household, and her bosom friend, Miss Victoria West. Each held and wielded a crochet-needle, and had upon her lap a basket of many-hued balls of double or single zephyr worsted, or Shetland or Saxony wool, or whatever was the fashionable article for such pretty trifling at that date. Miss West had completed one-quarter of a shawl for herself, white and scarlet; and her friend had made precisely the same progress in the arduous manufacture of one whose centre was white and its border blue.

"Yours will be the prettiest," remarked Lucy, regretfully. "Blue never looks well in worsteds. Why, I can't say, I'm sure. It is too bad that I can wear so few other colors! But I am such a fright in pink, or scarlet, or any shade of red!"

"As if you could ever be a fright in anything!" returned her companion, with seeming indignation.

Lucy smiled, showing a set of faultless teeth that, to a stranger's first glance, would have appeared by far the most attractive point in her physiognomy. If closer examination discovered that her skin was pearly in whiteness and transparency, that her form was exquisite, with a sort of voluptuous grace; her hands worthy, in shape and hue, to become a sculptor's model; still, in the cold, unflattering light of this rainy afternoon, her want of color, her light gray eyes, her yellow hair, drawn straight back from the broad, low brow, precluded the idea that she could ever, with all the accessories of artificial glare, dress, and animation, be more than a merely pretty girl. Miss West knew better, and Lucy realized the power of her own charms with full and complete complacency. Secure in this pleasant self-appreciation, she could afford to be careless as to her everyday looks and home-people. She saw and enjoyed the manifest surprise of those who, having seen her once in morning dishabille, beheld her afterwards in elaborate evening toilet. Then the abundant hair, wreathed with golden ripples, the classic head, the most artfully simple of tasteful ornaments—a camellia, a rosebud, or a pearl hairpin its sole adornment; her eyes, large, full, and soft, were blue instead of gray, while the heat of the assembly-room, the excitement of the crowd, or the exultation of gratified vanity supplied the rounded cheek with rich bloom, and dewy vermilion to the lips. But nature's rarest gift to her was her voice, a mellow contralto, whose skilful modulations stole refreshingly to the senses amid the sharp clash of strained and higher tones, the castanet-like jingle which most American belles ring unmercifully into the ears of their auditors. Lucy Hunt was not "a great talker," still less was she profound or brilliant when she did speak; yet she invariably conveyed the impression to the mind of a new acquaintance of a thoroughly cultivated woman, one whose acquirements were far beyond her modest exhibition of thought and sentiment. The most commonplace phrase came smoothly and roundly from her tongue, and he was censorious indeed who was willing to lose the pleasure afforded by its musical utterance in weighing its meaning. At school she had never been diligent, except in the study of music, and her pains-taking in this respect was rewarded by the reputation, justly earned, of being the finest vocalist in her circle of associates. In society she shone as a rising star of the first magnitude; at home she was happy, cheerful, and indolently amiable. Why should she be otherwise? From her babyhood she had been petted and admired by her family, and the world—her world—was as ready with its meed of the adulation which was her element.

There were, besides the two sisters already introduced to the reader, three other children in the Hunt household—a couple of sturdy lads, twelve and fourteen years of age, and little Jeannie, a delicate child of six, whom Lucy caressed with pet titles and sugar-plums of flattery, and Sarah served in secret and idolatrous fondness. This family it was Mrs. Hunt's care and pride to rear and maintain, not only in comfort, but apparent luxury, upon the salary which her husband received as cashier of a prominent city bank, an income sufficient to support them in modest elegance, but which few besides Mrs. Hunt could have stretched to cover the expenses of their ostensible style of living. But this notable manager had learned economy in excellent schools; primarily as a country girl, whose holiday finery was purchased with the proceeds of her own butter-making and poultry-yard; then as the brisk, lively wife of the young clerk, whose slender salary had, up to the time of his marriage, barely sufficed to pay for his own board and clothes, and whose only vested capital was his pen, his good character, and perfect knowledge of book-keeping. But if his help-meet were a clever housewife, she was likewise ambitious. With the exception of the sum requisite for the yearly payment of the premium upon Mr. Hunt's life-insurance policy, their annual expenses devoured every cent of their receipts. Indeed, it was currently believed among outsiders that they had other resources than the cashier's wages, and Mrs. Hunt indirectly encouraged the report that she held property in her own right. They lived "as their neighbors did," as "everybody in their position in society was bound to do," and "everybody" else was too intent upon his personal affairs, too busy with his private train of plans and operations to examine closely the cogs, and levers, and boilers of the locomotive Hunt. If it went ahead, and kept upon the track assigned it, was always "up to time," and avoided unpleasant collisions, it was nobody's business how the steam was gotten up.

Every human plant of note has its parasite, and Miss Lucy Hunt was not without hers. There existed no reason in the outward circumstances of the two girls why Miss Hunt should not court Miss West, rather than Miss West toady Miss Hunt. In a business—that is, a pecuniary—point of view, the former appeared the more likely state of the case, inasmuch as Victoria's father was a stock-broker of reputed wealth, and with a probable millionaireship in prospective, if his future good fortune equalled his past, while Mr. Hunt, as has been stated, depended entirely upon a certain and not an extravagant stipend. But the girls became intimate at school, "came out" the same winter at the same party, where Lucy created a "sensation," and Victoria would have been overlooked but for the sentimental connection between the débutantes. Since then, although the confidante would have scouted the imputation of interested motives with the virtuous indignation of wounded affection, she had nevertheless "made a good thing of it," as her respected father would have phrased it, by playing hanger-on, second fiddle, and trumpeter general to the belle.

"As if you could be a fright in anything!" she had said naturally and perhaps sincerely.

Lucy's smile was succeeded by a serious look. "I am sadly tempted sometimes! Those lovely peach-blossom hats that you and Sarah wore this past winter were absolute trials to my sense of right! And no longer ago than Mrs. Crossman's party I was guilty of the sin of coveting the complexion that enabled Maria Johnston to wear that sweet rose-colored silk, with the lace skirt looped with rosebuds."

"You envy Maria Johnston's complexion! Why don't you go further, and fall in love with her small eyes and pug nose?" inquired Victoria, severely ironical. "I have heard that people were never contented with their own gifts, but such a case of blindness as this has never before come under my observation."

"No, no! I am not quite so humble with regard to my personal appearance as you would make out. Yet"—and the plaintive voice might have been the murmur of a grieving angel—"I think that there are compensations in the lot of plain people that we know nothing about. They escape the censure and unkind remarks that uncharitable and envious women heap upon those who happen to be attractive. Now, there is Sarah, who never cares a button about her looks, so long as her hair is smooth and her dress clean and whole. She hates parties, and is glad of any excuse to stay out of the parlor when gentlemen call. Give her her books and that 'snuggery,' as she calls it, of a room up stairs, and she is happier than if she were in the gayest company in the world. Who criticizes her? Nobody is jealous of her face, or manners, or conversation. And she would not mind it if they were."

"She has a more independent nature than yours, my dear. I, for one, am rejoiced that you two are unlike. I could not endure to lose my darling friend, and somehow I never could understand Sarah; never could get near to her, you know."

"I do not wonder at that. It is just so with me, sisters though we are. However, Sarah means well, if her manner is blunt and sometimes cold."

The entrance of the person under discussion checked the conversation at this point, and both young ladies began to count their stitches aloud, to avoid the appearance of the foolish embarrassment that ever overtakes a brace of gossips at being thus interrupted.

Sarah's work lay on her stand near the window, where she had thrown it when the crying child attracted her notice, and she resumed it now. It was a dress for Jeannie. It was a rare occurrence for the second sister to fashion anything so pretty and gay for her own wear.

"Have you taken to fancy-work at last?" asked Victoria, seeing that the unmade skirt was stamped with a rich, heavy pattern for embroidery.

"No!" Sarah did not affect her sister's friend, and did not trouble herself to disguise her feelings towards her.

Lucy explained: "She is making it for Jeannie. She does everything for that child."

"You are very sisterly and kind, I am sure," Victoria continued, patronizingly. "You must quite despise Lucy and myself for thinking of and doing so much for ourselves, while you are such a pattern of self-denial."

A blaze shot up in Sarah's eye; then she said, coldly: "I am not self-denying. Have I ever found fault with you or Lucy for doing as you like?"

"Oh no, my dear! But you take no interest in what we enjoy. I dare say, now, you would think it a dull business to work day after day for three or four weeks together, crocheting a shawl which may go out of fashion before one has a chance to sport it at a watering-place."

"I certainly should!" The curl of the thin upper lip would have answered for her had she not spoken.

"And you hate the very sight of shell-work, and cone-frames, and Grecian painting, and all such vanities?"

"If I must speak the truth, I do—most heartily!"

Victoria was not easily turned from her purpose.

"Come, Sarah! Tell us what you would have us, poor trifling, silly things, do to kill the time."

"If you must be a murderer, do it in your own way. I have nothing to say in the matter."

"Do you mean that time never hangs upon your hands? that you are never ennuyée, blasée?"

"Speak English, and I will answer you!"

"I want to know," said the persevering tormentor, "if the hum-drum books up-stairs, your paint box, and your easel are such good company that you are contented and happy always when you are with them? if you never get cross with yourself and everybody else, and wonder what you were put into the world for, and why the world itself was made, and wish that you could sleep until doomsday. Do you ever feel like this?"

Sarah lifted her eyes with a wondering, incredulous stare at the flippant inquisitor.

"I have felt thus, but I did not suppose that you had!"

"Oh! I have a 'blue' turn now and then, but the disease is always more dangerous with girls of your sort—the reading, thinking, strong-minded kind. And the older you grow, the worse you will get. I hav'n't as much book knowledge as you have, but I know more of the world we live in. Take my advice, and settle down to woman's right sphere. Drive away the vapors with beaux and fancy-work now. By and by, a husband and an establishment will give you something else to think about."

Sarah would have replied, but Lucy broke in with a laugh, light and sweet.

"You two are always at cross-questions! Why can't you be satisfied to let one another alone? Sarah and I never quarrel, Vic. We agree to disagree. She gives me my way, and I don't meddle with her. If she likes the blues (they say some people enjoy them!) where's the harm of her having them? They never come near me. If I get stupid, I go to bed and sleep it off. Don't you think I have done ten rows, since breakfast? What a godsend a rainy day is, when one has a fascinating piece of work on hand!"

Too proud to seem to abandon the field,

Sarah sat for half an hour longer, stitching steadily away at the complicated tracery upon the ground to be worked, then, as the dimmer daylight caused the others to draw near to the windows, she pushed aside her table and put by her sewing.

"Don't let us drive you away!" said Victoria's mock-polite tones; and Lucy added, kindly, "We do not mean to disturb you, Sarah, dear!"

"You do not disturb me!" was the reply to the latter. The other had neither glance nor word.

Up another flight, she mounted to a room, much smaller than that she had left and far plainer in its appointments. The higher one went in Mrs. Hunt's house, the less splendid everything became. In the state spare chamber—a story below—nothing of comfort and luxury was wanting, from the carved rosewood bedstead, with the regal-looking canopy overshadowing its pillows, down to the Bohemian and cut-glass scent bottles upon the marble of the dressing-cabinet. Sarah's carpet was common ingrain, neither pretty nor new; a cottage bedstead of painted wood; bureau and washstand of the same material; two chairs, and a small table were all the furniture her mother adjudged needful. To these the girl had added, from her pittance of pocket money, a set of hanging bookshelves; a portable desk, an easel, and two or three good engravings that adorned the walls.

She locked the door after her, with a kind of angry satisfaction in her face, and going straight to the window, leaned upon the sash, and looked down into the flooded street. Her eyes were dry, but there was a heaving in her throat; a tightening of the muscles about the mouth that would have made most women weep for very relief. Sarah Hunt would have scorned the ease purchased by such weakness. She did not despise the sad loneliness that girt her around, any more than the captive warrior does his cell of iron or stone, but she held that it would be a cowardly succumbing to Fate, to wound herself by dashing against the grim walls, or bring out their sleeping echoes by womanish wailings. So, presently, her throat ached and throbbed no longer; the rigid muscles compressed the lips no more than was their wont; the hands loosened their vice-like grasp of one another—the brain was free to think.

The rain fell still with a solemn stateliness that befitted the coming twilight. It was a silent storm for one so heavy. The faint hum of the city; the tinkle of the car-bell, three blocks off, arose to her window above its plashing fall upon the pavement, and the trickle of the drops from sash to sill. A stream of light from the lamp-post at the corner flashed athwart the sidewalk, glittered upon the swollen gutter, made gold and silver blocks of the paving-stones. As if they had waited for this signal, other lights now shone out from the windows across the way, and from time to time a broad, transient gleam from opening doors, told of the return of fathers, brothers, husbands from their day's employment.

"He sees the light in happy homes!"

What was there in the line that should make the watcher catch her breath in sudden pain, and lay her hand, with stifled moan, over her heart, as she repeated it aloud?

Witness with me, ye maternal Hunts, who read this page—you, the careful and solicitous about many things—in nothing more ambitious than for the advancement and success in life of your offspring—add your testimony to mine that this girl had all that was desirable for one of her age and in her circumstances. A house as handsome as her neighbors, an education unsurpassed by any of her late school-fellows, a "position in society;" a reasonable share of good looks, which only required care and cultivation on her part, to become really distingué; indulgent parents and peaceably-inclined brothers and sisters; read the list, and solve me, if you can, the enigma of this perturbed spirit—this hungering and thirsting after contraband or unattainable pleasures.

"Some girls will do so!" Mrs. Hunt assured her husband when he "thought that Sarah did not seem so happy as Lucy. He hoped nothing ailed the child. Perhaps the doctor had better drop in to see her. Could she be fretting for anything? or had her feelings been hurt?"

"Bless your soul, Mr. H. ! there's nothing the matter with her. She always was kind o' queer!" (Mrs. Hunt did not use her company grammar every day), "and she's jest eighteen year old. That's the whole of it! She'll come 'round in good time, 'specially if Lucy should marry off pretty soon. When Sarah is 'Miss Hunt,' she'll be as crazy for beaux and company, and as ready to jump at a prime offer as any of 'em. I know girls' ways!"

Nor am I prepared to say that Sarah, as she quitted her look-out at the high window, at the sound of the dinner-bell, could have given a more satisfactory reason for her discontent and want of spirits.

CHAPTER II.

Mrs. HUNT's china, like her grammar, was of two sorts. When her duty to "society" or the necessity of circumstances forced her to be hospitable, she "did the thing" well. At a notice of moderate length, she could get up a handsome, if not a bountiful entertainment, to which no man need have been ashamed to seat his friends, and when the occasion warranted the display, she grudged not the "other" china, the other silver, nor the other table-linen.

She did, however, set her face, like a broad flint, against the irregularity of inviting chance visitors to partake of the family bread and salt. Intimate as Victoria West was with Lucy, she met only a civil show of regretful acquiescence in her proposal to go home, as the dinner-hour approached; and Robbie or Richard Hunt was promptly offered to escort her to her abode upon the next block. If she remained to luncheon, as she would do occasionally, Lucy, in her hearing, begged her mother to excuse them from going down, and to send up two cups of tea, and a few sandwiches to the sitting-room. This slight repast was served by the butler upon a neat little tray, in a tête-à-tête service—a Christmas gift to Lucy, "from her ever-loving Victoria," and sentimentally dedicated to the use of the pair of adopted sisters.

Therefore, Sarah was not surprised to find Victoria gone, despite the storm, when she entered the dining-room. An immense crumb-cloth covered the carpet; a row of shrouded chairs, packed elbow to elbow, stood against the farther end of the apartment, and a set of very ordinary ones were around the table. The cloth was of white-brown material, and the dishes a motley collection of halt and maimed—for all Mrs. Hunt's vigilance could not make servants miraculously careful. There was no propriety, however, according to her system of economy, in condemning a plate or cup as past service, because it had come off second best, to the extent of a crack, or nick, or an amputated handle in an encounter with some other member of the rockery tribe. "While there is life there is hope," was, in these cases, paraphrased by her to the effect that while a utensil would hold water, it was too good to be thrown away.

It was not a sumptuous repast to which Sarah sat down after she had placed Jeannie in her high chair and tied the great gingham bib around her neck. On the contrary it came near being a scant provision for the healthy appetites of seven people. Before Mr. Hunt, a mild, quiet little man, was a dish of stew, which was, in its peculiar line, a thing—not of beauty—but wonder.

Only a few days since, as I stood near the stall of a poultry vender in market, a lady inquired for chickens.

"Yes, ma'am. Roasting size, ma'am?"

"No; I want them for a fricassee."

"Ah"—with a look of shrewd intelligence. "Then, ma'am, I take it, you don't care to have 'em overly tender. Most ladies prefers the old ones for fricassee; they come cheaper, and very often bile tender."

"Thank you," was the amused rejoinder. "The difference in the price is no consideration where the safety of our teeth is concerned."

Mrs. Hunt suffered not these scruples to hinder her negotiations with knowing poultry merchants. A cent less per pound would be three cents saved upon the chicken, and three cents would buy enough turnips for dinner. It is an ignorant housekeeper who needs to be informed that stewed chicken "goes further" than the same fowl made into any other savory combination. Mrs. Hunt's stews were concocted after a receipt of her own invention. Imprimis, one chicken, weight varying from two and a half to three pounds; salt pork, a quarter of a pound; gravy abundant; dumplings innumerable. It was all "stew;" and if Jeannie's share was but a bare drumstick, swimming in gravy and buried in boiled dough, there was the chicken flavor through the portion.

For classic antecedent the reader is referred to the fable of the rose-scented clay.

To leave the principal dish, which justice to Mrs. Hunt's genius would not permit me to pass with briefer mention, there were, besides, potatoes, served whole (mashed ones required butter and cream), turnips, and bread, and Mrs. Hunt presided over a shallow platter of pork and beans. What was left of that dish would be warmed over to piece out breakfast next morning. The children behaved well, and the most minute by-law of table etiquette was observed with a strictness that imparted an air of ceremonious restraint to the meal. If Mrs. Hunt's young people were not in time finished ladies and gentlemen, it was not her fault, nor was it for the lack of drilling.

"Do as I tell you, not as I do," were her orders in these matters. Since Lucy had completed her education, the mother added: "Look at your sister; she is never awkward!" This was true; Lucy was born the fine lady. Refinement of manner and grace of movement, an instinctive avoidance of whatever looked common or underbred were a part of her nature. Only the usage of years had accustomed her to her mother's somewhat "fussy" ways. Had she met her in company as Mrs. Anybody else, she would have yielded her the right of way with a feeling of amazement and amiable pity that one who meant so well should so often overdo the thing she aimed to accomplish easily and gracefully. Following out her excellent system of training, the worthy dame demanded as diligent and alert waiting from her butler as if she were having a dinner-party. The eggless rice pudding was brought on with a state that was absolutely ludicrous; but the family were used to the unsubstantial show, and took it as a matter of course.

After the meal was over Mrs. Hunt withdrew to the kitchen for a short conference with the cook and a sharp glance through the closets. It was impossible that the abstraction of six slices of bread from the baking of the preceding day, three thick pieces of cheese, and more than half of the cold meat she had decided would, in the form of hash, supply the other piece of the breakfast at which the beans were to assist, should escape her notice. Mr. Hunt was reading the evening paper by the drop-light in the sitting-room, Lucy was busy with her shawl, and Sarah told a simple tale in a low voice to Jeannie, as she leaned upon her lap, when the wife and mother entered, with something like a bluster. All present looked up, and each one remarked the cloud upon her brow.

"What is the matter, mother?" said Mr. Hunt, in a tone not free from alarm.

"I am worried! That's the whole of it! I am downright vexed with you, Sarah, and surprised, too! What upon earth possessed you, child, to take that beggar into my kitchen to-day? After all I have told you and tried to learn you about these shameful impostors! I declare I was beat out when I heard it. And to throw away provisions and clothes upon such a brat!"

Lucy opened her great eyes at her sister, and Mr. Hunt looked perplexedly towards his favorite, for at heart he was partial to his second child.

"I took the poor creature to the fire, mother, because she was wet and cold; I fed her because she was hungry; I gave her some old, warm clothes of mine because hers were thin and soaked with rain."

"Poor little girl!" murmured Jeannie, compassionately.

Sarah's hand closed instantly over the little fingers. The simple-hearted babe understood and sympathized with her motive and act better than did her wiser elders.

"Oh, I have no doubt she told a pitiful story, and shed enough tears to wet her through, if the rain had not done it already. If you listen to what these wretches say, and undertake to relieve their wants, you will soon have not a dress to your back nor a house over your head. Why didn't you send her to some society for the relief of the poor?"

"I did not know where to find one, ma'am."

This plain truth, respectfully uttered, confounded Mrs. Hunt for a second.

"Mrs. James is one of the Managers in a Benevolent Association," she said, recovering herself. "You had ought to have given your beggar her address."

"Even if I had known that fact, mother, the girl would have been obliged to walk half a mile in the storm to find this one manager. What do you suppose Mrs. James would have done for her that was not in my power to perform?"

"She would have asked the child whereabouts she lived, and to-morrow she would have gone to hunt her up. If she found all as she had been told, which is not likely—these creatures don't give a right direction once in ten times, why, she would have brought the case before the board at their next meeting, and they would help them, if neither of her parents was a drinking character."

"God help the poor!" ejaculated Sarah, energetically. "God help the poor, if this is man's style of relieving his starving brother! Mother, do you think that hunger pinches any the less when the famished being is told that next week or next month may bring him one good meal? Will the promise of a bushel of coal or a blanket, to be given ten days hence, warm the limbs that are freezing to-night? Is present help for present need, then, always unsafe, imprudent, insane?"

"That all sounds very fine, my dear." Mrs. Hunt grew cool as her daughter waxed warm. "But when you have seen as much of the world as I have, you will understand how necessary it is to be careful about believing all that we hear. Another thing you must not forget, and that is that we are not able to give freely, no matter how much disposed we may be to do so. It's pretty hard for a generous person to say, 'No,' but it can't be helped. People in our circumstances must learn this lesson." Mrs. Hunt sighed at thought of the curb put upon her benevolent desires by bitter necessity. “And after all very few—you’ve no idea how few—of these pretended sufferers are really in want.”

This precluded a recital of sundry barefaced impositions and successful swindles practised upon herself and acquaintances, to which Mr. Hunt subjoined certain of his personal experiences, all tending to establish the principle that in a vast majority of cases of seeming destitution the supplicant was an accomplished rogue, and the giver of alms the victim of his own soft heart and a villain’s wiles. Jeannie drank in every syllable, until her ideal beggar quite equalled the ogre who would have made a light supper off of Hop-o’-my-Thumb and brothers.

“You gave this match-girl no money, I hope?” said Mrs. Hunt, at length.

“I did not, madam. I had none to give her.” Impelled by her straight-forward sense of honesty that would not allow her to receive commendation for prudence she had not shown, she said, bravely: “But I lent her my umbrella upon her promise to return it to-morrow.”

“WELL!”

Mrs. Hunt dropped her hands in her lap, and stared in speechless dismay at her daughter. Even her husband felt it his duty to express his disapprobation.

“That was very unwise, my daughter. You will never see it again.”

“I think differently, father.”

“You are too easily imposed upon, Sarah. There is not the least probability that your property will be returned. Was it a good umbrella?”

“It was the one I always use.”

“Black silk, the best make, with a carved ivory handle—cost six dollars a month ago!” gasped Mrs. Hunt. “I never heard of such a piece of shameful imprudence in all my born days! and I shouldn’t wonder if you never once thought to ask her where she lived, that you might send a police officer after it, if the little thief didn’t bring it back to you!”

“I did think of it.” Sarah paused, then forced out the confession she foresaw would subject her to the charge of yet more ridiculous folly. “I did think of it, but concluded to throw the girl upon her honor, not to suggest the theft to her by insinuating a doubt of her integrity.”

Mr. Hunt was annoyed with and sorry for the culprit, yet he could not help smiling at this high-down generosity of confidence. “You are certainly the most unsophisticated girl of your age I ever met with, my daughter. I shall not mind the loss of the umbrella if it prove to be the means of giving you a lesson in human nature. In this world, dear, it will not do to wear your heart upon your sleeve. Never believe a pretty story until you have had the opportunity to ascertain for yourself whether it is true or false.” And with these titbits of worldly wisdom, the cashier picked up his paper.

“Six dollars! I declare I don’t know what to say to you, Sarah!” persisted the ruffled mother. “You cannot expect me to give you another umbrella this season. You must give up your walks in damp weather after this. I can’t say that I am very sorry for that, though. I never did fancy your traipsing off two or three miles, rain or shine, like a sewing-girl.”

But, steadied by pride as was her voice, her heart sank at the possibility of resigning the exercise upon which she deemed so much of her health, physical and mental, depended. These long, solitary walks were one of the un-American habits that earned for Sarah Hunt the reputation of eccentricity. They were usually taken immediately after breakfast, and few in the neighborhood who were abroad or happened to look out at that hour, were not familiar with the straight, proud figure, habited in its walking-dress of gray and black, stout boots, and gray hat with black plume. It was a uniform selected by herself, and which her mother permitted her to assume, because it “looked genteel,” and became the wearer. Especially did she enjoy these tramps when the threatening storm, in its early stages, kept others of her class and sex at home. The untamed spirit found a fierce pleasure in wrestling with the wind; the hail that ushered in the snow-storm, as it beat in her face, called up lustre to the eye and warm color to the cheek. To a soul sickening of the glare and perfume of the artificial life to which she was confined the roughest and wildest aspects of nature were a welcome change.

I remember laughing heartily, as I doubt not you did also, dear reader, if you saw it, at a cut which appeared several years ago in the Punch department of Harper’s Magazine. A “wee toddler,” perhaps four years old, with a most lack-a-daisical expression upon her chubby visage, accosts her grandmother after this fashion: “I am tired of life, grandmamma! The world is hollow and my doll is stuffed with sawdust, and, if you please, ma’am, I should like to go to a nunnery!”

Yet that there are natures upon which the feeling of emptiness and longing herein burlesqued seizes in mere babyhood is sadly true. And what wonder? From their cradles, hundreds of children, in our so-called better classes, are fed upon husks. A superficial education, in which all that is not showy accomplishment is so dry and uninviting that the student has little disposition to seek further for the rich kernel, the strong meat of knowledge, is the preparatory course to a premature introduction into the world, to many the only phase of life they are permitted to see, a scene where all is flash and froth, empty bubbles of prizes, chased by men and women with empty heads, and oh, how often empty, aching hearts! Outside principles, outside affections, outside smiles, and, most pitiable of all, outside piety! Penury of heart and stomach at home; abroad a parade of reckless extravagance and ostentatious profession of fine feeling and liberal sentiments!

"Woe," cried the Preacher, "to them that make haste to be rich!" If he had lived in our day, in what biting terms of reprobation and contempt would he have declaimed against the insane ambition of those who forego the solid comforts of judicious expenditure of a moderate income would afford; spurn the holy quiet of domestic joys—neglect soul, with heart culture—in their haste to seem rich, when Providence has seen that wealth is not to be desired for them! Out upon the disgusting, indecent race and scramble! The worship of the golden calf is bad enough, but when this bestial idolatry rises to such a pitch of fanaticism, that in thousands of households, copies in pinchbeck and plated ware are set up and served, the spectacle is too monstrous in its abomination! This it is, that crowds our counting-rooms with bankrupts and our state prisons with defaulters; that is fast twining our ball-rooms and other places of fashionable rendezvous, into vile caricatures of foreign courts, foreign manners, and foreign vices; while the people we ape—our chosen models and exemplars—hold their sides in inextinguishable laughter at the grave absurdity of our laborious imitation. It is no cause for marvel, that, in just retribution, there should be sent a panic-earthquake, every three years, to shake men to their senses.

Such was the atmosphere in which Sarah Hunt had always lived. In the code subscribed to by her mother, and the many who lived and felt and panted and pushed as she did for social distinction, nothing was of real, absolute value except the hard cash. Gold and silver were facts. All things else were comparative in use and worth. The garment which, last winter, no lady felt dressed without, was an obsolete horror this season. The pattern of curtains and furniture that nearly drove the fortunate purchaser wild with delight, three years back, was now only fit for the auction-room. In vain might the poor, depleted husband plead for and extol their beauties. The fiat of fashion had gone forth, and his better half seasoned his food with lamentations, and moistened her pillow with tears until she carried her point. We have intimated that Sarah was a peculiar girl. Whence she derived her vigorous intellect; her strong, original turn of thought; her deep heart, was a puzzle to those who knew her parents. The mother was energetic, the father sensible, but both were commonplace, and followed, like industrious puppets, in the wake of others. They were pleased that Sarah brought home all the prizes offered at school, and both considered that she gained a right, by these victories, to pursue her studies at home, provided she did not obtrude her singular views and tastes upon other people. Mrs. Hunt sighed, frequently and loudly, in her presence, that her genius had not been for shell, or bead, or worsted-work, instead of for reading volumes, that did not even decorate the show book-case in the library.

"If you must have so many books, why don't you pick out them with the tasty bindings?" she had asked her daughter more than once. "And I wish you would paint some bright, lively pictures, that would look handsome on the walls, instead of those queer men and women and cloudy things you have got up stairs. I'd have 'em framed right away, and be real proud to tell who done them."

Sarah remained proof against such hints and temptations, and, shrinking more and more from the uncongenial whirl around her, she twined her eager, restless spirit into her secret, inner life, where, at times, it was flattered into content by the idealities upon which it was fed; at others, ramped and raved, like any other chained wild thing. The sweetest drop of pleasure she had tasted for many a day was the thrill she experienced when the forlorn object she had rescued from the power of the storm stood before her, decently and comfortably clad. The rash confidence she had reposed in so suspicious a stranger was the outgoing of a heart too noble and true in every impulse to pause, for a moment, to speculate upon the chances of another's good or bad faith. The great world of the confessedly poor was an unknown field to her—one she longed to explore. Her footsteps loitered more often near the entrance of some narrow, reeking street or alley, down which she had promised her mother not to go, than on the spacious paré, where over-dressed women and foppish men halted at, and hung around bewitching shop-windows. She wondered how such throngs of breathing beings contrived to exist in those fetid, cramped quarters; how they lived, spoke, acted, felt. The great tie of human brotherhood became daily more tense, as she pondered these things in her heart.

On this particular day, as she sat, silent and thoughtful, at her needle, the chit-chat of her companions less heeded than the continual dropping of the rain without, the wail of the shivering wanderer caused a painful vibration through every nerve. The deed was done! the experiment was tried. She was ashamed that an event so trivial held her eyes waking, far into the night. At least, she said to herself, she would not be without a lesson of some kind; would learn whether deceit and falsehood prevailed in the lowest, as well as the higher ranks of society. If, as she still strove to believe would be the case, the child returned the borrowed property, she would make use of her, as the means of entering upon a new sphere of research and action. After so complete a refutation of her theories respecting the utter corruption of all people, who had not enough to eat and to wear, her mother could not withhold her consent to her petition that she might become a lay-missionary—a present relief committee to a small portion of the suffering, toiling, ill-paid masses. She would then have a work to do—something to call out energy and engage feeling in healthy exercise—and soothed by the romantic vision, she fell asleep with a smile upon her lips.

The morning dawned between breaking clouds, that soon left the sky clear and bright. All through the day Sarah watched for her visitor of the preceding day—watched with nervousness she could not wholly conceal, from morn to night, for two, three days—for a week. Then she looked no longer while at home; her question, at entering the house, after a drive or walk, ceased to be, "Has anything been left for me?" So palpable was her disappointment that her father forbore to make any allusion to her loss, and Lucy, albeit she was somewhat obtuse to the finer points of her sister's character, good-naturedly interposed to change the subject, when her mother sought to improve the incident to her daughter's edification and future profit. Mr. Hunt was right in supposing that the "unsophisticated girl" had learned something. Whether she were happier or better for the lesson thus acquired was another thing.

Once again Sarah had an opportunity for speech with her delinquent protégée. Two months later, she was passing through a by-street in a mean neighborhood, very far up town, in her morning ramble, when her progress was arrested, for an instant, by two boys, who ran out of an alley across the walk. One overtook the other just in front of the lady, and catching him by his ragged collar, threw him down.

"That's right! beat him well! I'll help!" screeched a girl, rushing out of the court whence they had come.

Grinning with delight, she flung herself upon the prostrate form and commenced a vigorous assault, accompanied by language alike foul and profane.

Sarah recognized her instantly, and while she paused in mingled amazement and anger, the child looked up and saw her. In a twinkling she relinquished her grip of the boy's hair—jumped up and sped back into the dirty alley, with the blind haste of guilty fear.

Yes! Mr. Hunt was a wise man, who knew the world, and trebly sage in her generation, was his spouse. If their daughter had never acknowledged this before, she did now, in her disgust and dismay at this utter overthrow of her dreams of the virtuous simplicity to be found in lowly homes, where riches and fashions were things unknown.

EVERY soul has an immortality and infinity in itself that cannot be searched or expressed; it is an awful secret, that neither language, nor action, nor expression of any kind can disclose; we all of us long for what life cannot supply; our aspirations are infinitely beyond our attainments; so much so, that they who are contented with the world as it is are the mere cattle of society. All improvements originate with discontentment; we labor and bring forth in sorrow; genius is a laborer, an operative, a slave; and every useful man and woman is.

KINDNESS in ourselves is the honey that blunts the sting of unkindness in another.

WOMEN are extreme—they are better or worse than men.

THE ORPHAN'S HOPE.

BY EMMA C. D. COWES.

My invalid mother and I were alone,
 Out on the low porch where the bright sun shone—
 In the month of June—'twas a lovely day ;
 With the vines o'erhead the wind was at play—
 The sweet breath of flowers was borne on the breeze—
 The katydid's song came forth from the trees—
 We heard the noise of the busy old mill
 That's over the brook, down under the hill ;
 And from hill, and dale, and woodland would float
 Sweet notes from many a musical throat.
 My mother sat there in her old arm-chair,

And I was near,
 Plying my needle and chanting an air
 She loved to hear.
 I suddenly paused in my joyous lay,
 And gazed on her face ;
 I thought that her cheek was paler that day,
 And I could trace
 Deep shadows of pain on her fair high brow—
 I know they are gone, yet they haunt me now.

"Oh, mother," I cried,
 As I flew to her side,
 "Dear mother, I fear you are worse to-day!"
 "Aye! 'tis true, my child, I am passing away!
 A little time here, then the sexton's spade
 Will hollow my grave, and I shall be laid Away in the mould
 Of the churchyard old.

Nay, child, do not weep, it is all for the best
 That this aching form should be laid to rest ;
 Since the gloomy day that your father died,
 I have thought 'twere sweet to sleep by his side ;
 Though my form will lie 'neath the churchyard sod,
 My spirit will wing its way to its God.

Dear child, prepare
 To meet me there."

"But, mother, the way—do you not fear
 The valley of Death, with its shadows drear?
 The coffin, the shroud, the pall, and the bier?
 And the awful gloom
 Of the cold, dark tomb?"

"Nay, daughter, the Saviour will guide me through
 The shadowy valley—the Saviour true,
 Who alone can save.

His upholding arm can never fail,
 For He has passed through the gloomy vale,
 And conquered the Death king, grim and pale,
 Who ruled the grave.

It is but for you, poor darling, I grieve ;
 Aye, it pains me sore, all lonely to leave
 My orphaned one :

But He who numbers the sparrows that fall—
 Whose mercies extend to His creatures all—
 His will be done !

Pray to Him always, daughter, dear, pray !
 He'll comfort and guide you when I've passed away."

That beautiful night, ere the moon was set,
 The soul of my dearest friend had fled ;
 My agony wild I can never forget,

When they tore me away from the form of the dead !
 My bosom was filled with the deepest woe ;
 Of light I could see not a flickering ray,

Till those sweet words came, spoke a short time ago,
 "Pray to Him, always, daughter, dear, pray !"

Then a strange, sweet peace swept over my soul
 As I knelt in prayer ere the rise of the sun,
 And a voice within, when I heard the bell toll,
 Said, "It's all for the best—His will be done."
 My mother's voice I can hear no more ;
 Nor her footfalls light on her chamber floor ;
 All within her room looks gloomy and bare,
 And empty and lone is her old arm-chair ;
 But her home is a happier home than this—
 A home where the angels dwell in bliss ;
 And I humbly hope that bliss to share,
 As I trust ere long I shall meet her there.

THE EDUCATION OF WOMEN.—There is a vast deal which women have taught men, and men have then taught the world, and which the men alone have had the credit for, because the woman's share is untraceable. But, cry some of our modern ladies, this is exactly what we wish to avoid ; we can teach the world directly, and we insist on being allowed to do so. If our sphere has been hitherto more personal, it is because you have forced seclusion and restriction upon us. Educate us like yourselves, and we shall be competent to fill the same place as you do, and discharge the same duties. With extreme deference we do not think this is quite so ; we cannot believe what is now-a-days so broadly asserted, that the difference between the male and female intellect is due entirely to difference of education and circumstances, and that women, placed under the same conditions as men, would become men, except in the bare physical distinctions of sex. If the education and lives of women have been so utterly obliterative of such important qualities, it seems strange that they should have retained what they have got. No influences have succeeded in making them stupid, in destroying the spring and vivacity of their minds, their readiness, their facility, their abundant resources. Yet their education has been little, if at all, directed to foster these qualities more than those of reflection and comprehensive thought. Reverse the question. Do not men in innumerable instances develop the characteristic masculine intellect in all its force, totally irrespective of any training whatever? And is it supposed that any care, however sedulous, would make the mass of men rivals of the mass of women in those qualities which we have indicated as specially belonging to the latter? But it is fighting with shadows to combat such an assertion. The evidence of facts against it is scattered, minute, appealing in varied form to individual minds and experiences ; but it is overwhelming to all but the most prejudiced minds.

AUNT EDITH. A TALE OF THE HEART.

BY REV. H. HASTINGS WELD.

"Why so very thoughtful, Anna?"

"I am wondering, mother, how it could have happened that so pleasant and ladylike a person as Edith Gray has always lived alone with her niece in that romantic old house."

"Why," said the mother, smiling, "do you think it betokens a poor prospect for certain young ladies? And do those young ladies fear that, notwithstanding they are pleasant and ladylike, they may chance to live and die maidens, too?"

Anna did not attempt to parry her mother's railery or notice her sister's smiles, but continued: "Aunt Edith is so kind to Clara that we can easily see she would have made the best of mothers. She has what one may term a domestic heart, and it is such a pity that it has been thrown away!"

"It is well your father does not hear your wise discourse, Anna. He says the present generation of young girls read so many watery romances that they all talk like books, and not the highest style of books, either."

"Why, mother," cried the three sisters, in a breath, now rallying to the common defence.

But she laughingly begged their pardon, and returned to the subject of Aunt Edith. "It would be a great pity if Miss Gray's life had been wasted, as you seem to think. But there are other uses for women in this world besides marriage. And there are opportunities, if we will improve them, by which maiden ladies may do more disinterested good than the joyful mother of children. You have never heard Aunt Edith's history?"

"Never."

"Quiet as she seems, and passionless, her life has been quite a romance. But her adventures, and her fortunes and misfortunes, have not been of her own seeking. She was born in that old house, but there are people who remember that she has not always lived in it. By the way, you never have heard Edith Gray talk about her neighbors except to speak well of them?"

"Never."

"And that is the reason why her personal history is left untouched by a world which we are apt to consider scandal-loving. There is a vast fund of good in poor abused human nature, after all; a sense of justice, and a disposition to reward the generous with generous treatment. Aunt Edith never gossips, and is never gossiped about. But she has been the nine days' wonder more than once in her time. Suppose I tell you her story while the twilight lasts. It is a story with a moral, and will teach you that there may be women who have done a great deal better than to marry."

In the twilight, to her listening daughters, the mother told Aunt Edith's Story.

"Aunt Edith is some ten years my senior. I knew her, when I was a child like you, as a charming young woman. She was a half-orphan and her father's housekeeper, an only child, and the supposed heiress of a large fortune. Her father's house, the same in which she now lives, was made cheerful by her young friends. I was never better pleased than when I could find an errand or a pretext to go see Miss Edith.

"Of course it was presumed that Edith would one day marry. For, whatever we may say about it, the general expectation of young people is that they shall do so, and the usual conclusion of their elders is that they may. Edith was never what is called demonstrative; she never liked to make a sensation or to become the subject of remark; and though her early life abounded in circumstances which gave her prominence in people's minds, this notoriety was not of her seeking. The quiet manner which she now has was always the manner of Edith Gray.

"Though she was silent, even to her dear, dearest, and intimate, most intimate friends, of which most young girls have a half dozen, more or less, it was discovered in due course of events and indications that Edith was affianced. The matter had proceeded without any of the display of a public engagement, which we sometimes see. Nobody knew day and date, if ever there was a day and date on which he first distinctly proposed, and she distinctly accepted. But it was just as well understood, notwithstanding, that they were to be married. Everybody said of him, 'Lucky fellow!' and of her, 'What can her father do without his housekeeper?' That was the difficulty, and I happen to know, from circumstances not of her relating, that while she did accept her suitor, she could not be persuaded to fix the day of the marriage.

"Just in the midst of the public speculation on the affairs of the young couple, the lamentations of the sentimental that youth must be sacrificed to age, and the wonder of the imaginative why her father did not find himself a wife and release his daughter, there came in speculation of another sort to disturb the movement of events.

"The course of true love,' you know, 'never did run smooth.' There are always foolish men in the world, and Edith's father claimed his right of admission into that large family. I have told you that he was wealthy. He had long retired from business, but could not, it seemed, let well enough alone. He entered into some speculative adventures, and at sixty found himself a beggar.

"They still lived on, Edith and her father, in the old family mansion. It was said to be all that they had left; in strict justice it was not theirs. It was mortgaged so heavily that the form of a sale would have netted nothing to any one except the holder of the claim. And he did not care to disturb an old friend and respected citizen in his declining days.

Edith patiently and with a daughter's love gave herself to her father. I am afraid that the old man did not fully appreciate the sacrifice that his daughter made. He grew silent and morose. The house was not nearly now so pleasant a place to visit, and the young folks were afraid of meeting the moody countenance of old Mr. Gray. Edith was—outwardly, at least—the same as ever. Never having been what is called 'lively,' she could not now be said to be subdued; but I thought there was an air of sadness on her sweet face, though she still met me, as all other friends, with a calm smile. The wise people said, of course, that now the match must be broken off. I remember that I thought, as a child, how sad it was! And others shared the thought, and placed Edith's sadness entirely to the credit of the interruption of her nuptial preparation. I know now that such was not the case. It was her father's misfortune which oppressed her.

"Though people had said the marriage of Edith could not now take place, her silent, uncomplaining course soon changed the fickle tide of public opinion. People began to hint that it was very small and mean for a man, under the circumstances, to break off the engagement. There is no evidence that he had attempted any such thing. Perhaps he had hesitated, and grown somewhat cold. Now he was moved by the popular judgment, and his visits to Edith became as frequent as ever. The village verdict instantly was spoken that he was a 'noble fellow.' I confess that I do not like such noble fellows; I have no respect for any man who has to feel the public pulse to learn his private duty. On a review of all the circumstances, I am inclined to suspect that such was his case. But to make himself sure, and to guard against his possible feebleness of purpose, and to secure the praise which he coveted, he again formally tendered his hand and fortune to Edith Gray.

"Probably she understood his character. At any rate, much to the surprise of those who did not know her, and not at all to the astonishment of those who did, Edith offered him a release from his engagement. He declined to receive it, and the parties still stood upon their old relations. Edith, everybody said, would be married some time. Long engagements are generally voted tedious. Nobody dislikes them worse than those who have no other interest in them than the public right to talk. People like a young couple to be married and have done with it, and make room for the next candidates.

"It did not require many months for sorrow and disappointed pride to kill Edith's father. He was honored with a large funeral. Those who felt conscious of having neglected him in his reverses, pacified their consciences by following his remains to the grave. Edith was the subject of sympathy and commiseration for which she was grateful, and none the less so, that she did not understand it. People were grieving for her future. She was mourning her father; she thought they united with her in her grief, and was thankful and comforted.

"She felt the full weight of the blow when she was told, as tenderly as it could be done, that the home in which she had lived could no longer be hers. She learned now that the home of her childhood must come under the hammer, and that all the objects familiar to her must be sacrificed, to pay, as far as they might, the demands against an insolvent estate. Now, how the wise women regretted that Edith had been so very punctilious and straight-laced in her ideas of duty! If she had only consented to the proposals made to her! If she were only married now, the death of her father would not have marred her prospects! Twice she had deferred, if not refused, and nobody could expect that the offer would be renewed. It was just one of those long courtships which everybody saw would come to nothing.

"But the lover seemed determined to take high rank among earth's disinterested and faithful ones. He lost no time, after the death of Edith's father, before he formally declared himself to her again. Decent respect required that the nuptials should be deferred for a season. Meanwhile the suitor reached the very pinnacle of village fame for his magnanimity. I have already said that this kind of excitement in well-doing is dangerous; or rather that the good conduct which comes from such motives is scarcely to be trusted. But in this instance even the skeptics rejoiced that they were to be disappointed.

"Edith retired from the home of her birth, on a small income which had been secured to her from her mother's property, before her father's misfortune. It was increased by the kindness of some friends; and has not only kept her from want, but enabled her to do good to the more needy, all her life. Woman's wants are easily supplied, when, like Aunt Edith, they understand how to put money to its full and highest use.

"A new surprise was ready for the neighborhood. The advertised sale of Edith's home did not take place. Her lover took house and furniture at a fair appraisement, and Edith's fears of the profanation of a public sale were averted. Now, indeed, it did appear as if one of the impossible good genii of fairy tales had stepped into human life. The gentleman was almost canonized. The highest praise was accorded to him by the selfish, who declared that they did not think there was such a romantic fool among living men.

"Now Edith really could resist no longer. The marriage engagement became a fixed fact for a definite time. Carpenters, masons, painters, and other renovators were busy upon the old house. The new owner discovered a wonderful taste. People had not supposed the place capable of the improvements which transformed the Gray mansion and grounds, like magic. Perhaps he was guided by a better eye for beauty than his own. But if Edith was his counsellor, her maidenly delicacy prevented any appearance which could identify her with the work.

"The place quite renewed its youth, and stood forth quite an aristocrat among the houses in the village. Any man with money—or credit—may erect quite an imposing pile of stone or brick. But fine old trees, shaded avenues, and time-honored associations cannot be created in a day; and a noble old pile of a house judiciously embellished cannot be approached by any invention of the architect. In view of the splendid mansion preparing for her, people now began to consider Edith Gray one of the most fortunate of women, and the bridegroom, in prospect, one of the most generous and noble among men. Still, Edith's quiet manner was not changed, either to her lover, or to any one else. And if he seemed to move with the style of one who considers himself a benefactor, perhaps it was only my fancy that thus saw him.

"Perhaps you cannot understand what I mean; but I believe that speech is not by any means the readiest mode of our understanding each other. When a person speaks, it is one man or woman giving an opinion or concealing one. For you have heard the cynical remark that speech is a faculty given to us by which we conceal our thoughts. But even the most common observer can gather, he knows not how, the sentiment of a community on any subject without hearing their voices upon it. It may be misunderstood. It may be taken for more than it means, or for less. But we get our ideas of 'public opinion' by a kind of unspoken sympathy, and if we have not a very firm mind, are apt to be swayed—perhaps to our detriment. At any rate, our generous friend, Edith's lover, came to think that he was whole-hearted, magnanimous, self-sacrificing, and devoted, to a fault. And she—why she was not worthy of him. He was throwing himself away upon her! How far he let this lofty idea of himself appear to her, we never shall know. To all outward indications the affair was proceeding as successfully as such a long courtship could; and Edith was rather blamed, and he was rather exalted. Perhaps some persons—especially among the ladies, regarded him as rather injured by the coldness of the calm beauty.

"Suddenly the village was startled from its propriety by the announcement that another bride was to be mistress in the house prepared for Edith! It was monstrous! It was an outrage! It was an indecency! There were no words strong enough to express the indignation which was now awakened against the man who could be so base. The popular sympathy was full in favor of Edith, the popular wrath furious against her false swain. No wonder. Still, while everybody had been saying that he was too good and too kind by half, and that his generosity was almost a wrong to himself, and quite a weakness, what could a poor fool do but take the public at its word, and show himself a man?

"The fickle bridegroom—fickle at last, after long constancy—took the public, like another

Napoleon, by a coup d'état. Before the popular indignation was ripe for the inauguration of Judge Lynch, or even for the arrangement of a charivari, he appeared in the village church with his wife on his arm and a bridal party in her train, occupying two or three pews. She was beautiful, even more so than Edith; and, poor frightened thing, what could she have known about it? How was she to be blamed? It was not her fault, and she must be received courteously. And then she was so well connected! The name, position, and family of every one of the party were known through the whole town before anybody slept, except, we may add, those who slept in sermon time. There was some talk of 'audacity,' and 'bad taste,' and 'worse principles,' through that Sunday. But after the congregation had all slept upon it, it was reasonably perceived that so distinguished a connection was not to be ignored. The 'reception' included everybody in its invitations, and there were very few indeed who did not respond. Nobody was ever better welcomed. Such is the value of popular opinion sometimes. Perhaps it was as well so.

"And poor Edith? She did not die, as we very well know. Hackneyed phrases spoil the gravity of a narrative, but really we can find nothing better than to say that 'she behaved with a great deal of propriety.' It was a blow and a most mortifying one; but Edith had the good sense to see that inasmuch as it was a misfortune over which the world could give her no relief, her only remedy was to conquer herself, and subdue her own chagrin. She made no public exhibition of her feeling of disappointment, and neither sought nor encouraged pity. Indeed I may say that she never permitted it, for she must have been on very intimate and familiar terms with her who could introduce a subject which she studiously and carefully avoided. She visited her faithless lover with no open censure, and to no few select friends (including half the village) did she confide her denunciations. But while people looked that she should have gone into a decline, or sunk into melancholy, become demented, or in some other way have given testimony how deep and awful was the blow, she went quietly on her way, the same gentle Edith as ever.

"The cold world soon came to the conclusion that Edith Gray's disappointment was no such great matter, after all. The young and novelled of ardent imaginations were quite indignant that the cold Edith Gray could so set all precedent and all genuine sentiment at defiance, as neither to drown, die naturally, or go mad under the operation of the 'sundering of her heart strings.'

"Years passed, and brought with them the evidence that Edith Gray's disappointment had shielded her from a worse misfortune. To be sure, having lost her first opportunity of matrimony, she remained single. This was not, be it noted, from necessity. Many an incipient attachment she might have encouraged into a declaration; but she had a very lady-like but positive way of checking such demonstrations. Some proceeded in spite of her, and these she resolutely put down at the proper time, and before the affair became so notorious as to cause remark. Having tested the thing once, she was determined on no more experience in that direction. Her friends tried in vain to break her resolution, for, gentle as she was, she had still the firmness of a strong will, supported by a clear conscience. Her conduct vindicated her from the charge of want of feeling. A person more demonstrative would have made more outcry with less affection, and settled, after her first disappointment, upon some one else.

"I have said that Edith Gray's desertion by her lover shielded her from a worse fate. The man who had laid so grievous a load upon his conscience sank under it. He was consumed by the coals which Edith heaped upon his head. If she had given him the excitement of a quarrel, if by a suit at law she had afforded him opportunity to add insult to injury, the punishment would have been less severe. But her calm superiority and indifference, easily, and perhaps not altogether wrongly, construed into contempt, maddened him. She evidently considered that he had proved himself to be not the man whom she had loved. He might not have been willing to confess it, but the punishment of Cain was upon him, and his inward strife and struggles made him wayward and fitful. His friends, and his family especially, could never be sure of him; one moment jocose, even to rude mirth, he was the next moody, even to moroseness. His fitfulness ended where that of men of small mind and less principle is apt to end—in habits of intemperance. You are ready to say that if he had married Edith this would not have been. Perhaps not; but the man who is guilty of one meanness might have been of another. And the treacherous lover would, had he saved his character until after he married, have probably proved a treacherous husband. So, indeed, he did, though not to Edith.

"His property soon gave evidence of the consequences of his habits. Other vices followed in the train of that parent of vices, drunkenness. He gamed, and tried by hard-hearted usury, and by questionable speculation, to repair the inroads which extravagance had made in his fortune. He was not without friends, and as his course threatened to make him a charge upon them, they used their influence to provide him such a maintenance as would avert this danger.

"As there existed such a positive necessity that he should be provided for, it required only a skilful use of party logic to demonstrate that he was precisely the patriot who should hold a place of trust under the government. The principle of 'rotation in office' decreed a vacancy. The old incumbent was 'rotated' out, and our unworthy hero was appointed. The requisite securities were executed without difficulty. There is no more efficient qualification for office than the necessity which may exist to provide for a needy man who has powerful friends.

"Habits of extravagance are not easily laid aside. Whatever may have been the officeholder's desire or resolutions, he early fell into the delusion of mistaking the public funds for his own. With every quarterly return, the deficiency he was compelled to conceal increased. His securities took the alarm, and hinted to him, not obscurely, their suspicions. Affrighted at the possibility of detection in his first breaches of trust, he was betrayed into crime of a deeper dye. He embarked in a course of deliberate frauds, which were continued for several years, and ended at last in detection, and the penitentiary.

"I have recently heard that the poor wretch lives still; and hope that he has, in adversity, better motives for reform than he had, in his prosperity, for good conduct. You see, my dear children, how weak a safeguard for our correct conduct is mere regard for human opinion and a taste for popular praise. And you see, too, that Aunt Edith Gray could have done worse than remain a single woman. The man of weak principles would have proved as weak as her husband as he showed himself when the husband of another.

"I have not told you his name. Nor do I intend to mention it. It is Aunt Edith Gray's secret; and the regard of the community has suffered oblivion to fall upon it. The wretched wife went home to her friends, upon the arrest of her husband.

"And now happened, in real life, one of those instances of poetical justice which we read of in books, but seldom see. Edith's father had been ruined by heavy investments in a corporate concern which fell from par to about ten per cent. The stock was purchased at this low rate by the creditors. By a turn of the wheel of fortune, it came up again, and the holders found themselves paid twice over. When the old mansion was sold on behalf of the government, the creditors of Mr. Gray bought and tendered it to his daughter.

"A romantic woman would have said, 'No! a thousand times, no!' with all the emphasis of the last shilling novel. Edith slept on it, rose calmly in the morning, wrote a note to her friends, and gracefully accepted the return which it was their pleasure to make, no less than her advantage to accept. And so she returned to the home of her childhood.

"The most curious incident yet remains. Edith could not live alone in that great house. And she began to find that she should one day grow old. She needed a young heart to be growing into strength, when she should be sinking into weakness. She desired a friend in the city to find her a child of years so tender, and of condition so destitute, that there should be neither power to recollect, nor need to recall its parentage. Clara, whom you know as Clara Gray, was that child, and is now her attached and most dearly loved friend. Clara knows no nearer heart than Aunt Edith.

"The child had been in her new home a year—and a sweet child she was—when Aunt Edith discovered that little Clara is the daughter of the faithless man who has been the shadow over her life! The mother is dead.

"A romantic woman again would have instantly discarded the child of such parentage—the reminder of her own early unhappiness. Edith looked on the babe as it slept. She looked, and wept, till her sobs awakened the infant. The child stared in wonder, reached out her little arms, kissed away Aunt Edith's tears, and stole so deeply into Aunt Edith's heart that nothing will ever dislodge her.

"Now, my dear children, I have done. You see why I have withheld the father's name from you. You will keep Clara Gray's secret; and you will cease to wonder, Anna, why Aunt Edith never was married. It is strange; but I do believe that she is such a stoic—or such a Christian, rather—that the tone of Clara's voice and the glance of her eye, which remind those who knew him, of her father, make the child still dearer. Edith never talks of her feelings. I only judge from her conduct."

BY WILLIE E. PABOR.

ONCE upon a time the King of Cloudland called his family of shadows together, in order to select one for a special mission to earth.

Now this king, having dominion over the dark side of humanity only, had sent an embassy to the realm of Sunshine for a spirit of that bright country to go with his own envoy upon the proposed mission. The embassy had returned, hence the gathering of the shadows.

Having chosen one suitable for his purpose, the king sent forth the Shadow and the Sunshine, saying to them as they went: "Go through the world and be witnesses of the way in which men walk; let the Sunshine—for the world's brightness will then render it invisible—take notice of their doings by day, and the Shadow—hidden in the darkness—watch them through the silence of the night. Bring back a faithful record of all the joys and sorrows, the hopes and disappointments, the pleasures and the pains of the children of men. Above all, discover the source from whence flows the most of evil wrought by human hands. Find out the fountain whose waters are more bitter than all the bitter waters of the world."

So, the king having dismissed them, the Shadow and the Sunshine journeyed together toward the lower world.

While yet afar off they heard sounds resembling distant thunder; as they drew nearer the air seemed to be full of cries of sorrow and wails of woe; here and there mingled among the discordant note, songs of revelry and echoes of words of blasphemy. At these the Sunshine wondered, but the Shadow said: "In Cloudland there is a legend that the words once uttered upon earth die not with the sound of the voice of the one that speaks them, but float on through space forever and forever, undying witnesses of the good or the evil deeds of men. This, then, must be Echo-Land. Here the cry of Abel, as Cain struck him to the ground, vibrates through the air; here lingers the plaintive appeal of Joseph as his brethren sold him into Egypt, mingling with their words of wonder, when, years later, they saw the brother they had sold a slave second only to the king upon his throne; here David's song of triumph cannot drown the accusing voice of the Prophet as he tells the story of the one ewe-lamb coveted by the owner of many flocks; here Peter's oath of denial vibrates through all the arteries of the air; here the dying words of the early martyrs testify in their behalf; and here the echoes of all the words that lips have ever uttered since Adam stood in the Garden of Eden, keep the record of the lives of men. By these shall they be judged and justified or condemned."

As the Shadow ceased, their lightning-like speed carried them beyond the confines of Echo-Land, and lo! they were in the heart of a city the hum of whose traffic went unceasingly upward night and day.

Through the streets of the city, the Shadow and the Sunshine went. Here they saw a beggar asking alms; here a Shylock taking his pound of flesh; here a mother clasping a dying infant in her arms, and herself suffering the pangs of starvation; here a miser dying amid his gold with no one to close his eyes or fold his dead hands over his pulseless breast. They went all through the homes that the daylight and the darkness covers, in the highways and the byways of the great city; they looked into the hearts of all those with whom they came in contact and saw there the secrets that were hidden from the eyes of men. They saw smiles upon faces and the worm of agony in the heart belied the face every hour. They heard words that lips uttered and the life falsified. They saw the mantle of friendship cover the smouldering fires of revenge and hate. The wolf of Guilt they beheld in close communion with the lamb of Innocence. Humanity in all its guises and in all its disguises; in all its beauty and deformity; in all the sweetness of its promise and all the bitterness of its realization; in all the glory that invests it, and in all the disgrace that encircles it, was laid bare before them. High and low, far and near they went their way seeking the fountain whose waters, on the lips of mankind—were bitterest of all; seeking the source of that evil wrought wholly by human means and influences and controlling the fate of so many lives.

And when, having grown weary of witnessing the effect, they began their search for causes, they learned that INTemperance lay at the root of nearly all the pain, the sorrow and the suffering of human kind.

"Surely," said the Sunshine, "this must be the fountain of which we are in search. The waters of Marah were bitter to the taste; but one drop from this fountain embitters a whole life."

They heard a man on the steps of the gallows trace his past history until he reached the turning point of life in his youth; and the wine-cup, with the serpent of Crime hidden in its glowing bosom stood out as the first great cause of all; "Look not upon the wine," said the Proverb, "when it is red; when it giveth its color in the cup; for at the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder."

But this man, born of Christian parents, heeded not the counsels of the wise man; the Spirit of Evil led him upon the slippery places of life, and deserted him when most he needed a helping hand. Closer and closer the cordon of crime gathered around him, until at last the law of life for life sent him to his last account with the dying wail of his victim still ringing in his ear. Here the trail of the serpent of Intemperance was over all the years of this man's life.

The Sunshine and the Shadow could not forget this scene. Said one: "Pandora's box of evil, with Hope at the bottom, has its kindred box of good, with sorrow beneath all the blessings it holds."

And the other replied: "Say, rather, Intemperance, for it seems to be the bane of life."

They entered the habitations of the poor and the homes of the lowly, and saw there the full effects of the fearful vice. They were witnesses to the prosperity of those who grew rich by dealing out destruction to their fellow-men.

Said the Shadow: "I went into a cottage by the wayside; all around were the signs of neglect in its outward aspect; within it was still worse. There was no fire on the hearthstone, no carpet on the floor, no bread in the cupboard. The father lay drunk in one corner of the room, with the gin bottle still in his hand. The mother lay near by, her senses steeped in liquor, utterly unconscious of her degradation and shame. On a heap of straw in another corner lay an infant whose lips had just uttered life's last wail. They would open no more by reason of cold, or hunger, or pain. And the parents knew it not; they lay there insensible for hours; then the woman rose up and would have taken the bottle from her husband's hand to drink again from the fountain whose bitter waters had already turned to gall all the sweetness that clusters around the holy name of wife and of mother. The attempt awoke him, and he would not yield, but cursed her with a curse. Nay, more; he rose up and struck her to the floor, and then kicked her as she lay there helpless. Nor was this all! this, the crowning-point of infamy in man! the lowest depth of woman's degradation! Reeling to and fro, he struck against a table on which stood a lighted candle; he and it fell to the floor, and in a little while the flames enveloped the house and its living and dead inmates, and from their drunken stupor they awoke at the bar of their God and their Judge."

And the Sunshine said, as the Shadow ceased: "Not many years ago these two stood together at the altar. There they vowed to love, cherish, and protect each other until death parted them. They were young, beautiful, and beloved; the rainbow of promise spanned their future, and beneath the sunny sky of love they walked amid the roses whose thorns were all turned aside. At the bridal feast the wine-cup passed around. Could the bride be pledged in it by all but the bridegroom? Could they all drink her health, and he, the chosen one of them all, refuse? Heretofore he had touched not nor tasted the cup; but now—now the moral courage that had held him up forsook him, and he raised the fatal first glass to his lips. Time passed on, but the first glass was not the last! Step by step, slowly at first, but surely, his feet travelled the downward road; friends failed and fortune forsook him. As his self-respect was lost, hers vanished also; and here, with the years of life scarce half told, behold the end! Surely the waters of this fountain are more bitter than all the other bitter waters of the world. Surely, of all sources from whence flows evil wrought by human hands, this was the greatest of all."

They went out of the city into the country, and through the land. They saw war and its desolations; the battle-field and its scenes of carnage; strong men falling as the grain falls before the sickle of the reaper, as cannon boomed, and shells burst, and bullets whizzed through the smoke and sulphur-laden air.

They went where the pestilence raged; and saw young and old, strong and weak, the beautiful and the loving, fall at the touch of the destroying angel.

They floated over the ocean, and, piercing the veil of the waters, saw in the bosom of the sea the wrecks of ships, and the dead over whose grave no tombstone will ever rise.

They saw disasters upon land and sea; earthquakes swallowing up cities, and the hurricane destroying armadas. But more than all, and beyond all these results of the years, they saw and realized that the victims of Intemperance outnumbered them all. Outnumbered the victims of the sea, of pestilence, and of war. Directly or indirectly the curse of the wine-cup gathered them in. Young and old, the wise and the simple, the good and the bad, the weak and the strong. It filled cells in prisons, wards in hospitals, and graves in Pottery fields. It broke the hearts of brothers and sisters, mothers and children, and brought down the gray hairs of fathers in sorrow to the grave. It caused more tears to flow than would suffice for a second deluge. It severed bridal vows, broke up household shrines, destroyed the hopes of youth, embittered the memories of declining years. It touched, and the ashes of desolation followed; it called, and its siren song brought countless victims. No Lurlei of the sea ever sang so sweetly or so fatally. Like the sexton in the play, its victims Intemperance "gathers in, gathers in," to a grave above which Resurgam—"I will rise again"—is not written.

The Shadow and the Sunshine having witnessed all these things, returned to Cloudland, and stood before the king. To one he put this question: "Did you find the source from whence flows the most of evil wrought by human hands?" To the other he said: "Tell me the name of the fountain whose waters are more bitter than all the other bitter waters of the world."

And each said unto the king: "The evils of Intemperance are the greatest of all evils, and its waters are the bitterest of all the bitter waters that flow from poisoned fountains in the valleys of the children of men."

LINES TO MY POEM.

BY VAN BUREN DENSLOW.

THERE are some that hear no music,
Scent no flower, see no sky;
Better thus than live no poem
In our little lives, and die.

Nay, we're born in the ideal
God, the poet, ne'er expressed;
Mother knows no sweeter sonnet
Than the infant at her breast.

Though its words be all of heaven,
Which we little understand,
Like the song the stranger singeth
In the tongue of fatherland.

When I listen to the echoes,
Murmuring back from hours gone by,
In my life I hear a poem,
In my life a joy have I.

As some mortal caught in vision,
Views the bowers of heavenly bliss
All but this may tell, returning,
But his lips are sealed to this;

So I cannot tell my poem
That like high auroral fire,
When I run and climb to grasp it,
Rises farther still and higher.

Though I hint of its appearing,
Faintly of its feebler part,
Yet I may not tell the glory
When my poem fills my heart.

Then oh leave me to its beauty,
To its fond and soft embrace,
To its white and pearly bosom,
To its smiling, loving face;

To its sweet blue eye of kindness,
To its wealth of shadowy hair,
To her fingers playing freely
With my locks that mingle there;

To her unrestrained caresses,
To her chaste and tender kiss,
To her flood of all that blesses,
To her depth of all that 's bliss—

Depth that hath no deeper measure,
For my very poem lives
Throbbing with the equal pleasure,
It receives and gives.

For thou, Mary, art my poem,
And amid all toil and strife
Let me clasp thee, pretty volume,
Closer, closer, darling wife.

As thy presence makes thee dearer,
And thine absence makes it known,
Here, if sighs could bring thee nearer,
Wouldst thou ever be my own.

HOME AFTER BUSINESS HOURS.—The road along which the man of business travels in pursuit of competence or wealth is not a Macadamized one, nor does it ordinarily lead through pleasant scenes and by well-springs of delight. On the contrary, it is a rough and rugged path, beset with "wait-a-bit" thorns, and full of pitfalls, which can only be avoided by the watchful care of circumspection. After every day's journey over this worse than rough turnpike road, the wayfarer needs something more than rest; he requires solace, and he deserves it. He is weary of the dull prose of life, and athirst for the poetry. Happy is the business man who can find that solace and that poetry at home. Warm greetings from loving hearts, fond glances from bright eyes, the welcome shouts of children, the many thousand little arrangements for our comfort and enjoyment that silently tell of thoughtful and expectant love, the gentle ministrations that disencumber us into an old and easy seat before we are aware of it; these and like tokens of affection and sympathy constitute the poetry which reconciles us to the prose of life. Think of this, ye wives and daughters of business men! Think of the toils, the anxieties, the mortifications, and wear that fathers undergo to secure for you comfortable homes, and compensate them for their trials by making them happy by their own firesides.

SNOWED UP.

BY MARY W. JANVRIK.

CHAPTER I.

"Such a storm! enough to weary one to death!" exclaimed Florence Hunter, a haughty belle and beauty of the Trimountain City, pacing her elegantly appointed chamber with impatient step, pausing now and then to part the rich curtains draping the window, and peer forth into the night. "Three days of snow, and no abatement yet! No shopping, scarcely a caller, and now a prospect of the trains being snowed up, and his not arriving!" And, with an air quite at variance with the customary repose of her manner, she let fall the heavy folds of brocette, and crossed the apartment to the crimson velvet covered arm-chair drawn up before the grate.

By every appointment of that luxurious boudoir—the Persian carpet, soft as woodmoss to the tread, the costly falls of silk damask and lace, the elegant chairs and couches, the oval pictures leaning from the walls, and the numberless articles of vertu scattered around—it was plain to see that this was the home of opulence; and by the curve of the city belle's scarlet lip, the arching of her stately throat, the expansion of her perfectly-chiselled nostril, and the regal carriage of her small Grecian head with its massive braids of jetty hair, it were easier yet to vote her haughty as she was beautiful.

It was, in truth, a long and wearisome storm that had for those three days been an unwelcome visitor to many in the busy city beside the belle and beauty, Miss Hunter; not a wild, fillibustering expedition of the allied powers of rain, sleet, and wind, which often sweep down upon our coast in fury, wreak their sudden vengeance, then as hastily retire; but a continued, pitiless siege of snowflakes, whose countless squadrons poured down so steadily that all the earth and air was one parade field for their white plumes. Merchants, passing through their almost deserted stores, or looking up from their lean ledgers, growled at the storm that kept the gold at home in ladies' purses, instead of in their money-drawers; clerks, lounging over orderly counters, folded their arms instead of webs of silk or Cashmere reps, for no fair customers disturbed their goods; there were few pedestrians abroad, for the sidewalks were deep in snow, and the horse-cars running through the thoroughfares were crowded to overflowing; State Street wore a forlorn look—curbstone brokers taking shelter in-doors, news-boys sparse and quiet, and 'Change transformed into a sort of "waste howling wilderness;" while above the brick walls, towering chimneys, and church towers of the old Puritan city folded the gray mantle of the storm, and "still fluttered down the snow."

"Dear me, Florry, another tedious evening at home!"—and the speaker, Mrs. Hunter, a showy-looking woman of forty-five, entered her daughter's chamber. "What shall we do to pass the time, unless Holt or Morgan drops in? They are better than solitude; for John says the railroads are blocked up, and Everett cannot arrive to-night. What could have possessed him to hurry off to that stupid country-seat of his before he came to Boston? And now this storm will detain him from us some days longer!" And Mrs. Hunter's voice was full of pique and disappointment.

"Oh, mamma, if Leonard Everett prefers the rustic attractions of 'Ridgewood' to town, let him enjoy them!" replied Florence, with a languid intonation that quite contradicted her former impatience when alone, for she did not care to confess, even to her mother, how eagerly she had looked forward to the arrival of their visitor from his long absence.

"Prefers! Why, Florry, you don't suppose that Everett has returned from Europe to bury himself on that horrid farm of his! I never could see the attractions of the country, even in summer, though one must go into it, to be sure, if one is at all fashionable; but give me a first-class hotel at a watering-place, or some other resort where our set go, and farmers are welcome to their fields, and grass, and all that. You don't imagine Everett will settle down and practise his profession in his native town, Florry?"

"He will make known his intentions to us when he arrives, mamma," replied Miss Florence, with a well-affected ennuied air. "In his letters to me from abroad he did not mention that arrangement."

"Which, of course, you would never consent to, Florry," went on her mother, imperturbably, and complacently adjusting the folds of her rich silk, for she was quite used to the indifference of her only and indulged child. "After your marriage he will, of course, take a house here; as for his profession, he will do as he likes about practising; but he has wealth enough to live without it. As Doctor Everett's wife, you will be the envy of all our set, Florry!"

"Why, mamma, you seem to regard it as a settled thing, when you remember I am not his affiancée yet," said Florence, in her soft, rippling voice, that veiled well her own wildly beating heart.

"Florence, all our plans have worked well, so far, and why should we look for defeat now? As your father's ward, Leonard Everett became more intimate in our family than any other young man, an intimacy I took pains to encourage after your father's death and his own majority and succession to his fortune; it was to attach him to you that I educated you to please him, and procured you the masters he recommended; it was to leave you a fair field that I sent her away, that dependant on your father's bounty"—and here the woman's eye flashed darkly, while the lip of the haughty brunette in the crimson velvet chair smiled triumphantly as she assented to her mother's gaze. "It has been my daily thought for these last three years, during Everett's absence in Europe, to anticipate the hour of his return, when he would ask your hand; and now, Florence, your own beauty and tact must do the rest, for if you let Leonard Everett, with his fortune and position, slip through your hands, you will never see such another eligible offer."

"Nor do I intend to fail in so doing, dear mamma, let me assure you!" was the beauty's quiet answer, complacently admiring her exquisitely small slipper, resting on the velvet footstool before the grate. "So, prythee, ma chère mère, don't fear in the least for your Florence!"

"I thought you had a portion of my spirit and shrewdness, Florry!" said Mrs. Hunter, well pleased at her daughter's answer. "And there can be no such thing as failure, if you decide so. Why, there's Fred Holt, ready to offer himself at any moment, if you but show him the slightest encouragement; or Alfred Morgan, either of them considered very eligible by any of our friends. But neither possesses Doctor Everett's fortune, a no small consideration, reared with such tastes as you have been, Florry; besides, he is handsome, gentlemanly, and refined. My hopes are high for you, daughter," said Mrs. Hunter, rising.

"Thanks, mamma," replied the haughty beauty, indolently. But when left alone, all her assumed calmness vanished, and, with flashing eyes, she sprang up and paced the floor of her room, as if she would throw off all false restraint. "Wealthy, handsome, gentlemanly, and refined—all true, my dear lady mother; but you did not think it necessary to add that I love him! Yes, Leonard Everett, cold and proud to the beautiful and accomplished women you have met in your wanderings, as I know from the tone of your letters from abroad, cold as you have hitherto been to me, my beauty has ripened vainly in these four years if it do not weave a spell to bring you to my feet!"—and she flung an appreciative glance into the toilet mirror, swinging in its elaborately carved frame. "Cold to all, I said," she went on, musingly, while her eyes flashed lambent fire for a moment; "and yet I have not forgotten that little episode of your last winter here ere you went abroad, that which might have ripened into something serious had not we—my sharp, shrewd mamma and I—sent the artful piece away, that month, after papa's sudden death. But, Edna Moore, with your blonde face and blue eyes, for you were lovely, enact the rôle of artlessness as you might, the drama was not played out here. It would have done well enough to have had you with us, had we kept you out of sight; but one cannot pass off their kin always as governess or sewing-girl, and father did have such queer fancies about supporting his poor relatives! So, when Everett became interested enough to inquire for you one day, it was a pleasure to tell him that you had proved ungrateful, and left our protection. Certainly you did talk shockingly for a person in your position to mamma that day we parted! Where are you now, I wonder? And yet why should I give you a passing thought, Edna Moore? It is sufficient that you were swept aside long ago, and now Leonard Everett is returned, and my triumph will soon be complete."

CHAPTER II.

A JANUARY day was drawing to a close in the town of Dentford—a country region where dwelt a hospitable, kind-hearted, and intelligent farming community. The landscape might have been pleasant enough on a fair day, under the influence of a bright winter's sun; but the twilight was closing early, with a thick fall of snow that had not ceased since its commencement the preceding day; and broad fields, bounded by straggling stone walls, dark clumps of firs and hemlocks, that stood like patient hooded monks on the hill to the west—and the weather-beaten houses, with their broad, low chimneys, and long lines of out-buildings—all seemed dim and weird-like through the veiling snow.

With the early twilight that shut in the winter's afternoon, the door of a little red schoolhouse, perched on the summit of a wind-swept, treeless rise of ground (after the fashion of our Puritan ancestors, who always selected such localities for the site of the meeting or schoolhouse), was thrown open with a wide swing; and a troop of noisy small urchins, followed by the great boys and girls of almost adult size, emerged into the open air. With book satchels in hand, or the little tin pails that had held the dinner for their nooning, they bent their steps homeward—the boys descending on the prospect of building a snow fort when it should "fair off," and easing the exuberance of their spirits let loose after the school-room confinement by pelting each other with snowballs hastily manufactured from the damp, clinging drifts through which they waded.

When the last scholar had departed, "the mistress"—a young and lovely girl, with such purely transparent complexion, tender blue eyes shaded by long brown eyelashes, and a grace of air that betokened her the fine lady—"the mistress turned the key in the great iron padlock that hung against the weather-stained door: wrapped her cloak more closely about her; and turned her steps down the drifted highway to Farmer Brooks' dwelling—the great, square, old-fashioned farmhouse, with its popular trees in the front yard, and the long gate that barred it from the road.

For a quarter of a mile "the mistress" kept on, until she turned up into the lane leading to her boarding-house. As she neared the door, she felt unaccountably ill and dizzy. For two days past, she had complained of a slight cold, but that afternoon, while busy with the duties of the school-room, sudden ague fits had sent her to the great wood fire blazing up the wide-mouthed chimney that filled one side of the old schoolhouse, and then, as suddenly, hot flushes shot through her veins, that sent a splendid crimson to her delicate cheeks and lips, and fired her eyes with unnatural brightness, till she was glad to lean her forehead against the cool window-pane for relief. Now, as she crossed the threshold of her boarding house, a blind vertigo seized her, and she stumbled into the entry, and would have fallen but for the friendly aid of Mrs. Brooks, who, seeing her approach from the window, had opened the door of the keeping-room.

"The land! what ails you? are you sick, Miss Edna?" asked that good woman, placing a chair, and hastening to remove the cloak and hood flecked with the soft clinging snow. "Speak, child, for you do look dreadful! Ain't a-goin' to be taken down, I hope!"

"My head was so dizzy!" said the teacher, in a faint, sweet voice. "It is a little better now—it will pass off, I think! Perhaps a cup of your nice tea will make me feel better. Don't look so alarmed, Mrs. Brooks!"

"Scairt? I ain't the least bit scairt, Miss Edna; but them cheeks of yours, crimson as pinies and hot as fire, ain't a-goin' to deceive me—you 're feverish, that 's sartain; and it 'll take another kind of tea than Young Hyson to cure you. I declare, I kept thinking of you this afternoon; and I went up into the garret, and fetched down some penny'r'yal to steep for you to-night, for I said to Jacob: 'This 'll cure up the Mistress's cold and sore throat.' Now, set right up to the fire in this cushioned chair, and put your feet on this stool while I take off them wet overshoes; and then, after a light supper—if you feel like eating—I 'll steep the penny'r'yal, and make you such famous 'arb tea as 'll bring you down bright as a dollar in the morning. We ain't a-goin' to have you down sick, while Aunt Betsey Brooks knows how to make penny'r'yal tea!" said the brisk, motherly woman, cheerily. "Land! what little feet you have got, Miss Edna!" she added, removing the teacher's rubbers, and placing the footstool.

"I am sorry to give you so much trouble, Mrs. Brooks!" said the teacher, faintly smiling, yet pressing her hand on her aching forehead to still its throbbing.

"Trouble? don't say that word agin, child!" cried the little woman with mock asperity. "Who 's a-goin' to take keer of us when we 're sick, if we ain't willin' to do the same turn by others?" and, stirring the maple clefts that burned in the great cook-stove, she filled the tea-kettle, then drew out the table for supper. "Yes, that 's what I often tell Jacob," she continued, laying the snowy cloth, setting out the well-preserved, old-fashioned pink china that she used in honor of "boarding the mistress," and cutting generous slices of snowy bread, nice cake, and rich yellow cheese. "I tell him, that what we do unto others 'll be pretty sartain to fall in our own dish some day; and duty, if nothing more, ought to point out the road for every human creature to walk in. Not that I need to think of any such reason for looking after you, Miss Edna—for I told Jacob, the first day you come under our roof, a year and a half ago, that I should be sure to take you into my heart to fill the place of my poor lost Annie!" and here Mrs. Brooks' voice trembled a little. "She was eighteen, when she died; and your brown hair and blue eyes always bring her up before me."

"You are very kind to me; and, if you are daughterless, I am motherless!" The words fell impulsively from the teacher's lips; and, with them, came also a burst of tears and little sobs that shook her frame. Ill and weary—grateful for the kind friends among whom her lot had placed her—yet oh for a mother's hand to be laid upon her aching forehead! a mother's breast whereon she might pillow herself to sleep!

"There, there, don't cry, child! You're tired and feverish, and homesick; don't cry, dear!" said Mrs. Brooks, soothingly.

"No, not 'homesick;' you forget that I have no 'home' to pine for!" replied the girl presently, calming her emotion, but suffering the tears to still roll down her burning cheeks. "But I can't help this longing for my dear mother; and when I get more wearied than usual, or a little ill as to night, the old feeling comes over me too strong to be conquered."

"And I wouldn't try to put it down, dear! Cry as much as you're a mind to; it's a blessed thing that we can cry sometimes!" exclaimed the sympathizing woman, who came and stroked the girl's hair with a tender hand. "Dear! how hot your head is! I'll fetch a cloth wet in cold water to lay on it. There, don't feel so bad! You've got some good friends in Dentford, at any rate! Squire Staniford was praising your teaching the other day to the minister, and he said our district had the best mistress of any in the county. So you can stay here all your days, and keep school, and live with us—unless somebody should carry you off to live in another home!" added Mrs. Brooks, as if previously forgetting such a possibility.

"Which isn't the least likely," said the teacher, after a long pause in which she had striven for calmness; "the last part of your sentence, I mean, Mrs. Brooks. So you perceive that the chances are for your keeping me the rest of my life."

"There! that sounds natural—to hear you talking cheerful again!" said Mrs. Brooks, bustling about her table. "Now drink this cup of nice hot tea, while I call Jacob."

When the good woman returned from summoning her husband, and the worthy farmer appeared in the cheerful keeping-room, the tea still stood untasted before the teacher.

"Land! Can't you touch it, child? You are real sick. I must have you go to bed right away! and in a warm room too," and when, an hour later, kind-hearted Mrs. Brooks returned from the chamber appropriated to "the mistress," she said to her husband, with a serious face: "Jacob, I don't know but the child's going to have a settled fever. I shall do my best to break it up; but if she isn't better by to-morrow, we'd better send after Doctor Fenner. She's had a bad cold two or three days, and going to the schoolhouse in this storm hasn't helped her any."

"I should have gone over after her to-night; but neighbor Stone had my horse to go to mill, and didn't get back in season. I hope Miss Edna'll be better in the morning," said the farmer kindly.

"I hope so, too; but she seems to talk kind of rambling, and keeps complaining of her head. I sha'n't leave her to night!" replied Mrs. Brooks with anxious face, returning to the chamber where—her scarlet cheeks upon the white pillow—the sick girl tossed and moaned in the wanderings of fever, and called constantly for her "mother" with plaintive cries.

CHAPTER III.

"THE railroads blocked up by these mountain drifts, I must settle myself contently to another week at Ridgewood!" said the owner of the handsome country-seat bearing that title, walking from the window of his library on the evening of the same day when we first looked in upon Florence Hunter so impatient in her city home. "What to do, to pass away these lagging hours, is the next question," stretching his handsome limbs indolently before the blazing wood fire, and patting his slippers on the polished fender. "Books? I don't feel like reading to-night. Ruminating over my travels? That's very well for a week, but one gets tired of solitude, and wants a friend to talk to about the Tyrol, the Vatican, and the Rhine. Correspondence? Well, none of my old chums know I've returned, so none will be expecting letters from me; thus, like Othello, my 'occupation' seems to be departed from me. Speaking of letters, though—and, by the way, I quite forgot that, if the trains are snowed up, they won't be likely to carry any mails—speaking of letters, here 's Miss Florence Hunter's last, received in Europe—a delicately penned, interesting epistle, which I duly replied to before setting foot on the Arabia for my homeward passage!" and he pulled a daintily superscribed envelope from his pocket-case. "They're expecting me, there in Boston—and, somehow, it seems impressed on my mind that Mrs. Hunter is also expecting me to offer myself to Florence. Handsome, accomplished, sought after in society—it would seem a desirable connection; and why should I not be thinking seriously of settling down in life? I've had my wanderings, my dreams, and my visions; why not now content myself henceforth with realities, and become a quiet, domestic Benedict? Florence Hunter is handsome, and 'the style' I am wealthy—not particularly ugly, I flatter myself—and with some traits that are not undesirable for a married man; she would make a dignified mistress to my house, and I should render her respect, if not love. But 'love,' love—ah, that's a word that has no business on my lips! Every man has his dreams, I suppose, of the woman he would like to take to his heart—a sweet, blue-eyed, gentle girl, who would fit into his being till she became a part of himself. I had a vision of such a face once, there at Mrs. Hunter's. Who would have believed that young thing so ill-tempered and unworthy? But ah, well! Imagination has many delusions; and thirty years should bring one a wiser head than to trust in them. When this tedious New England storm is over, I will go down to Boston, and offer my hand and fortune and heart, if I possess the article, to Florence Hunter!"

"Doctor, Farmer Brooks is at the door—waded over from his farm through all the drifts; and wants to know if you won't go over with him to visit the school-mistress, who's sick. He's been for old Dr. Fenner; but he's gone to see another patient, five miles off; and he heard you had come back, so thought p'raps you 'd go."

"Certainly, Hannah. Ask Mr. Brooks in, and say that I'll go with him directly," replied the young man, starting up; and while the maid returned with his answer, he took down a heavy overcoat, drew on his long boots, and soon stood ready. "Rather a surprise to me, Mr. Brooks, to receive 'a call' to-night, for my professional duties have been laid aside these few years back; but I think I can rub up sufficiently to be of help to you, if the case be not too severe," he said, entering the kitchen. "It is not your good wife, I believe, whose pleasant face I remember with distinctness, who needs my services? So I think Hannah stated," he added, as they went out into the storm together.

"No, Doctor; Betsy is hale and hearty, and brisk as ever, thankee! But the schoolmistress we have boarding with us seems pretty sick, and Betsy thinks is bordering on to brain fever."

"I hope it will not result so seriously as that, Mr. Brooks," said Everett, plunging on through the drifts which the two men encountered better on foot than they could have possibly done in a sleigh; and after a long walk they arrived at the farmhouse.

The greetings with little Mrs. Brooks over, Doctor Everett was shown to the chamber of his patient, where lay the sick girl, moaning in the fever delirium, and looking brilliantly beautiful. The young physician started in surprise, for he had not anticipated any other than the usually accredited type of country school-mistress—an elderly, sharp-featured spinster; and he involuntarily stepped to the bedside, smoothed the rich golden hair that floated out over the pillow, laid his cool hand upon her burning forehead, and said, in a deep, kind tone: "My poor child!"

His voice for a moment arrested the wandering reason of the sufferer; doubtless it touched a chord of memory, for she looked up into his face with almost a look of recognition in her bright blue eyes; then, putting her hands suddenly to her forehead, cried out sharply: "I know you, Leonard Everett! But they will not let you stay! They hate me if you look at me, or speak. Go away! go! They are watching me with their cold eyes!"

"Good heavens, what does this mean?" murmured the young doctor. "Her eyes, her hair, her voice! Mrs. Brooks"—turning abruptly to her—"this young lady's name?"

"Edna Moore. She has been our school-mistress a year 'n a half. You must have known her before you left the country, Doctor?" answered Mrs. Brooks, with surprise on her kind face.

"Edna Moore!—I knew it! Her eyes and golden hair! Yes, Mrs. Brooks; I met this poor child once, long ago," he answered. Then, bending down, he softly said: "I am glad you know me, Edna. Do Mrs. Hunter and Florence know you are ill?"

The question roused her into strongest excitement for a moment, which then gave way to an air of intense fear. "Don't tell them for the world!" she cried, looking around with frightened gaze. "They are cold and cruel. I will not call her aunt—that icy woman; and Florence is too proud to call me cousin. Don't tell them I am here; they will come and insult me with their haughty tongues, and take you away from me. Don't call them!" And she clung to his hands with strong, feverish grasp.

"Land! Miss Edna never told me a word about these folks that treated her so! You don't suppose it's true, Doctor? She's wandering," said good Mrs. Brooks. "And yet maybe it's so, for she seemed alone in the world; lost her mother when she was young; and she said once a kind uncle educated her, but died just after she had left school; and then she'd stop, and I never liked to ask her too much."

"The poor girl has evidently struggled with many trials," replied the Doctor, evading a more direct reply. Then, setting his teeth hard together while he mixed a soothing draught for the sufferer, he mentally exclaimed: "Proud Mrs. Hunter, beautiful, naughty Florence, I begin to sift this matter. Your story and this poor girl's scarcely agree. If truth be at the bottom, I will not leave Dentford till it be ascertained."

What need to prolong the recital of Leonard Everett's lingering there at Dentford, the most of which time was passed beside his beautiful patient? Enough that, when the fever spell was broken, another spell was woven about both physician and convalescent—the sweet, charmed bond of love; and the gentle orphan, who had been thrust out from her worldly, envious relatives, was received into a tender home, wherein she was henceforth to be shielded always—the noble heart of the master of Ridgewood. Doctor Everett did not make the visit to Mrs. Hunter and Florence, impatiently awaiting him in their city home; but sent a letter instead, announcing "that the duties of his profession detained him at Dentford." But when he did take the trip thither, his lovely young wife was his compagnon du voyage; and their rooms were at the "Winthrop," instead of their aunt's elegant mansion. To portray the anger and mortification of Florence and her mother is not in the power of this pen; let it only add that the happy bridegroom has yet never found cause to regret that January storm by which he was "snowed up" at Dentford, the storm which won him his bride.

Time never sits heavily on us, but when it is badly employed.

THE MODERN MANIA.

THESE are eminently the days of classification. The scientific professors continue to call helpless bits of creation by hard Latin names, on the discovery of the smallest peculiarity in formation, habits, or habitat. But this learned body are no longer allowed to have the fun all to themselves. The mania for classification has penetrated into every walk and department of life. In vain our modest friend from the country hopes to make all her purchases at one of our palatial establishments, which she bashfully enters, memorandum in hand. The clerks politely smile at her demands for buttons, fringes, colored zephyrs, and knitting-needles. She must push her way among the crowding throng on the sidewalks, and explore shop windows and sign-boards until she can find the stronghold of the merchants whose peculiar privilege it is to deal in these articles. Weary and heart-sick, how she longs for the dear old store of by-gone days, where cheese and china, candy and cashmere, buttons and broadcloth, pins and potatoes were not ashamed to keep each other company!

Fair one, hush thy murmuring! These are the days of classification. In the enlargement of trade it has necessarily divided itself into various departments. If you but lived in the city, the very speciality of which you complain would be to you a source of comfort. You should have heard the world-renowned Prof. G. discoursing the other day on the diversity of organs in the highest stages of the animal creation! How ignoble and insignificant he made the unfortunate polype appear, with its one organ doing the work of all, and that work but the simplest digestive process—a mere stomach, existing for the sole purpose of consumption! (Have we no human polypes, whose life has no better end or aim?) Society is, after all, but a great animal, and in its savage beginning it has but few departments. The Indian thinks it no shame to be his own butcher, tanner, or hut-builder, though he may be the chief of his tribe. But let civilization and progress once have their way, and what a division of labor, what a development of individual talent at once takes place! Here is free play for the idiosyncrasy of every man; a chance to develop the great truth that every child of Adam is the possessor of some peculiar inner treasure, and the wisely fashioned instrument for some special noble work. The notion gives one self-respect, it makes a place for everybody. Even the weakest and humblest of men may be the keystone on which some great arch depends, or at least the mortar without which some noble edifice would be but a crumbling ruin.

Let us not be out of humor with the age of classification, but take heart, and find our niche, and either fill it grandly with a statue that all ages may look on with reverence, or, bee-like, silently store it with honey, and sweeten life for others mid our daily toil.

Why, in these days one is not even obliged to think for himself. There is an author, or an editor, or a lecturer to tell him what views to hold on any or all subjects, and if an undecided old gentleman should chance to be in doubt concerning any opinion, he has but to appeal to all-knowing Young America, and be set right at once.

Where has classification more decided triumphs than in the kitchen cabinet? Where are its lines more closely drawn? It is vain for our friend in Fifth Avenue, having men-servants and maid-servants without number, to hope that any of them will condescend to sweep the few square yards of pavement in front of her house. Some outsider must be secured for that duty, because, forsooth, the rules of classification forbid any of the trained corps of retainers to depart so far from their peculiar walk as to perform an office not set down in the description of the species to which he or she may belong.

There were old-fashioned days when a well-to-do papa might have a dinner served up to suit his own notions, a sort of general hodge-podge of all his palate had approved lang syne. Not so now! There are laws prescribed as to the dishes that may appear together; and Jew might sooner worship with Samaritan or eat with Gentile than luckless man dare to hope for beef, lamb, or venison without their inevitable accompaniments.

While the grand system of classification has penetrated even to the direction of our daily food it is not strange that it should have set up its authority in the department of letters, and organized a system for the perfect and satisfactory feeding of that by nature omnivorous consumer, the human mind.

What are you? Doctor, minister, old maid, bachelor, child, young miss, college boy, sailor, soldier, school-mistress, or cook, apprentice boy, or aged saint, who or whatever you may be, there has been a book written especially for you, a book precisely calculated to meet the wants of the species of genus homo to which you belong.

But stop! There is one class for whom there has been no book written. Where is the book for widows? If it be in print, it has never met our eyes. Is that phase of woman's existence merely looked on as a time of transition, in which she passes by insensible stages from black crape veil to black lace, and so on to the second bridal veil, which enables her again to read the books for wives, and have her mind fed once more with food especially hashed for it? Ah, there are mourners, there are un comforted hearts among us who prove this excuse an idle slander.

If the widows cannot have their volume expressly for their use, perhaps the editor of the Lady's Book will give them for a time a spare corner in her valued periodical, where they may at least find their portrait, and possibly some hints which it would be wise for them to lay to heart.

Of course we should not think of entering upon any subject without classification, and so, dear reader, do not be shocked if we treat widows as if they were articles in a thread and needle store, duly boxed away with their proper labels, to be brought out as there may be a demand for them.

I.—THE WIDOW INDEED.

"Break, break, break
At the foot of thy crags, O sea!
But the tender grace of a day that is dead
Will never come back to me."

"I say it when I sorrow most,
I count it true, whatever befall;
It is better to have loved and lost
Than never to have loved at all."

Let thy widows trust in me.—JEREMIAH, XLIV.
None of them that trust in me shall be desolate.
PSALM XXXIV.

Did we say that there was no book for widows? Blessed be God! there is a Book for Widows Indeed, written by the finger of Omnipotence and illuminated with pictures of His tender compassion who hath formed the human heart.

For such a mourner we have no trite word, words of sympathy. No human hand can bind up her broken heart, no human voice can charm away her grief; yet for her there is laid up a wealth of consolation; there is an Almighty arm offered to sustain her; there is exhaustless love proffered her by one who is the Faithful Promiser.

We will not lift the dark, shrouding veil that hides the true widow's tears. Hers is a sorrow too sacred for touch of our pen. By and by her little ones will play bo-peep with those long sable folds, their faces will look lovingly up to hers, and she will learn to dash away her tears and return their sunny smiles. We but murmur, "God comfort her!" and pass on to her less afflicted sisters.

MILDRED'S RESOLVE.

BY VIOLET WOODS.

CHAPTER I.

"CLIFFORD, do not speak to me again of marriage. You know the only conditions upon which I could possibly become your wife, and yet you refuse to comply with them. My friends, as you are aware, are my advisers in regard to this, and I know too well what misery I might secure to myself to disregard their counsels."

A pause ensued in which the young man loosened his clasp on the hand he had been caressing, and moving farther and yet farther from the drooping figure, his eyes sought the downcast face. Mildred Asher looked up; Clifford Hale was subdued by that timid expression, and replied in a voice whose every tone was the very essence of devotion:—

"Ah, Mildred, you little know what an influence you might exert over me as my wife. I already love you, but a more intimate companionship will, if possible, augment the affection I now entertain, and increase the power you already possess. Will not even that admission make you yield to my dearest wishes?"

She did not reply; her fingers were playing nervously with her embroidered handkerchief, and the tears were settling in her eyes. Clifford grasped her hand, and continued: "Why do you hesitate, Mildred? Answer me, for heaven's sake, and let this burden of unrest be removed. Tell me your final resolve. Let me know whether we shall thus walk year after year, united in heart, and yet divided in life's dearest interests. Shall a fear force you to destroy my happiness when love and hope both prompt you to establish it? Answer me quickly, Mildred, for my ears are eager to hear the unjust words for which your countenance bids me prepare."

"You have, indeed, anticipated my reply," she returned with provoking coolness; "if you think me 'unjust' for maintaining a belief which I know to be correct, and for firmly standing my own ground when it would be wrong to yield. It is strange," she continued, earnestly, "that I am destitute of that power now, during our engagement, with which I should be invested after marriage. So, you see, Clifford, that your opinion is incorrect. Now is the time! I shall not wait until I am your bride to accomplish the reformation which, as your betrothed, I have vainly undertaken!"

There was a dignity and emphasis in her language which precluded all necessity for farther pleading, and Clifford, having observed it, exclaimed with ill-suppressed anger:—

"You do not love me, Mildred! You have never loved me, or you could not resign me so easily. If you were an automaton, you could scarcely evince less feeling. You have no charity for my faults, and exercise no forbearance towards the weakness which I cannot conquer. No, you do not love me," he added in a voice plaintive as that of a wounded dove.

"Clifford," she replied, raising her eyes and gazing steadily into his face, "you are doing me a great injustice, and my heart bleeds beneath the torture you inflict. How intensely I love you, you, who have received the manifestations, alone can tell. But I shall be more generous than you have been, and admit that every profession you have ever made, has been received without a doubt as to its truth. I have asked you to pledge yourself never to drink again, and my love and confidence are so boundless, so implicit, that I would willingly stake my life upon your honor. You have, I imagine, a mistaken belief that you will sacrifice your independence by adopting the course I have proposed, and for that reason, you refuse to secure to yourself the possession of my love. I shall no longer urge, for I already blush in remembrance of the fact, that I promised you my heart and hand upon certain conditions, and that you failed to comply."

"Yes," said he, "I have failed to comply, because I could not pledge my word to do that for which I felt I had not sufficient strength. You do not love me, Mildred, or you would be willing to marry me with a full knowledge of my faults."

"Calm yourself, Clifford, and let me tell you in what you are wrong. You say that you do not believe I love you, and yet, should another than yourself accuse me of infidelity, how quickly you would resent the infamy. Never, never did a young girl yield her heart to the keeping of another, more willingly, more entirely, than did I mine to you. I know the difference between your social position and mine; I know that you are brilliantly endowed with the rarest gifts of both Nature and Fortune, and that I am only a governess in the house of your sister ; I know all that intervenes between us in a worldly point of view, and, at one time, it seemed strange that you could descend from your lofty position, and select one so lowly as myself for the object of your devotion. That devotion has been reciprocated, and yet you accuse me of falsehood. Clifford," she added, her speech gaining earnestness with each word, "if I do not love you why should I wish to become your wife ? That I may enjoy the wealth of which I know you to be possessed ? That I may occupy the exalted station, which, as your wife, I would be expected to fill ? To no other facts than these can your insinuations be reduced. I either do love you devotedly, or else my object in entering into this engagement was merely mercenary. If you think the former, recall the words which you have uttered in a moment of passion ; if the latter, spurn me as you would a worthless bauble !"

Clifford observed her extreme agitation, and rising, he walked several times across the room. Finally, he approached the fire-place ; leaned his head upon the marble mantel, and gazed abstractedly into the glowing grate. It might have been the heat which sent the red flushes across his face in such rapid succession, but what was it that paled his cheek so instantaneously as he lifted himself from his bent position ? Mildred's head was buried in the velvet of the sofa upon which she was sitting ; one tiny hand was pressed upon her heart, and low, unmistakable sobs burst upon the stillness of the apartment. Clifford had never before seen her in tears, and the sight affected him painfully. He went forward, threw himself upon his knees beside her, and exclaimed : "Mildred, Mildred, God forbid that you should shed a tear for me ! I know and acknowledge my own unworthiness, and yet I cannot give you up. I have never broken my word ; have never made a vow which has not been fulfilled—but this, but this, oh ! Mildred, I am so weak. My heart is strong to undertake anything to which you may point, but can I succeed ? I dare not give my pledge, but I will struggle to do as you wish. If I am capable, I will claim you ; if not, I will resign you." The faltering voice, quivering lip, and moistened eyes were strangely at variance with the firm determination expressed in the words.

"Then, Clifford, I know that I shall at some time be your wife." The remark was uttered in a low, sweet voice, a voice that clearly evinced the fidelity of the heart from which it emanated.

Clifford pressed his lips to her brow, and replied : "Mildred, you could have given me no greater proof of your boundless affection than the utterance of those few, simple words. God alone knows with what miserly care I shall guard them. They will ring through my ears, and sound in the depths of my heart ; and if ever I am tempted, I will listen to their undying melody, and let it still the voice of the tempter. Mildred," he added, after a few moments had passed, "I no longer urge, nor would I have you to become my wife until my strength is tested. But oh, if that time had only passed, and I might claim you ! It seems so strange, so unjust, that I, a man and your affianced husband, should live in idleness, without a thought of the morrow ; while you, a woman, born to be admired and adored, are dependent upon your own exertions. If you were any place but here, I should feel miserable on account of your situation ; but I know that Agnes is your friend, and that she loves you. Am I right ?"

"Indeed you are," she returned. "Your sister is all that an orphan like myself could wish in a friend. She deserves and receives my unbounded confidence, and her advice is the wisest and best. I told her of the course I had resolved to adopt relative to our marriage, and it received her approbation. Clifford, she has committed to me the task of reclaiming you, and oh ! if love and hope can accomplish anything, you will be saved. Poverty and affliction have no terrors for me, if you are by my side ; wealth and honor no charm, if destitute of your presence. But," she concluded, looking into his eyes with a calm, penetrating gaze, "I would rather occupy a hireling's place in another's household than be mistress of a palace whose master is devoted to the wine-cup."

"You are enthusiastic," he exclaimed, with a smile.

"Yes ; the subject is one which demands the highest enthusiasm, the deepest earnestness. You have never thought of it as I have. What could I promise myself in the future years ? Could I hope to have an influence then, if it failed me now ? It has been promised that no man shall be tempted beyond his strength, and God's own words have many times been verified. Test them, Clifford, and test yourself. You love me, and you cannot fail. Think how I would act were you thus pleading with me."

Like a snow-white dove in its protecting covert, her hand nestled confidently in his. They no longer talked, but thoughts unspeakable swept through their minds, and it would have seemed a bitter mockery to mar the hallowed silence. But during that silence a change passed slowly over Clifford's countenance. A firm resolve was traced upon the brow, the black eyes grew more intensely dark, and the flexible lips assumed a sternness never before observed. But oh! the tones that issued from them were gentle as the notes of the woodland zephyr, as he drew nearer to the young girl, and said: "Mildred, if I should not visit you for a month, would you miss me?"

"Miss you!" was love's involuntary exclamation; "can you doubt it?"

"I do not doubt it, Mildred, but I shall test your truth. I am about to impose upon myself the severest penalty that could be inflicted. As I have told you, I intend trying to abstain from the use of any intoxicating beverages, whatever; and for one month shall place myself in a position to be assailed by every temptation. I shall mix with a class of society from which I have always kept aloof; and the consequences shall be truthfully revealed to you. If I resist, I shall make you the pledge for which you have asked, and shall demand, in return, a speedy marriage. If I fall, we will have one last interview, and I will resign you forever."

"Oh, Clifford, a month seems so long to wait for your smile; so long to listen for your voice!" The blue eyes were full of tears, and the lips were tremulous. "I cannot understand why you will not visit me in the meantime. Explain, and I shall be satisfied."

"Because I intend to mingle in those scenes with which it would be a sin to connect even a thought of you, and I must forget you for a while, if possible. You will be contented to wait, will you not?"

"Yes," was the low reply, "I am not only contented, but happy, to wait, for you will succeed."

Half an hour later, Clifford rose to take his departure. He was standing before the fire, holding both of Mildred's hands in his own, and she listened, oh! so intently, to each word as it fell from his lips. He was saying:—

"In four weeks from to-morrow night I will come again. Do not expect me until then, for I am determined to make this test. What a sad interview this has been, Mildred," he added, as he gazed more steadily into her sorrowful eyes.

"And the next!" she exclaimed with an involuntary shudder. "How much more painful than this it may be."

She burst into tears, he kissed the pallid cheek, and whispering, "In four weeks from to-morrow night," he departed.

CHAPTER II.

NIGHT after night found Clifford Hale wandering restlessly from one scene of low debauch to another, but like a statue of Parian marble in a company of grim and horrible skeletons, his soul remained pure and unsullied by the associations by which he was surrounded. Thoughts clothed in language which had never before fallen upon his ears, uttered as if in ignorance of the recording Angel, were breathed in his presence, and caused him to shrink back in horror from the debasing influences he was struggling to renounce. Time passed, and the period of his probation had almost expired. He had been tempted, but like an iron-bound ship breasting the fury of the wind and waves, he had resisted the enticements of the tempter, and looked proudly back upon the strength which had rendered him triumphant.

It was the night before that upon which he was to have an interview with Mildred. He would give the required pledge, and she, in return, would render his happiness complete. He had scarcely a thought independent of the woman he loved, and those thoughts flashed upon his mind like the beams of a brilliant star breaking through the parted clouds.

"And Mildred? There was an undefinable something which hung like a mist over her heart, and rendered her almost sad. Mrs. Wayland observed her dejection, and proposed that they should attend a masked ball to be given at the house of a friend. It was the last evening of Clifford's probation, and she accepted the offer upon condition that they should remain entirely unknown.

They did not go until late, and the company being assembled in the drawing-room, the upper halls were deserted. They had just reached the ladies' apartment, when a gentleman emerged from an opposite room, left the door ajar, and descended the stairs. A voice fell upon her ears—a voice welcome as the first carol of the spring bird, and she knew that Clifford was not far distant. Other tones, too, were heard, and the words swept down upon her heart like the ruinous avalanche upon the peaceful valley below: "Come, Hale, let's have a drink before we go down."

How will he reply? Her heart almost ceased to pulsate she was so fearful he would fall.

"No, no. Do not ask me. I am trying to abstain altogether."

"Under a pledge to some lady, I warrant," was returned.

"I am under no pledge, but my reason for refusing you is sufficient. Hereafter, the man who asks me is not my friend."

"Are you in earnest, Clifford? I thought you were jesting, perhaps."

"I was never more serious," was the calm reply. "If a kingdom were offered me if I would indulge in one glass only, I would scorn the offering."

They passed out of hearing, and Mildred turned to where Mrs. Wayland was standing before the mirror. She had not heard the conversation nor could Mildred repeat it. Who can tell the emotions of her heart? One might as well attempt to learn the rippling cadence of the brooklet's song, or the deep, sublime bass of the ocean's roar, as to think to read the language of a soul whose happiness is gained. Mildred's was supreme! She had known Clifford to be enticed, and she had known him to resist. Was she surprised? No, for had not her own heart prophesied that temptation would fall powerless in the presence of his superior strength?

A few moments later they descended; the rooms were crowded, and presented a splendid appearance. Clifford, with several other gentlemen and ladies, was unmasked, and one of the number, a young girl, won and engrossed Mildred's attention. She was lovely in an eminent degree, and Clifford, too, seemed to appreciate her loveliness; for already he appeared unconscious of the presence of another than herself. Mildred's confidence was too implicit to permit one jealous thought, but she did not like to acknowledge the influence the stranger seemed to exert. But the crowd moved toward the room in which the refreshments were served, and for a few moments she lost sight of the couple in which she felt so much interest.

"Wine, if you please."

Mildred turned, and recognized in the speaker the lady who had so irresistibly won her notice. Her eyes were as bright and her voice as liquid as the article she demanded, and, like Christabel, she was "beautiful exceedingly."

Clifford Hale approached with but one goblet, and presented it with a smiling bow. She received it gracefully, but exclaimed in astonishment: "Am I to drink this alone?"

"I cannot indulge," was the low reply.

"Cannot indulge!" she echoed. "You are not loyal, I am afraid. No gentleman can refuse a lady, and I demand obedience. Another glass, if you please."

Clifford bit his lip, but replied, firmly: "I cannot comply; you must excuse me."

"But I shall not excuse you." She approached one of the side tables, lifted a heavy decanter, and poured a glittering draught into a massive cup. Then, returning, she offered it with irresistible sweetness, and said: "Come, the wine will lose its brilliancy and I my patience, if you keep me waiting. This is to the health and happiness of Mr. Hale."

Their glasses touched, and Clifford's was emptied at a draught.

Mildred had heard every word, had seen every movement, and had the glass contained her heart's "best blood," she could not have endured a greater agony. Gone were the lofty hopes, the towering aspirations! Here a castle had crumbled away, and fallen a mass of gilded ruins at her very feet. Sick at heart, she turned away; but for a moment was almost tempted to tear the mask from off her face and stand revealed before the man she had loved and trusted. But should she condemn him? Had he not told her his weakness? And had he not refused to pledge his word? But with what woe and misery was the result of his failure freighted! Like the ship which moves majestically through the storm and mountain wave, yet goes down in sight of the shore to which it was hastening, he had wrecked himself when nearest the point he would have died to gain.

"Mildred, I have come to resign you!" Hopeless as the clank of a prisoner's chain was the voice which uttered these words. Few they were, but oh, how heavily laden with grief and woe!

The young girl addressed raised her eyes, and looked, not said: "You have failed, then?"

"Yes, failed—utterly, entirely," he responded, interpreting the mute expression. "At a time, too, when I thought myself most secure. Until last night, I resisted every variety of temptation; and then, exulting in the very strength which had sustained me, I became hopelessly weak, and fell." He endeavored to repress his agitation, and appear calm, but he might as well have attempted to still the roaring of a cataract or quell the fury of a storm.

Mildred did not speak. Words were useless now. She had striven and pleaded, and where was her reward? There was not a ray of light in the present, not one beam to dispel the darkness of the future.

In the intensity of his anguish, Clifford suddenly grew calm; he talked earnestly of his failure, and eloquently of his affection. He could not, would not give Mildred up! He would make one more trial, and then, if he fell or succeeded, he would abide by the consequences. And the young girl listened, accepting his terms as eagerly as the thirsty floweret receives the sparkling dew. She could not live without him; she would trust him again, and a thousand times, if necessary. Woman, loving and confiding! in thy breast the divine injunction finds its echo: "Yet not seven times, but seventy times seven shalt thou forgive."

Mildred did not tell Clifford that she had witnessed his humiliation; she had not the fortitude for that. He had failed signally, and had reported the truth to her. She would try him again, but where was the towering hope which had characterized her former trial? Even the eagle, whose eyrie is almost beyond the sweep of the human eye, can sometimes fail in the dizzy ascension, and so, too, Clifford, the high, the noble, would sometimes fall short of the mark to which he had aspired.

CHAPTER III.

THE period of Clifford's second probation was fast drawing to its close. Only one evening remained, and immediately after tea Mildred retired to her chamber, saddened by the remembrance of their former trial, and yet, oh, so hopeful for the one now impending! She could scarcely read, her excitement was so intense, and book after book was thrown aside, whose perusal was considered a task not to be accomplished in her present state of mind.

About eleven o'clock she walked to the window, threw aside the heavy curtains, and gazed out upon the night. The streets were almost deserted; now and then a lonely pedestrian moved hastily along, his heart growing lighter with each step that brought him nearer home and a quiet fireside, for the weather was intensely cold. In the midst of her reflections she was startled by the sound of approaching wheels, and a moment later a carriage drew up to the door and halted. A gentleman and two ladies alighted, and, running up the marble steps, gave the bell a quick, impatient jerk. She heard them speaking in merry tones to Mrs. Wayland, and presently that lady herself went up and entered her room.

"You are wanted, Mildred," was her exclamation.

"Wanted for what?" was the reply.

"Don't be frightened," Mrs. Wayland returned, with a smile. "Rose and Nellie Martin have come for you to go home with them. You know they give a party to-night. Rose wants you to take part in a duet with her, her friend whom she was expecting is necessarily absent."

"But I am not prepared."

"Oh, fy! when were you not prepared for music? Come, hasten; I will tell them that you will go."

It required but a few moments for Mildred to make her toilet; a simple white dress and no ornaments, and yet how radiantly beautiful she was!

"Ready so soon!" was the remark which greeted her as she entered the drawing-room, and Mrs. Wayland stepped back in surprise at her extreme loveliness. She had but seldom seen her attired in party style, for Mildred rarely ever went into company, knowing that, although she was invited, it was solely on account of Mrs. Wayland.

It required but a few moments for them to reach the place of destination, and Mildred was ushered into the parlor. The whole company had adjourned to the supper-room, and thither they soon followed them. The apartment being crowded, they were obliged to stand near the door, behind which a lady and gentleman seemed to be stationed, and were evidently in an earnest conversation. Mildred attempted to move away, but Clifford's voice, low but excited, riveted her attention.

"You need not ask me; I cannot, will not indulge."

"I remember," said the same sweet voice which once before had caused him to waver—"I remember what a task I had to resurrect your politeness on a former occasion. The remembrance of my success then gives me hope for the present."

"You need not make another attempt," was the quick, stern reply. "Once you almost ruined me, body and soul; I defy your utmost exertions now." There was no reply, and presently he added, in a softer voice: "Come, let's go where it is not so crowded, and I will give you the reasons for my abstinence."

They passed out directly in front of Mildred. Clifford recognized her, and bent upon her a look full of surprise and unutterable love. She remembered the disappointment which awaited her former trial, and for a moment her heart was clouded; but the shadow swept by, and the sunlight of confidence, renewed again, beamed full upon her.

"Did you see the lady standing near the door as we came out?" said Clifford, after he and his companion were seated in the drawing-room. "There she is now," he added, casting his eyes toward Mildred, who was then entering.

"Which? The one with such a lovely complexion, blue eyes, and brown hair?"

"Yes; though I rarely ever think of her external appearance, her mind and heart so completely enslave me. Nina Hayes, she is my betrothed, and you may imagine how dear she is to me. She is poor—a governess in my sister's family—and yet, she refuses to become my wife until I have conquered every desire for ardent spirits. I had determined to test my strength before giving my pledge to that effect, and for this purpose have resisted every species of temptation. In one effort I failed; in this, with God's help, I have been successful."

"And I was the cause of your former failure!" she exclaimed, her dark eyes filling with tears. "The lady despises me—doesn't she? and you, too?"

"She knows nothing of it," was the reply; "and as for myself, I can scarcely regret it. It has but proved that while she is just, she is truly generous; and that where I have deserved scorn and contempt, I have received only love and forgiveness. Let me make you acquainted with her, for I am sure that you will love her."

Affection is oftentimes a false prophet, but Clifford spoke the words of truth, when he said that Nina would love his affianced bride, for the admiration she first experienced soon deepened into the truest, most lasting friendship.

Two months later a brilliant party were assembled to witness the marriage of Clifford Hale with Mildred Asher. Had the wishes of either been regarded, the occasion would have been one of privacy; but Mrs. Wayland could not forbear publicly receiving her brother's wife into her family.

"No, no," said she, in answer to their entreaties: "do not ask me to forego my present plan. If but few were invited, the fashionable world might insinuate that I was not pleased with the alliance: when, indeed, I would have every one know that you are my choice as well as Clifford's."

So Mrs. Wayland gained her point. And manoeuvring mammas and aspiring daughters smiled and congratulated the lovely bride: and smiling, envied her the fortune she had won and the diamonds which glittered upon her arms, neck, and brow. But ah! she possessed one gem more priceless to her than all Golconda could have furnished; which, unseen by the world, threw its dazzling radiance across her pathway. And that gem was the pledge of total abstinence from all intoxicating beverages, which Clifford had presented her previous to her marriage. Happiness and honor attended their steps, and Mildred has never had cause to regret her resolve; for her husband has gained for himself a name and a place in the hearts of all who know him, and ever attributes his success to the woman of his choice.

THE CASKET OF THE YEAR.

BY WILLIE E. PABOR.

Pearl the First.—January.

KIND words of welcome, words of cheer,
First of the children of the year,

We give to thee!

Frost-crowned—ice-girdled though thou art—
Enter the people's home and heart,
January!

One of unnumbered thousands thou!
Born with a crown upon thy brow,
And bringing gifts
And promises of greener bowers
Beyond thy present icy hours
And white snow drifts.

From SIXTY-TWO to SIXTY-THREE
How brief the span of time; and we,
Upon the shore,
Look forward while our thoughts go back
To seasons and to scenes, alack!
That are no more.

And if a solemn measure runs
Our welcome through, because of suns
And seasons fled,
Be it the earnest of our faith!
What poet and what prophet saith,
Should thus be said.

Snow-wreathed, ice-girdled, and frost-crowned,
God speed thee on thy daily round
Of days to be!

And, as we walk Time's winding way,
"Touch us all tenderly," we pray,
January!

INFLUENCE OF A TRUE WIFE.—A sensible, affectionate, refined, practical woman, who makes a man's nature all the stronger by making it more tender—who puts new heart into all his worthy strivings, gives dignity to his prosperity, and comfort to his adversity. Every true life yields a still greater power when it feels a living heart drawing it with irresistible force into every position of duty.

ROBIN HOOD.

A PARLOR PIECE FOR EVENING PARTIES.

(As proposed to be represented in the Back Drawing Room.)

BY WILLIAM BROUGH.

Characters.

ROBIN HOOD, an Outlaw, passing himself off as Locksley.

LITTLE JOHN,
SCARLET, } Outlaws, followers of MUCH, the Miller's son, } ROBIN HOOD.

ALLAN-A-DALE, a wandering minstrel.

HUGO, the tax gatherer.

SIR REGINALD DE BRACY, Sheriff of Nottingham.
KING RICHARD CŒUR DE LION, travelling incognito as "The Black Knight," on his return from Palestine.

MAID MARIAN, the Sheriff's daughter, betrothed to Locksley.

ALICE, her attendant.

Outlaws, Citizens, Soldiers, etc. etc.

SCENE I.—An apartment in the house of the Sheriff of Nottingham, elegantly furnished.

[NOTE.—In order to put dramas on the stage correctly, it is usual to "consult authorities." In arranging the furniture for this scene, we should strongly advise that the "authorities"—that is to say, Papa and Mamma—should be consulted as to what chairs and tables may be used; as a neglect to do so, might lead to serious chronological mistakes—even to the premature sending to bed of the management.]

Enter ALICE with a dusting-brush.

Alice. There, my work 's done—if my work I can call work;

It seems all play, though I am maid-of-all-work.
Sure no girl e'er had such a place as this is,
The Lady Marian 's such a first-rate Missis.
Dusting her room 's mere child's play. Though I must Confess her pa' sometimes kicks up a dust.

This comes of being Sheriff. I'm aware

The seat of office is no easy chair;

But what care I what fortunes variable

O'er take that chair, while I am com-for-table.

[ALLAN-A-DALE is heard outside playing on the guitar.

[NOTE.—Should the resources of the establishment include a grand pianoforte, the notes of a guitar may be exactly imitated by laying a sheet of tolerably stiff paper loosely upon the strings. Should the only available piano be an "upright," or a "cottage," the paper may be threaded in and out of the wires. In the absence of a piano, however, or in the event of the "authorities" before alluded to objecting (as they probably would) to any tampering with the internal economy of the instrument, the guitar accompaniment may be safely left to the imagination of the audience.]

Alice. But hark! those silvery tones—'tis he; oh joy!

Allan-a-Dale, my own dear minstrel boy.

[ALLAN-A-DALE sings outside.

AIR.—"Lonely I wander."—TROVATORE.

Lonely I wander the wide town through,
In hopes to pick up an odd sixpence or two;
Ne'er shall I quit your door,
Till some odd pence or more,
You place into the hat of the poor troubadour.

Alice. 'Tis he! I knew it; ne'er yet was he willing

To move on under at the least a shilling.

[Going to the door.

Come in, dear Allan.

Allan (entering). May I?

Alice. May you! stuff;

You know you 're always welcome.

Allan (sits down). That 's enough!

Alice. My mistress is so fond of music.

Allan. True;

And of the gossip that I bring her too.

We wandering minstrels' story-telling powers,
Gain us admission to all ladies' bowers.

Alice. True, we 've no other way our news to get,

For newspapers are not invented yet.

Now for it! [Sits by him.

Allan. Alice, words would tell but poorly
How fair you are!

Alice. You don't call that news, surely!
Have you no fresher tidings?

Allan. Yes; I've learned
King Richard from his travels has returned.

Alice. Why then Prince John—

Allan. Prince John I should advise,
His nose put out of joint, to mind his eyes.

Since the king left, nice tricks has he been at.

Alice. Mice will play in the absence of the cat!

Allan. But see, the Lady Marian 's coming hither;

And, as I live—no—yes, say, who 's that with her?

Alice. That; oh, that 's Locksley.

Allan. Locksley him d'ye call?
His name is—

Enter ROBIN HOOD (as LOCKSLEY) and MARIAN.

Robin. Locksley, sir, of Locksley Hall.
(Aside to him). Be quiet.

Allan. All right, captain.

Marian. Why, how 's this?
The minstrel seems to know you.

Allan. Know him, miss!

That gentleman 's the leader of our band.

Robin (evasively). Yes; I conduct sometimes.

Marian. I understand.
You play first fiddle, I suppose?

Robin. Just so.

'Twould do you good to see me use my bow.

But never mind my beau: am I not yours?

Allan. I see; our leader 's made you overtures.

Marian. How dare you speak, sir, upon such affairs?

Alice, conduct the troubadour down stairs.

Allan. This conduct to a bard!

Alice. There, never mind;

I 've luncheon ready.

Allan. True, the bard 's not dined.

Yet if he chose he could speak.

Alice. Well, but don't.

Allan. The bard is hungry—so he thinks he won't.

[Exeunt ALLAN and ALICE.]

Marian. Now, Locksley, we 're alone, repeat, I pray,

What you but now were just about to say.

Robin. Rare news, sweet. I 've your father's full permission

To marry you upon one sole condition.

Marian. And that is—

Robin. That I from all rivals snatch

The first prize in to-morrow's shooting match.

Marian. Oh, should your arrow fail!

Robin. That chance look not for.

Marian. But I don't choose to be put up and shot for.

I 'll be no archer's butt. I don't like putting My future hopes on such an arrow footing.

Robin. I 'll hit the bull's-eye, dearest, have no fears.

Marian. I think pa's mad about his volunteers

And shooting matches. Of it what 's the good?

Robin. The fact is, he 's afraid of Robin Hood.

To catch him 'tis they drill each raw recruit, And teach their young ideas how to shoot.

Marian. I wish this Robin Hood was dead. Don't you?

Robin. Well, no, I can't exactly say I do.

Marian. His ceaseless thefts—

Robin. Such slanders don't believe in. He 's always Robin, but not always thievin'— Marian. You take his part? Oh, no, it can't be!

Robin. Why!

Perhaps he 's quite as good a man as I.

What if I were abused and slandered so,

Would you believe what folks said of me?

Marian. No.

Of course I wouldn't.

Robin. Just so. Then, again, E'en suppose I were Robin Hood. What then?

DUET.

AIR.—“Will you love me then as now?”

Robin. You have told me that you loved me,
With the blushes on your cheek;

Marian. Can you wonder at my blushing,
'Twas so difficult to speak.

Robin. But suppose the noble Locksley,
Into Robin Hood should change?

Marian. I should say the alteration,
At the very least, looked strange.

Robin. But I ask you would you cut me?

Marian. Well, I almost think somehow—

Robin. You would cease to care about me?

Marian. No; I 'd love you then as now. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Sherwood Forest.

[NOTE.—The arrangement of this scene will give an excellent opportunity for the exercise of skill on the part of the management. We have seen very effective “forest sets” got up by means of a few trunks of trees roughly painted on pasteboard, and surrounded by evergreens. But should this be found too troublesome or impracticable, it should be borne in mind that in the “good old times,” in the “palmy days of the drama,” before the present rage for spectacle had set in, it was considered amply sufficient to have the nature of the scene legibly written on a placard, and hung up in a conspicuous part of the scene. And surely, if this was deemed good enough for Shakspeare, the author of the present drama has no right to feel dissatisfied with it. So we should suggest, in default of any scenic appliances, a sheet of card-board with the words “SHERWOOD FOREST” written upon it, leaving the author to make what protest he chooses against the want of liberality in the management.]

Enter HUGO.

Hugo. Thus far into the thickest of the wood Have I marched on, nor yet seen Robin Hood. Oh, how I shudder at his very name! He'd deem a tax-collector lawful game.

He hates all taxes. Well, those we now levy
In the king's absence I confess are heavy;
And not quite constitutional, folks say:
Well, let them talk, what matters if they pay.
The tax on incomes, p'rhaps we might relax,
Or soon there 'll be no incomes left to tax.
And yet I don't know—tax them as you will,
This Anglo-Saxon race seems prosperous still.
To the last stick you bring them down—what then?

You find th' elastic race spring up again.

SONG.

AIR.—“The Postman's Knock.”

What a wonderful land this England must be (A remark that 's been made before);
You take her last shilling in taxes, and she
Is still good for some millions more.
What with income-tax, house-tax, assessments,
and rates,
No Englishman knows what he 's at;
His house is his castle, but we storm the gates,
As we come with the double rat-tat.
Every morn, as true as the clock,
The poor-rates or taxes are sure to knock.
[He brings a large money-bag from under his cloak.
This morning's work has brought me glorious profit,
My bag 's so heavy.

LITTLE JOHN, MUCH (the Miller's son), SCARLET, and other Outlaws, enter and surround him.

Little John. Let us ease you of it.

Hugo. Thieves! Robbery! Police!

Much. Peace, what 's the good,
To holloa till your safe out of the wood?

Little John. Give us the sack (snatching it from him).

Hugo. Nay, it 's not mine, you see;
Don't take it, or they 'll give the sack to me;
Mine 's a good situation.

Much. Well, at present,
Your situation might be much more pleasant.
Let 's hang him.

Hugo. No, no; quarter, pray.

Much. Just so;
We 'll quarter you, but hang you first, you know.

You, as a tax-collector, can't be nettled
To find the quarter you 've applied for settled.
Bring him along.

Scarlet. Had we not better wait
Till Robin Hood himself decides his fate?

Hugo. Yes, do.

Scarlet. He comes.

Enter ROBIN HOOD in forester's costume, with bow and arrows.

Robin. Now, lads, what means this stir?

Little John. We 've caught a Norman tax-collector, sir.

Robin. A Norman! Hated race! Our country's curse!

And a tax-gatherer, which is even worse!
The Norman's visit each true Saxon hates,
'Specially when he calls about the rates.
We loathe his written laws; yet even more
The printed papers he leaves at one's door.

Hugo (kneeling). Spare me!

Robin. Perhaps we might.

Much. What means this whim?

Robin. Who is there we could better spare than him?

Go; you are free.

Hugo. Oh, thanks!

Robin. Now, list to me.

Your name is Hugo. I let you go free.
So, when some Saxon in your law's fell pow'r,
Implores your pity, think upon this hour.
Spare him as you 're now spared; and when you would

Remorseless be, remember Robin Hood!

Hugo. Fear not. Oh, sir, I am so glad I met you.

Remember you! I never shall forget you.

Robin. No words. Away!

Hugo. My thanks no words can speak.

(Aside.) The rate-payers shall smart for this next week. [Exit.

Scarlet. I 'm sorry that you spared him.

Robin. Cruel varlet!

To say so I should blush, if I were Scarlet.

What think you, Much, of it?

Much (sulkily). I 'm sorry, too.

Robin. In that case, Much, I don't think much of you.

Black Knight (calls outside). What ho, there!
Help!

Robin. Hark! there 's a call. What is it?

Little John. That call may p'r'aps not mean a friendly visit.

Black Knight (outside). Help!

Much. By all means, if you have any pelf.

Scarlet. Oh, yes, we 'll help him.

Much. I shall help myself.

Enter THE BLACK KNIGHT. They surround him.

Robin. Now, sir, who are you through our forest bawling?

Your name and business tell; we 've heard your calling.

Black Knight. A weary knight, who all the weary day

Has wandered through this wood and lost his way,

Craves food and rest.

Robin. Your name?

Black Knight. I may not tell it.

I can repay your kindness.

Robin. I don't sell it.

Little John. No; but we'll take your money all the same. [Advancing towards him.]

Robin. What! rob a fasting, weary man! For shame!

Come in. We grant the shelter that you seek; We spoil the strong, but we befriend the weak.

Black Knight. Mine's but a momentary weakness, mind;

You'll see how strong I come out when I've dined.

Robin. No matter. Go (to outlaws), make ready for our guest.

And see that everything is of the best.

[Exeunt outlaws.]

Sir, you are bold to venture through this wood.

Have you no fears of meeting Robin Hood?

Black Knight. Would I could meet him hand to hand!

Robin. Well, stay.

After you've dined and rested, perhaps you may.

Are you his enemy?

Black Knight. I am the foe

Of all their country's laws who overthrow.

Robin. Nay, then of foes you'll find a decent lot.

There is King Richard to begin with.

Black Knight. What?

Robin. Yes, if the people don't obey the laws, The king himself is the unwitting cause.

Why quit his kingdom on a wild-geese chase, Leaving a cruel tyrant in his place?

Black Knight. Does John oppress the people?

Robin. Have you eyes

To see their sufferings, ears to hear their cries, That you can ask the question? Why, 'tis known Beneath his laws no man's life is his own, Save such as Robin Hood and his brave outlaws, Who, in the forest free, don't care about laws.

So when folks' grievances too heavy press, They fly to Robin Hood to seek redress.

In vain the tyrants as a traitor brand him;

The common people love and understand him.

DUET.

Air—"A famous man was Robin Hood."

Robin. Oh, a famous man is Robin Hood,
The English people's pride and joy;
The tyrants he has long withstood,
Who try our freedom to destroy.

Black Knight. What you've just told me, do you know,

Has filled my mind with strange alarm.

Robin. While Robin, though, can bend the bow,
Be sure his friends he'll keep from harm.

Both. A famous man is Robin Hood,
No wonder he is England's joy;
Where tyrants are to be withstood,
It's very plain that Rob's the boy.

Enter LITTLE JOHN.

Little John. The dinner's ready.

Robin. Come, then, worthy knight,
Let good digestion wait on appetite. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—The fair outside Nottingham. Stalls with toys, fruit, cakes, etc., on them. Swings, shows, etc. People attending the stalls, peasants walking about.

[NOTE.—The appearance of this scene will doubtless vary considerably in different establishments. A table with an open umbrella fixed over it makes a very good stall, while toys, cakes, fruit, and other articles to put on them ought to be readily obtainable, especially with a guarantee from the management that the "properties" shall not be demolished until after the conclusion of the performance. Should there be any difficulty in fixing swings, the simplest way is to do without them. The same remark will hold good as regards the shows; though, as only the outside of them is seen, a curtain or a tablecloth hung against the wall, with a showman standing in front of it to invite folks in, will answer every purpose. A picture of wild beasts, or a giant, or a dwarf, or a king, or a queen—or, in fact, a picture of any possible or impossible object, hung on the curtains, would improve the effect, but is by no means essential.]

The scene opens to a confusion of cries, such as "What'll you buy—buy—buy?" "Walk up—walk up—be in time." "Gingerbread-nuts, sir!—best spice-nuts, sir!" "This way for the giant!" "All the fun of the fair!" and others suggested by the articles on the stalls, all the cries being repeated together.

Enter the SHERIFF of NOTTINGHAM and his daughter MARIAN, followed by ALLAN-A-DALE and ALICE, attended by soldiers.

Sheriff. Silence! D'ye hear? Be quiet—cease this din.

[All are quiet immediately.]

Bring chairs here.

[SHERIFF and MARIAN sit at one side.]

Now, before the sports begin,

If any one has anything to say,
Any complaints to make or fines to pay,
Or any business to transact, in short,
Let him now bring it in the Sheriff's Court.
Only, I warn you, I am in a hurry,
So at your peril you'll the Sheriff worry!

[One or two peasants who have approached him turn away frightened.]

Does no one speak? Sure ne'er was town so bless'd,

With not a single wrong to be redress'd!

Marian. I think that maid would speak, if you'd but let her.

What is it, girl? Speak.

Sheriff. Nonsense! She knows better. The court's adjourned.

HUGO runs in.

Hugo. Nay, for one moment stop.

Sheriff. What seek you?

Hugo. Justice!

Sheriff. We've just closed the shop.

You are too late.

Hugo. But I've been robbed.

Sheriff. Pooh-pooh!

Hugo. Half murdered!

Sheriff. Call again to-morrow—do.

Marian. Who robbed you, friend?

Hugo. 'Twas Robin Hood, miss.

Sheriff. What?

Hugo. And I know where to find him.

Allan (in the crowd). I hope not.

Alice. What's it to you, pray?

Allan. Nothing, dear.

Sheriff (to Hugo). You meant

To tell us that you Robin Hood have seen?

Hugo. I have.

Sheriff. And know where he hangs out?

Hugo. I do,

For I was all but hanging out there too.

Come with your guards—I'll lead you to him straight.

Sheriff. Well, till our shooting-match is over, wait.

Hugo. You know you promised a reward.

Sheriff. Just so.

We'll talk of that when we have caught him, though.

Allan (aside to ALICE). Dear Alice, if you love me, get that man

Away from here, by any means you can.

Alice. Easily. Hugo's an old friend of mine.

Won't you come in and take a glass of wine
[To HUGO.]

After your troubles?

Hugo. I shall be enraptured.

[Exit ALICE and HUGO.]

Allan (aside). How to save Robin now from being captured?

Sheriff. Now, then, good people, let the sports begin.

Re-enter ALICE.

Alice (aside to ALLAN). All right. The pantry I have locked him in.

Marian. Why is not Locksley here? Pa', can't you wait?

Sheriff. Not I; it's his fault if he comes too late.

Marian. Mind, if he doesn't win me, I declare,

I'll have no other for a husband. There!

Sheriff. Peace, girl. Now, who shoots first?

First Peasant. Good sir, 'tis I!

Sheriff. You see the mark? Ready! Present! Let fly!

[Peasant shoots an arrow off. All laugh at him. Missed it! Who's next? (Another comes forward to shoot.)]

Mind how you take a sight. Ready! Present! Let fly!

[Second Peasant shoots.]

Good! in the white.

ROBIN HOOD (as Locksley) runs in.

Robin. So; just in time, I see. Confound that stranger!

I couldn't leave him.

Allan (aside to him). Robin; you're in danger.

Robin. I know; I always am. Who cares?

Look out! [He shoots.]

Sheriff. Right in the bull's eye. Shout, you villains; shout.

[The populace all shout.]

Locksley, your hand. You've nobly won the prize;

My daughter's yours.

Enter HUGO. He starts at seeing ROBIN.

Hugo. Eh! can I trust my eyes!

'Tis he; secure him! There stands Robin Hood!
[Soldiers seize ROBIN.]

Sheriff. What!

Hugo (holding out his hand). The reward, sir; if you'll be so good.

Sheriff. What! he! my future son, the outlaw! Pshaw—

An out-law can't become a son-in-law!

Marian. Speak to me, Locksley! Say it is not so.

Hugo. I told you I'd remember you, you know.

Robin. For this I saved you from the halter?
Hugo. Yes.

I like the halteration I confess.

Sheriff. Speak! Are you Robin Hood?

Robin. Well, without sham, Since you ask so politely, sir, I am.

Farewell, dear Marian. As you see, I'm sold.

Marian. No, it can't be!

Sheriff. To prison with him.

Enter the BLACK KNIGHT, followed by LITTLE JOHN, MUCH, SCARLET, and Outlaws.

Black Knight.

Hold!

Sheriff. Who 's this, that comes in style so harum-scarum?

Who are you?

Black Knight (throwing off his disguise). Richard, Rex Britanniarum. [All kneel.]

All. Long live the king!

King. He means to; and what 's more, To live at home, his people to watch o'er.

Release your prisoner. Robin Hood, come here.

[Robin kneels to the King.]

As Earl of Huntingdon, henceforth appear.

Robin (bringing MARIAN forward). This peerless maid, sire, who was late so cheerless—

King. Now has her Earl, so she 's no longer peerless.

We pardon all that 's past; let none bear malice.

Now all take hands.

Allan. Good! I 'll take yours, then, Alice.

Alice. Well, since the king commands.

There! I submit. [Gives her hand.]

(Aside.) I almost feared he 'd never ask for it!

Hugo. But my reward?

Robin. You 'll get it.—Don't be hurt, (To audience.) Reward us all! Not after our desert:

By no high standard, pray, our acting test;
Whate'er we've done—we've acted for the best.

FINALE.

AIR.—"There 's nae luck about the house."

Old Christmas comes but once a year,

The time for mirth and fun;

'Tis not a time to be severe

On those their best who 've done.

At such a time, to laugh 's no crime,

Don't harmless jokes despise;

Unbend a while—at folly smile,

Be merry though you 're wise.

For there is no luck about the house

That Christmas fails to cheer;

'Tis no bad rule to play the fool,

If only once a year.

All repeat in chorus.

For there is no luck about the house, &c

THE CURTAIN FALLS.

LETTERS FROM AUNT BETSY BROOMCORN.

LETTER I.

DEAR MR. GODEY: It 's nigh about three years since I come to Scrub Oak to live with Cousin Brewstir; and, as I was tellin' Flory the other day, I 've a'most forgot all my old-fashioned ways, and I don't s'pose anybody would know me for the schoolma'am in Pendle Holler, over twenty years ago. I remember as well as if 'twas only yesterday, how Deacon Arza Pendle come over after me in a bellus-top shay, and how Susan cried when she tied on my bunnit, and how Archy slid my little trunk—covered with a spotted calfskin tacked on with brass nails, and my two first letters on the top in brass nails, too—under the seat, shook hands with me and the deacon, and put up the bars after we drove out of the door yard. I looked back when we had got to the bend in the road, where you lose sight of the house, and I could see Archy standin' lookin' after us yet. Susan's winder was open, and if I didn't see her, I knew she was there, and I knew, too, how much they both hoped and feared for me. I hadn't tried to do anything after John's death till then, and maybe I shouldn't have courage enough to keep me up after all; but I kept sayin' to myself all the time, "I will, I will;" and I shut my lips together tight, so that I shouldn't even feel them tremble, and tried to think about the posies and little bushes along the side of the road. There was wintergreen, young sasafra, May-apples and lady-slippers. The red and yellow keys hadn't all dropped off the maple trees, and the popples was bright yet with their young leaves. All the birches was covered with tawsels that swung in the air with the tender leaves, and the wind brought us the smell of the young spruce cones, and the hemlock buds that was sweeter than the very best of the queer little bottles of perfume with outlandish letters all in gold printed on the glass, that Flory has on her table up stairs. I heard the birds singin' among the trees, and my heart begun to beat softer, and I was a'most glad that I was goin' away from home, when all at once, Deacon Pendle spoke out for the first time, "That 's a purty place over the lake yonder. I wonder how it comes to be deserted." I caught hold of the side of the shay, as if he had struck me a blow with his great whip. I couldn't help sayin' "oh," such a painful feelin' of suffocation came over me all at once. My heart gave a jump and then a'most stood still. The Deacon looked scared when he turned round and see how I shook. He stopped his horse and jumped down as spry as a boy.

There was a little tin pail in the shay full of cabbage plants, that the Deacon had begged of Archy, and now he flung 'em out, and run to the brook after some water.

I hadn't looked at the place where John died and was buried, before; but I looked now, for I could not hear it spoken of without feelin' as if I should die if I didn't look.

Oh how pleasant it was! How the lake shone in the sun like a sea of fire, and the tops of the maple trees on the hill brightened and darkened when the wind tossed them up and down! Little patches of bushes had sprung up in the clearin's and around the house; and I could see the two slender white birches in the corner of the yard where John was buried. I looked at it, as I had a thousand times before, as if the sight of that spot quenched a great thirst in my soul. I expected to have been so happy. Somehow my heart cried out at times for a sight of the Paradise that would have been mine, if the destroyer had not come and left it desolate. I had time to think of all this before the Deacon come back with the water. He had sense enough not to ask me what ailed me, and when I told him I felt better, he got into the shay and we drove along.

I like riding in the woods and among the hills, and I managed to gather enough courage and cheerfulness from the trees and birds and posies to make me quite chirp by the time we got to the Holler. The Deacon talked, but as he didn't seem to expect me to answer, I didn't, and I couldn't for my life tell what he said half the time; only when we got purty near the Holler, then he said that the red house yonder was Squire Kinyon's, and that white one the minister's. There was the meetin'-house furthur up the Holler, and close by the school-house, all shady with young maples; and yonder was his orchard and barn, we couldn't see the house.

I s'pose, of course, everybody knew the schoolma'am was comin' when the Deacon's horse and shay jogged up the road, and got a sly peep at me as I passed; for more than one white-headed boy jumped off the fence, and come and stood by the road, and bobbed his tow head at us as we rode along, grinnin' dreadfully all the time to think he had got a first sight of the schoolma'am.

There was Squire Kinyon drivin' some geese into the barn to be picked, and they wouldn't be drove, so he coaxed them along with some corn; then the widder Soul was scourin' a churn on the well-stone; and over at Elder Jones's there was the Elder with a cotton handkercher on his head under his hat, workin' in the garden settin' beanpoles and bushin' peas. A hull swarm o' little Joneses was scootin' about the yard, and yellin' as if they was doin' it for the good of their lungs.

Bymeby we come to Deacon Pendles, a little house with a cool gigsy yard, and two great clumps of yellow lilies at the corners of the house, and a little mite of a portico like one-half of a bird-cage.

I stood on the door-step waitin' for my trunk and the Deacon, when Mrs. Pendle opened the door. She poked back her specs, and looked at me, and then pulled me right into the house and made me sit down in a great green rockin'-chair with a feather cushion all covered over with red and blue merino stars. She said that she knew me in a minit, for I was the very image of my father, and "many and many's the times I've danced with Elnathan Broomcorn," says she, all the time busy untying my green calash and takin' off my shawl.

She was a dreadful small woman, and had a spry, handy way of doin' things. Before the Deacon got into the house she had a warin' fire on the hearth, the teakettle hung on, and the round top of the table turned down and covered with a newly-bleached cloth. Then she trotted in and out till I began to think we never should have anything to eat. Fust she brought a pile of white plates with copper-colored edges, then cups and saucers not a bit bigger than Cousin Brewstir's egg-cups, a fat little sugar bowl and cream pitcher to match, an oval tea board with just such picters on it as Miss Spanglebow's "Oriental Pieces" she is so proud of. For eatables, there was wheat biscuit, a round bake kittle loaf of indjin, honey, butter, cheese, plumsass, custard pie, and soft gingerbread.

I thought I was hungry when I was out doors, but in the house, with nobody but strangers, I felt a little homesick, and could not eat. The Deacon urged, and his wife coaxed, and I praised everything on the table till they was satisfied. I wanted to go out doors again, because then I wasn't homesick. Somehow all the out of doors world is pleasant to me, but I have to get used to houses and people, before I can feel at home with them. The Deacon's house had such a slick shiny look, as if there wasn't ever even the stir of a good hearty laugh in it, that I felt a little afraid.

After tea I went all over the yard and orchards, and went with the Deacon to let the cows out of the laue beyond the barn. Just as we got down at the foot of the hill by the bars, a couple of ragged boys jumped off the stone wall, and run across the fields screamin' as loud as ever they could, "Schoolma'am, Schoolma'am." The Deacon laughed so loud that it scart me at first, but I had to laugh, too, and so I forgot that I was a bit homesick, and was as happy as possible all the time. I even woke up in the night and laughed when I thought of the two boys.

The next day was Saturday; Sunday I went to meetin' and wore my new cambrie dress with sleeves a good deal bigger I'm afraid than anybody else's. The gallery was full of young folks, and they sung about as loud as any singers I ever heard. The leader was a big man, very blusterin', and he sung all four parts in the compass of a single verse, dodgin' about so that I couldn't have follered him, only, by the way, the part he was helpin' started ahead of the rest, and made more noise, as if suddenly somebody had given them a sly push. After sermon the folks that had come a good ways, sot around in the pews and talked, or strayed off into the buryin'-grounds, and a good many come over to Deacon Pendles and picked sweet Williams, and none-so-purtys in the yard, or set in the front room and talked over the sermon along with the Deacon and his wife.

There was a tall girl with an open-work straw hat, trimmed with blue roses, on her head, and a sprigged muslin gown and crape neck-hankercher, that walked about softly by herself, lookin' into all the rosebushes and piney-buds, after an "early flower," as she told me. I thought she must like roses, a lookin' after them so early. She had a bunch of camomile in her belt, along with some wild honeysuckles. She asked me if I liked school-keepin', and if I read verses, and if I could say every bit of "Young Edwin." She told me she meant to be well acquainted with me, and asked me what was my given name. When I said it was Betsy Broomcorn, she looked as if she thought it was a pretty common sort of a name. "Mine," says she, "is Matilda Mahala Button. Maybe you've heard of me before? I wrote some verses for Squire Kinyon when his wife died. I was asked for ever so many copies, and finally they was published in the Starry Banner newspaper, and went the length and breadth of the land, I suppose. I've got ever so much poetry at home—enough to make a good-sized book, for I keep a copy of everything I ever wrote. Elder Jones says I have quite a nachural gift for makin' verses. S'pose I repeat some I wrote about a lily-root. I know almost everything by heart." I said I should like to hear them, for I was 'mazin' fond of verses, so she broke off a laylock sprout, and began to switch the barberry briars with it as she went on repeatin':—

"O ploughman, spare that lily-root;
It's very dear to me,
Don't desecrate its humble bed
With implements of husbandry.

"I've seen your iron heel go down
Upon its tender leaves,
And for the flowers that never shall bloom
My tender spirit grieves.

"When last year's summer's fields was green,
I saw it proudly wave,
Its head all crowned with yeller flowers,
Where now I see its grave.

"Such is the fate of beauty
Upon this transient earth;
It's enmost as good as dead
The minit it has birth.

I'll hang my harp on a willow-tree,
And moura for the lily fair
That was rooted out of its grassy nest
By a rusty iron ploughshare."

"Well," says she, takin' breath, "how do you like 'em?"

I said—"I thought it was very nice, but seems to me they aint all in the same jingle. I couldn't sing 'em all to the same tune, could I?"

"Of course not," says she, bridlin' up. "It's a poet's license I've used, to change as I've a mind to. It's very handy to know how to let a line out a little, if you want to get in a good word. Some words is wuth more than others; they twist round so wavy and nachural. There's 'ploughshare;' it's as unaccommodatin' as buckram. I guess it's time to go to meetin'; I see Elder Jones's wife shakin' her tablecloth out of the back door."

Just then Squire Kinyon come along, and Miss Button said she wouldn't wait for me; she wanted to sing over "Strike the Cymbal" with the singers before meetin', so she opened the gate and went out in time to walk down with the Squire.

When Deacon Pendle's wife and I went into meetin' again, they was sayin'—"Spread your banners, shout hosanners," as loud and sharp as if they meant it.

The next day was Monday, and I begun my school. The school-house was all scoured up and trimmed with green bushes in the fire place and on the wall, and a new cedar broom stood behind the closet door. The children was like a flock of blackbirds; but I got along pretty well, for you see I was used to Susan's boys, and I had a knack of managin' children.

I was to board with Deacon Pendle's folks the first week, and then at Parson Jones's, and so around the deestrick. There 's some fun in boardin' round, and sometimes there 's a good many hard spots ; but I warn't a bit afraid of them, for I was used to makin' the best of everything.

When I walked home from school, I was tired enough, I can tell you, but about a dozen of the children walked along with me, all talkin' and laughin' at once, and the grass was so soft and cool under my feet, and the white and blue violets and dandelion heads looked so purty that I forgot all about it.

Miss Pendle was feedin' her goslins under an apple-tree when I went in, and I went out and broke off a lot of great pink blows, and sot on my table in a cheeny mug. After we had tea, Miss Button come in with a terrible stiff pink sunbunnet on, and went to talkin' with the Deacon. I never did hear such a talker. She fairly worried the Deacon, for he is ruther slow. Says she : " Brother Jones give us a better than ordinary sermon, but seems to me his doctrine is a little leanin' agin 'lection. Now, I should feel all unsettled, and would as soon turn Un-varseler as anything, if I on'y thought for a minit that 'lection wasn't true. As for quotin' Scriptor, Brother Jones does it pretty well ; but seems to me I 'd quote the hymn-book, too. Psalms is good ; I like 'em sprinkled over a sermon like daiseys over a medder. Don't you, Deacon Pendle ? Miss Pendle, how does your goslins get along ? Mother had a nice passle come off, but the weasles and minks catched about all of 'em. You allers have good luck, though. Miss Broomcorn, aint you a goin' to say somethin', or be you allers so dumb ? "

I declare I hadn't had a chance to speak before, and didn't then, for she kept right on a talkin', first to one and then another, till it begun to grow dark, and she got ready to go hum. I went down to the gate with her, and she picked a laylock for me to lay under my piller, and then she gave me a sheet of pink paper, folded up diamond-shape, with my name on it in the middle of a mess of posies, carle-cues, and stars, all made off as neat as could be with a pen.

After I went up to my little chamber, I opened the paper and read the verses. I don't suppose there 's any harm in copyin' them off for you. The paper is faded and old-lookin', and the ink looks a dirty brown color. I have always kept it along with my letters and the others Miss Button give me that summer. I'll copy it off just as it is. Miss Button wasn't a much better speller than I am now. Oh dear ! I used to do better, I believe ; but I remember with a sort of shame how hard I tried to understand Brown's Grammar that spring, and how desperately I figured over my old sums in Pike's shabby Arithmetic, and how I was troubled for fear some of the children would be a little further along than I, and how I brightened up my writing and spelling. But that 's a long time ago, and I have got to be ruther a poor speller. But dear me, I shall forget Miss Button's verses :—

LINES TO A KINDRED SPIRIT.

Many years I've been a seekin'
Of a sympathizin' mind,
Hopin', ere my youth was wasted,
Such a blessin' I should find.

What I wanted was a spirit
Fond of soarin' as my own,
One that warn't afraid of thunder,
Nor to walk the starry zone.

Oh, my pretty, pale, pink posey,
I have found you out at last ;
Now my wings your head shall shadder,
And my two hands hold you fast.

When you see the moon a climbin'
Up the side hills of the skies,
And you see two big stars shinin',
Make believe it is my eyes.

I shall think I come to see you
On a cloud as white as snow,
And I'll make a gale from heaven
Round your chamber winder blow.

Oh the glory of our futur,
Like a summer sundown shines,
When we see the specks of fire
In the long, slim, yellor lines.

You are pale as sorrel posies
Growin' by a shady spring ;
I am like a medder lily
Where the bobolinks do sing.

But you are the kindred spirit
I've been seekin' all the while,
Mourrain' like a lonely sparrow
For a sympathizin' smile.

Now I've found you, I can soar
For a poet's celestial crown
Higher than any went before,
And fetch a flood of glory down.

Well, after I went to bed, I laid awake ever so long, thinkin' it over. Miss Button was a curis girl. I didn't pretend to know about kindred spirits ; but if there was any meanin' in what she wrote, had I oughter write somethin' back to her or not ? I knew I couldn't come up to her, and after thinkin' it over and over, I concluded I wouldn't try. If I did, she might laugh at me, seein' she knew so much more about poetry than I did. So I pretended not to be able to make rhymes at all, and I praised Miss Button's verses all I could. I shall tell you about my boardin' at Parson Jones's next time I write to you. Brewstir wants me to go with him to be painted in some kind of a graff, I can't remember what, so good-by.

Your obedient,

BETSY BROOMCORN.

THE BEGGAR'S APPEAL.

BY MRS. JOHN C. WINANS.

ONE great from the silver that clangs
In the 'broider'd purse at your side:
One great for the beggar-boy's hand,
From the hand of the rich man's bride.
I am famished with woe and want:
Kind lady, bear while I plead:
Of the plenty lying about,
Only an atom I need.

There's a hovel over the waste,
Wretchedly cold and bare:
A heap of straw in a corner—
My mother is starving there.
She is starving! O God, do you know—
You, housed in comfort and ease,
How many naked and hungry,
The pitiless winters freeze?

She used to be up and toiling,
Before dawn lighted yon hill;
And she toiled till midnight nearing,
Our three little mouths to fill:
But her face has grown so ghastly,
And her form so spectral thin,
I dream whenever I'm sleeping
Of the grave they will bury her in.

I draw my cold limbs together,
And moon through the dismal night,
And watch for the coming of day
To shut out the horrible sight:
It comes—I say my prayers softly,
Fearing that she will awake,
And with hunger reptile-like gnawing,
The round of a beggar take.

I get a kick or cuff from men,
Eating the fat of the land;
And now and then a lone penny
Grudgingly drops in my hand;
Drops into my hand, and away
For a loaf and fagot small:
So very little sufficeth
The narrow wants of us all.

Give me, oh give of your plenty
My darling mother to save!
I cannot bear she should leave me
For the dark and loathsome grave.
I have heard her tell of the worms
That come and fatten them there:
How they eat of the crumbling flesh,
Till the bones are shining bare—

But what in your hand is gleaming?
Money! bright gold, do I see?
Lo, at your feet I am kneeling,
Dear lady, give it to me!

Quick, quick, for moments are ages—
Ah, ha! ha! ha!—thanks—I'll fly—
Back, back, little crowd—God bless you!
Mother, I've money—don't die.

WHERE I WOULD REST.

BY J. BRAINERD MORGAN.

WHEN all life's shifting scenes are o'er,
And here I've ceased to smile and weep—
Fore'er have pass'd from earth's drear shore
And lain me down in death's long sleep,
I ask not that the sculptured stone
Should proudly tower toward the sky,
Telling to every careless one
Where my mouldering ashes lie;
Or that the thoughtless and the gay
Around my sleeping dust should come
There to sport the hours away,
Lured by the splendor of my tomb;
Or not amid the worldly great,
With costly monuments around
(All hollow mockeries of their state)
May my last resting place be found.

Within a village churchyard lone,
Beneath a spreading oak-tree's shade,
A father and a brother gone
In dreamless rest are lowly laid;
Ay, and a mother's sacred dust
In death's long sleep there calmly lies,
Waiting in peaceful, hopeful trust,
Till God at length shall bid it rise
In His own image, pure and fair,
Up to the heavenly plains above,
Where ne'er can come dark pain or care,
But all is endless bliss and love;
There, in that spot to memory dear,
Near which bright boyhood's days were past,
When life was fair and skies were clear,
Oh let me rest in peace at last!

Then let no stranger soil receive
This useless form when life has fled,
But make my humble lowly grave
Near to my heart's own loved dead;
Let the sweet birds that sing above,
When summer's sunny days have come,
Trill forth the self-same songs of love,
The same soft strains o'er our last home.
And if perchance some faithful friend
With flowers should mark my place of rest,
Oh may their rising perfume blend
With that from off my mother's breast;
Then lay me down when life shall cease
Close by my loved ones gone before,
Till we shall wake in joy and peace
And meet again to part ne'er more.

WHEN minds are not in unison, the words of love itself are but the rattling of the chain that tells the victim it is bound.

A MAN'S favorite prejudice is the nose of his mind, which he follows into whatsoever predicament it may lead him.

LESTER'S REVENGE.

BY ANNA M. BINGEN.

CHAPTER I.

"To be weak is miserable."

LIZZIE HOWARD sat in her luxurious room with her hands lying idly in her lap, and a weary, dissatisfied look shadowing her gentle face. She was a fair mild woman, something over thirty years of age. Her deep blue eyes had lost none of their lustre, but early sorrow had given them a serious, pleading look which never failed to attract strangers. It had attracted Mr. Howard, when, twelve years before our story opens, he visited New York city and found her in the care of her aunt, the fashionable Mrs. Carey.

He inquired her history, and learned that when her father died she was found to be penniless, instead of, as was supposed, an heiress. Then when, in her bewildered grief, she turned to her betrothed lover for sympathy he quietly informed her that his fortune was too small for him to hope to supply her with the luxuries to which she was accustomed; and he would not ask her to live without them. She clung to him, and told him in broken timid words how valueless were all these luxuries when compared with his love; but he coldly replied that he had more worldly wisdom than she, and she must let him decide for both. Another week and William Allen had sailed for Europe; and Lizzie was eating the bitter, bitter bread of dependence, in her uncle's house.

Lester Howard was a widower when he heard this little history. The years of sorrow he had endured, as he saw the wife of his youth fade slowly away under the destroying hand of consumption, had prepared him to sympathize in the grief of others. His naturally haughty spirit was roused in bitter scorn toward the faithless lover, while he deeply pitied the desolate girl, who was so evidently miserable in her new home. He sought her out, and after a short acquaintance, offered her his hand; an offer which she gratefully but sadly accepted. Do not judge her too harshly. She was gentle and amiable, but utterly lacking in self-reliance; and that any one would suppose she could support herself, did not occur to her.

Marriage and death seemed to her the only avenues of escape from the cutting remarks which so deeply wounded her sensitive spirit. Besides this, she did not believe she could ever again love as she had done. Esteem was all she could give, and she certainly did esteem the generous stranger, who offered her his protection. She married for a home, as so many have done, but she resolved to strive to be, as she promised when she spoke her bridal vows, "a loving, true, and faithful wife." He took her away to his beautiful estate in Kentucky, and their marriage was far happier than she had any right to hope. Ten years passed rapidly away; then Lester Howard was gathered to his fathers, and his wife wept passionate tears of heartfelt grief as she and her boy followed him to the tomb. Time had, in a great measure, soothed her sorrow, and when two years after his death, we first introduced her to the reader, she had become quietly cheerful. She sat, as we said, with her hands lying idly in her lap, but beneath them was a letter which she had just perused—a letter from the faithless lover of her girlhood. The words were earnest and ardent; for William Allen could talk well; but Lizzie felt they were not entirely truthful, and (so strange a thing is the human heart) tried to reason herself out of the belief.

"He has always loved me, he says, and I believe he has, though he is so refined, so luxurious in his tastes, that he felt it impossible to marry me when we were both poor. If he had been rich, no doubt he would have acted differently. Mr. Howard called him a despicable wretch; but then he was so much nobler and better than other men that he could not sympathize with common frailties. I hope Letty will be high-spirited and generous like his father, I believe he will; he seems even now to despise anything mean."

A rich glow, a glow of motherly pride came to her cheeks. Ah, Lizzie Howard, if you had only tried to imitate the virtues you admired so much, how far better it had been for you. But she could not. The old feelings of her girlhood had been aroused. Though her idol had been proved to be clay, she loved him yet, and determined to marry him, when her instinct, her conscience forbade; when a loftier spirit would have turned from him in utter scorn.

Think pityingly of her, dear reader. Remember that those who by weak or wicked acts make their own misery, have, when that misery comes, the torture of reflecting that it might have been avoided. Thus the affrighted sinner who trembles and shudders as death appears in view, remembers with terrible agony how many precious opportunities he has slighted; how many times he has heard the gracious offer, "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow."

Mrs. Howard arose, and walking to the window, looked across the shady piazza to the green lawn which sloped down to the road, winding along the river bank. There was little Lester, a noble-looking boy almost ten years old, talking to old Tom who was busily engaged trimming some shrubbery.

"Now, Tom," he said, "I want you to go and saddle my new horse; I am going to ride him."

"Can't do it, Massa Letter, 'pon no 'count; 'cause you know Massa James he said how you mustn't ride any horse till he 'd rode hisself," said Tom, decidedly.

"Massa James," as Tom called him, was Lester's uncle and guardian, who resided on a neighboring plantation.

"Never mind what he says," said the boy, "I want my horse, and besides, how can he ride himself?"

"Haw, haw, haw," laughed Tom, "you know what I mean, Massa Let; and you know Massa James would be awful if I 'd go git your horse after he telled me not to."

"But Uncle James has no right to say what I shall do; nobody has but mamma, and she don't try."

Mrs. Howard's heart sank as she heard these words. "How would William and Lester agree? William who always loved to rule, and Lester who would not be ruled."

If there should be trouble between them, what could she do? Lester had inherited not only his father's deep dark eyes and high white forehead, but his indomitable will, his imperious temper. His mother was very proud of these qualities, but she realized that the calm, polished, yes, and selfish, William Allen would look upon them differently.

"Perhaps, after all, she had better remain a widow; it might be better for the boy she so dearly loved. But then she loved William too, and Brother James would not allow Letty to be imposed upon, even if any one felt so disposed, which, of course, no one would." The last words were spoken aloud, as if she was determined to convince herself of their truth. Need we tell her decision? Three days after, Mr. James Howard visited his sister-in-law, and was informed of her contemplated marriage.

"You do not mean to tell me that this is the same Allen that deserted you when your father died," he said in indignant astonishment.

"Yes; but he has been very sorry since," she replied, casting down her eyes.

"Sorry! yes, you would see how sorry he would be if you were poor. His conscience would not trouble him then, I'll warrant."

"You judge him very unkindly, Brother James," she said, tearfully.

"No, Lizzie, I do not wish to do that; but just think of all this man has done, and tell me what reason you have to suppose him less mercenary than formerly?"

"Why, he says he is perfectly willing to have my property so settled on me that he cannot touch it. Does not that prove him disinterested?"

"No, it does not, when, as he well knows, you are so yielding that it would be under his control as much as if in his possession; besides, as he has, no doubt, informed himself, your property is in the form of an annuity, payable only to you or your order; so he makes a virtue of necessity."

"I do not believe he ever asked anything about it. You are determined to think ill of him."

"Not so. I would be glad to have a better opinion of him, but I cannot; and I do earnestly entreat you to consider what unhappiness this will bring to Lester as he grows up."

"You think all for Lester and none for me. I am sure I shall be a great deal happier."

"Do be reasonable, Lizzie." But at this moment Lester came bounding into the room.

"Uncle James, why can't I ride the horse Uncle Carey sent me? Tom won't saddle him for me, because he says you told him not to."

"You may now, my boy; I tried him this morning, and do not think there will be any danger. But, Letty, what do you think of having some one take your father's place?"

"What do you mean?" asked Lester.

"Why, how would you like to have your mamma marry some one who would come here and order you around?"

"He had better not try that," said the boy, hotly. Mrs. Howard looked very deprecating.

"He will not think of such a thing, my darling; he will love you and be kind to you, if you will call him father, and act as if you thought him such."

"I won't call him father. So there, now!" was the ungracious answer which delighted his uncle and moved his mother's tears. This was Lizzie's last resort in all her contests with her impetuous son, and never failed to bring him to terms. "Yes, I will, dear mother. I'll call him anything you want me to," he said, with ready contrition. "I'll call him grandpapa, if you wish," he added, with a merry twinkle in his eye. A smiling sob from his mother and a glance of grim amusement from his uncle were the rewards for this generous proposal.

They were married. William Allen, the spendthrift, who had never yet done anything for his own support, but had sacrificed the property his father left him at the gaming table, and was now (though this was not known) almost penniless; and Lizzie Howard, who now renewed the vows of her early girlhood.

Six weeks were spent in travelling; then they came back to Kentucky, for Mr. Allen said he would not tear his Lizzie from the home to which she was so attached. Lester, who had spent the intervening weeks with his uncle, was delighted to see his mother again, and for two brief days Mrs. Allen had the happiness of seeing that her husband and son seemed to like each other. The third morning after their return the newly-made husband walked out to inspect the stables.

"Whose horse is this?" said he, pausing beside one.

"Massa Letter's," replied Tom, respectfully. "He's rode that horse most since he could sit alone. This one is Misse Howard's—beg pardon, sah, mean Misse Allen's."

"Well, Allen isn't a hard name to remember, is it?" said Tom's new master, smiling with an affability which quite won his heart, and he replied with alacrity—

"Oh no, massa, not hard at all; bery easy, in fac'."

"And whose is this one?" said Mr. Allen, stopping and gazing delightedly at the beautiful animal which Mr. Carey had sent as a present to the son of his "beloved niece."

"That's Massa Letter's, too. His Uncle Carey sent it to him from New York 'bout four months ago, and he jess thinks there never was such another."

Mr. Allen walked round and round the horse, and then turned to Tom. "Saddle him and bring him round to the house; and bring your mistress's too."

Tom scratched his head doubtfully. "Massa Letter don't like nobody to ride him but jess hisself."

"Do as I tell you," was the haughty reply.

The horses were brought to the door. Mr. Allen having assisted his wife to mount, was looking to something about his own saddle when Lester came bounding out.

"Are you going out riding, mamma? You look real pretty"—and the boy looked admiringly at the delicate roses which happiness was bringing to his mother's cheek. His look changed, however, as he saw his pet horse, the pride of his young heart, standing near. "Why, that is Hannibal; you mustn't ride Hannibal; nobody is to ride him but me," he said, his cheeks growing red and his dark eyes very brilliant.

"Why, Letty, dear, you will let papa ride your horse," said Lizzie, cheerfully, though with many forebodings.

"No, I won't. There are plenty of other horses he can take, but he sha'n't have Hannibal," he replied, his breast heaving rapidly, as he resolutely winked away the tears of which he was ashamed.

"Come, come, young gentleman!" said Mr. Allen in a tone of authority. "No more of this, if you please. I like this horse better than any of the others, and shall ride him."

"You shall not! he is mine! he is mine!" screamed Lester, now bursting into a passion of tears, and jumping up and down on the steps in his boyish wrath. "You have no right to him; Uncle Carey sent him to me." Mrs. Allen looked at her boy, and knew that it would be useless now to attempt to expostulate with him. Then she turned tremblingly to her husband.

"William, please come here a moment." Very unwillingly he complied, and went and stood by her. "O William," she whispered, timidly, "don't take Letty's horse; he almost idolizes it."

"Lizzie," he answered, sternly, "do you mean to ask me to yield to a boy of ten?"

How her coward heart quaked! how she longed to say, "Respect his rights, and he will respect you!" when all she replied was: "Oh, I don't want to ride; I am going into the house."

"No, you will not," he said, determinedly. "Stay where you are." And she dared not disobey. He turned to where Hannibal stood impatiently pawing the ground, and Lester saw him coming. Poor boy, how indignantly his ungoverned heart swelled as he looked at the horse, his horse! Then he looked down the lawn, and saw the carriage gate standing temptingly open. A sudden light gleamed in his eyes. He sprang from the high step where he stood to Hannibal's back, jerked the rein from Tom's hand, and galloped off.

"Stop him, you rascal, you!" said Mr. Allen, in a tone of concentrated passion, and Tom ran down the lawn shouting, "Stop, Massa Letter," but rejoicing in the depths of his honest old heart in the knowledge that "Massa Letter" would not stop.

"We may as well go in the house, Lizzie," said Mr. Allen, with an icy smile, when Tom came back and said he "clared Massa Letter went like the wind." His wife looked wonderingly at him; she could not understand this sudden cooling of his temper; but she went into the house and lay down in a state of exhaustion.

When Lester came back from his ride, and had sent Hannibal to the stable, he entered the house in a half defiant, half frightened mood, and was met by his stepfather.

"Lester," said he, coldly, "don't let me see you do such a thing again. I will excuse you this time; but if you try it again, I will assuredly punish you."

"Just you dare to lay your hand on me," said the boy, with blazing eyes, "and I'll—I'll—"

"What will you do?" was the mocking question.

"I'll go and live with Uncle James; and when I grow up, I'll turn you out of doors," exclaimed Lester, looking resolutely in his face. Mr. Allen did not doubt he would, if he had the power.

"Lizzie," he said, an hour later, "does not this house belong to you?"

"No," she replied, with languid indifference. "Only till Letty is of age. I have nothing of my own but my annuity."

Her husband turned wrathfully away; he was already beginning to hate his stepson.

Time passed slowly on, marked by continued hostility between Lester and Mr. Allen, till Mrs. Allen came to dread seeing them together. A daughter was born to her, a fair, lovely little creature, over whose cradle she spent her happiest hours. When her husband was away (and now this frequently happened, for in a neighboring town Mr. Allen had found a number of congenial spirits), she, and Lester, and the little Alice would really enjoy themselves, and the boy would forget his waywardness in the deep love he bore to his mother and sister. But his stepfather's return was sure to bring tumult, and the unhappy wife would be almost distracted between husband and son. Lester had gone to his uncle and begged permission to have Hannibal kept in his stables, for Mr. Allen would ride him, spite of all the boy could say. Mr. Howard readily consented, and gave strict orders that the horse should never be taken out except at his nephew's command. So Lester would ride over on his old horse, then mount Hannibal and go where he chose, but before he came home he always changed back; and his stepfather, though he often saw the coveted horse, could not gain possession. He had many sources of vexation toward the boy, for new difficulties seemed continually to arise between them, and since he had renewed his old habits of gaming, there was an added provocation in the fact that his wife's income, large as it was, was not sufficient for his continued demands. James Howard, who thoroughly despised him, would never pay it one day before it became due, nor would he permit him to interfere in the slightest degree in the management of Lester's estate. He fretted and chafed under this restraint, and often in his heart wished the boy dead, for then Lizzie would inherit all, and not be limited to an annuity.

One day, three years after Mrs. Allen's second marriage, Lester—having obtained permission from the teacher who was now employed to take charge of his studies—was walking along the river bank about a mile from his home. He had strolled away from the road which was here a little back from the river, had gone further than he meant to, and was about to turn back, when he saw a veil of his mother's hanging on a bush which grew on an island some few rods from the shore. He and his mother, with little Alice, her nurse, and old Tom, had visited the island a few days before, and when they came away, Mrs. Allen could not find her veil. "I will go and get it now," thought the boy, looking for the boat which usually lay moored there, but the boat was gone. The river was very high, and the current rapid, but Lester was not easily discouraged. Two or three planks which had been carried off by the high water were drifting past, and with the aid of a long pole he managed to bring one to shore, and stepping on it found it would support his weight.

There was a large tree growing on the edge of the island, its long branches reaching far over the water, and their extremities bending almost to it. As the boy neared the land standing on one end of his plank and using his pole as an oar, the forward end struck against this tree so suddenly and with such force as to throw him off into the water. Instinctively he caught at the branches over his head, and in a moment his unwieldy boat floated off. Lester was no swimmer, and if he had been, his strength was not equal to a contest with the swift waters; but he tried to move his hands along the branches and so draw himself toward shore. Finding that with every such effort the slender twigs broke off, leaving him to grasp at others equally slender, he desisted, for he saw that those he now held were the last which drooped within his reach. He screamed for help till almost exhausted, but the only answers which came to his ears were the sighing of the wind and the rushing of the waters. He called again, and shouted till his voice died out in a husky whisper, but still no reply. Then he looked toward the island. It was not very far off; maybe if he was to let go he could reach it. But no, he dared not try, he would hold on, perhaps some one would come along. At last, when hope had almost died, he heard (oh blessed sound!) horse's hoofs ringing sharply along the road. He turned as much as he could, and saw that the rider was Mr. Allen. "Father! father!" he shrieked (that word had not crossed his lips for months before), "father, come and help me or I shall be drowned. Oh, father, father!"

The horseman was riding rapidly and was now opposite him, though the trees between them partly hid him from view. "Father, help me!" Still he rode on, he was past him, now; the boy could see him plainly. "Oh, father, I'll never be ugly again! I'll do just what you tell me. You shall have everything I've got. I'll give you Hannibal," he screamed in his terrible agony; but the horseman rode on. Turn back, William Allen; now when you can win the warm love and gratitude of that generous boyish heart, smoothing away past difficulties and binding him to you forever; when you can save the child your gentle wife almost idolizes and win a hearty grasp of the hand from James Howard, prejudiced as he is against you. Let not this foul crime be added to your dread account. Do not do a deed which you—

"Shall blush to own

When your spirit stands before the throne."

No doubt his conscience whispered all this; but he had that day lost largely at the gaming table, and was pondering what he should do when he first saw Lester in the water. A dark temptation came to his mind. Why should he help the boy he hated? he had only to leave him where he was, and independence, yes wealth, would be his. So William Allen rode on without once turning to look at the struggling boy. Dismounting at the gate, he walked up the lawn, and little Alice, who was there with her nurse, came toddling up to meet him.

As he took her in his arms, and she stroked his face with her dimpled hands, had he no thought of two other hands gleaming whitely and coldly from the dark mass of waters? As the blue eyes were raised in childish confidence to his, did he not think of those darker ones now growing dim in their deep despair? He entered the house, and sitting by his wife's side with his child in his arms, talked to both with more than his usual affection. Lizzie's eyes beamed brightly.

"I wish, dear William, you would be a little more patient with Letty," she said, with unwonted boldness.

He kissed the little one, perhaps to hide the spasm which crossed his face, as he replied, "Well, I'll try, Lizzie. I do think a great deal of him; but sometimes he provokes me into saying things I do not mean."

"Oh, I know that," she answered, gratefully, "but he does not mean it either; he is quick-tempered, you know."

The dinner-bell rang. "Where is Lester, Mr. Banks?" asked Mrs. Allen, as her son's tutor took his seat at the table.

"I do not know; he plead so earnestly that his head ached, and he wanted to go out in the fresh air, that I let him go."

"I hope he will not go near the river," said Mr. Allen, unable to keep his thoughts from that one channel.

"I do not apprehend any danger for him, if he does," replied Mr. Banks, wondering at this sudden solicitude, but Lizzie thought she understood it, and smiled her gratitude.

It was hard for the guilty man to still his upbraiding conscience enough to join in conversation; and when the meal was over, he made an excuse to go away, taking care to ride up the river, though all his thoughts went in an opposite direction. He had not been long gone, and his wife and Mr. Banks were sitting in the parlor, when there was a sound of shuffling feet and frightened voices in the hall, and stepping to the door, Lizzie saw old faithful Tom with her dripping boy in his arms.

"He isn't dead, missus; don't you go get scairt, don't you see he is jess peryausted?"

She leaned over him in bewildered silence; and the poor tired arms were feebly placed around her neck. "O, mamma!" he whispered, "I thought I should never see you again."

"Are you sure you are not hurt, my darling?"

"I trust he is not," said Mr. Banks; "but perhaps we had better send for the doctor."

"Yes, do," she replied; "and tell them to stop and ask Brother James Howard to come over. I wish I knew where to send for Mr. Allen." Mr. Howard came immediately, and Mrs. Allen met him at the door.

"How did it happen, Lizzie?"

"I don't know. Mr. Banks said I had better not talk to him till he is a little rested. They are undressing him now.

"Where did Tom find him?"

"Down by the island holding the bushes to keep himself from sinking."

"Has Mr. Allen come back from town?"

"Yes; he came just before dinner, but he had gone away some place before Tom came."

"Missus, Massa Banks says you go up now, if you want to," said Tom. Lester was much revived. He had been undressed and rubbed by Mr. Banks' direction, and that gentleman was now holding a wineglass to his lips as he lay in bed. His mother laid her head on his pillow and silently kissed his cheek; while his uncle, taking his hand, said: "Why, Letty, my little man, how did this happen?"

"O, uncle! I saw mamma's veil, and I wanted to get it; but the plank struck so hard I fell off, and I'd have been drowned if I hadn't caught hold of the branch of that big tree."

"And our good Tom found you there, did he?"

"Yes," said the boy, his face suddenly darkening. "Mr. Allen passed, and I screamed to him, and called him father, and begged him to help me, and told him he should have all I had, but he wouldn't stop—he wanted me to die."

"O, Letty, Letty!" said Mrs. Allen, imploringly.

"He could not have heard you," said Mr. Howard, looking very grave.

"Yes, he did; you know what a little ways it is from the river to the road along there; and I called just as he was passing. I never screamed so loud before in my life; I didn't know I could."

The poor wife shivered, and placed her hand over her eyes. "O Letty, it can't be true!"

"Indeed it is, mother."

The doctor rode rapidly up, arriving at the gate just as Mr. Allen did.

"Why, doctor, what is the hurry?"

"I ought to ask you. Your Jack came for me: said Lester was almost drowned."

"Lester! Why, I had not heard of it; but I rode out immediately after dinner. Almost drowned, did you say?"

"Yes, that is what Jack said."

"Strange," said the guilty man, with a sinking heart. The little contrition he had felt was all lost in the horror of the thought that Lester would tell what had occurred. Feeling very much agitated, but not daring to stay away, he accompanied the physician up stairs.

"What does all this mean?" he said, addressing his wife. "The doctor tells me Lester is hurt."

"The doctor tells you!" said Mr. Howard, with bitter scorn. "Do you attempt to say that was the first you knew of it?"

"Most assuredly I do. How else should I know?"

"Lester says he called to you as you passed, and you would not stop."

"I didn't hear him call. Where was he?"

"You could not help hearing me," said the boy, resolutely. "I was by the island, and I called just when you was opposite, and kept on till you was out of sight. When Tom heard me, he was a great deal farther off."

"I certainly did not hear you," said Mr. Allen, determinedly.

"I am so glad to hear you say so," said his wife, with quivering lips. "You don't know how I felt, William!"

"Why, Lizzie, you surely did not believe such a thing of me. Lester's accident must have turned his head," he replied, wiping the perspiration from his forehead.

The physician had been leaning over the bed, professing not to hear this colloquy. Mr. Howard walked back and forth in deep thought; suddenly he paused. "Doctor, Mr. Banks, you are both men of honor. Will you promise me never to mention this wretched transaction abroad?"

"Certainly," said both gentlemen.

"Lester," continued his uncle, "will hereafter live with me; I am his guardian, and will take charge of him."

"You shall not take him away from his mother; I will not permit it," said Mr. Allen, haughtily.

Mr. Howard turned full upon him. "Just you try to keep him, and I will publish this shameful story; you will not find this part of the country very pleasant to live in after that."

Poor Lizzie sobbed bitterly. "I am sure Lester is mistaken, brother James."

"Perhaps so, but henceforth he will live with me."

And so Lester Howard went to live with his uncle, and his unhappy mother saw him but rarely, for her husband disliked to have her go to Mr. Howard's, growing petulant and moody when she did so; and she did not feel like urging her boy to come to his old home, when he steadily refused to speak to his stepfather. Though her heart often grew sick with vain longings for his presence, the love and fear she felt for her husband were too great to permit her to express her wishes. Her face grew thin and pale; a few months seemed to add many years to her bowed and drooping head, and the little face of her unconscious babe was often bedewed with the bitterest tears poor Lizzie had ever shed, for all past trials were light, compared to this.

HEAD GEAR IN THE SOUTH OF EUROPE.

AMERICAN and English females have little notion of the artistic effect of wearing, as many of the better sex do in Lombardy, those very becoming black veils, which cover a greater part of the head, neck, and shoulders. They would also be astonished for awhile at meeting in the streets of Genoa with something very different from any coverings for the heads used hereabouts in the muslin Pezzotto, which is pinned into the hair of the ladies, and floats away from it, and in the gaudy Mazzaro scarf, which is worn by their poorer neighbors. There is something to look at in the showy handkerchiefs of the Livornese, and something to admire in the pretty white shawl which adorns while partially concealing the locks of the fair ones of Bologna. The white folded square which painters commonly place upon the head of their plebeian figures belonging to Rome will probably disappoint the observer so far as the place itself is concerned, for it is not often worn by any but those wrinkled dames who used to play on the banks of the Tiber some time last century, and are now too conservative to submit to any new-fangled notion about showing the world the exact state or quantity of their residue of capillary attraction. Where we can suppose our countrywomen a little envious is in the neighborhood of Florence, itself the great centre of straw-plait manufacture, where the damsels come forth to captivate the hearts of certain open-mouthed swains, in their large, flapping hats, so limp as to take all sorts of shapes with the passing breeze, and yet so well made as to return forthwith to their normal condition. We well remember the effect of them when we were lounging in the dull, broad street of Fiesole, a place more noted for its Pelasgic and other historical remains than for any modern attraction. It was a fête day, the Duomo was gaudily furnished for the occasion, and the bells struck up a merry invitation to the service, which all the younger part of the population seemed duly to accept. The youths who came early showed anything but an anxiety to secure good places inside—in fact, loitered about to see the successive batches of damsels well in first, with or without any idea of profiting by that sort of introduction to the solemnities of the evening. We watched them likewise; and, seeing as a novelty to us that they took off the flapping hats at the entrance of the Duomo, we were tempted to look in and see what they did with them. We soon found that, although white veils have the chief place in old ecclesiastical costumes, the rule was for each female to put on a black one. And, since by another rule they all fell on their knees, the process of adjusting their veils had to be gone through in that position. The unfolding, pulling, squaring, etc., of the covering, the constant fidgeting of the wearer, and her evident critical anxiety about the success of others in gracefulness, all on the hard marble floor, seemed likely, in our view, to increase the difficulties of devotion under the circumstances; but then we had no license to judge.

ACTS OF KINDNESS.—Kindness makes sunshine wherever it goes—it finds its way into the hidden treasures of the heart, and brings forth treasures of gold; harshness, on the contrary, seals them forever. What does kindness do at home? It makes the mother's lullaby sweeter than the song of the lark, the care-laden brows of the father and the man of business less severe in their expression, and the children joyous without being riotous. Abroad, it assists the fallen, encourages the virtuous, and looks with true charity on the extremely unfortunate—those in the broad way, who perhaps had never been taught that the narrow path was the best, or had turned from it at the solicitation of temptation. Kindness is the real law of life, the link that connects earth with heaven, the true philosopher's stone, for all it touches it turns to virgin gold—the true gold, wherewith we purchase contentment, peace, and love.

PATTERNS FROM MADAME DEMOREST'S
ESTABLISHMENT,

No. 473 Broadway, New York.

"Spanish" Sleeve.—An elegant sleeve in silk or grenadine. It is a small bishop in shape, the fullness laid in box-plaits at the top, and gathered into a loose band, to which is attached a deep lace at the wrist. A wide gore cut out on the front of the arm is trimmed round with a ruching of ribbon, and discloses the handsome lace under-sleeve.

The "Madrilena."—This elegant sleeve can be made up in a great variety of ways, and in any rich material. It is superb in velvet, with inserted puffings of satin. The sleeve itself is quite plain, the puffings supplying all the ful-ness. The centre one extends in a point above the elbow, and each of the three is surrounded by a quilling of velvet or ribbon. The wrist is loose to slip over the hand, and is finished with a puffing of ribbon and quilling to match.

Freddie Dress.—This is a simple sack dress, with a seam at each side, and made back and front alike, except the addition of pockets in front, and is just put over the head and tied with a cord about the waist. The drawing is taken from a fine striped Mohair dress, braided with black; two and a quarter yards of material will make it.

Josie Sack.—This is a pretty sack, with a side jacket, which extends only to the seam under the arm. The belt is carried entirely round the waist. The sleeve is narrow, and a false piece set on in folds; the whole garment is trimmed with braid in a simple pattern. It is suitable for a boy five or six years old, and requires three and a quarter yards of material.

"Oxford" Jacket.—This is a very handsome jacket for a young gentleman of from ten to fifteen years old. It may be made in black, invisible green, or claret-colored-cloth, with black buttons. The vest should be white, with small jet buttons, and only just visible. White Oxford tie, embroidered in black.

The Gentian.—This elegant hat, designed by Mr. Genin for stylish Misses of any age over five, is as pretty as the northern flower from which it takes its name. It is made entirely of velvet, with a lower brim, shaped something like the "Jovita," but with an upper plaited rim surrounding the crown, which imparts novelty and additional beauty to its appearance. The trimmings are composed exclusively of velvet, very gracefully arranged.

The Russ Hat.—This is one of Genin's stylish winter hats for a boy of ten or twelve years.

It is made of beaver, with a smooth crown and brim of fur, and ornamented with a velvet band. The combination is novel and distingue.

THE ESMERALDA.

MADE OF BLACK AND VESUVE RIBBONS, SUITABLE FOR A BRUNETTE.

CROCHET FRINGE TRIMMING, FOR PIQUE BASQUES.

Materials.—Crochet cotton, No. 10, with a suitable hook.

Each piece intended for the trimming must be made separately; therefore make a chain long enough for, say, one sleeve.

2d row.—Single crochet. 3d.—Diamond open hem. 4th.—Single crochet.

5th. (Worked on the original chain).—* 3 sc, 5 ch, miss 3, * repeat to the end, which finish with 3 sc.

6th.—Worked on this. * 1 sc, taking up the original chain and working over the centre of 3 sc; 3 sc under the chain of five, another with a picot, and 3 more plain, making 7 altogether, under the chain of five.* Repeat to the end.

7th.—After this work on the 4th row. * 5 sc, 9 ch, miss 6; * repeat to the end, which finish with 5 sc.

8th.—* 3 sc on centre 3 of 5; 2 ch, dc on 1st of 9 ch, 2 ch, miss 1, dc on next, 2 ch, miss 1, dc on next, 2 ch, miss 1, dc on next, 2 ch, miss 1, dc on last, 2 ch, * repeat to the end.

9th.—Sc on centre of 3: 3 ch, dc over dc, and over every other dc, with 2 ch between, 3 ch after the last.

Wind some of the same cotton round a card two inches wide, and knot seven strands in each of the four centre holes of the shell.

CROSS STITCH KNITTING.
FOR A SOFA CUSHION.

Cast on 91 stitches.

1st row.—Knit 1, bring the wool forward, slip 1 the reverse way, pass the wool back, repeat.

2d.—Seam 2, *, pass the wool back, slip 1, bring the wool forward, seam 1, repeat from *.

Repeat these two rows alternately; knit 6 rows of black, 2 of violet, 2 of maize filoselle doubled, 2 of violet, 2 of maize, 2 violet, 6 of black, 2 of scarlet, 2 maize, 2 scarlet, 2 maize, 2 scarlet, 6 black, 2 green, 2 maize, 2 green, 2 maize, 2 green, 6 black, 2 blue, 2 maize, 2 blue, 2 maize, 2 blue. Repeat until the cushion is the size you wish it.

4 skeins of black double German wool, 2 skeins each of scarlet, violet, green, and blue, and 10 skeins of maize filoselle, are required.

NEEDLE-BOOK IN BEADS AND BERLIN WOOL.

SMALL ornamental articles are generally acceptable to those ladies who feel an interest in contributing to the numerous sales of fancy work which are annually held for the purpose of augmenting the funds of the many benevolent charities of America. The little design given among our illustrations forms a pretty and useful article for this purpose. It is worked on fine canvas with small beads; the pattern is in the two sorts of opaque and transparent, half the leaf being in one sort, and the other half in the other. The ground is in Berlin wool of any bright color which may be preferred, crimson, a rich blue, or a bright green, having either of them a good effect. This part of the work must be stretched over a cardboard cut to the proper size, and lined with silk. The cashmere leaves are laid in the inside, and fastened down with a ribbon; the ends are brought through to the back and tied in a bow. The edges are finished with a row of beads, one being put on at every stitch with great regularity.

PELERINE CLOAK.

This cloak is worked in Afghan stitch, with needle No. 3. The upper part is of blue, and the points of chinchilla zephyr.

Set up for the centre 321 stitches, and work

7 rows. In the 8th row begin the narrowing, which will be 8 times in the row; work the 8th row as follows: work 39 stitches, take 2 together, work 33, take 2 together, repeat this twice. You will have 4 narrowings each side of the cloak. Work for the middle 29 stitches, narrow 1; you will have to keep these 29 stitches all the way up and narrow on each side of them to go toward the fronts. Work 2 rows plain, narrow, so the plain part between the narrowing will be one stitch less. Narrow every 2d row all the way up, and at the same places. After you have done 52 rows there will be 22 rows of narrowing.

In the 53d row you must narrow on the 8th stitch, and between, twice in the middle part, work 9, narrow, work 7, narrow, work 9, narrow. This narrowing keep on the same as the 3 on each side, 5 times in every 2d row and 4 times in every row. When you begin the narrowing in the middle of the back you will have to narrow 1 stitch on beginning and end of the row. When you have 62 rows work the 63d as follows: two stitches together, 4 stitches plain, 2 together, 5 plain, narrow, 5 plain, narrow, 5 plain, narrow, 3 plain, narrow, 7 plain, narrow; these 7 stitches are the inside of the row, the other side must be repeated.

64th row. Take the 3 first stitches together, 1 plain, 2 together, 4 plain, 2 together, 4 plain, 2 together, 4 plain, 2 together, 2 plain, 2 together, 7 plain; this is the middle; repeat for the other side.

65th row. 2 together, 13 plain, 2 together, to the middle plain, and repeat to the end of the row.

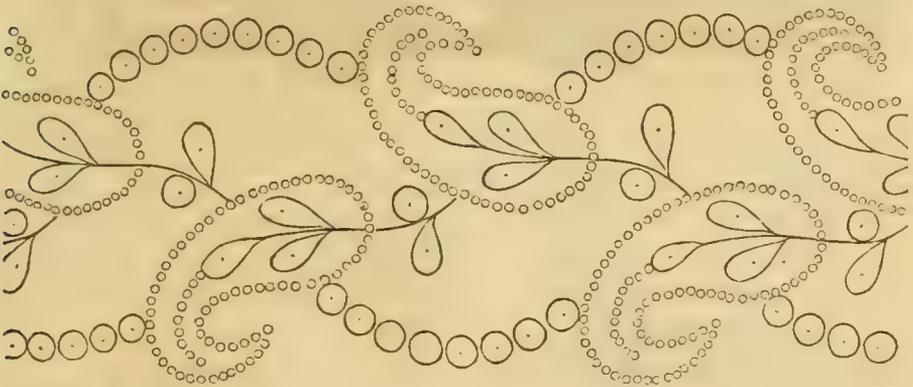

66th row. Leave 8 stitches of the last row and begin to work on the 9th, work plain, and leave 8 at the end of the row, the same as at the beginning.

67th row. Leave 5 stitches of last row, and work plain, leaving 5 stitches at the end of the row. This is the last row. Finish the neck the same as you would an Afghan stripe.

For the points of the cloak, take chinée worsted, and use No. 3 needle, but work very loosely. The points are worked crosswise. Set up 9 stitches; the 1st row widen on the left side by picking up the chain between the 2d and last stitch; do this every row up to 19 stitches, then narrow on the same side 1 stitch every row down to 9 stitches, then begin the widening again; work in this way until you have 21 points. It will take 3 for the neck, 3 up the fronts for each side, and 12 for the rest of the cloak. Sew the points all round, and join the pointed side on with 1 stitch of black and one of white. On the corner the pointed edge must be filled in a little, so it will set evenly. The little bars in the narrow part of the points are made of 6 threads of worsted, braided, or they can be done in crochet, 1 stitch of black and one of white. There are two buttons and two buttonholes to fasten the cloak in front.

BRAIDING FOR A CHILD'S PIQUE DRESS.

DESIGN FOR AN INFANT'S BLANKET.

This very simple and pretty design is suitable for an infant's blanket. It is made of white zephyr, with black velvet run through the chains, and lined with Marie Louise blue or rose-colored cashmere or merino.

LADY'S BRAIDED SLIPPER.

Materials required for one pair of slippers are: A quarter of a yard of bright blue cloth; one piece of Alliance silk braid, scarlet and gold.

This style of slipper is different from the ordinary shape, as it is made with shaped sides, the toe and back being sloped down to a point. These slippers are often made up with rather high heels, which give to the foot a very dainty appearance, particularly when the heels are made in bright scarlet. Velvet or bronze leather might be selected instead of cloth for the foundation, and a rich gold braid used instead of the silk, or a plain colored braid might be run on, edged with gold twist. The pattern should be traced on tissue-paper and tacked on the material to be braided. The braid should then be run over the paper, and when the work is complete this may be torn away. The slippers being very open, must be neatly finished inside with a quilted lining and quilted sock made of the same colored silk as the outside of the slipper, and should be bound round the edge with a silk or velvet binding, whichever ac-ords best with the material used. Chain-stitch might be substituted for the braid, worked in some very bright-colored purse silk. This may be also done over the tissue-paper, which being so thin, easily tears away. Before sending the slippers to be made up, we would advise our readers to tack some paper over the needlework, as it is so liable to soil under the shoemaker's hands.

EMBROIDERED POCKET FOR LADY'S DRESS.

THE present fashion of making the pocket sufficiently ornamental to become a part of the trimming of a dress is both convenient and pretty. Pockets are now worn embroidered on white muslin dresses as well as in silk and other materials. The one we are giving is appropriate for either white muslin or colored silk embroidery; in either case it is worked in satin-stitch. If on white muslin or piqué, No. 10 and No. 20 cotton must be used; but if the dress is of silk or other material, the embroidery should also be silk. Sometimes these pockets are placed on the long wide bands of a sash having the ends ornamented to correspond. A narrow lace beyond the scalloped edge is a great improvement.

This little article for the toilet-table is recommended not only by its novelty of shape, but for its being so admirably well adapted to take its place in the front of a looking-glass, when the space is too limited to allow of one of the entire circle. A small box of the form which will be seen in our engraving can be easily purchased, having the cushion on the top of its lid, and being covered and lined with either a pink calico or a silk of the same or some other bright tint. Immediately below the rim of the opening of this box is a frill of the same material as the covering, just the same depth as the box. The half circular portion on the top is to be worked on net, the flowers being all in satin-stitch. The twisted bar across the top is in sewn-over lines, with solid spots worked in the under divisions, and the upper part in a kind of herringbone-stitch. The ribbon bows have a double line of fine chain stitch at each edge, with a row of dots between, and in the middle a row of diamonds, run in with a spot in the centre of each. The flower or rosette at each end of the bar has its outline in chain stitch, filled in with solid spots. No. 20 will be found the proper cotton for the embroidery of this pincushion. We have only to add that a quilling of ribbon is to be carried round the edge of the lid, together with a little loop in the centre by which to lift it up.

MODERN COOKERY AND HOUSEHOLD MANAGEMENT.

THE average of human felicity may not be much higher now than it has been; the world will most likely deserve its title of a "vale of tears" to the end of time; but one consolation, and that by no means a small one, has become stronger and of more general circulation in the present day—there is the possibility of getting good dinners oftener! Good dinners, excellent dinners, super-excellent dinners, have been cooked and eaten in all ages. "Lord Mayor's Feasts" have never failed. Christmas time, Easter, and even Michaelmas, have secured good cheer for Christendom. Sunday dinners retain a comfortable superiority over the rest of their brethren; but their very association with plenty of good things suggests the "spare fast" of intermediate seasons, when a household was kept on salted meat for months, the frugal housewife being careful to use first the portions which were a "little touched," and going on with the remainder as it stood in the most urgent need of being cooked. Certainly all that has been much changed for the better. Our Lady's Book receipts deal less with grand dishes for high-company occasions, and more with the common dinners of every day. Domestic cookery-books have of late boldly encountered the difficulty of dealing with "that poor creature"—cold mutton. Set dinner-parties are less thought of than the comfort of the family. The idea has been set forth and cherished that the husband and the children are entitled to as much consideration as occasional guests, and that the table ought to be set out as carefully and neatly every day as on special occasions. There is a self-respect in such a fact that goes deeper than the clean tablecloths and dinner-napkins. One of the latest attainments of civilization is—comfort; it is one of the last applications men venture to make of their money, just as, in religion, the practical part of it lags a long way behind the canons of orthodox metaphysics. Men wore fine clothes whilst they walked on rushes, and the beautiful embroidery and picturesque costume of Vandyke's portraits were worn previous to Cromwell's sanitary direction that the dirt should be shovelled from before the doors of houses every day. People are beginning to make themselves comfortable with such things as they have. From the green-hafted scimitar-shaped knives and two-pronged forks which prevailed among decent people within the memory of man to the appointments of the present day there is a great step, and at no more cost. Silver forks are still for those who can obtain them, and silver spoons continue to be the mystic symbol of good luck; but the substitutes for these precious articles improve every day, and the convenience of the originals is afforded to a wider circle. The one point insisted upon in all works on household management is not a love of show or extravagant expenditure, but the necessity of having everything that depends on personal thought or care done as well as possible. The electro-plate or the nickel silver, or even the commonest species of Britannia metal, is to be kept clean and bright, and put neatly on the table; the table linen has no need to be fine, but freshness is indispensable. The dinner may be of scraps, but those scraps must be made savory; and certainly the receipts and directions for turning stale crusts into delicate puddings, morsels of cold, dry meat into delicious entrées, leave cooks and wives without excuse for "banyan days" or hungry dinners. No one can read the Lady's Book receipts without being struck by the good sense which pervades them as a general rule.

Cookery is not merely "the art of providing dainty bits to fatten out the ribs," as the scornful old proverb has it: it is the art of turning every morsel to the best use; it is the exercise of skill, thought, ingenuity, to make every morsel of food yield the utmost nourishment and pleasure of which it is capable. To do this, or to legislate for the doing of it, does not depend on the amount of money spent; the same qualities of character are demanded whether the housekeeping be on a large or a small scale. A woman who is not essentially kind-hearted cannot be a comfortable housekeeper; a woman who has not judgment, firmness, forethought, and general good sense cannot manage her house prudently or comfortably, no matter what amount of money she may have at her command; a woman who has not an eye for detecting and remedying disorderliness and carelessness cannot keep her house fresh and pleasant, no matter how much money she may spend on furniture and upholstery. It is not money, but management, that is the great requisite in procuring comfort in household arrangements. Of course, nobody asks impossibilities; none but the Jews ever yet succeeded in "making bricks without straw," and even they found it difficult, and lamented wearily; but the woman with limited means may make her things as perfect after their kind as the woman with ample means, only she will be obliged to put more of herself into the management; and that element of personality has a charm which no appointments made through the best staff of servants can possess—it is a luxury that money cannot buy, and generally hinders. The luxury of completeness must always depend on the individual care and skill of the mistress. That a thing should be perfect after its kind is all that can be required. Bacon and venison lie at opposite ends of the economical scale; but if the woman whose means allow her to procure bacon only is careful to have it so dressed and served that it is as good as bacon ought to be, she has attained the only perfection required at her hands; and it is the higher qualities brought to bear on a common action which give to the result a beauty and value not its own. We are all so much creatures of imagination, that we think more of the signified, than of the actual, fact. When a man sees his table nicely set out, he believes in the goodness of his dinner in a way that would be impossible with the self-same dinner on a soiled tablecloth with a slovenly arrangement.

MISCELLANEOUS COOKING.

A ROUND OF SALTED BEEF.—As this is too large for a moderate family, we shall write directions for the dressing half a round. Get the tongue side; skewer it up tight and round, and tie a fillet of broad tape round it, to keep the skewers in their places. Put it into plenty of cold water, and carefully catch the scum as it rises; let it boil till all the scum is removed, and then put the boiler on one side of the fire, to keep simmering slowly till it is done.

Half a round of fifteen pounds will take about three hours; if it weighs more, give it more time. When you take it up, if any stray scum, etc., sticks to it that has escaped the vigilance of your skimmer, wash it off with a paste-brush. Garnish the dishes with carrots and turnips. Send up carrots, turnips, and parsnips, or greens, etc., on separate dishes.

N B The outside slices, which are generally too much salted and too much boiled, will make a very good relish as potted beef.

VEAL.—Veal requires particular care to roast it a nice brown. Let the fire be the same as for beef; a sound, large fire for a large joint, and a brisker for a smaller; put it at some distance from the fire to soak thoroughly, and then draw it near to finish it brown.

When first laid down it is to be basted; baste it again occasionally. When the veal is on the dish, pour over it half a pint of melted butter; if you have a little brown gravy by you, add that to the butter. With those joints which are not stuffed, send up forcemeat in balls or rolled into sausages as garnish to the dish, or fried pork sausages; greens are also always expected with veal.

VEAL SWEETBREAD.—Trim a fine sweetbread (it cannot be too fresh); parboil it for five minutes, and throw it into a basin of cold water. Roast it plain, or beat up the yolk of an egg, and prepare some fine bread-crumbs. When the sweetbread is cold, dry it thoroughly in a cloth; run a lark-spit or a skewer through it, and tie it on the ordinary spit; egg it with a paste-brush, powder it well with bread-crumbs, and roast it. For sauce, fried bread-crumbs round it, and melted butter, with a little mushroom catsup and lemon-juice, or serve them on buttered toast, garnished with egg sauce or with gravy.

A LEG OF PORK of eight pounds will require about three hours. Score the skin across in narrow stripes (some score it in diamonds) about a quarter of an inch apart, stuff the knuckle with sage and onion, minced fine, and a little grated bread, seasoned with pepper, salt, and the yolk of an egg. Do not put it too near the fire.

A CHINE OF PORK.—Parted down the back bone so as to have but one side, a good fire will roast it in two hours; if not parted, three hours. Chines are generally salted and boiled.

GOOSE.—When a goose is well picked, singed, and cleaned, make the stuffing with about two ounces of onion and half as much green sage, chop them very fine, adding four ounces—i. e. about a large breakfast-cupful—of stale bread-crumbs, a bit of butter about as big as a walnut, and a very little pepper and salt (to this some cooks add half the liver, parboiling it first), the yolk of an egg or two, and incorporating the whole well together, stuff the goose; do not quite fill it, but leave a little room for the stuffing to swell; spit it, tie it on the spit at both ends, to prevent it swinging round, and to keep the stuffing from coming out. From an hour and a half to an hour and three-quarters will roast a fine full-grown goose. Send up gravy and apple sauce with it.

TO CLARIFY DRIPPINGS.—Put your dripping into a clean saucepan over a stove or slow fire; when it is just going to boil, skim it well, let it boil, and then let it stand till it is a little cooled; then pour it through a sieve into a pan.

Use.—Well-cleansed drippings and the fat skimmings of the broth-pot, when fresh and sweet, will baste everything as well as butter, except game and poultry, and should supply the place of butter for common fries, etc., for which they are equal to lard, especially if you repeat the clarifying twice over.

N B. If you keep it in a cool place, you may preserve it a fortnight in summer, and longer in winter. When you have done frying, let the dripping stand a few minutes to settle, and then pour it through a sieve into a clean basin or stone pan, and it will do a second and a third time as well as it did the first; only the fat you have fried fish in must not be used for any other purpose.

POTATOES ROASTED UNDER MEAT.—Half boil large potatoes, drain the water from them, and put them into an earthen dish or small tin pan, under meat that is roasting, and baste them with some of the dripping. When they are browned on one side, turn them and brown the other; send them up round the meat, or in a small dish.

VEGETABLE SOUP.—Put a cabbage, turnips, and carrots, cut up, a bit of celery or a little sugar, into two quarts of water; boil one hour; add three onions, sliced, some oatmeal or rice boiled, or crusts of bread, pepper, and salt; give it a boil up for a quarter of an hour.

CABBAGE JELLY.—A tasty little dish, and by some persons esteemed more wholesome than cabbage simply boiled. Boil cabbage in the usual way, and squeeze in a colander till perfectly dry. Then chop small; add a little butter, pepper, and salt. Press the whole very closely into an earthenware mould, and bake one hour, either in a side oven or in front of the fire; when done, turn it out.

TO HASH A CALF'S HEAD.—Clean the head thoroughly, and boil it for a quarter of an hour. When cold, cut the meat into thin, broad slices, and put them into a pan with two quarts of gravy; and, after stewing three-quarters of an hour, add one anchovy, a little mace and Cayenne, one spoonful of lemon pickle, and two of walnut catsup, some sweet herbs, lemon-peel, and a glass of sherry. Mix a quarter of a pound of fresh butter with flour, which add five minutes before the meat is sufficiently cooked. Take the brains and put them into hot water, skin them, and pound them well. Add to them two eggs, one spoonful of flower, a little grated lemon-peel, and finely chopped parsley, thyme, and sage; mix well together with pepper and salt. Form this mixture into small cakes; boil some hard, and fry them in it until they are a light brown color, then lay them on a sieve to drain. Take the hash out of the pan, and lay it neatly on a hot dish, strain the gravy over it, and lay upon it a few mushrooms, forcemeat balls, the yolks of four hard-boiled eggs, and the brain-cakes. Garnish with slices of lemon and pickles.

SCALLOPED OYSTERS.—Wash out of the liquor two quarts of oysters, pound very fine eight soft crackers, or grate a stale loaf of bread; butter a deep dish, sprinkle in a layer of crumbs, then a layer of oysters, a little mace, pepper, and bits of butter; another layer of crumbs, another of oysters, then seasoning as before, and so on until the dish is filled; cover the dish over with bread-crumbs, seasoning as before; turn over it a cup of the oyster liquor. Set it into the oven for thirty or forty minutes to brown.

CAKES, PUDDINGS, ETC.

In making cakes it is indispensably necessary that all the ingredients should be heated before they are mixed; for this purpose everything should be prepared an hour before the time it is wanted, and placed near the fire or upon a stove—the flour thoroughly dried and warmed; the currants, sugar, caraway seeds, and anything else required heated in the same way; butter and eggs should be beaten in basins fitted into kettles or pans of warm water, which will give them the requisite degree of temperature. Without these precautions cakes will be heavy, and the best materials, with the greatest pans, will fail to produce the desired results. The following directions should also be strictly attended to: Currants should be very nicely washed, dried in a cloth, and then set before the fire. Before they are used a dust of dry flour should be thrown among them, and a shake given to them, which causes the cakes to be lighter. Eggs should be very long beaten, whites and yolks apart, and always strained. Sugar should be pounded in a mortar or rubbed to a powder on a clean board, and sifted through a very fine hair or lawn sieve. Lemon-peel should be pared very thin, and with a little sugar, beaten in a marble mortar to a paste, and then mixed with a little wine or cream, so as to divide easily among the other ingredients. The pans should be of earthenware; nor should eggs, or butter and sugar be beaten in tins, as the coldness of the metal will prevent them from becoming light. Use no flour but the best superfine, for if the flour be of inferior quality, the cakes will be heavy, ill-colored, and unfit to eat; but if a little potato flour be added, it will improve their lightness. Cakes are frequently rendered hard, heavy, and uncatable by misplaced economy in eggs and butter, or for want of a due seasoning in spices and sugar. After all the articles are put into the pan they should be thoroughly and long beaten, as the lightness of the cake depends much on their being well incorporated. Unless you are provided with proper utensils as well as materials the difficulty of making cakes will be so great as in most instances to be a failure. Accuracy in proportioning the ingredients is also indispensable, and therefore scales, weights, and measures, down to the smallest quantity, are of the utmost importance. When yeast is used, a cake should stand for some time to rise before it is put into the oven. All stiff cakes should be beaten with the hand; but pound and similar cakes should be beaten with a whisk or spoon.

ROCK CAKES.—Take a pound of flour, rub into it half a pound of butter, and half a pound of sugar; mix with it a quarter of a pound of lemon-peel and the yolks of six eggs. Roll into balls, and bake on tins.

ARROWROOT BISCUITS.—Put together three-quarters of a pound of sugar, and the same weight of butter until they rise; beat three eggs well and mix with it, then stir in two cups of sifted arrowroot, and two of flour; roll them thin, cut them with a biscuit-cutter; place them in buttered tins, and bake in a slow oven.

LEMON PUDDING.—Take four ounces of butter, melt and pour it on four ounces of powdered loaf-sugar; add the juice of a large lemon, with the rind grated, and the yolks of six eggs. Line the dish with paste, bake it half an hour.

APPLE SNOW-BALLS.—Take half a dozen fresh apples, cut them into quarters and carefully remove the cores from them; then put them together, having introduced into the cavity caused by the removal of the cores, two cloves and a thin slice of lemon-rind into each apple. Have at hand half a dozen damp cloths, upon each dispose of a liberal layer of clean, picked rice; place each apple in an upright position in the middle of the grain, and draw the sides of the cloths containing the rice over the same, tying them at the top only sufficiently tight to admit of its swelling whilst under the operation of boiling—three-quarters of an hour will suffice. When released from the cloths they will resemble snow-balls. Open, add sugar, butter, and nutmeg to the fruit, and serve them up to table. The above will be found very wholesome and satisfactory food for children.

BATH BUNS.—Take a pound of flour, the rinds of three lemons, grated fine, half a pound of butter melted in a cup of cream, a teaspoonful of yeast, and three eggs. Mix; add half a pound of finely-powdered white sugar; mix well, let it stand to rise, and it will make thirty-nine buns.

AN ORANGE PUDDING.—Make a light paste, and roll it out to the extent you require it. Take your oranges, slice them with the rinds on, removing carefully the pips or seeds from the pulp. Place a layer of fruit, well-sugared, within one side of the paste and turn it over the fruit, and repeat the same course until the whole of the slices are disposed of. Fold the paste up at each end, so as to secure the syrup. Boil it in a pudding cloth. It constitutes, in some families, a nursery luxury.

APPLE CREAM.—Peel and core five large apples, boil in a little water till soft enough to press through a sieve; sweeten, and beat with them the beaten whites of three eggs, serve it with cream poured around it.

EVE'S PUDDING.—Grate three-fourths of a pound of stale bread, and mix it with three-fourths of a pound of fine suet, the same quantity of chopped apples and dried currants, five eggs, and the rind of a lemon; put it into a mould, and boil it three hours; serve it with sweet sauce.

CRANBERRY ROLL.—Stew a quart of cranberries in just water enough to keep them from burning; make it very sweet, strain it through a colander, and set it away to cool; when quite cold, make a paste as for apple pudding; spread the cranberries about an inch thick; roll it up in a floured cloth, and tie it close at the ends; boil it two hours, and serve it with sweet sauce. Stewed apples, or any other kind of fruit, may be made in the same way.

AN EXCELLENT PUDDING.—Take one pint and a half of milk, two eggs, and a small tablespoonful of flour; mix the flour with cold milk to the consistency of thick cream; boil the rest of the milk and pour, boiling hot, upon the flour, stirring all the time; add a salt-spoonful of salt, sugar to your taste, and, when cool, two eggs well beaten; have ready a buttered dish, pour the whole into it, grate lemon-peel or nutmeg over it, and bake thirty-five or forty minutes; it should be out of the oven fifteen minutes before serving. It is delicious to eat cold with jam, tart, or fruit pie.

APPLE JAM.—Three pounds of large apples to be put into a jar to stand all night in the oven with half a pint of water, the cores having first been taken out. The next day, add the juice of one lemon, and one pound of lump sugar; boil altogether from two to three hours.

A SWISS CUSTARD.—Take one quart of new milk; introduce one half of the measure into a clean saucepan, with the rind of a lemon shred very fine, and let the latter simmer over a gentle fire. Have at hand three tablespoonfuls of ground rice, damp it with cold spring water in a deep dish, and mix with it the milk which was left unused, adding loaf-sugar to your taste. When the milk in the saucepan simmers, let the cold mixture be gradually added to it, carefully stirring it round till it becomes thick and assumes the usual consistency of a custard made with eggs. Grate cinnamon and nutmeg over it, and eat it cold.

CHEESECAKES.—Two ounces of sweet almonds, a little better than an ounce of bitter do., the whites of two eggs, a quarter of a pound of lump-sugar pounded very fine Pound up the almonds (after blanching them); mix in the whites of the eggs with the sugar, and bake until a light brown in patty pans lined with a paste.

MISCELLANEOUS.

TO PRESERVE IRONS FROM RUST—Melt fresh mutton suet, smear over the iron with it while hot, then dust it well with unslaked lime, powdered and tied up in muslin. When not used, wrap the irons in baize, and keep them in a dry place. Use no oil for them at any time, except salad oil.

TO TAKE RUST OUT OF STEEL—Rub well with sweet oil and let the oil remain upon them for forty-eight hours. Then rub with leather sprinkled with unslaked lime, finely powdered, until all the rust disappears.

TO CLEAN BLACK GRATES, HEARTHES, SIDES, ETC—Boil a quarter of a pound of the best black lead in a pint of weak vinegar and water, adding a teaspoonful of brown sugar and a bit of soap about the size of a walnut. When that is melted, first brush off all the dust and soot, and then with a painter's brush wet the grate, etc. As soon as it begins to dry rub to brightness with a stiffish brush, such as shoes are polished with.

TO MAKE BLACKING—One pound of ivory black, two ounces of vitriol, one pound of treacle, two tablespoonfuls of sweet oil, two quarts of vinegar or stale ale. Have ready a large mug, put the ivory-black and oil into it, and mix them well together. Pour the vinegar and oil into a pan, and after making them hot, add them gently by degrees to the ivory black until you have mixed all well together. Let it stand till cold, and then add the vitriol. Bottle it for use. It will keep for years, and can be highly recommended when used for giving boots and shoes a lustrous jet appearance.

CORKS—The common practice of employing inferior corks for the purpose of stopping the mouths of bottles is often productive of considerable loss, from the air being only partially excluded, and the contents suffering in consequence. We once saw a large "bin" of valuable wine become, in less than a year, little better than sour Cape, from the parsimony of its owner on this point, and we have frequently had to regret the loss of valuable chemical preparations, from a similar cause. The best corks are those called "velvet corks," and of these the finest qualities are imported from France.

FOR CHAPPED HANDS—Two ounces of white wax, two ounces of hog's lard rendered, half an ounce of spermaceti, one ounce of oil of sweet almonds. Simmer all these ingredients together for a few minutes, then strain the liquid through muslin, and put it into pots. To be rubbed well over the hands when going to bed, and sleep with gloves on.

RED INK—Take of the raspings of Brazil wood one-quarter of a pound, and infuse them two or three days in vinegar, which should be colorless. Boil the infusion one hour over a gentle fire, and afterwards filter it while hot through paper laid in an earthenware colander. Put it again over the fire, and dissolve in it, first, half an ounce of gum Arabic, and afterwards of alum and white sugar, each half an ounce.

BLUE INK—Chinese blue, three ounces; oxalic acid (pure), three-quarters of an ounce; gum Arabic, powdered, one ounce; distilled water, six pints. Mix.

BLACK INK—Sulphate of iron, calcined, six ounces; powdered nutgalls, two ounces; powdered gum Arabic, two drachms. Mix a teaspoonful to a pint and a half of cold water.

TURKEY CARPET, TO CLEAN—Beat it well with a stick in the usual manner until all the dust is removed, then take out the stains, if any, with lemon or sorrel-juice. When thoroughly dry, rub it all over with the crumb of a hot wheaten loaf, and if the weather is very fine, let it hang out in the open air for a night or two. This treatment will revive the colors, and make the carpet appear equal to new.

EXTINCTION OF FIRES—The safety of the inhabitants being ascertained, the first object at a fire should be the exclusion of all fresh and the confinement of all burnt air—suffocate the flames—remember that burnt air is as great, if not a greater enemy to combustion than even water: the one, till again mixed with oxygen, can never support flame; the other, especially if poured on heated metal, is converted into its elements, the one hydrogen, in itself most inflammable, the other oxygen, the food of fire. For both purposes, of excluding the one air and confining the other, all openings should be kept as carefully closed as possible. An attempt should always be made to stop up the chimney-pots: wet rags, blankets, or an old carpet, will serve this purpose, and thereby confine a considerable quantity of burnt air.

VITRIOL ACCIDENTS are not uncommon in kitchens, as when oil of vitriol (improperly used for cleaning copper vessels) is left full upon the hands, etc. In this case, if a little soda or potash be dissolved in water, or some fresh soap-boilers' lye, and instantly applied, no injury whatever will occur to the person or clothes.

AS EASY method of removing wine stains from tablecloths is to hold the stained part in milk while it is boiling on the fire. The stains will soon disappear.

TOOTH POWDER—We know of no better than finely powdered charcoal; it cleans the mouth mechanically and chemically. But as alone it is dusty, and not easily mixed with water, it may for this purpose be mixed with an equal weight of prepared chalk, and, if requisite, scented with a drop or two of oil of cloves.

TO DESTROY ANTS—Ants that frequent houses or gardens may be destroyed by taking four of brimstone half a pound, and potash four ounces; set them in an iron or earthen pan over the fire till dissolved and united; afterwards beat them to a powder and infuse a little of this powder in water; and wherever you sprinkle it the ants will die or fly the place.

PORTABLE LEMONADE—Take of tartaric acid, half an ounce; loaf sugar, three ounces; essence of lemon, half a drachm. Powder the tartaric acid and the sugar very fine in a marble or Wedgwood mortar; mix them together, and pour the essence of lemon upon them, by a few drops at a time, stirring the mixture after each addition, till the whole is added; then mix them thoroughly, and divide it into twelve equal parts, wrapping each up separately in a piece of white paper. When wanted for use, it is only necessary to dissolve it in a tumbler of cold water, and fine lemonade will be obtained, containing the flavor of the juice and peel of the lemon, and ready sweetened.

CHEESE SNAPS—Take a new loaf, hot from the oven, pull it in halves, dig out pieces about the size of a walnut with a fork, put them on a dish, and set in a quick oven to brown lightly. Stale bread can be used, but does not answer so well. This forms a pretty supper dish, and can be eaten with wine.

A NEW YEAR AND NEW HOPES.

THE Present is only known to us by the Past. We must look the OLD YEAR in the face as he is dying before we can comprehend the great task imposed on the New Year in the burden he has to take up.

Turn to the FRONTISPICE, where, in an allegorical illustration, you will read these lessons.

At the top of the picture the palms of peace are rocking the Infant Year; there, too, is the emblem of promise, nursed by winged hopes and pious wishes.

On the right side is the decrepit Old Year, as a man on crutches, turning to gaze on his infant successor. Ah! the old year departs burdened with the sorrows of millions, and scoffed at by a thankless world. But let us remember that his path was beset with difficulties.

The New Year! Is there not a glorious opportunity before the New Year? "What will he do with it?"

Look on the left side of the picture; see the little group of happy helpers, symbolizing the hopes and prayers of those who love peace; see them carrying away the weapons of warfare and ensigns of military strife, so that the influences of love and good-will may have room to work; and glance at the bottom of the plate; there are the emblems of happy meetings, of concord, prosperity, and joy.

But the centre PORTRAIT is the magnet that will draw all true American hearts to feel that Union must be peace. Who can look on that august face, where passion is subjected to duty, and every line and expression show the patriot who loved his whole country, and not feel that "Peace greatness best becomes."

Heaven grant our New Year's dream may soon be realized! Then how dearly we shall enjoy the blessings of peace, with its bright anticipations, its leisure for mental improvement, and its wide range of benevolent interest that finds its best pleasures in the general happiness of society!

Dr. Franklin's old motto—"Take care of the minutes, and the hours will take care of themselves"—may be applied to a wider range of thought. Let every citizen take care of his or her own conscience, character, soul; keep these pure, right, and just, and the Commonwealth will take care of itself.

We always approach our readers on these anniversaries with feelings akin to warm personal friendship and confidence. So many years have been given, or at least a large part of our time and thoughts, to the questions—What good can we do, what advantages offer to our subscribers?—that the idea of contributing to their happiness has become a necessary part, as it were, of our life. We trust this feeling is reciprocated. We believe our readers will welcome this first number of our new volume with kindly desires for the happiness of the Editors, and accept with pleasure our sincere greetings and good wishes for the NEW YEAR, 1863.

A NEW YEAR'S GIFT. SEE PLATE.

"What though my heart be crowded close with objects dear nor few, Creep in, my little smiling babe; there's still a niche for you."

AH, yes; there is always room in the loving heart of womankind for the new baby! It is this instinct of the sex which these three dear little girls are obeying, as each lets fall her choice holiday presents to gaze with yearning tenderness on the sweetest gift of the New Year, their own baby brother. "Isn't he a darling?" they all exclaim.

When our first mother went out, weeping sorrowfully, from her Paradise Garden, she carried in her heart, like a holy gift of perpetual youth and hope to humanity, the blessed promise that her "seed" should restore the lost glories of Eden. But Eve did not find her first-born what she anticipated. Why was this cross of her hopes? Might it not have been caused by her over-indulgence of Cain's appetites and passions? Her unwise tenderness thus fostered her egotism and selfishness, till, when his brother Abel came and claimed a share in the mother's love, the jealousy and hatred of the elder born was aroused, and never afterwards slumbered.

Here is a subject demanding the inquiry of the educator. We do not recollect that any writer has analyzed the effect which might be wrought on the sensitive nature of a young child, two or three years of age, who has been the worshipped of the nursery, when a new baby comes to displace the first idol. It is a terrible trial to an affectionate and indulged little child.

Every young mother should watch carefully when her first-born is put away from her immediate tendency by the presence of a new claimant on her affections; she must see that the elder one is not made to feel forsaken, as the thoughtless words of servants, or visitors, even, would imply. She should never permit expressions of preference for the baby to be made in the hearing of the other, and all the changes which must be felt by the first autocrat of the nursery should be made up to him by new enjoyments and resources for self-amusement. More than this, great pains must be taken to cultivate the tender feelings of love and care for his little brother or sister.

Very much of the real happiness of children depends on giving them something to do for themselves or for each other in promoting the means of amusement and happiness. Encourage them to do this, and praise and caress them when they show a spirit of generosity and self-sacrifice towards each other. It is an unspeakable blessing to a family if the mother has rightly trained her first-born; the child, son or daughter, is the index of the mother's character in the household, and also of her capacity to mould the minds of her children. The example of this elder one, if right, leads all the others rightly, almost without the need of authority from the parents.

Look at the trio of sisters in the plate, as they bend over their little baby brother! Will they not be almost like guardian angels to his opening life?—tending his steps, watching his wishes, keeping him from harm, and helping him, so far as they can, to become what they will surely believe he may be if he tries—one of the best and noblest men in the land.

HOUSEHOLD WORK.

Women show their parts
When they do make their ordered households know their aims. KNOWLES.

Those who read our Table for December (we hope all our friends have that number) will recollect the "Letter from a Lady of Pennsylvania," concerning the changes which, coming over our country, must affect the condition and character of American women.

We now give the thoughts and suggestions of another dear friend, whose excellent ideas on "household work" will, we hope, make a deep impression on the hearts and minds of our readers.

LETTER FROM A LADY OF NEW ENGLAND.

MY DEAR MRS. HALE: The Lady's Book, which has always been foremost in every good word and work relating to women, seems to me a proper channel through which to express some of the sentiments, the expectations, the hopes, and the fears called out by this unhappy war, so far as women alone are concerned.

The good which has been elicited out of evil, certainly among New England women (with whom mostly I have been conversant) is one of those mysterious Providences which make us feel that we know nothing about the management of the world or of human beings. When I have seen young creatures whose fingers have been too dainty all their lives long to do a useful thing; who not only did not know how to do a useful thing, but really piqued themselves on this delightful ignorance; when I see such girls, heartily entering into the making of coarse shirts and drawers, and knitting coarse yarn for stockings; when I see them do this, not once, but all the spare hours, formerly given to idleness or to delicate fancy-work; when I see these girls, whose only delight seemed to be a ball or a concert, to dress and be admired, patiently and industriously working away, week after week, at common clothes and the making of comfortable garments for the sick and wounded; when I hear the talk of these girls, deeply interested in something apart from themselves, above themselves, relating to something altogether aside and above the petty interests of daily life, and involving the highest contemplations of the human mind; when I look at this and at those, I feel that there is good in all evil, and that the regeneration of so many young hearts almost pays the price of blood and suffering.

This war is to make widows and orphans, sisters without brothers to care for them, mothers with no sons to uphold their age and comfort their infirmity. The whole face of society will be changed. How, then, shall women prepare for such a change, for such a new order of things? From being cherished they must uphold themselves; the wind that formerly must not blow rudely on their tender cheeks, will strike blastically, with the tempestuous force of poverty and desertion. Whatever the political result may be of this war, the social and domestic results are inevitable. It is of no use to thrust them aside; better look them squarely in the face.

It seems to me there will gradually and imperceptibly open a way for these mothers, daughters, and sisters to maintain themselves, merely from the circumstance of their sex being in excess of the other, for a long future. Many of the occupations which have heretofore been monopolized by men, but which are suited much better to the strength and ability of women, will be open to women. Work of all sorts will be necessary and fashionable. If it is fashionable now to strew the drawing-rooms with blue shirts and brown stocking yarn; if the belle comes to receive her morning calls with her knitting in her hand, much more will it be fashionable to continue to labor when that labor shall be sanctified with deeper than patriotic motives, with higher and clearer impulses than a country's love.

It is well for our young girls to look forward to this state of things. Not despondently, not fearfully, but honestly, fearlessly, cheerfully. Better rathons and times that you "wear out" in the quick attrition of active exertion than to "rust out" in the inane idleness of a useless existence. If to be a cherished and petted wife be desired you, you can still be a helpful sister, a devoted daughter, or a cheerful, patient and soothing companion to a wounded or helpless husband.

We know—for even in the middle of the blind rush there was virtue enough in the country to say and feel it—we know that we have drifted, as a people, far out of sight of the principles of our fathers, on which our country was settled and this republic founded. We have been warned, over and over, that we were going down to ruin, though the corruptions of prosperity, as fast as we could possibly go. We heard the voice of prophecy and of denunciation; the "We upon this goodly land!" We heard, but we folded our hands, and said, "Après nous le déluge." But the deluge has come upon us, the guilty ones, and not on our innocent children; for them opens a brighter path through suffering. No more luxury or pampering, no more laziness and dissatisfaction; but, instead, cheerful labor, fortitude, and Christian dignity. For one, I rejoice in the prospect of new virtue in the body politic, beginning as it must and ought, with women. If they must give up, during their woe lives, the pleasing task of educating their persons, and even in some measure of adorning their minds, still they will have gained immeasurably in mental elevation, and their whole plane of action and thought be far higher.

There is a large class of single women who will be thrown out of employment by this war. There will be more teachers than schools; more instructors of music than pupils or punis; more ready to give drawing lessons than children to avail themselves of such blessings. This state of things will necessitate a broader and different kind of action for these women.

In the increased and tactitious refinement of manners and employment in the country, all the pleasantest part of domestic life has long been sacrificed, and an imitation of European style substituted. In the sparse condition of our native population, it has been necessary to employ emigrant labor for all domestic purposes. This has had a bad effect on both employer and employed. I could dwell on this at great length, and yet it cannot be necessary. You hear constantly pathetic lamentations over the "old nurses," the "old help" (when servants were not) that were so faithful, so friendly, so to be relied on at all times; and mournful chats over the faithless cook who left you that morning without warning, or the ungrateful waitress, who "won't stay under two dollars and a half."

There will be a better opening for labor for the large class of efficient and active young women in domestic service. Hitherto, they have declined to enter into competition with emigrants, and have chosen—partly with a laudable, and partly with a foolish pride—rather to confine themselves to needle work and teaching, than to enter the lists of active household labor with foreigners.

Everybody who is at all conversant with the real state of the country (I mean as distinct from the city) knows that there is already a glad opening and liberal remuneration for domestic service. For Americans, much more. There is friendly interest and attachment. I should be very glad, for one, to see the days of almost feudal distinction, which have obtained during the last thirty years among us, abolished; and the old times returned where to aid and serve in the family, was associated with no degradation, but, on the contrary, with pleasure on both sides.

Then there will not be so much starving in city attics, because women prefer to make shirts for fourpence a piece to washing dishes and cooking dinners for two dollars a week. They will feel a proper self-respect and self-appreciation which will not be lowered by sweeping the house, or speaking properly to their employers. A new state of feeling and interest will spring up among all. We shall all be grateful for aid, and glad in our turn to aid others. Heretofore we have been hard. There has been no possible room for kindly feeling or interest beyond the day, for domestic service, which was liable to cease at any hour, when increased wages called, and where interest was the sole propelling motive. We acknowledged that it could not be helped; that it could not be expected; that it should be otherwise. Still, we mourned over the good old days when everything was so different!

I apprehend that in the immediate future of our country, there will be a closer weaving of all classes, through the intense and common interest in the general good. There will be in me upholding and assisting of those who need it. A novel spirit of character, born within is better than any amount of encouragement from without; and persons who cannot be or would not be benefited by public aid are inexpressibly consoled and fortified by private sympathy and encouragement. They begin to feel themselves strong and able to cope with life; nay, more, to feel that labor is itself a dignity and a blessing; and that to adapt themselves to the kind of labor most healthful for them, is the truest dignity as well as common sense.

MEMORIAL

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:—

WHEREAS, there are now more than two millions of children in our country destitute of the opportunity of education, demanding sixty thousand teachers to supply them at the same ratio as is common in our best educated sections, your memorialists beg to call your attention to these considerations:—

1. That while the Great West, California, and the wide Ocean, invite young men to wealth and adventure, and while the labors of the school-room offer so little recompense or honor, the sixty thousand teachers needed cannot be obtained from their ranks, and therefore the young women of our country must become teachers of the common schools, or these must be given up.

2. That the reports of common school education show that women are the best teachers, and that in those States where education is most prosperous, the average of female teachers to that of the other sex is as five to one.

3. That while, as a general rule, women are not expected to support families, nor to pay from their earnings to support the State, they can afford to teach for a smaller compensation than men, and therefore funds bestowed to educate female teachers gratuitously will, in the end, prove a measure of economy, and at the same time will tend to render education more universal and more elevated by securing the best class of teachers at a moderate expense.

4. That those most willing to teach are chiefly found in the industrial class, which, as yet, has received few favors from National or State Legislatures.

5. That providing such gratuitous advantages for women to act as educators, will secure a vast number of well educated teachers, not by instituting a class of colleges, but by employing the unoccupied energies of thousands of young women from their school-days to the period of marriage; while, at the same time, they will thus be qualifying themselves for the most arduous duties of their future domestic relations.

In view of these considerations, your memorialists petition that THREE OR FOUR MILLIONS OF ACRES OF THE PUBLIC NATIONAL DOMAINS be set apart to endow at least one Normal School in every State, for the gratuitous education of Female Teachers.

These institutions could be modelled and managed in each State to suit the wishes of its inhabitants, and young ladies of every section would be trained as instructors for children in their own vicinity. This would be found of immense advantage in the States where schools have hitherto been neglected.

While such vast portions of the national domains are devoted to national aggrandizements, or physical advantages, we humbly petition that a moderate share may be conferred to benefit the Daughters of our Republic, and thus at the same time to provide Educators for two millions of its most neglected children.

BOOKS FOR BIRTHDAYS, HOLIDAYS, AND HOME READING.—The list of expensive books, prepared expressly for the holiday season, has greatly diminished, much to the advantage of better literature, and also as preventing useless expense. This year new books of all descriptions are few, compared with our "halcyon days of peace." Still, there must be gifts for Christmas and New Year, and those who wish to find a worthy literary souvenir for a Christian lady (old or young), which shall have an impressive interest for the present and be a rich addition to the family library, let them select the five volumes of Dr. Cummings' works, lately republished in New York.*

THE GREAT TRIBULATION: or, Things Coming on the Earth. 2 Vols.

THE GREAT PREPARATION: or, Redemption Draweth Nigh. In 2 Vols.

TEACH US TO PRAY. 1 Vol.

These books are wonderful productions, and breathe the true spirit of Faith, Hope, and Charity. The style is perfect of its kind, clear, cogent, impressive, and yet simple and tenderly careful of offences. The subjects discussed are the highest, noblest, and of most awful import to the whole human race. Upward flights which the greatest poet would not dare attempt are here opened to our view; grand and awful scenes that no human genius could conceive or delineate are here shown, through the veil of prophesy, to be surely approaching. Every true Christian, who believes what the Great Redeemer (They shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory.—MATT. XXIV. 30) declared to his followers should happen ought to read these books.

MY SHIP.

In the purple flush of the twilight dim,
Way out on the ocean's most distant rim,
I watch for my ship in her gallant trim.

Pray tell me, good friends, have you seen my ship,
Her satin sails in the blue ocean dip?
I say sometimes with a quivering lip.

"What's the captain's name?" they ask, with a smile,
And I know they're wondering all the while
At my sad question, so quaint in its style.

My ship's the most royal you e'er did behold,
And Strength was the name of the captain bold,
And Health was the freight, of value untold.

Some years ago, on a drear stormy day,
She spread her bright sails and flew far away;
Oh watch for her coming, good sailor, I pray.

Toward the lake of the Sunrise she turned her bow,
And the blue waves surged round her shining prow,
'Tis graved on my brain, I see it now.

So e'er that dark ocean I still keep my eye,
I'll watch for my ship till the day that I die;
I've faith she will come though I do not know why.

Then watch for her coming, good sailor, I pray,
Be sure that you tell me the very same day,
And whether she's anchored in river or bay.

ESTELLE.

WOMAN'S UNION MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF AMERICA, FOR FOREIGN LANDS.—We have had encouraging Reports from Mrs. Mason since her return to her School for Karen girls. All her labors in regard to the Karens are prospering. Our missionary, Miss Sarah A. Mauston, who went out, October, 1861, to found a School for Burman girls at Tounghoo, has been successful: her school is established: also five native women are also employed as teachers of children at different mission stations in the East. These teachers, except Mrs. Mason, are paid by our "Woman's Union," etc. It is encouraging to record that the collections have been successful. The ladies of New York and Boston are ready with their funds, those of Philadelphia will not be found wanting. But the hopes we cherished of assistance from ladies in the Western States have not yet been fulfilled. We still hope that contributions of "Fancy articles and of Children's clothing," which can be sold by ladies at our missionary stations to much advantage, will be forwarded. Boxes or packages may be sent to the Editress of the Lady's Book.

MISS S. J. HALE'S BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES, 1826 Rittenhouse Square, Philadelphia, Penna.

This school has now entered on its seventh year; its success and present prosperity are very satisfactory to its friends.

The design of the Principal is to give a thorough and liberal English education, to furnish the best facilities for acquiring the French language, and the best instruction in music and the other accomplishments. The Assistants employed are of the best class and highest merit. French is taught by an experienced instructress, a lady lately from France who resides in the family; and thus the pupils have ample opportunities of acquiring the accomplishment of speaking the language.

Particular and continued attention is paid to the moral training, and also to the health and physical development of the young ladies.

Circulars will be sent wherever required.

TO OUR CORRESPONDENTS.—We have accepted these articles: "Both Sides"—"Faithful to the end"—"Disenchanted"—"John Broad"—"At Sea at Night"—"Is Genius desirable?"—"Homes and Husbands"—"Peace, be Still"—"Aunt Rachel"—and "Reminiscences."

These articles are declined: "Unreal"—"A Wish"—"My School" (a stamp must be sent when an answer is requested)—"Music of the Heart"—"Jane Archer"—"The Golden Gate"—"Agnes Day" (worth publishing, but we have no room)—"The Zephyr"—"Sunrise"—"My Wife" (has some beautiful imagery and the sentiment is tender and holy, but the rhythm is defective)—"Fortune-tellers and their Victims"—"The Way of Life"—"Edgetools"—"My Playmates"—"Energy is the great lever of success"—"Stories"—"Beggars in the Street"—and "Come to me" and the other poem.

We hoped to have reported on all the MSS. in our hands; but are compelled for want of time to postpone a number till next month.

And now we take pleasure in expressing our thanks to the many warm friends who have contributed to our pages during the past year. The letters which pour in their tributes of encouragement are most welcome now, when many circumstances are adverse to literary success. We are glad to find that our magazine does not lose its interest, even when it is old, as our friends often assure us that the Lady's Book, in bound volumes, is treasured in their family libraries. A charming letter from Mrs. T. K. says: "Often when unfurnished with books to my taste I turn to your magazines, published years ago, and always find some new beauties." The lady goes on to thank us for herself and also in the name of the ladies of her own State, "for the instruction and entertainment afforded them by the Lady's Book;" wishing us "all prosperity and happiness in the future."

Such friends, we feel sure, are with us to-day; we wish them all a Happy New Year.

We don't return poetry even if stamps are sent; can't afford the time. Those who send poetry must keep a copy. Consult this department and you will see whether it is accepted or rejected.

"Mary Mayfield." A letter sent to your address, Saratoga Springs, N. Y.

Health Department.

BY JNO. STAINBACK WILSON, M. D.

BEDS, COVERING, ETC. OF INFANTS.—Children, if allowed to sleep alone, should have bedding sufficiently soft to prevent injurious and disagreeable pressure, and the covering should be sufficient to protect from cold. But at the same time, excessive covering and over-heating should be carefully guarded against. Indeed, as things are generally managed, there is much more danger of over-heating than of cold.

"It is too much the custom," as Dr. Condie truly remarks, "to lay an infant when asleep—with its body warmly clad—in a feather bed, and to cover it carefully with a thick blanket or two. The consequence is, that in mild weather, or in a warm room, a copious perspiration is quickly produced, which, besides weakening the child, exposes it to catarrhal or even more dangerous affections, when, upon its awaking, it is exposed to the air of the room, or perchance to the draft from an open door or window." There can be no doubt that many of the colds, croup, and bowel affections of children are produced in the manner indicated by our writer. To avoid these evils, children should sleep on a good thick hair or cotton mattress, and the covering should be just heavy enough to prevent chilliness. Of the two extremes there is more danger from too much heat than from cold.

Feather beds should be entirely and forever banished from the nursery. They retain too much heat; they interfere with the electric currents of the body; they are a reservoir of offensive and contagious matters; and they are well calculated to occasion deformity in young children by their softness and compressibility. Pillows of feathers are particularly objectionable. "Occasionally it happens, that when a young infant is placed in a soft feather bed with a thick soft pillow, its own weight causes it to slip, so that its head is brought entirely beneath the external coverings, and, in common with its body, becomes so completely buried in the feathers as to endanger suffocation." Another great objection to soft feather pillows is that they keep the head excessively warm, thus exposing the child to colds, eruptions on the scalp and behind the ears, and even to inflammation of the brain, an affection to which young children are peculiarly prone.

To guard against these serious dangers, pillows should be made, like the beds, of hair or cotton, and they should be flat, so as to raise the head but slightly above the level of the body, thus avoiding the difficulty of slipping down, and the deformity of round shoulders. The faces of children should never be covered when asleep or awake, and every impediment to the free circulation of air should be removed.

INFANTS SHOULD SLEEP WITH MOTHER, ETC.—For the first month or two of their existence, infants should sleep with the mother. At this tender age they cannot generate sufficient heat of themselves without such a quantity of covering as to prove injurious by its weight. But after the first few months, the child should be placed in a cradle or cot by itself. The practice of leaving children to sleep with old and infirm persons is attended with the most serious difficulties. It is a well-established fact that old and diseased persons of feeble vital powers will abstract from the vitality of younger and more healthy persons when brought in contact with, or close proximity to them. This must certainly predispose strongly to disease; while children thus exposed are liable to contract actual disease from imbibing the foul secretions, and breathing the impure air arising from diseased persons. On the same principle, the kissing and fondling of children by diseased people, strangers, and servants should be avoided.

Literary Notices.

BOOKS BY MAIL.—Now that the postage on printed matter is so low, we offer our services to procure for our subscribers or others any of the books that we notice. Information touching books will be cheerfully given by inclosing a stamp to pay return postage.

When ordering a book, please mention the name of the publisher.

From PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—
ANDREE DE TAVERNEY; or, The Downfall of French Monarchy. In two volumes. Being the final conclusion of the "Countess of Charny," "The Memoirs of a Physician," "Queen's Necklace," and "Six Years Later." By Alexander Dumas, author of the "Iron Mask," etc. etc. Written in its author's best vein, this is undoubtedly the most exciting and absorbing novel of the series to which it belongs, and of which it is the conclusion. Price 50 cents per volume.

From J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—
THE PHANTOM BOUQUET. A Popular Treatise on the Art of Skeletonizing Leaves and Seed-vessels, and Adapting them to Embellish the Home of Taste. By Edward Parrish, Member of the Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia, etc. etc. The author has kindly furnished to the lovers of artistic recreation this little volume, giving as complete information concerning the process of skeletonizing leaves and seed-vessels as can be conveyed by words. We have no doubt many of our young friends who would gladly devote a portion of their leisure time to an employment so pleasing, will avail themselves of this assistance in preparing and grouping the delicate, lace-like bouquets which are at once so beautiful and so easily obtained. Price 75 cents.

THE BOOK OF DAYS Nos. 7, 8, and 9. We have received the above numbers of this valuable work. We are certain that every one who could secure a single number of this work would subscribe for it at once. Price 15 cents per part.

CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA. Nos. 53 and 54, with engravings. This Encyclopædia, when finished, will be a most valuable library work. The minds of the most eminent men in Europe are engaged upon it, and it is in its detail very full and satisfactory. Each number is a study in itself; we would want no better work to employ our spare hours upon. The quantity of information to be derived from its perusal is incalculable. It is an invaluable work. Price 15 cents per part.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

ORLEY FARM: A Novel. By Anthony Trollope, author of "North America," "Framley Parsonage," "The Bertrams," etc. etc. Trollope has excelled himself in the present work. It is by far the best of his productions that we have yet read. It is especially a character novel, and each figure is boldly and strikingly personified. Some portions of the book, on this account, remind us of Dickens. Lady Mason, the heroine, is a woman that challenges admiration at the same time that she repulses. Sir Peregrine Orme is one of the noblest specimens of the English gentry. Mrs. Orme is so gentle, so forgiving, so truly womanly and Christian-like, and carries all these qualities to such a degree, that we cannot help wondering at the boldness of the author for flying in the face of generally received sentiment, in thus daring to describe her. We cannot think of undertaking a description of the plot, but we cordially commend the book to our readers. It is finely illustrated by J. E. Millais. Price $1 25.

A MANUAL OF INFORMATION AND SUGGESTIONS FOR OBJECT LESSONS, in a Course of Elementary Instruction. Adapted to the Use of the School and Family Charts, and other aids in Teaching. By Marcus Willson, author of "Willson's Historical Series," "School and Family Readers," etc. etc. We have given this work a careful consideration, both as to the theory upon which it is based, and the matter it contains. Though it is daring enough to propose a thorough reform in our present system of education, we are yet sufficiently convinced of the necessity of such a reform, to be willing to sustain it in all it proposes. Its plan is to depend less on the use of the memory of the pupil alone, and to develop and strengthen his perceptive faculties. We believe this book will prove an invaluable aid to the teacher who comprehends its purpose, and is ready to adopt its suggestions; though no good teacher will rely upon it altogether, but will see the advantage of carrying out the principle to an unlimited extent, drawing upon his own resources, in every branch of science. Price $1 00.

A SYSTEM OF LOGIC, Comprising a Discussion of the various Means of Acquiring and Retaining Knowledge, and Avoiding Error. By P. McGregor, A. M. The system of logic here presented is remarkable for clearness, precision, and compact fulness. We cannot call to mind any similar work so well calculated to meet the wants of students. Without any effort at simplicity of language or style, its author has succeeded in making his book one that can be understood by those who are expected to apply to it for assistance. As a general thing, our "systems of logic," hitherto, have not possessed this desideratum to a noticeable extent. Price $1 00

MEMOIRS OF THE REV. NICHOLAS MURRAY, D. D. (KIRWAN). By Samuel Irenæus Prime, author of "Travels in Europe and the East," "Letters from Switzerland," etc. etc. The biography of a clergyman, who, at one time, enjoyed quite an extensive reputation in the religious world. It is written in a familiar and easy style, and the materials furnished its author have been sufficiently well arranged. The work has evidently been a labor of love, and the friendly spirit thus evoked gives to the book a gentle charm that it might not otherwise have possessed. Price $1 00.

THE LIFE OF EDWARD IRVING, Minister of the National Scotch Church, London. Illustrated by his Journals and Correspondence. By Mrs. Oliphant. The lives of clergymen, generally speaking, present few incidents calculated to render the record of them universally attractive. The life of the subject of this biography could not rightly be called an exception to the general rule. Nevertheless Mrs. Oliphant has invested the history of the comparatively uneventful career of the pious and eloquent Irving with attractions which will go far to procure for it a wider circle of readers than usually falls to the lot of works similar in character. We know of no more striking picture of an earnest, faithful, indomitable, hard-working minister than this interesting volume affords. Price $3 00.

From SHELDON & Co., New York, through SMITH, ENGLISH, & Co., Philadelphia:—

MIRIAM. By Marion Harland. Marion Harland is one of the few American authoresses whose names and fames have had something more than an ephemeral existence. The public acknowledged her genius when, a few years ago, "Alone," was issued from the press. Other authors have made as brilliant commencements, but have neglected to follow them up altogether, or their second efforts have been such signal failures, that their names were quickly buried in obscurity. But not so the gifted lady of which we speak. We have now her fifth work before us, though we trust it is far from being the climax of her literary labors. "Miriam" is a truly womanly book, but bearing throughout its pages the evidence of the pen of a high-souled, intelligent, and Christian woman. The character of Miriam is a noble conception, and ably illustrated. She is altogether different from the namby-pamby class of girls which novelists too frequently consider as being especially qualified for heroines. Miriam is characterized by energy, strength of purpose, dignity, and rare intellectual gifts, combined with qualities which are considered as being more especially feminine. And, most wonderful, most commendable, she is no beauty. What Miriam is as a woman, such is Neale Thorne, the hero, as a man. A lively variety to the theme is the little chatter-box, Mrs. Fry, with her many good intentions, and her frequent journeys to the "valley of humiliation." The story is ingeniously arranged; and though everything is not just as you might wish it—for instance, you wish Mrs. Hartley might open her eyes to the true character of her graceless son—still the reading of the book affords one intense pleasure. The prestige of Marion Harland's name is a sufficient guarantee for its merits, while we believe this work will be pronounced better than her previous ones. Price $1 25.

SERMONS. Preached and Revised by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon. Seventh series. The admirers of the Rev. Mr. Spurgeon will find in this volume twenty-two sermons, exhibiting, in a marked manner, all the peculiarities of style and thought which have rendered their author so popular. Price $1 00.

AMERICAN HISTORY. By Jacob Abbott. Illustrated with numerous Maps and Engravings. Vol. IV. Northern Colonies. The series of little histories to which this volume belongs, promises to be most useful and instructive, as well as entertaining. It presents to the youth of our time a source of information of which they should not hesitate to make a good use. The contents of the present volume comprise a full account of the early settlement of New York and the New England colonies. We should be better pleased with these histories, had not Mr. Abbott, evidently acting upon some peculiar notion of his own about the dryness of such things, almost entirely discarded the use of dates. Price 75 cents.

From TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

EYES AND EARS. By Henry Ward Beecher. This book is a collection of short sketches, essays, etc., originally written for newspaper publication. They are lively, amusing, and sentimental by turns, and not unworthy of a reading; though we almost wonder at their being thought of sufficient importance, by either author or publisher, of being preserved in book form. Articles written thus on demand, from week to week, should be read at once, as soon as prepared, or else, however brilliant and sparkling they may have been, like soda-water, they are apt to become insipid when the effervescence has passed off. Price $1 25.

THE POEMS OF OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES. A choice little volume in blue and gold, containing the complete poetical works of this famous American humorist. Let those who wish to laugh, as well as those who wish to make a valuable addition to their poetical library, be grateful to Messrs. Ticknor & Fields for the means of gratification afforded them. Price 58 cents.

From T. O. H. P. BURNHAM, Boston, through J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

THE VICTORIES OF LOVE. By Coventry Patmore, author of "The Angel in the House," etc. The admirers of the author of that exquisite little domestic poem, "The Angel in the House," will find many of the characteristics in the present volume which gave to that work its chief attraction. Coventry Patmore, however, does not seem to us an improving poet. His first work is, to our mind, his best. In "The Victories of Love," he has adopted a style of rhyming that is entirely too easy for the purposes of poetry. If the various epistles which form this present volume had been given to us without rhyme, and with no attempt at metre, they would certainly have sounded better, and, in all probability, would have pleased a larger number of readers than they will in their present shape. Price 50 cents.

From J. E. TILTON & Co., Boston:—

THE ALDEN BOOKS. Illustrated. By Joseph Alden, D. D., comprising—

THE CARDINAL FLOWER; and other Tales.

THE LIGHT-HEARTED GIRL; a Tale for Children.

THE LOST LAMB; and THE BURIAL OF THE FIRST BORN.

The Reverend author has done faithful service in the cause of family happiness by devoting his thoughts and time to the preparation of this series of books for the young. The stories are very interesting, full of wise sentiment and cheerful hope; they are entertaining as Fairy Tales, yet instructive even to mature Christians. The style is simple and natural, and the words so fitly chosen that while the youngest reader can comprehend the meaning, the scholar's taste will feel the books are from the pen of a good and learned man. The publishers have made up the set in beautiful style.

REWARD CARDS, from the same publishers, are pretty and useful in Family instruction and Sunday Schools.

From CARTER & BROTHERS, New York:—

VESPER. By Madame the Countess de Gasparin. Our readers will remember the notice of a former work by this fascinating writer—"The Near and the Heavenly Horizons"—in our Table of last February. This new book, "Vesper," has the same tender sentiment of love for God's works and trust in his mercy, which made the first work so charming. Madame de Gasparin paints in words, and this charming little book will find, as her other one did, thousands of readers. It deserves them.

NED MANTON; or, The Cottage by the Stream. By A. L. O. E. We need not waste words in commending a book for children which has the initials of this popular writer. We think her books among the best which are found in our Sunday Schools, and for Sunday reading.

LITTLE WALTER OF WYALUSING. By a Guest in "the old castle." This is an American book, the story of a little boy, whose short life of less than seven years has formed a very interesting sketch. The touching trait is the tender love which the character of this child awakened in the hearts of all who knew him.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

GODEY FOR JANUARY.—The first number of the sixty-sixth volume—a holiday number. We give a list of the prominent embellishments: "A New Year's Gift," which is an engraving we think will be understood and appreciated. A further notice of it will be found elsewhere. "New Year," an emblematical plate of the past and present season. If this picture were not otherwise beautiful, it would be valuable to every family for the very admirable likeness of Washington, taken from Stuart's celebrated painting. Our Fashion-plate contains five beautiful figures; these plates praise themselves. The "Daisy travelling or winter hood," is the best piece of color printing we have ever given. We publish in this number the "Old Sewing-Machine." In the February number we shall give the "New Sewing-Machine." In addition to the above will be found dresses, hoods, crochet-work, braiding and embroidery patterns, fancy ties, braided slipper, headdresses, toilet pin-cushions, cloaks, an alphabet of letters, pocket for lady's dress, pin-cushion, and about fifty other articles, designed expressly for the ladies' work-table. This is a specimen of what we mean to do this year. With thanks for former favors we wish all our old friends a Happy New Year.

THE PRICE OF CLUBS.—Owing to the increased price of paper, unprecedented in this country, we shall be obliged to advance the price of clubs, commencing with the issuing of the February number, as follows: One copy, $3. Two copies, $5. Three copies, $6. Five copies, $10. Eleven copies, $20; no extra copy given. Even at this price there will be no profit on clubs. We can give our readers no idea of the panic in paper. One month it will be one price, the next month twenty per cent. will be added to the price, and the next twenty more; and what will be the eventual price it is at present impossible to say. Canada clubs of five subscribers only, and no extra copy, $11 25, which includes the postage.

Our price to dealers will also be increased.

THE PRICE OF NEWSPAPERS.—The Rockport Republic has the following in reference to the increase of the price of newspapers:—

"Most of the large daily newspapers in Western New York have advanced the price of the issues. An editor of a leading New York daily informed us last week that the publishers in that city would soon follow suit. Many of the country journals have also been published at increased prices. The advance is caused mainly by the advance in printing stock."

We ask attention to our advertisement for 1863, published in this number. It is but a faint outline of what we will do, but will give some general idea of what the Lady's Book will be. In fact, it is hardly necessary for us to publish any advertisement. Our subscribers and the public know that we will publish the best lady's book in the world; and they have known us so long that they are willing to trust us, even without any promises on our part. We are thankful, very thankful for the patronage we have received for the last thirty-three years; and we can only add that, having found that fulfilling every promise made has been the best policy, that plan we shall still continue to pursue.

MARION HARLAND.—We call attention to the first portion of the story of "Husks" in this number. We think that our subscribers will say, when they have finished the story, that it is her best.

FROM present appearances this will be our largest subscription year. We wish that the price of paper would allow it to be a more profitable one.

NOTICE TO THOSE WHO SEND US DRAFTS OR CHECKS.—Be particular, when you purchase a draft or check to send us, that the same has the proper stamp affixed to it by the person from whom you procure it.

Extracts from the Law.

"Stamps must be affixed to all documents by the party issuing the same."

"The person using or affixing a stamp must write thereupon the initials of his name, and the date when used."

"The penalty for making, signing, or issuing any instrument, document, or paper of any kind without the same having thereon a stamp to denote the duty is $30, and such a paper will be invalid and of no effect."

Any check on a bank, or sight draft, over $20 requires a two cent stamp; $20 and under no stamp is required.

CLUB RATES.—Godey's Lady's Book and Harper's Magazine, one year, $4 50. Godey's Lady's Book and Arthur's Magazine, one year, $3 50. All three of these magazines, one year, $6. Godey and Madame Demorest's Quarterly Book of Fashions and Patterns, one year, $3.

LITERARY ASSOCIATIONS.—We now commence in time to warn our subscribers against sending their money to any association purporting to furnish the Lady's Book as part of the inducement to subscribe, and promising them great prizes in some future drawing of a lottery. We will not be responsible in any way. We will also add that we have no agents for whose acts we are responsible. We only send the Lady's Book when the money is sent direct to us.

A GENTLEMAN in England once died suddenly while he was writing a letter to his brother. When his executor found the letter among his papers, he finished and signed it as follows: "While I was writing this, I fell dead. Your affectionate brother, ———"

OUR MUSICAL COLUMN.

At this writing the city is being Gottschalked, and concerts and soirees rule the day. Opera is looming up, however, and the year will not go out without permitting us a taste. But, while waiting for the legitimate, who shall forbid us enjoying the burlesque, as it is found at the Eleventh Street Opera House? Everything is well managed there. Even Dambolton's famous troupe, which used to set the London ditt-crazy, were nothing compared with Carnecross & Dixey's. Carnecross is a sweet singer; and Dixey—we heard a lady say there is but one Dixey. And then the Burlesque Monster Concert, got up in the style of Jullien's! If there could be a better mimic of Jullien in all his remarkable exaggerations as an impresario than Frank Moran—we beg his pardon, Signor Morano—we should like to see him. Caricatured or not, there is good music down Eleventh Street. Their overtures and choruses would shame some orchestras and singers we have heard at the Academy.

The Operatic World.—For the purpose of familiarizing young piano players with the best music from operas, Firth, Pond, & Co., of New York, are now issuing a fine publication with the above title. Each number is complete, and contains two or three gems from some opera. Those we have seen are La Favorita, L'Elisir d'Amore, Auna Bolena, Satanella, Luisa Miller, and Nabucodonosor. Price of each 25 cents, on receipt of which we will purchase and mail to any address.

New Songs and Ballads.—H. Tolman & Co., Boston, have just published a pretty song, Minnie Ray; a beautiful ballad, Can I Go, Dearest Mother? by Covert; Angels, my Darling, will Rock thee to Sleep, sung by the Barker family; The Angels' Call, song by Oechner; and Ferdinand Mayer's arrangement of We are Coming, Father Abram, or Three Hundred Thousand More, adapted as a song or quartette. Price of each 25 cents.

The new songs from Firth, Pond, & Co.'s press are Mother, Oh Sing me to Rest, in the style of Rock me to Sleep, 25 cents. I'll be Home To-Morrow, new ballad by S. C. Foster, 25. Come in and Shut the Door, and The Last Broadside, two beautiful songs by Fred Buckley, of Buckley's Opera Troupe, each 25. Oh Let me Shed one Silent Tear, author of Cottage by the Sea, 35. Comrades, Touch the Elbow, same author, 25. There's a Beauty in the Summer Flower, an exquisite quartette by Laurence, 10 pages, 50 cents.

New Pieces, &c.—The same publishers issue splendid variations on the army air, Marching Along, by Grobe, 10 pages, 50 cents. Himmel's Battle Prayer, transcribed by Julius E. Muller, 35; and a charming bagatelle by G. Wm. Warren, Harry's Music Box, 25 cents.

The popular air, Adams and Liberty, as played by the military bands, is published by H. Tolman & Co., who also issue at the same price (35 cents) a fine transcription by Baumbach of Louis' exquisite nocturne, Departed Days; at 25 cents, Porini's Hilton Head Waltz; at 40 Magdalena, new fantasia, by the author of The Maiden's Prayer; and at 50 cents a splendid new set of waltzes by Strauss, entitled Gedankenflug (stray thoughts), 11 pages.

New Music by the Editor.—We have just published new editions of our own songs, Beautiful Valley (third edition in a few weeks); Poor Ben the Piper (seventh edition); O Lady, Touch those Chords Again; The Minstrel's Grave; and The Passing Bell, or Home Returning from the Wars. Price 25 cents each, or we will send the five to any address for $1 00.

The Musical Editor will continue to purchase and mail any music ordered, or will cheerfully give any information requested concerning music. In these Christmas and New Year holiday times especially our friends making presents should draw largely from the above list, or the lists in past numbers of the Book, as a fine assortment of music makes one of the most acceptable of presents. Address, at Philadelphia,

J. STARR HOLLOWAY.

SEND ME A SPECIMEN NUMBER.—We never hesitate to send a specimen when we think that it is honestly asked for; but here is another attempt at imposition. A man writes to us from a town in Ohio, for specimens of Lady's Book, Arthur, and Harper. He also wrote to Mr. Arthur for specimens of Arthur's Magazine and Lady's Book. Thus far we know. No doubt he has also written to the Messrs. Harper, and the Atlantic and Knickerbocker for specimens, and probably to every other magazine in the country. If any publisher wants his name, we will send it to him.

A NICE SITUATION FOR A LITTLE BOY—in the parquet of a theatre, behind a lady with a very fashionable bonnet on of the present style.

THE FOSTER HOME.—This institution, situated at the corner of Twentieth and Hamilton Streets, has accomplished a large amount of good under the care of the benevolent ladies who have it in charge. It provides for the wants of many children who would otherwise be left to suffer. Among others, the children of fathers who are doing duty as soldiers, who otherwise would be left to suffer, and probably become outcasts. It cares for the children in such a way as to make them useful members of society. Would any lady visit the establishment, she would become at once convinced of its utility; she would see how happy the children are, how well they are cared for. The war has necessarily increased the demand for its beneficent agencies, and it is now considerably straitened for funds. With a largely increased family, and the winter season approaching, its means are nearly exhausted, and in this state of things an appeal is made to the benevolent to come to its succor. The ladies who manage the "Home" do not feel that they can apply personally to the public, and they trust that this appeal will be successful, and that the power and usefulness of the "Home" may be strengthened by liberal donations. Persons wishing to contribute may leave the funds at the office of the Lady's Book, 323 Chestnut Street, or with Mrs. GODEY, No. 1517 Chestnut Street.

LITERARY NEWS.—Our readers will be pleased to hear that we have made arrangements with Marion Harland, the well-known author of "Alone," "Hidden Path," "Moss Side," "Nemesis," and "Miriam," for a series of stories. Every number for 1863 will contain a story from her pen. This is a compliment to the Book, as she writes for no other magazine. The stories will be copyrighted, so that they may not be found anywhere but in the pages of the Lady's Book.

POSTAGE ON THE LADY'S BOOK.—Postage for three months, if paid in advance at the office where it is received, four and a half cents.

MAKE UP YOUR CLUBS.—Remember that the Lady's Book is the best work for ladies published in this country. We have more than one thousand private letters testifying to this fact, and the press throughout the country is unanimous in saying that the Lady's Book is the best magazine of its kind in this or any other country. The difference in the club price of the Lady's Book and that of other magazines is only a few cents, and for these few cents you get nearly one-third more reading and engravings, besides other more expensive embellishments that a low-priced magazine cannot afford to give. Clubs must be for the Lady's Book alone, with one exception, and that is "Arthur's Home Magazine." One or more of that work can be introduced in a club in place of the Lady's Book, if desired.

Any person, with a very little trouble, can get up a club for the Book; we have frequently been so informed by ladies—the work is so popular. It is but to call and get a subscription. Clubs are always in time, as we are able to supply numbers from the beginning of the year; yet we like them sent in soon, to know how many we shall print. Remember, that a work with 150,000 subscribers can give five times as much as a work with only half that number, and the embellishments can also be made of a very superior character.

Our terms are made plain and explicit, so that they may be easily understood. We are often asked to throw in an extra copy. In no instance can this be done, as our terms are so low to clubs that it cannot be afforded. A shop-keeper would look amazed, if a purchaser should ask him to throw in an extra yard because she had purchased twelve. And yet we are asked to add an extra copy because twelve have been ordered. It cannot be done.

SANFORD has opened a very pretty place of amusement under Concert Hall, Chestnut Street. The performances are very good, but we have one piece of advice, both to Sanford and Carnecross & Dixey—give us more negro melodies; we don't want to hear a stalwart looking negro singing love songs. Bad enough to hear a white man giving utterance to such songs as "Love me, dearest," "I'll love thee ever," "Fondly I'll love thee." We go to hear negro minstrelsy, and don't want white folks' songs. As the old negro said when reproached for throwing in the water a fine black fish he had caught, "When I fishes for cattiee, I fish for cattiee."

NOTES of all solvent banks received in payment; but when the amount is $10 and over, drafts had better be sent. A sight draft of $20, and under that amount, requires no excise stamp.

NEW TABLE ORNAMENTS.—Ladies are introducing a new and beautiful ornament for the parlor mantel or centre-table. They take large pine burs, sprinkle grass seeds of any kind in them, and place them in pots of water. When the burs are soaked a few days they close up in the form of solid cones, then the little spears of green grass begin to emerge from amongst the laminae, forming an ornament of rare and simple beauty.

An advertisement to this effect appeared in one of the papers: "A citizen wishes to find the sum of $50,000. If any one will tell him where to find it, he will give him half of the money."

OUR very able musical editor, Mr. Holloway, opens the year with a piece of music of his own composition.

CLUB of $10.

Your magazine is a welcome monthly visitor, without it I don't know how I could procure the Fashions in time. Most of the other monthlies are, I find, behind you in the Fashions. M. M., New York.

DEAR SIR: I have had your Lady's Book for two years, and would not, on any account, be without it, and so I have been telling my friends; and have succeeded in getting up a club. Please accept my warmest thanks for your useful and elegant Book. Miss R., Mass.

Club of $10.

Accept many thanks for the pleasure you have given us during the year. Though we feel the depressing influence of the times, we cannot yet feel that we can give up the Book which always comes with so pleasant and cheerful a greeting. Mrs. R., Ohio.

I enclose $10 for the Lady's Book. It is a welcome visitor to me, for it has gladdened my household for four years, and it has improved every year. I hope it will still continue to be the best magazine published. Mrs. H., Conn.

A BIT OF GERMAN ROMANCING.—In a book published at Berlin, under the title of "Schultze and Müller in London," is the following passage: "At a quarter to six we went to the great Post Office. As to-morrow is Sunday it was to-day an extraordinary crowd, and especially the squeeze was tremendous round the newspaper-box, when as the Englishman says, the newspapers are thrust in in bales; and it is, indeed, on a grand scale, since the Times alone has 16,000,000 subscribers. I wanted Schultze not to go so near the crush, but he did not hear me. As he was standing there there come a great shock of newspaper boys running with bales of newspapers and throwing them in at the window. A bale of newspapers hits Schultze on the head; he loses his balance and tips head-forwards into the bureau; half a dozen officials immediately seize him, stamp him in the stomach, and the unhappy Schultze is dispatched as an unpaid newspaper to the provinces. At this moment the box is closed with a snap. I rush against it and cry, 'Schultze! Schultze!' But it was too late. Your unhappy son-in-law was already packed in the post-cart, and went off with the bale of newspapers to the South-Eastern Railway. I run into the bureau of the postmaster, and demanded back your son-in-law. 'Is your friend addressed?' he asks. 'No,' I answered. 'Very well,' says the Englishman, 'Mr. Schultze will remain for six months in the bureau, and, if no one applies for him, he will be burned as a dead letter.'"

A CAUTIOUS MAN.—As a pedestrian tourist was lately proceeding towards Trenton, he asked a man who was breaking stones by the roadside how long it would take him to reach that place. The man looked at him without speaking and then resumed his work. The question was repeated with the same result, and at last the traveller walked on. He had not proceeded more than a hundred yards when the man called after him and made a sign for him to return. When the pedestrian reached the stonebreaker, the latter said to him, "It will take you an hour to reach Trenton." "Then why did you not tell me so at first?" said the traveller. "Why," replied the man, "it was necessary for me first to see at what rate you walked, and, from the way you step out, I am now able to say that you can do the distance in an hour."

THE FAIRY SEWING-MACHINE. A HOLIDAY GIFT FOR THE WORK-TABLE

As many of our readers are anxious to know just what the new sewing-machine introduced by Mme. Demorest, and alluded to in our November number, is, we will tell them what we think of its uses and advantages.

WHAT IT IS.

In the first place it will attract attention from its diminutive, fairy-like size, and the ease with which it can be carried, an important matter to a seamstress or dressmaker employed from house to house. It is contained in an ordinary paper-box, much the size of an ordinary square photographic album, and may be carried about with the same ease. When in use it is attached to an ordinary table, after the fashion of a sewing-bird. There is no machinery below, the whole motive-power being a small crank, which is turned with ease.

HOW IT WORKS.

Its operation is wonderfully simple. An ordinary sewing needle is threaded, the eye placed in a socket, which may be seen in the cut; the point must rest opposite the centre of the cog wheel, and for this reason the socket may be adjusted by a simple screw, pushed backwards or forwards as the needle is longer or shorter. This is the chief judgment required. The commencement of the seam is held to the point of the needle, which takes it up until the needle is full, when a reverse movement of the crank is made, the work drawn off, and it begins afresh.

WHAT IT DOES.

What no other sewing-machine attempts to do, it runs, and does not stitch, it sews the more delicate materials, which an ordinary sewing-machine cuts or draws. The cambrics for infants' clothing, the Swiss muslin for Swiss waists, skirts of soft fabric, Nansook, muslin, and mousseline de laine (all wool), can be traced beautifully by it.

Breadths of fine flannels, mousselines, summer poplins, and all thin fabrics, can be run up with it. For the dressmaker, in spring and summer it is invaluable; for the household it supplies a vacant place for more delicate uses. As in sewing by hand one seamstress is required for heavy parts of it, so with sewing-machines. Every owner of these household blessings is willing to give five dollars for a "tucker" or "hemmer," or any improvement that facilitates work—it is just the price asked for this little gleaner in the great harvest field of industry, that modestly keeps its own place, nor seeks to usurp one already filled. It is a most useful and appropriate gift for the holidays, being packed for this purpose in a pretty case, and ornamental in itself.

The price is only $5. Address Madame Demorest, 473 Broadway, New York.

From an Editor.

FRIEND GODEY: I am bothered to the roundest every month with persons who wish to borrow your valuable Book; they (the ladies) know it is the best book of fashions, and they are sending from all quarters of the town to my better half to borrow it; she does hate the principle, and often tells me to publish them. She is very afraid that you will discontinue it to this office, if I do not publish the borrowers. However, in the long run, I believe it is an advantage to you, because they subscribe to the Book after awhile; that is, I have known several ladies who have subscribed after examining our copy.

Yours truly, B.

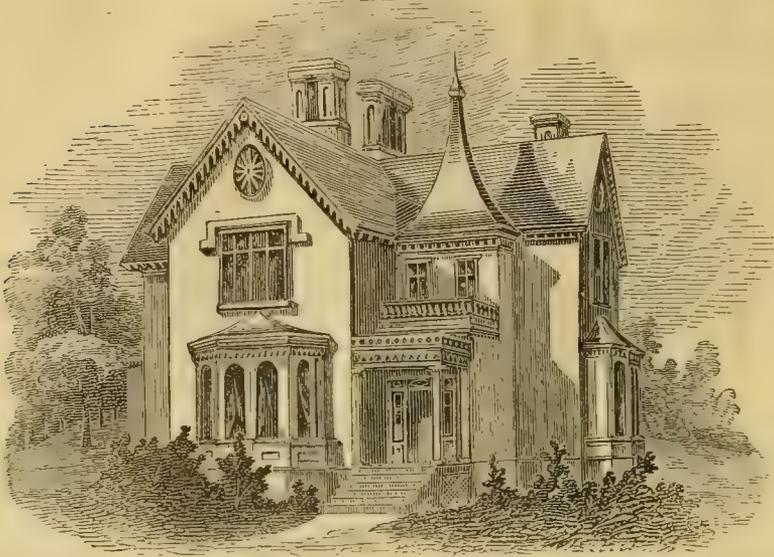

A PRESENT FOR A LADY.—Did it ever strike any of our young friends that they could not make a more agreeable Christmas or New Year's present to a young lady than a year's subscription to the Lady's Book? Will it not monthly call the donor to their remembrance, and will they not be particularly gratified in receiving so useful a present?

A LADY once wrote to her absent husband thus: "I write to you because I have nothing to do; I stop because I have nothing to say."

THE best $3 and the best $2 monthly are offered one year for $3 50. See advertisements in this number.

RURAL RESIDENCE.

Designed expressly for Godey's Lady's Book by ISAAC H. HOBBS, Architect, Philadelphia.

In presenting to the public the above design, I have taken pains to make it practicable. The building is intended to be built of stone, and roughcast; but if built of dow-frames are intended to be made plank front, which need no outside lintels, as they are always objectionable if made of wood, where roughcasting is done.

The roof of the main building is intended to be built of slate or shingles, as choice may determine; but if the loft rooms are to be fitted for sleeping rooms, shingles should be preferred, as they make them more pleasant in warm weather. Bay-window and veranda roofs must be of tin, and preparation should be made for them as the building goes up. All conductors, lightning rods, and all other work to be fastened to the walls, and work put up inside around the windows previous to roughcasting, as in the performance of them there is much danger of laying the foundation for cracked and scaling walls. Many are prejudiced against roughcasting on that account, but if it is properly done, and in a good season of the year, with sharp sand and good lime, well beaten together, avoiding the covering of any wood-work, cutting it off neatly at the edges of frames, as the adjar caused by the striking of doors and shutters will shatter the work. The color, if possible, should be obtained by the use of colored sand, which is by far the most durable and natural in appearance. The more it is worked in beating it together the less danger of blisters. More sand than lime can be used, which is always desirable. Base courses must always be placed as high up as the veranda floors, made of stone, pointed, or bricks, and painted.

brick, the walls may be reduced to 13 inches in thickness, and will need no internal lining, which must always be done when they are built of stone. The win-

Cement is not to be relied upon, and as I have found by experience a poor substitute for either of the above.

ISAAC H. HOBBS, Architect.

SOME HINTS.

In remitting, try to procure a draft, and don't fail to indorse it.

Address L. A. Godey, Philadelphia, Pa. That is sufficient.

If a lady is the writer, always prefix Mrs. or Miss to her signature, that we may know how to address a reply.

Town, County, and State, always in your letter.

If you miss a number of any magazine, always write to the publishers of the magazine. If Arthur's, address T. S. Arthur & Co., Philadelphia; if Harper's, address Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York.

When a number of the Lady's Book is not received, write at once for it; don't wait until the end of the year.

When inclosing money, do not trust to the sealing matter on an envelope, but use a wafer in addition.

Mrs. Hale is not the Fashion Editress. Address "Fashion Editress, care L. A. Godey, Philadelphia."

When you send money for any other publication, we pay it over to the publisher, and there our responsibility ceases.

We can always supply back numbers.

Subscriptions may commence with any number of the year.

The postage on the Lady's Book, if paid three months in advance at the office where it is received, is four and a half cents for three monthly numbers.

Let the names of the subscribers and your own signature be written so that they can be easily made out.

PEG TOP PANTALOONS.—We have often referred to excess of fashions among the ladies. Let it be understood that every fashion is supposed to be pretty. The eye gets accustomed to it, and the departure from it is what is remarked. Occasionally a lady may be seen without crinoline; people stare and turn round to look at her. She certainly attracts attention. So with the gentlemen's peg tops; the use would be well, but the abuse is ridiculous.

THE MEN WHO MAKE SPELLING-BOOKS.—Will not some person start up and make a spelling-book that will contain words that there may be some possibility that one of them may be used some time in the next fifty years? We have before us now a spelling-book in which are some words that in an intercourse with the world of some sixty years we never have heard used; and we will venture to say that we will ask one hundred men in common life, and no two out of the hundred will be able to tell the meaning, and no one out of the same number will be able to spell the word. It is a common complaint, and we hear it every day, that children come from school and cannot spell, simply from the reason that they are kept at words not in use, and not at those used in common every-day life.

MANY SUBSCRIBERS.—You have probably seen, by the way the fashion is folded in the December number, how stupid your bookbinder must have been.

Mrs. W. S. T.—A mother's feelings should answer your question about mourning.

Miss E. R. N.—We shall probably commence paper flower making in our next number.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godey, Esq.

No order will be attended to unless the money is first received. Neither the Editor nor Publisher will be accountable for losses that may occur in remitting.

The Publisher of the Lady's Book has no interest in this department, and knows nothing of the transactions; and whether the person sending the order is or is not a subscriber to the Lady's Book, the Fashion editor does not know.

Instructions to be as minute as is possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice. Dress goods from Evans & Co.'s; mourning goods from Besson & Son; cloaks, mantillas, or talmas, from Brodie's, 51 Canal Street, New York; bonnets from the most celebrated establishments; jewelry from Wriggins & Warden, or Caldwell's, Philadelphia.

When goods are ordered, the fashions that prevail here govern the purchase; therefore, no articles will be taken back. When the goods are sent, the transaction must be considered final.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION-PLATE FOR JANUARY.

Fig. 1.—Dress suitable for a bridesmaid. White silk under-dress, with over-dress of white crêpe, made with two skirts. The second skirt is quite long, and is finished with scallops bound with white silk, and is elegantly trimmed with puffs of the crêpe arranged in a linked Grecian pattern. The same design forms the bertha on the corsage, also trims the sleeves. The corsage is made with a deep point both behind and before. Etruscan ornaments and coiffure of cherries with foliage.

Fig. 2.—Dress of white reps, with five narrow flounces on the skirt, trimmed with violet velvet. Above this trimming are three black thread lace flounces. Corsage pointed both back and front, and trimmed with lace and violet velvet trimmings. Sash of violet velvet, embroidered and fringed. Coiffure of Parma violets.

Fig. 3.—White satin dress, trimmed elaborately with groselle velvet and black lace. Bertha and corslet trimmed to match the skirt. Coiffure composed of white ostrich plumes and groselle velvet.

Fig. 4.—White glacé silk, with plain skirt; corsage trimmed with folds, and the sleeves one large puff. Breast knot of green velvet, with bullion tassels. Sash of green velvet, with pointed ends, finished with heavy bullion tassels. Coiffure of green velvet and Solferino flowers.

Fig. 5.—Dress suitable for a bridesmaid, composed of white muslin, with six gauffered flounces on the skirt. Bertha formed of three gauffered ruffles. Full body and puff sleeves. Pink sash, with heavy fringed ends tied behind. Coiffure of rose-buds, with foliage.

HEADDRESSES.

Fig. 1. The Coralio Headdress.—This headdress is formed of a torsade of cerise velvet and a point lace barbe, with a large bow on the forehead, and white plumes on the right side.

Fig. 2. The Eulatio.—Net composed of gold cord caught with black velvet and gold buttons. Three white plumes are on the left side. Over the head is a roll of black velvet, which is finished on the right side by a large bow with ends trimmed with gold and lace.

Fashions.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

HAVING had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editor of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Spring and autumn bonnets, materials for dresses, jewelry, envelops, hair-work, worsteds, children's wardrobes, mantillas, and mantelets, will be chosen with a view to economy, as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

DAISY TRAVELLING WINTER HOOD.

(See plate printed in colors in front.)

Materials required to make one hood: An ounce and a half of single white Berlin wool; two ounces of a very bright shade of Alpine rose; half an ounce of single Partridge wool; six skeins of white sewing silk; half a yard of Alpine rose ribbon for the bow behind; a d'oyley frame, with brass pegs, twelve inches square, and one four inches wide and twelve inches long.

This pretty hood, which is so useful for travelling wear, or for putting on in coming out of a theatre or place of public amusement, is made in the same manner as the daisy d'oyleys which used to be so much in vogue.

The hood has a white and speckled head-piece, bordered all round with a bright rose-colored border, with strings of the same. The head-piece is not cut after it is removed from the pegs of the frame; but the border and strings have half of the wool cut in the same manner as the daisy mats, to give it a fluffy, soft appearance.

The wool is wound on a frame, and each square is secured by a cross-stitch in wool. The head-piece consists of a simple square, the wool being wound crosswise on the frame, from corner to corner, so that, when finished, the diamonds lie in the proper direction.

Four rows of white wool must be wound round every other peg, and over this three rows of white sewing silk; the other pegs require two rows of white wool and two of Partridge wool.

When all the wool is wound, the squares must be secured with white wool, threaded in a long netting-needle, slipping the wool on the wrong side to form a square underneath; or, to explain ourselves better, securing the squares the straight way of the frame.

When this square is completed the head-piece is finished, and the border must be commenced on the long, narrow frame.

The front border and strings are made in one piece; and, as the frame is not long enough, it must be accomplished by four separate windings. Take seven skeins of the rose-colored wool, fold each skein into five lengths, fasten each skein on to the pegs of the long side, winding the wool that is to be continued, round the opposite pegs, to keep it secure. To form the squares, loop two pieces of wool in and out the short way of the frame, and over that three pieces.

It will now be seen that the squares are formed, which must be secured with the same colored wool; and, when this portion of the work is completed, three of the threads cut on each side of the stitch, to form a little tuft, or daisy.

When removed from the frame, the border is finished by the loops on each side, which make a pretty edging to the strings. Three more lengths of border must be done in the same manner, until the wool is used up.

Half the quantity of border is sufficient for the hood behind. The border must now be sewn on in front, holding in the cap a little at the top, to give it a round appearance. After it is sewn on behind, a piece of platted Partridge wool should be run in between the stitches on the wrong side, so that the hood may be drawn in to the required size.

In the colored illustration of this hood, our readers will see that the border is composed of four windings of wool only. The reason for this is that, if there had been seven rows shown, the character of the work would not have been so easily seen, on account of its minuteness.

CHITCHAT UPON NEW YORK AND PHILADELPHIA FASHIONS FOR JANUARY.

WHILE the month of January brings with it opportunities for using the elegant evening toilets, for which our ladies are famous the world over, it none the less brings mud and mire and stormy days. But notwithstanding mud and mire, business must be attended to and exercise taken in the open air. For these purposes, there is nothing so useful as the Jupe Pompadour; and we cannot recommend it too highly. It is very easily made: Two rows of rings are sewn at regular intervals on the inside of the skirt; through these rings pass cords, fastened to the bottom of the dress, which come out at the top of the skirt. By these cords the skirt can be drawn up in graceful folds to any height. With this Jupe should be worn the colored or Balmoral skirts, of which there is an endless variety. Some are elegantly braided and trimmed with velvet, others are of black material, with bands of scarlet cloth pinked on each edge and stitched on them. Again we see them alternately striped with black and white, with a deep Grecian design embroidered in black. Sometimes they are in brilliant colored merinos, with arabesques of black silk or cloth. They are also made of Poplin. But we object to these expensive styles, for a colored petticoat in our eyes, is only suitable for unpleasant weather, and should not, under any circumstances, take the place of a white one, with a handsome dress.

Dress skirts are now rarely seen perfectly plain. They are generally much ornamented, but in excellent taste. Soutache or braiding seems to be the order of the day. We have lately seen at Stewart's some very beautiful imported dresses of Empress cloth, braided or rather tamboured in a very deep and rich design. Other styles for misses, with Sautés en barques to match, were of blue, green, or brown reps with two rows of the Greek pattern woven on them in black velvet, the velvet about one-eighth of an inch in width, and the designs complete for the entire dress. The same style of robe was in the mourning department, black and purple velvet on black materials; also other rich designs on different materials.

At Mme. Pinchon's, Lord & Taylor's, and other establishments, were dresses with sack or Camailles to match, richly braided with fancy braids.

Dress skirts are worn of a moderate length on the street, but for a reception, visiting, or evening, they are made exceedingly long. Sleeves generally are of the coat style, and dresses are either made with jackets, many of them with box-plaits at the back, or else trimmed to give the appearance of a jacket in front. The vest pastillon, basquine lancier, and vest Impératrice are all fashionable.

The taste for solid colors seems to prevail, and never were such greens, purples, modes, and garnets, as those of this season. Changeable silks are being introduced, and moire antiqués and watered silks are much worn.

Merinos like the silks are of the most brilliant dyes this winter, and as they are a very pretty medium dress, and susceptible of much ornamentation, no wardrobe is considered complete without one. Indeed there seems to be a perfect rage for them, and as they hang in such soft graceful folds, we should prefer them rather than poplins for misses.

Mrs. Ellis, of 880 Broadway, contributes some very beautiful styles to our chronicle of fashions for this month. A very stylish dress was a wine-colored noir trimmed at the edge of the skirt with a narrow platted founce. Above this plaiting were a series of semicircles or coquilles of black lace, in the centre of which were bands of black velvet. These coquilles, which were carried quite round the skirt, and ascended half way up the skirt on the left side, were headed by a narrow plaited founce corresponding with that on the edge of the skirt. The corsage was trimmed en zouave, and the trimming of lace and velvet was carried under the arms to the back, where it was finished with a bow and long ends. Another was of wine-colored silk, with chestnut leaves of velvet, caught in pairs with a jet ornament and carried round the skirt and up one side to the waist. Spanish corsage trimmed to match, and Spanish pocket.

Another dress, quite novel and in excellent taste, was a silver gray silk, ornamented round the bottom with a very deep band formed of black and violet ribbons, so arranged as to form checkers. On the corsage was a plastron of the same, and the sleeves with revers were trimmed to match.

Among the numerous merino dresses, was one of rose de chine, with velvet oak leaves, chain-stitched with white, running all round the skirt. Another of green, beautifully braided with thick white silk cord, a brown braided with gold color. A travelling dress of Humboldt purple, with Camail to match, both elegantly braided with fancy black braid.

Black alpaca are being made up with fluted ruffles, and trimmed with colored velvets and braids. Velvets are to be had narrow enough for braiding and so up to a finger in width of all colors; the black with white edge, however, seems to be preferred for everything. Plain black velvet ribbons come one-quarter of a yard wide. Black and white fancy braid is very stylish, and black mixed with tinsel we see used. Beads worked in with braiding add much to the effect. Short plaid silk scarfs are very much worn by misses, tied in a large bow under the chin. Camel-hair scarfs are worn in the same style. For in-doors, lace and muslin lappets or scarfs are now very generally worn round the neck, to the exclusion of collars. They are also tied in a large bow, and, when well tied, are very stylish. When made of lace, and arranged with taste, they are very becoming.

Handkerchiefs are worn very simply ornamented: some have five rows of small spots in black silk all round, and trimmed with a narrow ruffle, with similar black spots worked upon it. Others are chain-stitched, or braided in colors, with a medallion and initials on one side, the handkerchiefs being generally round. The more elegant are trimmed with insertions and futings of Valenciennes.

Sashes are much worn, and as it is rather expensive to have them to match every dress, many are made of black silk, with either a ruche all round, or else braided and the ends fringed. The most elegant are of black thread lace, and add much to the style of a dress.

The accepted style of bonnet is very high, rather square on top, and straight, shallow sides. For misses the tabs are generally very small. The trimming is placed on top, and consists of plumes or fans, fold, or futings of velvet.

We noticed at Miss McConnel's, of Clinton Place, New York, an exquisite bonnet of Humboldt purple velvet, with the whole of the front covered with the green blossoms of the American linden. We should remark, en passant, that the Humboldt purple has the peculiarity of looking well in the evening. Another of the same shade was trimmed with velvet flowers to match, and black lace. We have not space to describe the many beautiful bonnets we saw at this establishment; but we were particularly attracted by a new veil styled Loup de dentelle. They are suitable for round hats as well as bonnets, and, we have been told, have been adopted by the Empress, and will be much patronized this winter. They are made in different sorts of lace, rather oval in shape, and held in their place by a black velvet, or ribbon of a similar color as the bonnet, which is run through a beading, and tied with bow and ends just over the mouth. The veil is then trimmed with a lace about two inches in width.

Brodie's cloaks are as usual very stylish and of great variety in shape and trimming. A number of the rich velvet cloaks are long sacks without trimming, except on the revers of the sleeve, on which there is a coquille of lace. Others are rounding, with several seams from the shoulders to the waist, causing them to hang very gracefully. They have armholes, but no sleeves, and are trimmed with jet passenterie running up in pyramids. Some have a large plait in the centre of the back, and are ornamented with rich crochet medallions, and fastened at the throat with crochet ornaments.

Ball cloaks are now being made of exceedingly rich and handsome material, and really form part of the evening toilet. Some are of white silk, bordered with bands of black and gold, others spotted with gold. New designs appear daily in the show-rooms. At Mme. Pinchon's we noticed a number of cloaks made of blue cloth, thick, soft, and velvety, richly braided or trimmed with passenterie. Others were darker, almost a blue black.

At other establishments we have seen sacks made up of army blue cloth, and trimmed with gilt braid and buttons; but these are entirely too prononcé for the street, and the style will not be adopted by ladies of good taste.

We were shown some very elegant dresses, just finished by Mme. Demorest, 473 Broadway. One was a Russian leather colored taffeta, the skirt trimmed with five bands of black velvet, edged on both sides with quilting of the same taffeta, and finished with black lace. The body was open and trimmed round over the shoulders with three rows of the velvet and plaiting, the centre band being the widest, which was also the case on the skirt. The bands ended in the girdle, which had broad, long ends, fastened without a bow.

An evening dress we admired for its novel and appropriate use of crêpe as the trimming. This was a mauve silk, trimmed with three rows of crêpe ruches in three shades, the inner one the darkest, and the outer one lighter than the dress. Low body, with Marie Antoinette fichu, trimmed to correspond, and terminating in long ends behind. Another silk of Mexican blue had three fluted crêpe founces, the same shade as the dress, and edged with black lace.

A very beautiful carriage dress was a fine poplin, in shaded tints of maize color and black, with five undulating black stripes. This dress had a hemmed founce of changeable silk, the same shade as the foundation color of the dress. Above this was an application of guipure four inches wide. The body was trimmed en Zouave, and the sleeve shaped at the elbow with trimmings of guipure lace and futings.

One of the latest novelties is the Spanish pocket, a very pretty and dressy little affair. It is worn on the outside of the dress, and is very like a Zouave pouch. It is suitable both for ladies and misses, and, we think, will be a favorite this winter.

A LADY'S GLANCE AT THE LONDON INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

SHAWLS AND MIXED FABRICS.

As in the earlier ages men were accustomed to turn their gaze towards the eastern quarter of the globe as the source of civilization and the birth-place of the fine arts, so even in the middle of the nineteenth century, in one branch at least of productive industry, its prestige remains unquestioned. Notwithstanding the adaptive genius of the Western World, and the wonders wrought by its machinery, the Indian shawl still remains, par excellence, in the eyes of the initiated, the shawl of the civilized world.

For how large a portion of this distinction it may be indebted to the difficulty of its attainment we are hardly prepared to explain. Nor, unless the limitation of caste be removed which assigns its peculiar work to distinct native tribes, is the question likely to be speedily solved, as the manufacture of a single shawl of high quality is said to absorb the labor of years. Thus, for some time, at least, the demand is likely to exceed the supply, securing for it all the benefit of a mercantile protection, notwithstanding our national boast of universal free trade. Meanwhile, the increased facilities afforded by commerce for the acquisition of the raw material, the successful naturalization of the Thibet goat in Europe, with the advantages of skilled labor and an ever-improving machinery, present formidable obstacles to the long continuance of its hitherto unchallenged supremacy.

That the Indian shawl has been fully appreciated since its first introduction to this country is abundantly evident, from the period when scattered examples found their way through the medium of individual enterprise to the time when they became more generally familiar to the elite through the periodical sales of prohibited goods by the East India Company as early as the year 1750. That the most elaborate specimens of the article should generally find their destination in the families of the Court of Directors is not very surprising, more especially as the possession of one or two shawls of the kind was sufficient to constitute a mark of distinction for the possessor.

Within thirty years of their introduction as articles of merchandise by the India House, we find them in the list of goods imported through the ordinary channel of the Custom House, but at a duty of nearly thirty per cent., which was subsequently reduced through six successive stages to the present merely nominal impost, just sufficient to secure the registry of their number and value.

It may, perhaps, be as well to remind our readers, previous to their visit to the Indian section of the International Exhibition, that the most brilliant specimens of shawls, appealing to the eye as blazing with gold and silver, are by no means the most valuable nor those most eagerly coveted by the initiated. The highest class of Indian shawls are those of more sober pretensions, exclusively loom-made, and may be briefly described as of two particular classes, with, of course, many subdivisions.

The most distinguished are the veritable cashmere, where the pattern (as in Honiton lace) is first made, the groundwork being subsequently filled in in the same loom, and not attached by any needle or similar instrument, although the extreme outer border is usually so joined, and consists of small squares, embodying every shade of color used in the fabric.

The value of a shawl depends on its quality even more than its pattern. Each fleece of the cashmere goat affords about eight ounces of the finest wool, which has to be separated hair by hair. It takes a native rather more than a week to disentangle a single ounce; leaving a second, third, fourth, and even a fifth quality, each having its assigned place, though never mingling in the same shawl. Such minute subdivisions render great experience necessary to decide on the relative value of any individual specimen, irrespective of the taste and extent of the pattern wherewith it is ornamented.

The second of the two classes to which we have above alluded is also made of the genuine Pashum cloth, woven in the loom, of a plain color and in a single piece: the object is to obtain on this ground, through the medium of needlework, an effect similar to that of the more elaborate specimens. This is wonderfully managed by a peculiar kind of applique, as yet without an English name, of so fine and minute a character as to deceive any but the most curious observer, the surface presenting no perceptible inequality from the groundwork. A glance, however, at the reverse side reveals the distinction, but so close is the imitation, that it ranks far more frequently as the genuine cashmere than is supposed.

The indispensable necessity of the shawl as an article of wearing apparel to well-dressed natives of India, Persia, and parts of Turkey, necessarily absorbs so large a proportion of the genuine article that few, comparatively speaking, remain for exportation, and of them the lion's share is secured for our own country, many being re-exported to the Continent and to America, where the demand is even greater than with ourselves. The most elaborate specimens of each kind are to be found in the present exhibition. Among the contributions of the Indian Government, to which a separate case has been assigned, we would direct the especial attention of our readers to one representing a pillar formed of clusters of pine, as remarkable for its beauty, although there is another said on unquestionable authority to bear away the palm. For the almost exclusive use of the pine as a form of decoration, with its various modifications, we are, in all probability, indebted to the almost religious veneration attached by the natives to the "surfeish," or egret, of the Oriental turban, and, as the same pattern is adopted by successive generations, little scope for variety has hitherto been afforded; but, with the more extensive demand consequent upon the opening up of remote provinces, a wider range of invention may be anticipated, and evidence of such advance has already presented itself in a most gorgeous specimen wrought in gold on a groundwork of four colors. The favorite design is in this case alternately reversed, by which means a circular ornament is achieved. Among the more brilliant shawls a black and gold applique from Delhi, priced at 25 guineas, appears to be remarkably cheap for its quality; whilst a black cashmere cloth embroidered in scarlet and gold, at 18 guineas, is scarcely less attractive. Of the silk and silver kingcobs many, in stripes resembling gold and silver ribbons on a dark groundwork, are very effective. Among the lighter scarfs, entitled "doopatta," or ornamented net, an example bearing a resemblance to scale-armor in silver, with a gemlike ornament on each scale, seems worthy the attention of our home manufacturers. One in "dhance," or faded leaf-color, with gold embroidery, is, from the contrast of tints, exceedingly effective, and a cinnamon-brown, with silver, is hardly less striking. There are many others, among which may be particularized samples of the renowned embroideries of Scinde, and the filmy gold muslins of Dacca; but over these we will not linger, as they scarcely seem to come legitimately within the scope of our subject.

Great as may be the value and reputation of Oriental shawls, it is in the French department that ladies will instinctively seek for evidence of that progress in design and execution so noticeable in other branches of industrial production, and, therefore, reasonably to be looked for in the one in question. We may not now stop to define that particular element in the taste and character of a Frenchwoman which secures her unwavering favor for this form of outdoor drapery, and renders the possession of a really good and varied assortment the object of her ardent ambition. Suffice it for us to extol the great perfection which, under the influence of such incentives, has been attained by French manufacturers, whose triumphs, by the way, will probably be more highly estimated in this country than in their own. The enthusiasm for Indian cashmeres, which is undoubtedly far more genuine and universal in France than among ourselves, leads to a certain disregard of all imitations, however beautiful. Ladies of very moderate means and position will strain every nerve to obtain the more expensive adornment, should it not have constituted a feature of the corbeille de mariage; but, happily, the absolute necessity of such a possession for a married woman is admitted by reasonable husbands and fathers, and its attainment seconded by them almost as a point of honor. This being the case even among the middle classes of society, those beautiful cachemires Français which amply gratify our feminine ambition are obliged at home to descend a grade lower before they meet with perfect appreciation, and become in turn objects of aspiration or self-gratulation, as the case may be.

The origin of this national predilection for shawls has been traced to the close of the last century, when a few Oriental specimens were imported, as it were, by accident from Egypt, and quickly found favor in the eyes of republican beauties. The ever-increasing demand, which was sparingly supplied through British agency, soon suggested to private enterprise the idea of an imitative manufacture. The enormous expense of setting up a loom for this purpose, which in 1802 amounted to 60,000*l.*, is said to have concentrated the attention of Jacquard on the invention of a process for working intricate designs with greater facility; and the perfect success of his efforts converted a curious experiment into one of the most productive and honorable of the industrial resources of France. We find that in 1819 very excellent shawls were produced from real cashmere wool, imported of course, but prepared at home, as at present. A great improvement was effected about thirty years since by the introduction of a new power into the loom, the effects of which are precisely similar to those of the simple yet laborious processes employed in the East. We are informed that thirty or forty men would there be occupied many mouths in the construction of a shawl, of which an exquisite imitation can, thanks to this invention, called sponline, be woven in less time by the intelligent industry of one person.

As a feature of the specimens contributed to the exhibition by French manufacturers, we are gratified to notice a less servile adhesion to the Indian style of ornament than was apparent in 1851. Many beautiful and ingenious modifications of the accredited type are presented to our view, retaining just enough of the Oriental character to indicate the source in which they originated. We may point, for instance, to a shawl representing an open tent, the looped curtains of which reveal very successfully by their massive folds the richness and quality of the fabric. In the foreground two emblematical green dragons appear to be keeping watch and ward before the entrance of the pavilion, which rises from a wilderness of tropical foliage.

Birds of Paradise and other gay-plumaged creatures figure also occasionally on shawls of a high class, but such designs are more remarkable for brilliancy and novelty than for real artistic beauty. No such exception can be taken to a superb specimen manufactured by the well-known house of Duché, and appropriately designated the Albion cashmere. It is a perfect triumph of elaborate simplicity, and adapted to meet the requirements of a really refined taste. Equally attractive is one exhibited by Messrs. Allison, bearing a figured stripe on a black ground; modest in pretension, but very elegant. A charming example from the looms of M. Lair deserves especial notice; and there are, indeed, many others which will fully repay careful inspection, though scarcely adapted for minute description. A claim to distinction has been put forth by one manufacturer, M. Biétry, to which we allude rather as giving an idea of the importance attached to details by shawl buyers and sellers than because his invention, designated by the author as "a real and admirable progress," seems to us worthy of such exalted pretensions. It appears that it has been the practice to attach to the finest Indian shawls a mignonette pattern, designed and embroidered in France. M. Biétry has just discovered a means of producing this order of merit in the French shawls, woven in with the original substance, and consequently immovable; for this discovery he has obtained a patent.

Although the reputation of England as a shawl-weaving country has not hitherto approached that established by French manufacturers, it is undoubtedly true that they acted as pioneers in the enterprise of imitating the productions of the East. In 1784 Alderman Watson and Mr. Barrow, of Norwich, achieved the first shawl of that character ever made in Europe. The process was too slow and unprofitable to be repeated; but some specimens were produced soon afterwards, of mixed silk and worsted, the pattern being embroidered by hand. No particular advance was made until the year 1805, which witnessed the completion of the first shawl wholly fashioned in the loom. The manufacture was taken up about the same time in Edinburgh, where it was afterwards abandoned, and in Paisley, then suffering from the decline in the muslin trade. There it took root, and that town, with its vicinity, is well known to be the seat of production for all shawls of the Indian style, the higher classes consisting of real cashmere wool, and being afforded in great beauty at comparatively low prices. The recent removal of the paper duty will, we should hope, give an impetus to the trade, as the cost of the card-board for a Jacquard loom forms a very important element in the expense of production. As regards quality, the present exhibition affords several specimens of British design and workmanship which will challenge the admiration of the most fastidious taste. Among these is a shawl which appears under the auspices of Messrs. Lock & Co., consisting of a striped pattern of remarkable variety, with a light design intersecting it from corner to corner, as if by the suggestion of some happy afterthought. In one, exhibited by Spiers & Co., Paisley, the ornamentation assumes the form of an elongated arch of interwoven pines. Its attractions are great, but not inferior are those of similar articles from the looms of Forbes and Hutcheson.

Of Norwich silk and mixed shawls, Messrs. Claburn & Crisp are the most extensive exhibitors. Their productions are remarkable for brilliancy of color; indeed, they are in all respects worthy the established reputation of the firm, and as much may be said for those of Kerr, Scott, & Kilner. The assortment of warm, thick shawls for winter use is remarkably excellent and varied. It is a department in which they are, of course, unrivalled. The prevailing fashion for the coming season is evidently supposed to tend towards colors of a sober cast, for in cases where the material used is some animal fibre, the natural shade is closely imitated, or it is even manufactured undyed, different shades being supplied from various portions of the animal's body. The style of make is furlike, as may be inferred from the substances used. In the case of Mr. Bliss, of Chipping Norton, shawls may be seen woven from the hair of the beaver, hare, fox, rabbit, llama, alpaca, Thibet goat, and camel. Thus it would seem that every quarter of the globe has furnished its especial tribute for our benefit, and ingenuity has turned all of them to good account.

THE TURRETS OF THE STONE HOUSE.

BY VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND.

"HAVE you been over the house, Miss Margaret?" inquired Mrs. Stebbins, a little, pleasant-faced, vivacious woman, as she stopped a moment in the sitting-room to adjust her shawl and receive the blue china bowl which she had brought over filled with jelly for Mrs. Phillips, who was an invalid.

The mound of jelly stood on the table, on a small cut-glass dish of an antique pattern, and as the sunlight poured its golden rain upon the "quaking tumulus," it looked like an immense ruby.

"No, Mrs. Stebbins; I haven't seen the house at all." The tones were sweet and distinct that answered. Hearing them, you would not need to see Margaret Phillips to know that she was a lady, so far as cultivation of mind and graciousness of manner make one this.

"Oh, you don't know what you've missed," added Mrs. Stebbins, in her good-natured, sympathetic way. "It's a perfect palace. John says it's built after the style of some foreign nobleman's. There's no end to the money that it cost. I can't attempt to describe it, but there's the library openin' on the lawn, all of oak; and the parlors, with the green and gold; and the dinin'-room—well, there's no tellin'; but I told John after I got home that my house didn't look bigger nor better'n a shanty. But it's some folks' luck to be born with silver spoons in their mouths."

"And some have the faculty of keeping the silver spoons, and some don't seem to." This general statement had a particular application in Margaret's mind, and this was the reason that there was a little touch of bitterness or pain in her voice, which only a very keen observer would have detected.

"That's a fact." Mrs. Stebbins was of the acquiescent, approbative type. "But"—slipping at once from general theories to specific facts—"it's too late now to see the inside of the house, for the family are expected next week, and they've got a train of servants puttin' things to rights."

"If it were otherwise, I haven't the time to get over there," answered Margaret, with a lack of enthusiasm which even Mrs. Stebbins must have perceived. "You were very kind, Mrs. Stebbins, to remember mother so often; I wish you knew how she will enjoy your jelly."

"La! don't speak of that. I thought it might set well with an egg or some chicken broth. My grandmother Parsons used to say, and she was a reg'lar hand at nussin', that there was everything in knowin' how to coax along a weak stomach; it did more than the doctor a good many times."

"I have no doubt of it, Mrs. Stebbins; and I really believe the nice little dainties you've sent mother for the last month have done more for her than all her medicine has."

The little woman's faded face flushed with genuine pleasure. "I don't feel as though I'd done anything at all, Miss Margaret; only just to show that I'd got the will."

"I do—so much, Mrs. Stebbins, that I'm emboldened now to ask you to do something for me. Isn't your husband on the school committee this year?"

"Yes. He tried to get out of it, but they would put him in."

"If he has no other teacher engaged, I shall be very glad to obtain the situation this year."

"Miss Margaret!" Mrs. Stebbins had arisen from her chair, but she sat down again, and there was no need she should express her astonishment at the young lady's proposition; her tones had done this more effectually than any words could.

"You are surprised?" said Margaret Phillips, looking her neighbor in the face with a brave smile, and one that had yet a little flickering pain in it.

"Well, yes; I am quite taken aback," faltered the small, dark woman.

"Of course, Mrs. Stebbins, this step is not, under existing circumstances, a matter of choice, but one of necessity. We are poor people now, mamma and I, whatever we were once; and I must look the matter boldly in the face, as I have done many other things, and it will be a great relief to my present necessity if I can obtain the situation of which I have spoken."

"I'll speak to John this very day," answered Mrs. Stebbins. "But how in the world can you take so much on yourself, with the care of your sick mother?"

"Mrs. Stebbins," answered Margaret Phillips, with a solemn faith on her fair young face, "God has given me strength to bear many burdens that I did not once think I could carry. I do not believe He will fail me in this one."

Mrs. Stebbins made no further protest. That look of Margaret's silenced her; still the manner in which she took the girl's hand, and pressed it as they parted, showed that she was both appreciative and sympathetic.

Margaret Phillips went up stairs to her own room, and sat down by the window, and somehow her gaze turned to the eastward, where, about three-quarters of a mile off, a couple of gray stone turrets showed picturesquely through the thick foliage. Somehow the sight did not seem to attract Margaret Phillips. The shadow of pain which had hovered over her face seemed to settle deeper there. Yet it was a morning in the late May, full of praise and beauty. The white, fleecy mists hung wide on the distant mountains, the air was perfumed with all sweet smells of young grass and blossoming fruit trees, the birds brimmed the morning with songs, and through the branches filtered like golden wine the sunshine of the spring.

Everything was glad, everything but Margaret Phillips. Yet I would not have you suppose for one moment that she was a morbid or sentimental character, that she could not arise out of her own private limitations and losses and be courageous and of "good cheer," knowing that whatsoever burdens and sorrows were appointed her here, she still had the one love to give thanks for, to rejoice in, and that sooner or later, if she trusted it, all sorrow and pain should be lost in the rest and the joy which God promises to those who love him. And this Margaret Phillips believed, not in occasional bursts of enthusiasm or exalted sentiment, but in her daily living, in struggle and weakness, amid diligent work and petty cares, and sometimes amid bitter struggles.

A very few words will give you a few necessary glimpses into her past life. Her father had been a rich man, honorable to the core in his dealings with all men, and respected and beloved wherever he was known.

But, during the latter part of his life, he had been induced, through the influence of his partner, to embark in some foreign speculation which had proved totally ruinous through the weakness and dishonesty of various parties. A fever, the consequence of exposure and anxiety, closed his life before it reached its fiftieth year. Margaret was the only and dearly beloved child of her parents. Her youth had been sheltered by watchful tenderness from every sorrow. Her mother, a woman of a gentle mimosa nature, had been an invalid for years; and the young girl found herself suddenly face to face with a world of which she had known nothing except the bright side.

Then the soul of Margaret Phillips awoke within her. She set herself diligently and bravely to meet these altered circumstances as soon as the first shock of grief for her father's death was over. The old, luxurious home was given up, the furniture sold, and, through the influence of friends, Margaret entered a small, pleasant cottage in Woburn; for both mother and daughter shrank from the thought of life in the city, where the old, harrowing associations would be constantly revived. And for the next two years Margaret devoted herself to her mother's comfort, and the supervision of their small household; for they kept but one domestic.

Mrs. Phillips rallied a good deal in the fine country air during the first year of her residence in Woburn; but the second, her health sank again in consequence of a severe cold she took in some exposure during the late autumn; and Margaret Phillips was kept in fluctuations of hope and fear for her mother's life during the whole winter.

With the return of the spring, Mrs. Phillips began slowly to recuperate; but now another dread haunted the mother and daughter by night and by day—their slender means were nearly exhausted, and afar off they saw the "wolf" approaching their door.

Margaret was not a girl to sit down, and fold her hands in weak, unavailing tears and lamentations at this crisis. Not but the anxiety, and doubt, and ultimate decision cost her much pain and many sleepless hours. But she reached it at last.

And, not to prolong this subject, the next week Mr. Stebbins called on Margaret, had a long interview with the young lady, which resulted in another visit, several evenings later, when Mr. Stebbins was accompanied by two other members of the committee, and after an examination, which was merely nominal, she was installed teacher of the district school for that summer.

It was a little, low, long red building with white shutters, on the side of the road where there were no trees, and the sun poured down with a sickening glare during the heats of the summer, and within it were gathered more than forty boys and girls—many of them coarse, unruly, ill-bred.

It was hard work for Margaret; hard for mind and body; yet she set herself to do it, and summoned all her moral forces to the work, and did it well, as any work that is worth doing at all ought to be done.

Yet I think any one with fine intentions and generous sympathies would have looked sad, could they have glanced into the little bare, red schoolhouse that summer, and seen the gentle, delicate, sweet-faced young teacher in her high chair, behind her brown desk, surrounded by those half grown boys and girls, many of them so bent on the promotion of mischief, and petty annoyance, and disturbances that in order to control them it was necessary to keep her thoughts and observation strained to their utmost tension.

She looked too fair and fragile amid those rude boys and girls, and seemed more out of place than she actually was, for Margaret had in her nature some moral force which commanded respect, and to a large degree obedience. And she had various soils in which to sow her seed, and some of it took root there, and gave promise of a stronger, better manhood, a sweeter and more gracious womanhood.

The schoolhouse was situated less than a quarter of a mile from the new stone house, which was the pride and wonder of all Woburn, and as Margaret went up every morning through the green country lane to her school, the gray turrets of the stately house looked afar through the green trees upon her, with the sunlight touching them into a new splendor.

Somehow the sight of those turrets always hurt Margaret. If you had watched her narrowly, and seen the sweet light widening up into her dark eyes, and about her lips, as she listened to the birds filling the air with their sprays of song, or looked off where, through the dark plush of meadow grass, the summer winds went searching to and fro, you would have witnessed a sudden shadow sweep over her face as the gray turrets rose in sight, a shadow that blurred all the brightness, and was almost like pain.

That stone house was Margaret's vulnerable point all summer. She was no faultless heroine (this lady of whom I write), dear reader. She would have opened her brown eyes wide at the thought of being one; but she was a woman, young, brave, lovely, struggling with herself, and all the hard realities of her lot—struggling for faith, duty, charity—sometimes defeated, sometimes victorious. And this thought of the "great stone house" was the thorn in Margaret's side; she tried to put it away, but it came back and haunted her day by day. She thought of it in the hot, weary noon as she sat drooping before her desk in the hour of intermission; the large, cool, luxurious rooms would rise and shine before her; she would see the soft, mossy carpets sprinkled with leaves and blossoms; she would see rare pictures and statuary scattered along the walls, and gleaming white in the corners, feeding with beauty the eyes which beheld and rejoiced in them; she would hear the sudden rush, and the sweet thrill, and quiver of music that drew the quick tears to her eyes; and then she would see the lofty balconies where the June roses and honeysuckles made heats of bloom about the pillars, and where in the cool moonlight of the summer evenings they told her the guests wandered up and down; and then jets of laughter would suddenly thrill the air; and stately gentlemen and fair ladies would roam up and down the beautiful grounds, where the fountains threw up their white embroidery of waters, or where the deep, green shrubberies made darkness and stillness; or by the lake, where the stately swans went dreaming up and down, and the waterlilies, like great, white pearls, were scattered lavish on its bosom.

Margaret knew nothing of the inmates of the "stone house," except that they were people of immense fortune, and, as their home indicated, of rare taste. She had gathered, too, from the various gossip of the villagers, that the family was not large—a couple of sons and daughters. They had travelled for several years in foreign lands; and the girl fancied, without knowing, that they were haughty, purse-proud people.

The only possible opportunity she could have had of meeting the family was at the village church, which they occasionally attended, but, as they most frequently drove to service in the city ten miles distant, it did not happen that Margaret met any of the residents of the stone house. But in her hours of weakness and weariness, the young teacher thought of these people, dwelling in luxury, surrounded by all which could make the outward life beautiful and happy, and her heart rebelled against her own hard, toiling, uncongenial lot.

And so it happened one day, after the heats of the summer had passed and the earth was still and serene, and the ripeness of September flooded the year's pulses with wine, that Margaret Phillips sat at her chamber window just as she had sat in the brave life, and gladness of the June which would never come back any more. It was one evening afterschool, and weary with her day's work, she had tossed aside her bonnet and shawl, and sat down to the window to refresh herself with the cool air, which was spiced with sweet fern, and saffras, and pine from the woods on her right hand. The young teacher looked out, and drank in the sweet refreshment of air, and earth, and sky, with a face that grew peaceful as she gazed, until suddenly her roaming gaze fell upon the gray turrets of the stone house betwixt the trees.

Margaret closed her eyes. "I believe that house is the Mordecai in the gate of my life," she said to herself in a tone made up of annoyance and self-reproach. "It haunts me everywhere, and spoils all my landscapes. I heartily wish it could burn to the ground."

"Margaret! Margaret!" whispered softly the conscience of the girl, and heeding the admonition, she sat down and took counsel with herself.

"After all, isn't it wrong," whispered the still inner voice, "for you to be disturbed in this way, and to let the sight of those turrets darken always over your sky? Doesn't it prove some petty envy or bitterness in your own nature, which it is your duty to struggle with and overcome? I know those people are rich, and you are poor; but you, at least, are wise and true enough to the best part of yourself not to think that can make any real difference betwixt you and them; and see here: aren't you only indulging this unhappy morbid state of feeling by avoiding that stone house as carefully as you do? Isn't it your duty now to walk bravely over there and look it squarely in the face; and the more disagreeable the duty, the plainer the necessity for performing it, and overcoming once and forever the wrong, unhealthful feeling which has taken hold of you?"

And Margaret Phillips was of the number of those who, a duty set plain before them, would go to prison or the stake to do it; a woman who made I must, not I will, the great ruling force of her life. And so Margaret Phillips covenanted with herself that very evening to walk over to the stone house, and look her "Mordecai" in the face, and then she went down stairs to help prepare her mother's supper. Poor Margaret! they kept but one servant, and she was a little girl.

The sun was just behind the hills, leaving the sky once more for its nightly blossoming of stars, when Margaret closed her little cottage gate, and took the old turnpike road which intersected the one that led to the stone house. It was a pleasant walk, and the soft light and the throbbing hum of the insects soothed her, and, walking with her own thoughts, she was greatly startled when, turning an abrupt angle in the road, she came suddenly upon the house. There it stood before her in its strength and stateliness, amid green shrubberies and beautiful grounds, which made a picture wonderful for loveliness all about it, itself the central beauty and grace of the whole.

It seemed to Margaret Phillips, as she gazed on the Gothic pile, that she had been suddenly enchanted into some foreign country. She could hardly believe that that great, massive palace of stone rose in its simple, grand architecture on the homely, everyday soil of Woburn, on the very land which the farmers sowed every autumn and ploughed every spring. It seemed to the girl's fine poetic instincts—although be it here understood that Margaret Phillips had never written a poem since she was a school-girl—that that stone palace belonged to the mediæval ages, that old legends and old songs should cluster thick about it, that brave men's deeds and beautiful women's love and grace should have hallowed it; and musing on all these things, and entirely unconscious of herself, she strayed through the broad iron gate, and through the thick hedges of shrubbery, and smiled up to the frowning turrets, her own smile, brave, glad, victorious. They could not frighten her any more; their power was gone; she had conquered them!

And so Margaret Phillips, following the serpentine path, came into the vicinity of the house. The quietness wooed her on, for, although the doors were open, there was no sight or sound of human life about the dwelling. And so the girl approached the veranda on the right side of the house, and, leaning against a large horse-chestnut tree, stood still and drank in with hungry eyes the scene before her. Suddenly there came the sound of light voices and rapid steps to her ear, and a moment later a company of gentlemen and ladies poured through the wide doors and scattered up and down the great veranda, some of the latter playfully fluttering over the mosaic pavement.

Margaret stood still under the horse-chestnut in some natural embarrassment, hoping that she should not be discovered, and would be able to make her escape unobserved. She had no idea what a picture she made, just in front of the old tree, with the sunset dropping its golden festoons all about her. She stood there, in her straw hat and the delicate lawn dress which two years before had been her father's gift, for one moment in a flutter of embarrassment; the next her feet were bound to the spot, and she lost all consciousness of her position, for there were three faces amid the company which she recognized, and the first of these was an elderly lady, with a portly figure and self-complacent countenance, near whom for a moment stood two graceful, haughty-looking girls. And this lady and those girls were the wife and daughters of the former senior partner of Mr. Phillips, the man who had wronged her father as no other man had ever done, the man who had taken advantage of Mr. Phillips's implicit confidence in him, and, managing to evade the law, had yet contrived to get his younger partner's property into his own hands, and availed himself of Mr. Phillips's illness to entirely control the firm and so involve matters that at the latter's death the widow and the daughter had been left penniless; and intimate as the families of the partners had previously been, Mrs. Lathrop and her daughters had entirely neglected Margaret and her mother after the change in the latter's circumstances. The Lathrops were living in splendor now on their ill-gotten gains; and all this surged and stormed through Margaret's soul as she gazed on them and thought of her delicate mother struggling with ill health and poverty in their lonely cottage, and of her own hard, daily toilsome life, and of him whose strong arm and loving heart would have shielded them from all this injustice and suffering. She stood still, with her pale face bent sternly on the veranda, almost wondering that some voice from heaven did not cry out against those people for the wrong which they and theirs had done her.

And while the girl stood there a group of gentlemen and ladies turned suddenly toward that side of the veranda nearest her, and started as they all caught sight of the still figure under the chestnut tree.

"Who is that lady?" Margaret heard the surprised question from more than one voice.

"Ellen, she is a lady; you had best go out and proffer her our hospitality," said one of the young gentlemen to a lady who stood near him.

"Oh, I know who it is," interposed at this moment an errand boy, who came up with some letters; "she is the district school-teacher; my cousin goes to her."

"Really, Ellen," interposed at this moment Julia Lathrop, the elder of the girls; and she tossed her haughty head, and her laugh and her words came silver and scornful to Margaret's ear—"I don't think I should give myself much trouble for the sake of a schoolma'am, instead of some princess in disguise, as I fancied the lady might be. Your hospitality would doubtless overwhelm her. But, dear me," shrugging her pretty shoulders, "I don't think such people ought to be allowed to wander around people's grounds in this fashion. It encourages too much freedom on their part." It was quite evident that Miss Lathrop had not recognized Margaret, or she would not have made this speech.

"I think so too," chimed in softly Caroline, the younger of the sisters.

The words and the laugh stung Margaret into a white calm. Some impulsion outside of herself seemed to send her out from the great horse-chestnut. She walked slowly and steadfastly right up to the people on the veranda, and confronted with her white face the dozen others that were bent down in amazement on her.

The start and look of blank consternation on three of those faces warned Margaret that they had recognized her; and turning to Julia Lathrop, she said in her clear, soft voice, which kept its tone steadfast to the end: "You will please tell your friends, Julia, as you well know that they have nothing to apprehend from freedom on my part, and as you do not perhaps know, I take here occasion to tell you that if your father had dealt honestly or justly by mine, if he had not through all the years that he was his partner, and on his dying bed, wronged and robbed him, my mother would not be now dwelling in poverty and obscurity, neither should I be a schoolma'am."

The words fired Margaret's lips, and she could not hold them back. Their effect cannot easily be described. Every one on the veranda heard them, and stood still, gazing from the young teacher to the Lathrops. They were all, mother and daughters, so overwhelmed with surprise, mortification, and it may be so conscience-stricken, that they could not utter a word. They stood there still, with crimson faces, looking confounded and convicted. And so Margaret turned away, and walked alone down the avenue which led out of the grounds.

The feeling which had sustained her for a time gave way as she was out of every one's sight. The gray turrets only looked down on the girl and saw her stagger feebly beyond the gate, and the tears flowed still from the brown eyes of Margaret Phillips.

She had not gone far when a quick step aroused her, and turning her tear-stained face, she saw the young gentleman who had proposed to extend her some courtesy when she stood under the chestnut tree. He was a man about thirty, tall, with a fine figure, and a face that was all that and more, for though it was not handsome, it was a good, strong, cultivated face, a face which compelled you to believe it, for it was inspired with justice, and courtesy, and real truth and manliness of character.

"Madam," said the young gentleman, lifting his hat with a grace which no courtier could have rivalled to a lost princess, "if you will do us the honor to accept it, we shall be most happy to send you home in our carriage. I fear you will find it a somewhat long and lonely walk at this late hour."

Margaret Phillips little suspected the beautiful and eloquent thanks which her brown eyes flashed up through their tears to the gentleman, before her lips, all unheeded now, and with a little tremulous flutter about them, answered: "Thank you. I am familiar with the road and with loneliness too, so I am compelled to decline your courtesy."

He did not renew it; he had fine intuition enough to perceive that the girl must prefer just now to be alone, so he answered, with a smile, and the smile of Gilbert Sackett was not just like the smile of most other men, for higher elements entered into it: "I hope, then, ma'am, you will give us some opportunity of renewing our courtesy at some time that shall find greater favor with yourself. We have only just learned you were our neighbors." And he lifted his hat and left her.

And Margaret went her way alone, and the young moon was like a silver lily blossoming amid the golden buds of stars which filled the sky.

Three years have passed. In a small alcove which opened out of the sitting-room in the stone house were gathered one day Mrs. Phillips, and Margaret, and Gilbert Sackett. The elder lady was a pleasant, gentle, dignified woman, and the bands of soft brown hair, faintly sifted with gray, lay smoothly about her face, which still retained something of the beauty of its girlhood. The gentleman and lady were hardly changed in these years, except that Margaret's face shone with a light and joy which it never wore in those days when she carried it up to the old red school in faith and patience.

Margaret was seated by the bay window, looking, with eyes that read its new meanings every day, to the beautiful landscape which stretched before her in a rain of June sunlight, the soft winds ruffling the short grass and loitering among the rare and beautiful shrubberies, and as she gazed a flock of thoughts or memories came into her head and over her face, which, although these were not sorrow, yet were touched with something tender and sad.

"What are you thinking of, my little wife?" asked Gilbert Sackett; and he tossed aside the paper, threw himself on the lounge, and leaned over toward Margaret.

Her hand, her soft, cool hand, moved tenderly through the short, thick chestnut hair. "What makes you ask that question?"—with a faint smile just touching her lips.

"Oh, several things. Why don't you answer it, Mrs. Sackett?"

"Had I better indulge him, mamma?" said the lady, and this time the smile was emphasized into archness as she turned toward her mother.

"Now, mother, I interpose with a protest there," exclaimed the gentleman. "You know you gave up your right and title here into my hands a year and a half ago, and my claim on her is absolute."

"I believe it is," answered Mrs. Phillips, smiling fondly on her children.

"There, Margaret, you hear!"

"Well, if you put it in that light," smiled the young wife, "I see no choice left but obedience and confession. So I was thinking of some mornings, which are not so far off but that they rise up very vividly before me now and then, and wondering how I should have felt at that time had any one told me, as I went up through the lane to the old red schoolhouse, and caught sight of the gray turrets that used to haunt and trouble me so, that in less than three years I should be the mistress here!"

"What should you have felt, little woman?" laughed Gilbert Sackett, pinching the small rose in his wife's cheek.

"It is impossible for me to tell. Yesterday, when you were away, I walked up through that old lane, and tried to feel as I used to, and to contrast the past with the 'to-day.'"

"And did you succeed, my dear child?" asked her mother, for both husband and parent were evidently touched with Margaret's simple avowal.

"Well, partly. I hope that I realized both with sufficient force and vividness to gather some lessons, some good from out them."

"Ah, Margaret, you are not like other women; you never were, and from that first time that I looked on your face until this day, you have always been unconsciously doing something quaint and original, something to startle and surprise me."

The small rose widened into bright bloom in the cheek of Margaret Sackett. "Oh, Gilbert, I was not seeking for quaintness or originality then!"

"My darling, nobody would ever suspect you of that. Do you suppose so prosaic and sensible a man as I am would have been so completely conquered at first sight as I was, had I not known well a vast deal more than you suspected, O innocent Margaret?"

"I wonder what gave me courage to do and say what I did at that time?" said the lady, speaking softly, half to herself.

"I don't; it was like you at such a time and under such circumstances. And, Margaret, I close my eyes, and see the whole scene again."

Before the lady could answer, a domestic suddenly entered with some letters for Mr. Sackett. Breaking the seal of the first one, with an apology to the ladies, he read for a little while.

At last he looked up. "Ellen and her husband have taken a house near Paris, and mother and Elizabeth will remain with them for a year or two; so, Margaret, you are sole mistress of the stone house, turrets and all."

"How those turrets are changed to me now!" she said. "They stand to me, wherever I catch a glimpse of them, as a sign of all home warmth, and grace, and happiness, and I have grown to love and welcome the sight of them always."

"Margaret, shall I tell you just what I am thinking of just now?"

"Yes; I shall be glad always to know your thoughts, Gilbert"—her little fingers braiding themselves once more in the bright chestnut hair.

"I am thinking that you are a very good woman, Margaret—the best woman, it seems to me, that God ever gave a man for his especial love and cherishing; and that I shall be a truer, better man because of your power and influence about my life." He spoke solemnly, fervidly now, looking into her face.

The tears were in her brown eyes now, as she leaned over him and said: "Oh, Gilbert, what you last said is the one prayer of my life!" And Margaret Sackett did not suspect that that prayer was its own fulfilment!

TO ONE WHO SAID, "I WILL LOVE THEE BEST OF ALL."

BY FREDERIC WRIGHT.

Nor for all the stars of night,
Nor for morning's rosy light,
Nor for all that land and sea
Ever could bestow on me,
Would I have thee yield me love
Due alone to God above!

Nor for beauty in my face,
Nor for eyes of lustrous grace,
Nor for gentle look or smile,
Nor the bloom that care may spoil,
Would I dare such worship own—
Worship due to God alone!

We are but creatures of a day,
Treading life's uncertain way,
Liable to sin and shame;
All around us are the same.
Let thy soul's first homage be Paid to God, and not to me!

SOIREE AT ALEPPO.

(From a Correspondent.)

Is winter-time the élite of Aleppo society, inclusive of Europeans, native Christians, and Hebrews, assemble ever and anon at each other's houses just to help the long evenings on their flight and enjoy a little keif. They are dreary enough, in all conscience, without this circle; for though there is but little severe cold, and that only of brief duration, the temperature is moist and humid, with abundance of rain; and solitude and solitary cogitations might only be suggestive of suicide. Therefore, after we have done justice to the late dinner (usually at 7 P. M.)—for we shall get no solids to eat where we are going—we go through the necessary toilet, etc., give an extra twist to moustache or curl to whiskers—for all the belles of Ketab will be there—and, armed with a sensibly large umbrella and goodly mackintosh, preceded by a servant carrying a lantern (which is a precaution necessary, not only on account of the narrow, dirty, dark, and deserted streets, but to keep off the legion of half-starving curs that would otherwise devour us, and avoid the unpleasant alternative of falling in with the night patrol, who would forthwith put us into chokey until morning—it being the law of the land to imprison all found abroad after dark without lantern or light of some description), we walk forth into the night, and so towards the house of Howaja Nalah Fattalah Karalla, who has a reception this evening.

Our host and hostess are lineal descendants of one of the most ancient and respectable Aleppine families, tracing their descent easily as far back as the time when all the commerce of the Indies passed through Aleppo—the route via the Cape of Good Hope being then undiscovered, and when Venice had many princely merchants residing in this city. Before the earthquake of 1821 this family had a splendid mansion in one of the best khans in the city, where from generation to generation had accumulated the choicest and the rarest porcelain vases, etc., besides untold wealth in jewels and other gems and jewelry. At one fell swoop, even as it were in the twinkling of an eye, the house, in common with the greater part of the city, was levelled with the ground, and the fruits of years of toil and hundreds upon hundreds of miles of weary and fatiguing journeyings were destroyed and irrevocably lost. Our host found himself one amongst some thousands that had lost their everything and had a fresh start to make in life. Thankful, however, that their lives had been spared amidst the utter desolation and sorrow that reigned around, they migrated to this suburban and pleasantly situated spot, called Ketab, and there constructed houses on a modern and lighter pattern, and built so as best to resist any recurrence of such a frightful calamity. With this prelude we arrive at the door of our host's house, which is brilliantly lighted up, and whence the hum of many voices issuing assures us that we are not the first arrivals.

"Allah! Salah mete salami!" This from our aged host and hostess, and signifying, in hyperboles, "You are welcome as the dew in summer," we are escorted to the further end of the room behind the musicians and ensconced amongst comfortable cushions upon a luxurious divan, receive and return the usual flow of compliments, and then fall to smoking like chimneys over a cookshop. Our position is an admirable one from which to scan the motley assemblage and see all that is going forward. The very pink of Aleppine fashion is rapidly assembling, and to do them special honor the hostess has procured the services of the celebrated Hadjih-Bashi and his band of musicians, who are tuning up horribly, with the intention of bursting forth into superb strains, such as shall astonish the weak minds of all strangers. The group is seated upon a Turkey rug, and the leader plays upon a stringed instrument something like half an Æolian harp laid flat upon the floor: he performs with the aid of a species of steel talon, attached thimblewise to each forefinger. So long as he restricts himself to this instrument, the melody emitted is really soft and pleasant; very soon, however, the guitar plays, throws his overbalance of discord into the music, and drowns the soft notes of the stringed instrument with his abominable twang-twanging, wholly regardless of accord as regards the timing of the two instruments performing, or tune, or anything else. What, however, can be expected from such a wretch with a dried old gourd with three strings to perform upon? In all conscience, the music is villanous enough at this stage of the proceeding; but it has far, very far, from arrived at its climax of horrors. The heartless vocalist throws in his contribution, in the shape of a sudden, loud, prolonged, and dirge-like yell, hanging on the last quaver so long and obstinately that he is obliged to hold his jaw with his hand for fear of dislocating it. In our opinion, the wailing at an Irish wake is far more lively; especially, varied as it is by an occasional fight. But quot homines, etc., the old axiom stands good here as elsewhere: the ancient in the kalpak, or cap of honor (a badge of high dignity, and a hereditary one enjoyed by some families whose ancestors did noted service to the state in bygone times), is evidently enraptured with the performance, and can hardly restrain himself putting in an extra quaver or two when the vocalist at length stops from utter exhaustion, pulling up as abruptly as a cavalry charger, and dropping his voice as quickly as a monkey would a hot potato. This latter method of abruptly terminating music is considered the very acme of vocal art; and, truth to say, it must be a difficult knack. If the ancient in the kalpak looks fascinated, the foreign refugee doctor of the troops in the city, who sits next to him, and whose first experience this is of Oriental melody, is lost in unfathomable surprise at the glee evinced by his neighbor, marvelling secretly whether really any human being with tympanum in healthy state could other than shudder at the performance just concluded. Next to this fresh importation, and utterly callous to everything else going on around them, are a couple of merchants, native and European, deep in commerce, and discussing in whispers projects of future specs to be undertaken in gallinut and scammony. Not in so low a whisper is their all-engrossing conversation, however, but that the wary Hebrews near them are picking up useful crumbs of information which they will assuredly turn to account when occasion requires. In the background are congregated the small fry of the evening discussing the merits and dress of everybody but themselves. These are mostly small shopkeepers, and so forth, who, as a rule, may be classified as of the genus toadies.

But what can all this stir be that is going on at the further end of the room? Oh, we perceive the mighty man, the lion of the evening, has arrived, accompanied by his lady and suite, and preceded by six sturdy, silver-caned cu-wasses, who form a kind of avenue at the entrance-door, through which the pompous official struts with indescribable grandeur. This is Signor Console Generales of some Power that never carries on a ha'porth of trade with any part of Syria. However, in return for serving gratis, he is granted the dignity of a Baron, and sports a splendid uniform, with cocked hat and multifarious plumes, to say nothing of his decorations of the golden spurs, and divers others, amongst which, mayhap, is the order of the Mouse in the Mustard-pot. Our host and his son receive the lion with almost humiliating cringings in their endeavors to do him honor, and it is delightful to see how urbanely he receives these attentions, smiling over his stiff cravat benignantly. Even the two French doctors, who are loudly argumentative on professional subjects, drop their noise and their gesticulations to do homage to M. le Baron; for M. le Baron has a large and wealthy family, and commands great influence; and, all said and done, these disputatious disciples of Æsculapius are but a couple of hungry adventurers, ready to grapple with and cure every malady, imaginary or real; if the former, so much the easier, and it is a complaint that oftentimes besets the well-to-do and indolent in their plethoric repose even in our own favored country.

The lady conversing with the Consul is of an independent, jealous kind of disposition, and little disposed to knuckle down to the lion and his party; and as for the Consul himself, being a salaried one and of private independent means, he can afford to sit and chuckle alike at the offerers and the receivers of fawning flattery; and so this couple smoke and chat together amicably.

* Seated on a divan are the lady guests of the evening, inhaling alternately the perfumed fumes of the nargheel, or whispering scraps and odds and ends of scandal, to be improved upon and retailed hereafter. The pretty and fascinating young daughters of the house are handing round small fingans of coffee to the assembled guests; a continuous supply of this refreshing beverage being always ready to hand, and simmering on the ledge of a well-piled-up mangal, or brazier of bright charcoal, which also supplies the coals used by the smokers of the long pipe, at the same time that it contributes a genial warmth to the atmosphere of the room, which is lighted by a splendid chandelier, adding brilliancy to the rich costumes and headdresses of the lady guests. Contrasting wonderfully with the noise and bustle going forward is the faithful old house-dog, fast asleep, not far from the mangal.

By and by the Adonis and the belle of the evening (the latter after much coaxing and persuading) walk into the centre of the rooms with all the grace and dignity of people born and bred at court. Now step we a measure; the music at first is low, and the motions of the dancers, each armed with an embroidered handkerchief, slow and graceful also. Presently both musicians and dancers warm with the theme, till ultimately the music gets deafeningly loud and awfully rapid, and the dancers so excited that they whirl and twirl about—very gracefully withal—but so rapidly as to perfectly bewilder and make one giddy. The old lady spectator is positively enchanted, and claps with her old wizened-up hands to encourage and urge on the dancers at such a rate that one can almost hear the bones rattling together. Towards the end, everybody assembled is expected to clap hands, till, just as the dance terminates, the old dog awakes from a trance of terror, and joins his wail to the equally discordant voice of the musician.

So the evening passes. Now a dance, now a song, very often amateur; then some wretched lunatic of a foreigner comes out of a corner with a fiddle, and scrapes out some national anthem or ditty. Sometimes a profusely moustached professor of the guitar gives an extract from some favorite opera, accompanying the music with a low bass growl, his voice reminding one of some fierce animal trying to make its way through a thicket. So passes the evening till nigh upon midnight, when lanterns are relit and cloaks resumed, the ladies enveloping themselves in white sheets up to the very eyes, and sailing out into the dark night like so many ghosts issuing forth from a vault. A glass of something hot before leaving, and a freshly-lighted cigar, and we follow in the wake of the departed, waking the still night into countless echoes with snatches of songs sung in far distant lands, and which are pleasanter to us as souvenirs than a thousand soirées at Aleppo, diverting, entertaining, and profitable though these better undoubtedly are.

LINES.

BY LEMUEL H. WILSON.

GENTLY close the heavy lid,
For the brightness all has fled
From the violet eyes;
Part the tresses from her brow,
It is pale and icy now;
Press thy lips to lips of clay,
For the soul is far away,
Wandering in the skies.

Fold anew those taper hands,
Clasped by tender, flowery bands
All unconsciously;
Deck with flowers the radiant hair,
She is wondrously fair;
Is it death, or is it sleep?
Press again your quivering lip
To those lips of clay.

Strong heart, where is now thy pride?
She has fallen by thy side—
Here thy joys end;
Ah, the world is dark! but where
Wilt thou hide thy deep despair?
For the sods are pressing new Damp and heavy on her brow,
Where the willows bend.

Wander there at twilight hours,
Beautify the tomb with flowers
Watered oft with tears;
Feeble heart, thy boasted strength
Dwells in agony at length,
For her smile you are denied,
And the world is dark and wide,
Shadowed deep with fears.

Heard ye not the cadence sweet
Of her voice, with song replete,
In the heavenly choir?
Saw ye not the violet eyes
Beaming with a glad surprise?
But the vision passed away,
Leaving on my path a ray,
Quickening desire.

Toll thou on with patience; "hope Bears the fainting spirit up."
Thou shalt meet again
In a fairer world than ours—
Land where never-fading flowers
Grace the heavenly plain.

HOW TO REACH THE HEART.—We have found throughout a not very long career, but very extended experience, that kindness is the surest way to reach the human heart, and that harshness is a northern, frost-laden blast, hardening a current that should flow as merrily as a brook in spring. Kindness makes sunshine wherever it goes; it finds its way into the hidden treasures of the heart, and brings forth treasures of gold. Harshness, on the contrary, seals them forever. What does kindness do at home? It makes the mother's lullaby sweeter than the song of the lark, the care-laden brows of the father and the man of business less severe in their expression, and the children joyous without being riotous. Abroad, it assists the fallen, encourages the virtuous, and looks with true charity on the extremely unfortunate—those in the broad way who perhaps have never been taught that the narrow path was the best, or had turned from it at the solicitation of temptation. Kindness is the real law of life, the link that connects earth with heaven, the true philosopher's stone, for all it touches it turns to virgin gold—the true gold, wherewith we purchase contentment, peace, and love.

We should forget that there is any such thing as suffering in the world, were we not occasionally reminded of it through our own.

In order to deserve a true friend you must first learn to be one.

It is often better to have a great deal of harm happen to one: a great deal may arouse you to remove what a little will only accustom you to endure.

THE DUET.

BY S. ANNIE FROST.

(See Plate.)

"THERE is a family moving into the big house on the hill." Willie Holmes fully appreciated the importance of his announcement, and expected the flood of questions which followed it. A family moving into the big house on the hill! Why, the big house had been empty ever since Willie was a wee, toddling baby, and he was now fourteen years old. He, in company with the other village boys, had spent hours of unmitigated enjoyment playing tag in the large deserted garden, or, creeping in through the long closed windows, roaming at will in the wide halls and empty rooms. It was the house, par excellence, of Linwood, towering in its lofty position over the little clusters of cottages in the vale formed by the hill's rising, and occupying, with its wide sweep of garden, orchard, and fancy ground, almost the whole eminence. There were men in the village who had seriously thought of taking possession of the pretentious brick mansion; but from year to year it had been postponed, the builder and proprietor having left it with an agent, who did not urge its claims.

"Who are they, Willie?" The question was put by his elder sister Nettie, who opened her large blue eyes with great interest at his announcement.

The Holmes family were at tea when Master Will came in with the latest news, and he dashed off to make himself presentable before he gave Nettie an answer. They were Robert Holmes' only children, yet beside Nettie sat one evidently much at home in the family. A tall, well-knit figure, curling brown hair, large hazel eyes, and handsome features made Wilson Rivers no unsightly addition to the farmer's well-spread board, and Nettie had evidently found this out. She was a simple, modest country girl, this heroine of mine, and when the young doctor came with his introductory letters to ask board at the farmer's, Nettie's voice was one to urge his claims.

He was a man of sparkling intellect (yet not frothy, for his brilliants were pure, dug from the mines of knowledge) and courteous, winning manners. Soon popular in his profession, he had learned early in his stay at Linwood to find the home parlor the most attractive of them all. To Nettie his presence was a source of never-ending delight. Stories of travel, incidents gleaned from the ever-varying scenes of an active life, bright scraps of book knowledge, criticisms that related the novel or recited the poem, these were the interests that made Nettie's eyes glow, her cheeks flush, and hastened the day's toil that the evening might be all free for listening. She was so pretty, so intelligent in spite of her modest estimate of herself, so eager to listen, yet so winningly shy, that Wilson was only too ready to join her when she stole softly into the parlor after tea. He was not her lover by protestation, yet in these long winter evenings, the summer rambles, drives, or rides, two hearts were fast knitting together in this pleasant cottage of Linwood. Two years had Dr. Rivers lived with Farmer Holmes at the time my story commences, and Nettie had grown from a shy, blushing school-girl into a beautiful maiden, modest yet, but self-possessed, and in the social gatherings of the village a belle amongst her companions. No party was complete without Nettie Holmes, and of course the Doctor was her escort to all. Many sly, laughing speeches were made about Nettie's beau, but she heeded none of them. No words of love-making had ever passed between herself and Wilson, Rivers, yet she felt confident in the certainty of his love, sure that at some good time he would tell her of it. It was part of her very being, this love and trust, and so, happy and constant, she waited for him to confirm his actions by speech. He was her constant companion, her teacher, her protector, her escort, and in her pure little heart she firmly believed her lover.

And after this long preamble, during which Willie has washed his hands and taken his place at the tea-table, we come back to the eventful fact—the big house on the hill was taken.

"Such furniture!" said Willie, with much energy. "Such chairs and tables! All the way from New York they came! The folks are New Yorkers, too. They've got a big box that is a piano, somebody says."

"Oh," said Nettie, with wide opened eyes, "I do so long to hear a piano! Who are they, Willie?"

"Why, there's a lady and three daughters. One of them is married, and has two more little girls; then there's a grown up son. The married one is named Sawyer; her husband is in the navy, and he's away. The mother is a widow; her name is Loftus."

"A widow!" cried Wilson.

Nettie looked at him in utter amazement. His face was white as death, his bloodless lips parted, his eyes fixed on Willie with a strange stare. Seeing that he had attracted the attention of all the family, he gave a nervous little laugh, and abruptly left the table.

Nettie's interest in the big house and its inmates was lost in her wonderment about Wilson. He was always so self-possessed and quiet that this sudden agitation was as new as it was alarming. It was quite late in the evening before he joined them in the parlor, but when he came he was self-possessed and quiet as if no word had ever stirred the depths of his heart to such marked manifestation. His manner to Nettie, always affectionate, had a new tenderness, his voice a new tone that thrilled her with happiness; yet there was a sadness lurking in the depths of his dark eyes, a shadow on his brow that had never been so deep. He was never gay, but his usual manner was cheerful; now it was quiet and sad, as if a new, strange grief had befallen him.

It was not long before the new-comers were the queens of the village. With wealth and style, the young ladies were gracious in manner, courteous to callers, and prompt to make friends. Walter, the son, was handsome enough to win his way easily in the hearts of the villagers, and the big house was one of the most popular in Linwood. They had been in their new home but a short time when Nettie called with her mother to welcome them and extend the hospitality of the farm to the new-comers. The little village beauty returned delighted with her visit; Mrs. Loftus and Mrs. Sawyer were so kind, the girls, Winnie and Emily, so handsome, and the son so courteous. Nettie could talk of nothing else, and the Doctor listened eagerly. He asked a thousand questions, calling the girls by their Christian names, and flushing out of his customary dignity to pour forth his eager interrogations.

"You will go with us on Thursday evening, will you not?" said Nettie. "We are invited to tea, and the invitation includes you. There will be no company, but Emily has promised that I shall hear the piano."

"I go! No—I—well, yes, I will go," said the Doctor, and again his pale face made Nettie wonder.

Thursday evening, the eventful evening, came, and at what would be deemed in cities an unfashionably early hour the guests arrived at the big house. Mrs. Holmes, Nettie, and Willie came first; the others were to join them after tea. The afternoon passed pleasantly, though Nettie, in her constant little heart, wished Walter would not be quite so attentive, and was glad that Wilson was not there to see. It was early still when Farmer Holmes and the Doctor arrived. Mrs. Holmes and Mrs. Loftus were in the nursery, deep in the mysteries of a new apron pattern, and upon Nettie fell the task of introducing the Doctor and her father. The latter was cordial and pleasant in his greeting, but the Doctor's face was pallid, and the hand that held Nettie's cold as death. He made a stiff bow, and stood leaning against the mantelpiece, evidently ill at ease. Nettie, accustomed to see him the life of society, courteous and popular, puzzled her brain in vain to account for this strange manner. It threw a chill over them all. At last, to break the spell, the sisters threw open the grand piano, and began to play, first Emily, then Winnie, and finally both sat down for a duet.

Where was the pleasure Nettie expected to derive from hearing that wonderful instrument? Gone! lost in her strange bewilderment over Wilson's conduct. From the moment when the piano was opened his face had changed from its cold reserve to a look of the most eager interest. He had come nearer and nearer to the piano, till, leaning forward, his whole soul was in the eager eyes watching the players.

Walter Loftus had drawn Nettie down to a seat, and was leaning over near her, talking with lovelike earnestness, and his mother, gliding softly in, took the seat to her right; yet, while her answers were polite to the host, her ear could catch Wilson's quick breathing, and if she turned her head, it was to see his eyes fastened upon the players. At last the long duet was over, and the groups round the piano moved their position. Nettie stood up, Walter still beside her.

Her heart was sick with a new sensation. Never in his warmest moods had Wilson's eyes rested upon her as they now rested upon Emily Loftus, and when Mrs. Sawyer took her turn at the piano, Nettie saw Wilson bend over the young lady with an earnest face and tender manner that cut her heart like a knife. All the evening he was beside her, and the walk home was taken in silence. This was but the beginning of her sorrow. Day after day, Wilson Rivers was the guest of the big house, and while Nettie, keeping her heart still for him, spite of its pain, was cold and distant to Walter, his attentions to the fair Emily redoubled. They walked together, and rode. The long evenings, before spent in the farmhouse so pleasantly, were now lonely and sad for Nettie, while Wilson was away at the big house.

Poor little Nettie! Her sweet face grew pale over her sick, sad heart; and if for an hour Wilson's still gentle attentions called back the smile to her lip, it faded when he left her. What were her modest charms to this dashing, accomplished city girl's? Nothing! Though he broke her heart, she found excuses for him in the beauty of her rival.

It was late in the fall, and the Loftus family had been some two months in Linwood, when one evening Nettie passed through the grounds on her way from the village home. Farmer Holmes lived, as did many others, on the south side of the hill, while the shops of the village were principally on the north side. The path through the garden of the big house was a thoroughfare for those passing over the hill, and Nettie took it. She did not raise her eyes, from a long fit of musing, till she stood in front of the house; then the light from the parlor windows, striking across her path, made her look up. One look, and she stood as if nailed to the spot.

It was a cruel scene for her loving heart that was passing in that gayly furnished parlor. Wilson was standing by the fireplace, and Emily Loftus was before him. Some tale of interest his eager lips were telling, for she listened with flushed cheeks and quivering lip, till he opened his arms to fold her in a long, close embrace. Then the door opened, and the rest came in. Emily sprang to her mother's side, telling some new found happiness, and then as the group closed round Wilson, Nettie, with a cry of pain, ran forward with a fearful speed homeward. Home! home to shut herself close in her little room, and pour forth her bitter woe in choking sobs. She had so loved, so trusted him, that it seemed as if she could not bear this proof of faithlessness and live. The long night passed without one hour of sleep.

How wildly and blindly she had loved him! Many nights before she had lain awake to think of him; but then it was to recall his soft, sweet voice, as it murmured low cadences of poetry, or in clear clarion tones taught her to sing some favorite ballad, praising her clear bird-like voice. It was to think of his goodness, his kind care in his profession, and humbly to wonder how he could love so ignorant and simple a country girl as herself.

Now, now, she felt bitterly that, while she had been loving with all the fervor of her warm impulsive heart, he had been trifling, testing, perhaps, his powers of pleasing. The morning found her pale and weary, but with the innate pride of womanhood she rose, resolved that he should not triumph over her whom he had slighted and injured.

She was in the dining-room when he entered, and she fairly started when she saw his face. All the gravity, the half sadness which had always marked it, was gone, and in its place shone a joy that was radiant. Never had his face lighted with such a smile as he gave her then, crossing the room to take her hand in a warm cordial pressure.

"Can you give me an hour after breakfast?" he asked; "I have something to tell you, Nettie."

Never had his voice dwelt with such lingering fondness upon her name. Was he about to make her the confidante of his love? She believed this; yet she could smile and say,

"Certainly!"

His impatience to tell was as great as was her dread of listening; for he hurried through the meal, and then, not speaking of her untouched cup and plate, he took her little cold hand and led her into the parlor.

"Nettie," he said, as soon as he had seated himself beside her, "I am going to tell you who I am!"

Nettie opened her big blue eyes.

"Yes," he said, laughing, "I know! I am Dr. Wilson Rivers, medical practitioner of this lovely village of Linwood; but that is not all. My father died when I was but ten years old, leaving my mother a widow with five children—two sisters older than myself, one sister and brother younger. Between this young sister and myself there was the strongest tie of love, and we were from babyhood almost inseparable. When my own father had been some two years dead, my mother married again, and then my misery commenced. I cannot tell you all the persecutions my stepfather lavished upon me, simply because I of all was the only one who opposed my mother's marriage. To her he was a kind husband, he was proud of my beautiful sisters, and my brother was too young to cross him; but his hatred for myself was one of the ruling passions of his life. I was a high-spirited, passionate boy, and my patience was soon exhausted. Daily my father's anger was visited upon me for some petty fault, till, driven desperate by persecution, I ran away from home.

"For two years my life was passed working hard for my bread as a newsboy in Philadelphia. I had, fortunately, money enough for my passage from New York, and something to purchase my first bundle of papers. Then, under the exposure, fatigue, and lonely homesickness, my health gave way. I was very ill, but from that illness dates the change in my life. The landlady of the house where I boarded, a kind-hearted woman, sent for Dr. Rivers, one of the warmest hearted, most eccentric old bachelors that ever lived. Something in his forlorn little patient interested him, and he soon won my confidence. I will not weary you with the history of our friendship. Suffice it to say, that I rose from that sick bed to become the adopted son of my physician. He was wealthy, and had me educated in his own profession. Before he took me home, he exacted from me a promise that I would never return to my stepfather, and I willingly gave it. Upon his death, I became, by his will, heir to his property, and, having a strong love for my profession, sought out a quiet home where I could at once enjoy my practice, and the delights of country life.

"And now, Nettie, comes the happy part of my story. I have found my mother, sisters, and brother free from the tyrant who made my boyhood so wretched. I was afraid they would never forgive the prodigal who so suddenly and selfishly left them, and for weeks I dared not speak. Last night my sister spoke so tenderly, so regretfully of the brother whom she had lost that I could keep silence no longer. I shall never take the name they have all adopted, but my mother is Mrs. Loftus, and my sisters are your friends."

Happy little Nettie! Spite of herself, the joy she felt would spring up to her expressive face, the dimpling smile to her lip, the color to her cheek. And when, in a more tender, earnest tone, Wilson preferred a suit near to his heart, there did not live in Linwood a prouder, happier little maiden than Nettie. With the frank simplicity of a child, she told him all her doubts and misery of the past few weeks, receiving reiterated assurances of his faithful love.

It was a happy evening—the one that followed this confidence. In the parlor of the big house, the newly-found brother brought the blushing little Nettie to his mother, sisters, and brother, as a claimant for love, and most cordially was she welcomed.

They were all standing round the piano, when Emily struck the first chords of a duet from Martha.

"Ah, Em!" said Wilson, "can you ever guess how, when you played that once before, I was longing to rush at you like a maniac and clasp you in my arms?"

"You showed it in your eyes," said Nettie, in a low tone that reached his ear only; "from that duet dated all my dream of misery."

"And my hope of happiness," he said, softly, "dates from those strong chords."

THE CASKET OF THE YEAR.

BY WILLIE E. PABOR.

Pearl the Second.—February.

By Numa named, to Neptune dedicate,
And patroned by St. Valentine the Good—
I at Time's portals with thy welcome wait
As a true lover of the seasons should.

Thy span, by two suns briefer than the rest,
Hath little that is genial to bestow!

The stream still hides within the Ice King's breast,
And Winter sits upon his throne of snow.

The wind still whistles through the leafless trees,
And Nature, in her desolate array,
Waits—like a devotee upon her knees—
The veil that falls; the clouds that rolls away—

Waits, in the patience of a perfect hope,
The coming of a better, brighter day;
When roses shall their blushing bosoms ope,
And yield the far-famed odors of Cathay.

Within thy circle fireside pleasures yet
Have power to charm; the song and tale go round
The hearth where all the loving ones have met
When Night has round each home her mantle-bound.

Within thy circle lies the natal hour
Of good Saint Valentine, the lover's friend;
Youths and fair maidens own his magic power,
And all their wishes to his welcome tend.

And thou canst also claim my natal day,
Who was our country's Founder, Father, Friend!
Whose hallowed precepts we would still obey!
Whose gift of Freedom we would still defend.

For these we welcome thee! for these we twine
The fragrant flower of Memory for thee!
Amid the odors floating round thy shrine
We yield thee tribute on our bended knee.

CHAPTER III.

SUMMER had come to the country with its bloom and its beauty, its harvests and its holidays. In town its fever heat drew noisome smells from overcharged sewers, and the black, oily paste to which the shower that should have been refreshing had changed the dust of crowded thoroughfares. Cleaner pavements, in the higher portions of the city, burned through shoe-soles; glass radiated heat to polished stone, and stone radiated, in its turn, to brick, that waited until the evening to throw off its surplus caloric in hot, suffocating waves that made yet more oppressive the close nights. The gay procession of fashionable humming-birds had commenced their migrations, steam-boats and excursion-craft multiplied at the wharves, and the iron steed put forth all his tremendous might to bear onward the long train of self-exiled travellers.

The Hunts, too, must leave town; Lucy must, at all events, have a full season, and a brilliant one, if possible, for it was her second summer, and much might depend upon it. Her mother would accompany her, of course; and equally of course her father could not; that is, he must return after escorting them to Saratoga, and spend the remainder of the warm months at home. His business would not allow him to take an extended vacation. The boys were easily disposed of, being boarded every summer at the farmhouse of an early friend of Mr. Hunt's, where they were acceptable inmates, their clothes as well cared for as they were at home, and their morals more diligently cultivated. The younger girls caused that excellent manager, their mother, more perplexity. This was not the first time she had repented her indiscretion in allowing Sarah to “come out” before her elder sister had “gone off.” But “Sarah was so tall and so womanly in her appearance that it looked queer, and would set people to talking if I kept her back,” she was accustomed to excuse her impolitic move to her friends. This summer she realized, as she had not done before, the inconvenience of having two full-fledged young ladies upon the carpet at once. Lucy's elegant and varied wardrobe, and the certain expenses in prospect for her and her chaperon at Spa, seaside, and en route, left a balance in hand of the sum allotted for the season's expenditure that was startling in its meagreness. Mrs. Hunt was a capital financier, a peerless economist, but the exigency taxed her resources to the utmost.

One morning she arose with a lightened heart and a smoother brow. “I've settled it!” she exclaimed to her husband, shaking him from his matutinal doze.

The “Eureka!” of the Syracusan mathematician was not more lofty in its exultation. Forthwith she unfolded to him her scheme. She was a native of New Jersey, “the Jarseys” she had heard it called in her father's house—had probably thus denominated the gallant little State herself in her girlhood. In and around the pretty, quiet village of Shrewsbury there were still resident scores of her relatives whose very names she had sedulously forgotten. One alone she could not, in conscience or in nature, dismiss to such oblivion. This was her elder and only sister, long married to a respectable and worthy farmer, and living within a mile of the “old place,” where both sisters had drawn the first breath of life. Twice since Mrs. Hunt had lived in the city had this kind friend been summoned on account of the dangerous illness of the former, and her presence and nursing had restored peace, order, and health to the household. The earlier of these occasions was that of the second child's birth, and in the softened mood of her convalescence Mrs. Hunt had bestowed upon the babe her sister's name—Sarah Benson—a homely appellative she had oftentimes regretted since. At distant and irregular intervals, one, two, three years, Mr. or Mrs. Benson visited their connections in “York;” but the intercourse grew more difficult and broken as time rolled on and the distance widened between the plain country folk and their rising relations. Then, again, death had been busy in the farmhouse; coffin after coffin, of varying lengths, but all short, was lifted over the threshold and laid away in the village graveyard, until but one was left to the parents of the seven little ones that had been given to them, and to that one nature had denied the gifts of speech and hearing. Grief and the infirmities of approaching old age disinclined the worthy pair to stir from home, and their ambitious sister was too busy in building up a "set" of her own, and paving the way for her daughters' distinction, to hide her light for ever so short a period in so obscure a corner as her former home.

Aunt Sarah, however, could not forget her nursing. Every few months there arrived some simple token of affectionate remembrance to "the child" she had not seen since she wore short frocks and pinafores. The reception of a basket of fruit, thus dispatched, was the suggestive power to Mrs. Hunt's present plan. She had made up her mind, so she informed her husband straightway, to write that very day—yes! that very forenoon, to "Sister Benson," and inquire whether she would board Sarah and Jeannie for a couple of months.

"I don't s'pose she will let me pay board for them, but she will be pleased to have 'em as long as they like to stay. It's never been exactly convenient for me to let any of the children go there for so many years, and it's so fur off. But dear me! sometimes I feel real bad about seeing so little of my only sister!"—a heavy sigh. "And there 'll be the expenses of two saved, out and out, for they won't need a great variety of clothes in that out-of-the-way place."

"But how will the girls, Sarah and Jeannie, fancy being sent off so?" inquired Mr. Hunt.

"Oh, as to that, it is late in the day for my children to dispute what I say shall be done; and Sarah's jest that odd that she 'll like this notion twenty times better than going to Newport or Saratoga. I know her! As to Jeannie, she is satisfied to be with her sister anywhere. She is getting thin, too; she looks real peaked, and there's nothing in creation so good for ailing children as the salt-water bath. They have first-rate still-water bathing not a quarter of a mile from sister's. It's jest the thing, I tell you! The wonder is it never came into my head before."

Mr. Hunt had his sigh now. "Somehow or other he was always down in the mouth when the family broke up for the summer," his wife frequently complained, and his lack of sympathy now excited her just ire.

"Upon my word, Mr. H.! anybody would think that I was the poorest wife in the world to you to see and hear you whenever I talk to you of my plans and household affairs. You look as if you was about to be hanged, instead of feeling obliged to me for turning, and twisting, and contriving, and studying, day and night, how to save your money, and spend what we must lay out to the best advantage. I can tell you what—there's few women would make your income go as far as I do."

"I know that, my dear. The question is"—Mr. Hunt paused, cleared his throat, and strained his nerves for a mighty effort, an unprecedented exercise of moral courage—"the question is, Betsy, whether our income is stretched in the right direction!" Mistaking the stare of petrified incredulity he received for fixed attention, the infatuated man went on: "This doubt is always forced upon me when we separate in July, some to go to one place, some to another, a broken, wandering family for months together. I am growing old, and I love to have my children about me; I begin to feel the want of a home. There is Johnson, in the —— Bank, gets five hundred less per annum than I do; yet, after living quietly here a few years, he bought himself a snug cottage up the river, and has his family there in their own house, everything handsome and comfortable about them. I have been in the harness for a long while; I expect to die in it. I don't mind work—hard work! but it seems to me sometimes that we would all be better satisfied if we had more to show, or rather to hold, for our money; if there were less of this straining after appearances, this constant study to make both ends meet."

"And it has come to this!"—Mrs. Hunt sank into a chair, and began to cry. "This is my thanks for slaving and toiling for better than twenty years to get you and your children a stand in the world! It isn't for myself that I care. I can work my fingers to the bone, and live upon a crust! I can scrape and save five dollars or so a month! I can bury myself in the country! But your children! those dear, sweet girls that have had the best education money can buy, and that to-day visit such people as the Murrays, and Sandersons, and Hoopers, and Bayers, and meet the Castors and Crinnalls at parties—millionaires, all of 'em, the cream of the upper crust! I don't deny that I have been ambitious for them, and I did hope that you had something of the same spirit; and now to think of your complaining, and moping, and groaning over the money you say I've been and wasted! Oh! oh! oh!"

"You misunderstood me, my dear; I merely questioned whether we were acting wisely in making so much display upon so little substance. We are not millionaires, whatever may be said of the girls' visiting acquaintances, and I tremble sometimes to think how all this false show may end."

Mr. Hunt's borrowed courage had not evaporated entirely.

"That's distrusting Providence, Mr. H. ! It's downright sinful, and what I shouldn't have looked for from you. I can tell you how it will end. If both of us live ten years longer, you will see your daughters riding in their own carriages, and leaders of the tong, and your sons among the first gentlemen of the city. If this does not turn out true, you needn't ever trust my word again. I've set my head upon getting Lucy off my hands this summer, and well off; and, mark my words, Mr. H., it shall be done!"

One part of her mother's prophecy was fulfilled in Sarah's manner of receiving the proposition so nearly affecting her comfort during the summer. Lucy wondered at the cheerful alacrity with which she consented to be "hidden away in that horrid bore of a farmhouse," and Jeannie cried as her elder sister "supposed that they would eat in Aunt Sarah's kitchen, along with the servant-men."

"Lucy, be quiet!" interposed her mother. "Your aunt is not a common poor person. Mr. Benson is a man of independent means, quite rich for the country. They live very nicely, and I have no doubt but that your sisters will be happy there."

Sarah had drawn Jeannie to her, and was telling her of the rides and walks they would take together, the ducks and chickens they would feed, and the merry plunges in the salt water that were to be daily luxuries. Ere the recital was concluded, the child was impatient for the hour of departure, and indignant when she heard that Aunt Sarah must be heard from before they could venture to present themselves, bag and baggage, at her door. There was nothing feigned in Sarah's satisfaction; her preparations were made with far more pleasure than if she were to accompany Lucy. The seclusion that would have been slow death to the latter was full of charms for the book-loving sister. Aunt Sarah would be kind; the novel phases of human nature she would meet would amuse and interest her; and, besides these, there was Jeannie to love and pet, and river, field, and grove for studies and society. She panted for the country and liberty from the tyrannous shackles of city customs.

Aunt Sarah wrote promptly and cordially, rejecting the offered compensation, and begging for her nieces' company as long as they could content themselves in so retired a place. Simple-minded as she was, she knew enough to be sure that the belles and beaux of the neighborhood would be very unsuitable mates for her expected visitors. If her own girls had lived, she would have asked nothing higher for them in this world than to have them grow up respected, beloved, and happy, among the acquaintances and friends of their parents; but "Sister Betsy's children had been raised so differently!" she said to her husband. "I don't know what we will do to amuse them."

"They will find amusement—never fear," was the farmer's response. "Let city folks alone for seeing wonders where those that have lived among them all their lives never found anything uncommon. They are welcome to the pony whenever they've a mind to ride, and Jim or I will find time to drive them around a'most every day; and what with riding, and boating, and bathing, I guess they can get rid of the time."

Before the day set for the coming of the guests there appeared upon the stage an unexpected and welcome ally to Aunt Sarah's benevolent designs of making her nieces' sojourn agreeable. This personage we will let the good woman herself describe.

"You needn't trouble yourself to fix up for tea, dear," she said to Sarah, the afternoon of her arrival, as she prepared to remove her traveling-dress. "There's nobody here besides husband, and me, and Charley, except husband's nephew, Philip Benson, from the South. He comes North 'most every summer, and never goes back without paying us a visit. He's been here three days now. But he is just as easy as an old shoe, and sociable as can be, so you won't mind him."

"Uncle Benson has relatives at the South, then?" said Sarah, seeing herself called upon to say something.

"One brother—James. He went to Georgy when he wasn't more than sixteen years old, and has lived there ever since. He married a rich wife, I believe"—sinking her voice—"and has made money fast, I've heard. Philip never says a word about their wealth, but his father owns a great plantation, for husband asked him how many acres they worked. Then the children—there are four of them—have had fine educations, and always spend money freely. Philip is not the sort to boast of anything that belongs to him or his. He is a good-hearted boy. He was here the August my last daughter—my Betsy—died, and I shall never forget how kind and tender he was then. I can't look at him without thinking how my Alick would have been just his age if he had lived. One was born on the fourth and the other the fifth of the same April."

Keeping up a decent show of interest in these family details, Sarah divested Jeannie of her sacque and dress, and substituted a cool blue gingham and a muslin apron. Then, as the child was wild to run out of doors, she suffered her to go, charging her not to pass the boundary of the yard fence. Aunt Sarah was dressed in a second mourning de laine, with a very plain cap, and while the heat obliged Sarah to lay aside the thick and dusty garment she had worn all day, she had too much tact to offer a strong contrast in her own attire to her unpretending surroundings. A neat sprigged lawn, modest and inexpensive, was not out of place among the old-fashioned furniture of her chamber, nor in the "best room," to which they presently descended.

Aunt Sarah ushered her into the apartment with some stiffness of ceremony. In truth, she was not herself there often, or long enough to feel quite at ease, her property though it was. Alleging the necessity of "seeing to the tea," she bade her niece "make herself at home," threw open a blind that she "might see the river," and left her.

First, Sarah looked around the room. It was large and square, and had four windows, two in front and two in the rear. The floor was covered by a well-saved carpet, of a pattern so antique that it was in itself a curiosity; heavy tables of a mahogany dark with age: upright chairs, with slippery leathern seats; a ponderous sofa, covered with haircloth; small mirrors, with twisted frames, between the windows; two black profiles, of life-size, over the mantel, and in the fireplace a jar of asparagus boughs, were appointments that might have repelled the looker-on, but for the scrupulous, shining cleanliness of every article. It was a scene so strange to Sarah that she could not but smile as she withdrew her eyes and turned to the landscape commanded by her window.

The sight changed the gleam of good-humored amusement to one of more heartfelt pleasure. Beyond the grassy walks and flower-borders of the garden behind the house lay green meadows, sloping down to the river, broad and smooth at this point, so placid now that it mirrored every rope and seam of the sails resting quietly upon its surface, and the white cottages along the banks, while the banks themselves, with their tufts and crowns of foliage, drooping willows and lofty elms, found a faithful yet a beautified counterpart in the stream. The reflected blush of the crimson west upon its bosom was shot with flickers of golden light, and faded in the distance into the blue-gray twilight. The air seemed to grow more deliciously cool as the gazer thought of the hot, pent-up city, and beds of thyme and lavender added their evening incense.

The hum of cheerful voices joined pleasantly with the soothing influences of the hour, and, changing her position slightly, Sarah beheld the speakers. Upon a turfy mound, at the foot of an apple-tree, sat Jeannie beside a gentleman, whose hands she watched with pleased interest, as did also a boy of fifteen or thereabouts, who knelt on the grass before them. Sarah divined at once that this was her aunt's deaf and dumb son. The gentleman was apparently interpreting to Jeannie all that passed between himself and the lad, and her gleeful laugh showed it to be a lively dialogue. Could this be Mr. Benson's nephew, the beardless youth Sarah had pictured him to herself from Aunt Sarah's description? He could not have been less than six-and-twenty, had dark hair and a close, curling beard, an intelligent, handsome face, and notwithstanding his loose summer sack and lounging attitude, one discerned plainly traces of uncommon grace and strength in his form.

"What is he, I wonder? A gallant professional beau, who will entangle me in my speech, and be an inevitable appendage in the excursions? I flattered myself I would be safe from all such drawbacks," thought Sarah, in genuine vexation, as she obeyed her aunt's summons to tea.

Perhaps Mr. Benson read as much in her countenance, for, beyond a few polite, very unremarkable observations, addressed to her when his hosts made it a necessity for him to do so, he paid her no visible attention during the whole evening. The next day he set off, the minute breakfast was over, with his gun and game-bag, and was gone until sunset.

Sarah sat at her chamber window as he came up to the back door; and, screened by the vine trained over the sash, she watched him as he tossed his game-bag to Charley and shook hands with Jeannie, who ran up to him with the familiarity of an old acquaintance.

"What luck?" questioned his uncle.

"Nothing to boast of, sir; yet enough to repay me for my tramp. I have been down to the shore."

"Philip Benson! Well, you beat everything! I suppose you have walked as much as ten miles in all!" exclaimed Aunt Sarah, with a sort of reproachful admiration.

"I dare say, madam, and am none the worse for it to-night. I am getting used to your sand, uncle; it used to tire me, I confess."

He disappeared into the kitchen, probably to perform the ablutions needful after his day's walk and work, for it was several minutes before he returned. Charley had carried the game-bag to the mound under the tree, and was exhibiting its contents—mostly snipe and red-winged blackbirds—to his little cousin.

"It is refreshing to see something in the shape of man that is neither an effeminate dandy nor a business machine," soliloquized Sarah. "Ten miles on foot! How I would like to set that task for certain of our Broadway exquisites!"

"She isn't a bit like a city girl!" Aunt Sarah was saying, as she followed Philip into the outer air.

"I am glad to hear that she is likely to be a nice companion for you, madam. I thought, from her appearance, that you would suit each other," was the reply, certainly respectful enough, but whose lurking accent of dry indifference sent the blood to Sarah's face.

Hastily withdrawing from the open window, and beyond the reach of the voices that discussed her merits, she waited to recover equanimity before going down stairs. In vain she chided herself for her sudden heat. Mortified she was, and even more ashamed of herself than angry with the cool young man who had pronounced her to be a fitting associate for her excellent but unpolished aunt. While his every look and intonation bespoke the educated gentleman, a being as different in mental as in physical muscle from the fops who formed her sister's train, had he weighed her against the refined women of his own class and clime, and adjudged her this place? At heart she felt the injustice, and, stimulated by the sting, arose the resolve that he should learn and confess his error. Not tamely or willingly would she accept an ignoble station at the hands of one whom she inwardly recognized as capable of a true valuation of what she esteemed worthy.

She looked haughty, not humbled, when she took her seat opposite her critic at the tea-table. "A nice companion," she was saying over to herself. The very phrase, borrowed, as it was, from Aunt Sarah's vocabulary, seemed to her seasoned with contempt. She kept down fire and scorn, however, when Mr. Benson accosted her with the tritest of remarks upon the probable heat of the day in town as contrasted with the invigorating breeze, with its faint, delicious sea flavor, that rustled the grapevines and fluttered the white curtains at the dining-room door and windows. Her answer was not exactly gracious, but it advanced the one tempting step beyond a mere reply.

Thus was the ice broken, and for the rest of the meal, Aunt Sarah and "Uncle Nathan"—as he requested his nieces to style him—had respite from the duty of active entertainment, so far as conversation went. To Sarah's surprise, Mr. Benson talked to her almost as he would have done to another man. He spoke of notable persons, places, and books—things of which she had heard and read—without affectation of reserve or a shade of pretension; and to her rejoinders—brief and constrained for awhile—then, as she forgot herself in her subject, pertinent, earnest, salient, he gave more than courteous heed. It was the unaffected interest of an inquirer; the entire attention of one who felt that he received more than he gave.

They parted for the night with a bow and a smile that was with each a mute acknowledgment of pleasure derived from the companionship of the other; and if neither looked forward to the meeting of the morrow as a renewal of congenial intercourse, both carried to their rest the effects of an agreeable surprise in the events of the evening.

CHAPTER IV.

A WEEK had passed since the arrival of the city nieces at the farmhouse. An early tea, one of Aunt Sarah's generous and appetizing repasts, was over; and through the garden, out at the gate that terminated the middle walk, and across the strip of meadow-land, danced Charley and Jeannie, followed at a more sedate pace by Philip Benson and Sarah. Seven days' rustication had wrought a marked change in the town-bred girl. There was a lighter bond in her step, and in her cheek a clear, pink glow, while her eyes looked softly, yet brightly, from out the shadow of her gypsy hat, a look of half surprise, half confidence in her companion's face.

"One week ago," he was saying, "how firmly I made up my mind that you and I could never be anything but strangers to each other!

How I disliked you for coming down here to interfere with my liberty and leisure!"

"But even then you thought that I would prove a 'nice companion,' for Aunt Sarah perceived my suitability to her society," was the demure reply.

"Who told you that I said so?"

"Not Aunt Sarah herself, although she considered it honest praise. I overheard it accidentally from my window, and I can assure you properly appreciated the compliment, which, by the way, was more in the tone than the words."

"And you were thereby piqued to a different style of behavior. Bravo! did ever another seed so worthless bring forth so rich a harvest? I am glad I said it. Here is the boat."

It was a pretty little affair—Charley's property and care, and he was already in his seat at the bow, oar in hand. Philip helped Sarah in, placed Jeannie beside her, and stationing himself upon the middle bench took up a second pair of oars. A noiseless dip of the four, and the craft glided out into the stream, then up against the tide, the water rippling into a foamy wake on either side of the sharp bow. A row was now the regular sequel to the day's enjoyments, and to Jeannie, at least, the climax of its pleasures.

"Pull that way, please, Mr. Benson!" she cried. "There! right through that beautiful red water!"

A skilful sweep brought them to the spot designated, but the crimson deserted the wave as they neared it, and left dull gray in its stead.

"It is too bad!" complained the child, pointing back to the track of their boat, quivering amidst the fickle radiance she had thought to reach by this change of course. "It is behind us and before us—everywhere but where we are!"

"Is there a moral in that?" questioned Philip, smiling at Sarah.

"Perhaps so."

A fortnight before, how assured would have been her reply! How gloomy her recognition of the analogy! Changed as was her mood, a shade fell over her countenance. Was it of apprehension, and did Philip thus interpret it?

"I could not love Life and this fair world as I do, if I conceded this to be universally true," he said. "That there comes, sometimes, a glory to the present, beside which the hues of past and future fade and are forgotten, I must and will believe. Such, it seems to me, must be the rapture of reciprocal and acknowledged affection; the joy of reunion after long separation from the beloved one; the bliss of reconciliation after estrangement. Have you ever thought how much happier we would be if we were to live only in the Now we have, and never strain our eyes with searchings for the lights and shades of what may be before us, or with 'mournful looking' after what is gone?"

"Yet is this possible?" asked Sarah, earnestly. "Does not the very constitution of our natures forbid it? To me that would be a miserably tame, dead-level existence over which Hope sheds no enchanting illusions; like this river, as we saw it three days ago, cold and sombre as the rain-clouds that hung above it. O no! give me anything but the chill, neutral tint of such a life as thousands are content to lead—people who expect nothing, fear nothing—I had almost said, feel nothing!"

"That is because every principle of your being is at war with commonplaces. Tell me frankly, Miss Sarah, did you ever meet another woman who had as much character as yourself?"

"I do not know that I understand the full bearing of your question." She leaned on the side of the boat, her hand playing in the water, her lips working in an irresolute timidity that was oddly at variance with their habitual firmness.

"I am aware," she began, slowly and gravely, "that I express myself too strongly at times; that I am more abrupt in language and action than most other girls. I have always been told so; but it is natural to me. My character has many rough and sharp edges that need softening and rounding—"

"In order to render you one of the pretty automatons, the well-draped, thoroughly-oiled pieces of human clockwork that decorate men's homes—falsely so called—in these days of gloss and humbug!" interrupted Philip with energy. "I am sick to death of the dollish 'sweet creatures' every boarding-school turns out by the score. I understand all the wires that work the dear puppets—flatter myself that I can put them through their paces (excuse the slang!) in as short a time as any other man of my age in the country. The delightful divinities! A little music, and a little less French; a skimming of the arts and sciences; and it is a rare thing to meet one who can tell an art from a science ten days after she has graduated—a stock of pet phrases—all hyperbolic, consequently unmeaning—a glib utterance of the same; a steady devotion to balls, beau-catching, gossip, and fancy-work; voilà the modern fine lady—the stuff we are expected to make wives of! Wives! save the mark! I never think of the possibility of being thus ensnared without an involuntary repetition of a portion of the Litany—“From all such, etc. etc.!”

He plied his oars with renewed activity for a moment, then suspended them to continue, in a softer tone: “And this is the representative woman of your Utopia, Miss Sarah?”

“Did I intimate, much less assert, such a heresy?” responded she, laughing. “But there is a golden mean somewhere—a union of gentleness and energy; of domestic and literary taste; of independence and submission. I have seen such in my day dreams. She is my Ideal.”

“Which you will one day embody. No reproachful looks! This is the sincerity of a friend. I have promised never to flatter you again, and do not violate the pledge in speaking thus. From my boyhood, I have made human nature my study, and it would be hard to convince me that I err in this case.”

“You do! indeed you do!” exclaimed Sarah, with a look of real pain. “I lack the first characteristic of the portrait I have drawn. I am not gentle! I never was. I fear that I never will be!”

“Let us hear a competent witness on that head. Jeannie!” to the child, who was busy spelling on her fingers to Charley; his nods and smiles to her, from the far end of the boat, being more intelligible to her than were her attempts to signal her meaning to him. “Jeannie!” repeated Philip, as he caught her eye. “Come, and whisper in my ear which of your sisters you love the best. Maybe I won’t tell tales out of school to the one you care least for.”

“I don’t care who knows!” said the saucy, but affectionate child. “Sis’ Lucy is the prettiest, and she never scolds me either; but she doesn’t make my clothes, and tell me nice stories, and help me with my lessons, and all that, you know. She isn’t my dear, best sister!” And, springing up suddenly, she threw her arms around Sarah’s neck, with a kiss that answered the question with emphasis.

Sarah’s lip trembled. The share of affection she had hitherto dared to claim as her own had barely sufficed to keep her heart from starving outright. She had often dreamed of fulness of love as a stay and comfort, as solace and nutriment in a world whose wrong side was ever turned to her. Now there dawned upon her the sweetness and beauty of a new revelation, the bliss of loving and being beloved. Over life floated a warm, purple tinge, like the sunset light upon the river. For the first time within the reach of her memory her heart rested!

In the smile whose overflowing gave a tender loveliness to her features, Philip saw the effect he had wished and anticipated, and, motioning to Charley to let the boat drift with the current, he picked up the guitar, that, by Sarah’s request, was always taken along in these excursions.

“The dew is on the blossom,
And the young moon on the sea:
It is the twilight hour—
The hour for you and me;
The time when memory lingers
Across life’s dreary track,
When the past floats up before us,
And the lost comes stealing back.”

It was a love song, inimitable in its purity and tenderness, with just the touch of sadness that insured its passage to the heart. Sarah’s smile was softer, but it was a smile still, as the melody arose on the quiet air. When the ballad was concluded, she only said: “Another, please!”

Philip sang more than well. Without extraordinary power, his voice had a rich and flexible quality of tone and a delicacy of expression that never failed to fascinate. To the rapt and listening girl it seemed as if time could bring no more delicious fate than thus to glide on ever upon this empurpled, enchanted stream, the summer heavens above her, and, thrilling ear and soul, the witching lullaby that rocked her spirit to dreams of the youth she had never had, the love for which she had longed with all the wild intensity, the fervent yearning, her deep heart could feel.

Still they floated on with the receding tide, its low washing against the sides of their boat filling up the pauses of the music. The burning red and gold of the sky cooled into the mellow tints of twilight, and the pale curve of the young moon shone with increasing lustre. Jeannie fell asleep, her head upon her sister’s lap; the dumb boy sat motionless as stone, his dark eyes fixed on the moon; there seemed some spell upon the little party. Boat after boat passed them, almost noiselessly, for far into the clear evening went the tones of the singer’s voice, and the dullest hearer could not withhold the tribute of admiring silence until beyond its reach.

And Sarah, happy in the strange, restful languor that locked her senses to all except the blessed present, dreamed on, the music but a part of her ideal world, this new and beautiful life. Into it stole presently a theme of sadness. a strain of grief, a heart-cry, that, ere she was aware, wrung her own heart-strings with anguish.

"The long, long, weary day
Is passed in tears away,
And still at evening I am weeping.
When from my window's height
I look out on the night,
I still am weeping,
My lone watch keeping.

"When I, his truth to prove,
Would tattle with my love,
He'd say, 'For me thou wilt be weeping,
When, at some future day,
I shall be far away;
Thou wilt be weeping,
Thy lone watch keeping.'

"Alas! if land or sea
Had parted him from me,
I would not these sad tears be weeping;
But hope he'd come once more,
And love me as before;
And say, 'Cease weeping,
Thy lone watch keeping.'

"But he is dead and gone,
Whose heart was mine alone,
And now for him I'm sadly weeping.
His face I ne'er shall see,
And naught is left to me
But bitter weeping,
My lone watch keeping."

If ever a pierced and utterly hopeless soul poured forth its plaint in musical measure, it was in the wondrously simple and unspeakably plaintive air to which these words are set. There breathes in it a spirit wail so mournfully sincere that one recognizes its sob in the very chords of the accompaniment. The mere murmur of the melody, were no words uttered, tells the story of grieving desolation.

Sarah did not move or speak, yet upon her enchanted ground a cloud had fallen. She saw the high casement and its tearful gazer into the night, a night not of music, and moonlight, and love, but chill, and wet, and dreary. Rain dripped from eaves and trees; stone steps and pavements caught a ghastly gleam from street-lamps; save that sorrowful watcher, there was no living creature abroad or awake. She grew cold and sick with looking into those despairing eyes; the gloom, the loneliness, the woe of that vigil became her own, and her heart sank swooning beneath the burden.

As he ceased the song, Philip looked up for some comment or request. To his surprise, she only clasped her hands in a gesture that might have been either relief from or abandonment to woe, and bowed her head upon them. Puzzled, yet flattered by her emotion, he refrained from interrupting her; and, resuming his oars, lent the impetus of their stroke to that of the tide. Nothing was said until the keel grated upon the shelly beach opposite the farmhouse. Then, as Philip stooped to lift the unconscious Jeannie, he imagined that he discerned the gleam of the sinking moon upon Sarah's dripping eyelashes.

The fancy pursued him after he had gone up to his room. Seated at his window, looking out upon the now starlit sky, he smoked more than one cigar before his musing fit was ended. It was not the love-reverie of a smitten boy. He believed that he had passed that stage of sentimentalism ten years before. That Southerner of the male gender who has not been consumed by the fires and arisen as good as new from the ashes of half a dozen never-dying passions before he is eighteen, who has not offered the heart and hand, which as often as otherwise constitute his chiefest earthly possessions, to some elect fair one by the time he is one-and-twenty, is voted "slow" or invulnerable. If these susceptible sons of a fervid clime did not take to love-making as naturally as does a duckling to the pond by the time the eggshell is fairly off of its head, they would certainly be initiated while in the callow state by the rules and customs of society. Courtship is at first a pastime, then an art, then, when the earnestness of a real attachment takes hold of their impassioned natures, it is the one all-absorbing, eager pursuit of existence, until rewarded by the acquisition of its object or thwarted by the decided refusal of the hard-hearted Dulcinea.

This state of things, this code of Cupid, every Southern girl understands, and shapes her conduct accordingly. Sportively, yet warily, she plays around the hook, and he is a very fortunate angler who does not in the moment of fancied success discover that she has carried off the bait as a trophy upon which to feed her vanity, and left him to be the laughing-stock of the curious spectators of this double game. She is imperturbable to meaning Équivoques, receives pretty speeches and tender glances at their current value, and not until the suit becomes close and ardent, the attachment palpable to every one else, and is confessed in so many words, does she allow herself to be persuaded that her adorer is "in earnest," and really desires to awaken a sympathetic emotion in her bosom.

Philip Benson was no wanton trifler with woman's feelings. On the contrary, he had gained the reputation in his circle of an invincible, indifferent looker-on of the pseudo and real combats, in Love's name, that were continually transpiring around him. Chivalrous in tone, gallant in action, as he was, the girls feared while they liked and admired him. They called him critical, fastidious, cold; and mockingly wondered why he persisted in going into company that, judging the future by the past, was so unlikely to furnish him with the consort he must be seeking. In reality, he was what he had avowed himself to Sarah—a student of human nature; an amateur in this species of social research—than which no other so frequently results in the complete deception of the inquirer. Certainly no other is so apt to find its culmination of devotion in a cold-blooded dissection of motive, morals, and sentiment; an unprincipled, reckless application of trial and test to the hearts and lives of its victims and final infidelity in all human good, except what is concentrated in the inspector's individual, personal self. Grown dainty amid the abundant supply of ordinary material, he comes at length to disdain common "subjects." Still less would he touch one already loathsome in the popular estimation, through excess of known and actual crime. But a character fresh and noble from the Creator's hand; a soul that dares to think and feel according to its innate sense of right; an intellect unhackneyed, not vitiated by worldly policy or the dogmas of the schools; a heart, tender and delicate—yet passionate in love or abhorrence; what an opportunity is here presented for the scalpel, the detective acid, the crucible, the microscope! It is not in fallible mortality to resist the temptation, and even professors of this ennobling pursuit, whose motto is, "The proper study of mankind is Man," are, as they allow with shame and confusion of face, themselves mortal. Of all the dignified humbugs of the solemn farce of life, deliver me from that creature self-styled "a student and judge of character!"

In Sarah Hunt, Philip discovered, to his surprise, a rare "specimen;" a volume, each leaf of which revealed new matter of interest. The attentions he had considered himself bound to pay her, in order to avoid wounding their kind hosts, were soon rendered from a widely different motive. It did not occur to him that he was transcending the limits of merely friendly courtesy, as prescribed by the etiquette of the region in which he was now a sojourner. He was, by no means, deficient in appreciation of his personal gifts; rated his powers of pleasing quite as highly as did his warmest admirers, although he had the common sense and tact to conceal this; but he would have repelled, as an aspersion upon his honor, the charge that he was endeavoring to win this young girl's affections, his heart being as yet untouched.

"Was it then altogether whole?" he asked himself to-night, with a coolness that should have been an immediate reply to the suggestion.

Side by side, he set two mental portraits, and strove deliberately, impartially to discern any traces of resemblance between the two. The future Mrs. Benson was a personage that engrossed much of his thoughts, and by long practice in the portrayal of her lineaments, he had brought his fancy sketch very nearly to perfection. A tall, Juno-like figure, with raven locks and large, melting eyes, unfathomable as clear; features of classic mould; an elastic, yet stately form; a disposition in which amiability tempered natural impetuosity, and generous impulse gave direction to gentle word and deed; a mind profoundly imbued with the love of learning, and in cultivation, if not strength, equal to his own; discretion, penetration, and docility combined in such proportions as should render her her husband's safest counsellor, yet willing follower; and controlling and toning the harmonious whole, a devotion to himself only second in degree, not inferior in quality, to worship of her Creator. This was the Ideal for whose embodiment our reasonable, modest Cœlebs was patiently waiting. Answer, O ye expectant, incipient Griseldas! who, from your beauteous ranks, will step into the prepared niche, and make the goddess a Reality?

And how appeared the rival picture in comparison?

"No, no!" he ejaculated, tossing the remnant of his third cigar into the garden. "I must seek further for the 'golden mean.' Intellect and heart are here, undoubtedly. I must have beauty and grace as well. Yet," he continued, reluctantly, "there are times when she would be quite handsome if she dressed better. It is a pity her love for the Beautiful does not enter into her choice of wearing apparel!"

In ten minutes more he was asleep, and dreamed that he stood at the altar with his long sought idea, when, as the last binding words were spoken, she changed to Sarah Hunt, arrayed in a light blue lawn of last year's fashion that made her look as sallow as a lemon, and, to his taste, as little to be desired for "human nature's daily food."

Poor Sarah! The visionary robe was a faithful reflection upon the dreamer's mental retina of a certain organdie which had formed a part of Lucy's wardrobe the previous summer, and, having become antiquated in six months' time, was altogether inadmissible in the belle's outfit of this season.

"Yet it cost an awful sum when it was new!" reasoned Mrs. Hunt, "and will make you a very useful dress while you are with your aunt, Sarah. It's too good to cut up for Jeannie!"

"But the color, mother?" objected the unwilling recipient.

"Pooh! who will notice that? Besides, if you had a good complexion, you could wear blue as well as anybody."

Sarah's stock of thin dresses was not plentiful; and, recalling this observation, she coupled it with the fact that she was growing rosy, and dared to equip herself in the azure garment, with what effect she did not dream and Mr. Philip Benson did!

WIDOWS: PART II.

THE YOUNG WIDOW.

"The storm that breaks the aged oak
But bows the slender elm."

It is all very well while the young widow goes about shrouded in her black garments, veiled like a nun, and as demure and reproachless as the lady abbess herself. People cry "poor thing," and think the better of themselves for their pity. But youth is stubborn stuff; it will contend for its rightful share of cheerfulness, no matter how it is hedged round by sorrow and care. The poor flower, planted in some dreary, shady nook, will send out its long stem, and crook, and bend, and fairly turn a corner, till it gets its face to the sunshine, and there it will bloom as bewitchingly as if its root and leaves were not hidden away in the dampness and gloom. So it is with the human heart in the glad morning of life. It is made for joy, and it knows it. Put it where you will, cramp it with poverty, cumber it with care, rack it with sorrow, or give it weary nights of pain, and it will yet smile through its tears, and win a sweetness out of woe.

The time must come when the widow in "her teens" will find it unnatural to be shut out from the free, pure air of heaven. Those heavy folds of orape seem to wall her into the desolation of the living tomb; they are cast aside, and her young face looks out once more on the world, which to her now lies in shadow.

Where is the loving pity, the tender sympathy that so welled up for her a twelvemonth ago? Winks, and nudges, and significant

"hems!" have taken the place of all that kindly current. Not that she is the less the object of general attention. Men love contraries, and even monstrosities; they will go hundreds of miles to see the midnight sun, and crowd and push to have a peep at the Tom Thumb man, the five-legged sheep, or the "bearded woman." It is perhaps as much to this peculiarity of our nature as to its nobler side that the young widow owes the conspicuousness of her position. Girlhood's bloom and the garments of mourning, the heart of youth and earth's sorest grief, these are combinations which cannot pass unnoticed. If a beautiful face chance to be within the closely quilled cap, the charm is complete. Even wiseacres, who pretend to adhere to that moral nursery theory—"handsome is that handsome does"—will be found quickening their pace or stretching their necks to have one look at the fair round cheeks or the dark eyes that are half shadowed by that long veil.

Now comes the perilous time for the young widow. She must walk circumspectly, if she would escape the wounds of that venomous adversary, the human tongue. Critics seem to have their sorrow-metres, by which they are enabled to tell exactly the degree of grief or resignation suited to this stage of her affliction, and wo be unto her if she come short of the standard! Alas! if, under any provocation, she should let slip a merry word or suffer her old, girlish laugh to ring out on the telltale air! If she have a pretty foot, she must be careful not to show it at a muddy crossing; if she have a white hand, it must never be ungloved on the background of her sombre garments. There must not be a trace of vanity or coquetry in her deportment, though she may have been a perfect bundle of these womanly imperfections in her days of maidenhood.

- For the young widow who feels reviving within her the natural joyousness and craving for society of her own age there seems no place provided. There is no rest for the sole of her foot on the social platform. She does not feel altogether in sympathy with the matrons of forty or fifty because she has been for a few months a wife. She has few subjects of interest in common with them. The cutting and making of children's clothing do not seem to her the great end of life, with or without a sewing-machine. She has no Jennie or Tommy to dress out like a Parisian doll; she wants no new patterns for little pants, no royal road to quilling ruffles. She has no housekeeping cares to confide; she probably lives with some uncle, or aunt, or mother, or brother, and knows no more of the kitchen of the establishment than of those mysterious African regions never penetrated by Park or Livingston, or the Frenchman who discovered (not invented) the gorilla. When these notable ladies discourse about their several "lords and masters," she can but sit a silent listener; there is no centre of attraction for her now. What wonder that she is a little "flighty," somewhat eccentric in her orbit! It is plain that she is out of place among the bobbing headdresses and busy knitting needles. If the young widow goes back to her old companions, the merry associates of her girlhood, she finds herself no more at home with them. They do not feel that she is any longer one of them. She can see that they do not expect her to join in their plans for amusement or their chatter about the beaux. Her own sense of propriety, too, forbids much to her which seems innocent for them. What shall she do? Who shall be her associates?

We do not forget that there are true young hearts which, having once loved and been left desolate, look upon the world as a place where they may give joy, but no longer receive it. On their quiet way they go, ministering to the suffering and cheering the sorrowful, giving forth to all who need the love that the one beloved object no longer monopolizes. It is not of these unselfish mourners we are speaking; we have for them no meed of praise; they are sure of a better and a more enduring treasure, when they who bear well the cross shall receive the crown.

We all acknowledge that we believe true affection to be the legitimate provocation to matrimony by the universal estimation of the misery and desolation of widowhood. Here, as in most cases, the generally received theory is the right one. Unfortunately, however, there are cases where Hymen's torch is quite innocent of any acquaintance with Cupid, and is merely lighted up as one might bring out a candle to put the seal to some deed of land or other weighty document. Women have married for a home, for a place of shelter, for an elegant establishment, for freedom, for an incomparable trousseau, to look pretty as a bride, to go to Europe, because such a man was cruelly "handsome, or rich, or the rage," and for what other senseless reasons the foolish creatures themselves only know. They have found themselves in a bondage which love only can make light, and the Christian heart hallow into happiness. Must such young widows grieve as if life were suddenly made all darkness for them?

There are true women who have given their best affection for but a name, a fleeting shadow, a worthless, effervescent interest that has fled before the honeymoon is over. They have found themselves tightly linked to one who has forfeited their every claim to respect or the faintest shadow of esteem. Can such wives continually mourn when the stern hand of death sundered the chain that had become so galling?

Everybody has a heart, speaking physiologically, a valuable apparatus, with which the most ingenious mortals cannot well dispense. There is a finer kind of mechanism, however, which we sometimes call by the same name, which is by no means so universal as the fleshly symbol. Some poor souls come into this world hopelessly shallow in their feelings. Whether they are thick-skinned or thin-skinned is a matter of no moment, since there is nothing to be shielded or covered, there are no sensibilities to be blunted, there is nothing to be wounded. They can't feel; you might as well find fault with a fish for his cold blood, or a mole for his blindness, as with them for floating placid or simpering along the changing river of life. Cloud or sunshine, rough water or smooth, it is all the same to them; on they go to make those comfortable, fat old ladies who "go to sleep evenings," and are never in anybody's way. What, then, is to become of those young widows who have worn mourning, but shed no bitter tears, and of those other elastic spirits who have had their sorrow cured by the very vigor of their youth and the upspringing of the natural wells of joy?

They generally answer the question for themselves in the most satisfactory manner, and another question too at the same time, a question which is to be "popped," bolted out if it is ever to find its way to the intended ear or the ear of the intended. They do well; they have Old Testament and New, example and precept, Ruth and Paul on their side. Young folks will toss their heads and speak slightly of them, young chits whose hearts go pit-a-pat at the sight of a handsome pair of boots and are all in a flutter at a word from a beau. It is very unselfish, truly; not at all the thing set down in novels! We would not put it in a book if we were writing one ourselves. Yet we are glad when we see the poor things find shelter in an honest man's home. The world is a rough place for a lone woman, and a dangerous one, too, when she is young and pretty, or warm-hearted. A kind, manly arm, thrust between her and malicious, peering faces, is just what she needs.

The young widow may marry if she be capable of a true affection, and its object be worthy of her choice, and there will be many kindly people to bid her God speed! She may marry, but her love-making must be of the discreetest sort; there must be no moonlight walks, no tender looks, no window-seat tête-à-têtes; they are barely allowable for the misses; they will not do at all for you, Young Widow. They are not to be forgiven; no, not for many a long year. The ill-natured public has a very tenacious memory; don't store it with tittle-tattle about your indiscretions. You must not be foolish, and blush and look conscious. If you cannot help it, you had better shut yourself up until you have a wife's right, and a husband to face the world for you. Do not have a long engagement; you will be the "town-talk" until you are married, and you may as well abridge as much as possible the period of your notoriety. Have a quiet wedding, no endless string of bridesmaids to titter behind your back, and be amused at your youthful airs. You have been through it all before, and everybody knows it. If you are conscious of the springing of a new affection, as pure and true, and perhaps higher and nobler than the first, keep this knowledge to yourself. Don't talk about your love for your second husband, but show its fruits in your home; you do not want to be a laughing-stock in polite circles. Your character may have been chastened by your sorrow; you may make a far better wife than before, but don't tell your good resolutions; let them be found out by their fulfilment. Above all, let him whom you have chosen have reason to rejoice that you have borne the yoke in your youth, and have been purified by passing through the fire.

The school-mistress is always haunted by hints of the regulations of the last teacher as authority for her proceedings; the more such hints she receives, the more oil of birch is administered to the advisers. Take warning, and do not founder on the rock fatal to such luckless pupils. Your first husband may have been a saint, a model in every department of life, but don't quote him for the benefit of number two. Your skein of silken bonds may seem to be winding ever so smoothly, but this will be sure to bring on a snarl which it will take more than patience to set right. Profit by the past yourself, but let it be a "dead past" for others. People never want your experience dug up and dissected for their benefit. Everybody has skeletons enough of his own mistakes to rattle in his ears when he wants a warning.

We speak generally, but if you marry a widower, the remark may be closely applicable.

But a truce to giving advice. Take our best wishes, Young Widow, so soon to be a wife. We are glad to see the wee wave-tossed, stranded bark once more trimmed and set for another voyage. All fair winds attend thee, and bring thee and thine into the blessed harbor where "there is neither marriage nor giving in marriage."

FLOWN.

BY MRS. F. A. MOORE.

Come with the duster, come with the broom:

Throw all the medicine vials away;
Up with the windows and back with the blinds—
Let in the light of the glad, young day.
Drape all the room in the saintliest white;
Gather fair roses to put in the vase,
And lay one—the purest of all you bring—
Beside the snow of that still, dead face.

Roll on your fingers her hair's pale gold,
And twine it around her forehead white;
And fold her still hands together, so,
That the wedding-ring may be in sight.
That ring—she has worn it but one swift year,
And very happy you two have been;
Few clouds have lowered above your world,
And few are the griefs that have entered in.

Yet you will remember—you think of it now—
As you press wild kisses on those mute lips,
How once you answered not back their love,
And the thought will lash you like scorpion whips.
You had quarrelled, you know, and she came first.
Tembling with hiding her yearning love,
And you—so foolishly piqued and proud—
Refused the kiss of your penitent dove.

But it matters not now. To-morrow—the hearse.
The dirge, the grave, and the empty nest:
The dark-eyed pansy, her favorite flower,
We'll plant all around her shadowy rest.
And when in the summer-time you are there,
Sit silent and breathless, that you may hear
The tones of her spirit-voice, and feel
The breath from her white wings floating near.

PARENTS must never put away their own youth. They must never cease to be young. Their sympathies and sensibilities should be always quick and fresh. They must be susceptible. They must love that which God made the child to love. Children need not only government, firm and mild, but sympathy, warm and tender. So long as parents are their best and most agreeable companions, children are comparatively safe, even in the society of others.

CROSS PURPOSES.

PEOPLE never look well travelling in cars ; women as a rule look worse than men. To be sure there is nothing particularly pleasant in seeing a gentleman leaning back in his seat with his felt hat pulled over his eyes, and his mouth open ; but men generally are enabled to while away the time with a magazine or book, and jumping out at every different station to get a breath of air, or a newspaper. But ladies cannot leave their seats ; they are always thirsty ; they do not dress well ; they look sleepy, and dusty, and dowdy, and no matter how hungry they are they cannot eat ; for surely no lady in her senses would eat in the cars, unless she was perfectly oblivious to her outward appearance. Now there are exceptions to every rule. And if you had been at the depot one fine afternoon in April, 18—, you would have seen the neatest little figure jump off the cars on the platform, and receive a kiss from a fat, pompous, good-natured looking individual ; and soon I had her little hand tucked through my arm as I led her off to the boat. When I had found a nice seat for her on the upper deck, I sat down opposite her, and we began a most interesting conversation ; but before I tell you what we said I must tell you who she was.

Now, when I was a young man, I was not sent to college, more 's the pity, but to a merchant's office, where I commenced at the beginning, made fires and swept out. For all that, I used to be very fond of visiting a pretty little cousin of mine, with long fair curls and blue eyes, who lived in a great house in the upper part of the city of New York. Time went on, and my love grew with my growth, and strengthened with my strength, when one evening I ventured my all of bliss in life and lost. Soon after she married a Captain Evans in the Navy, and went away beyond the seas ; but though lost to me I always loved her the same ; and when long years after she came back widowed to her childhood's home, with her little Laura, it was to me she ever looked for comfort and support in her affliction ; and when she died she placed her orphan child in my care, and made me promise, by the memory of my love for her, ever to be her good and true father.

I took a house, a plain old-fashioned house, and a prim, neat housekeeper, Mrs. Brown, who was Laura's nurse ; and then we three lived together in a homely, contented way, my little girl ever a gladdening sunbeam, making the dark places light and the world all cheery. But pleasant things cannot always last ; and so one day I took my Laura to school. She was fourteen, and the old house and the old man must be left, and the duties of life commenced. How well I remember, as I stood on the doorstep, how tightly the little arms were clasped around my neck, and the deep, heart-breaking sobs which came from under a mass of wavy brown hair, floating on my breast. I could never have bidden the dear child to leave me, but she, knowing my pain, pushed me from her, dried her tears, and smiled a good-by.

Every succeeding vacation the bright presence filled my home, each time more beautiful, more mischievous, more lovable ; and now that she is seated by my side, watching the water as we glide along, there is in my heart a measureless content to know that she will not leave me again, and as my heart speaks to her through my eyes, and I meet her answering smile, through the din of the noisy crowd the low words fall on my ear—"Our little parlor will never see another parting, dear uncle, for you will keep me with you always."

"Always, dear child," I answer ; "and God bless you and make you happy with me."

Any afternoon that summer, if you were passing my house, you would have seen the figure of my darling as she sat in the window, sewing and waiting for me to come home. There she sat and watched, and as I turned the corner of our street and came in sight, she was gone ; but a moment after she had the front door open, and was ready with her warm, welcoming kiss. Those days were the pleasantest of my life, and my thoughts were all of peace and contentment ; still my little girl soon drooped for want of company ; she missed the gay companionship of her school friends ; she missed the hum and never-ceasing noise of a large household. Here she was, only eighteen, in the early freshness of youth, shut up with an old man and woman—all her little confidences pent up in her breast, all her wild fancies and girlish dreams lost.

The young never confide in the aged ; nor would it be natural. One just entering into life is so sanguine, so full of joyous anticipations, has such an intense enjoyment of simple things, such a perfect confidence in the world, such a capacity for realizing and appreciating the bright, hopeful summer, basking in the full splendor of its sunbeams with scarcely a thought of the coming autumn. Oh, youth, thou hast gone from me forever, and left me nothing but dreams, idle dreams of faces and scenes so gradually fading away that even as I recall them they are dim—dim from my failing eyesight and the thick, clouded breath of time!

As I sat thus ruminating, one sultry summer evening, in my easy-chair, the half-finished cigar held lazily between my fingers, glancing now and then at the white-robed figure in the obscurity of the curtained window, and just catching the refrain of Laura's low-toned song, I formed a plan which, before a week elapsed, I saw executed. Yes, before the week was over, I had left Laura with Mrs. Brown, down at the sea-shore, where she could have the advantage of seeing nature, the ocean, and society, which latter, I thought, she needed most.

Three weeks passed away in which I never once received a word from Laura, as I had left town on a fishing excursion with some old friends. When I returned I took the cars for the sea-shore, and upon arriving at the nearest station, very impatiently received the intelligence that I must wait for the next stage to the house. At last it came, and after half an hour's dusty drive, we drew up at the end of the long porch of the hotel, when whom should I see but Laura promenading arm in arm with a gentleman? As I stood mutely gazing at her she turned, caught sight of me, and in another instant her arms were round my neck, and she had kissed me again and again.

When I had made myself presentable, Laura and I went in to a late tea. As we walked together up the long dining-hall, every one turned to look at her. I thought she appeared to be a great deal dressed, and when I hinted something of the kind she laughed, and told me that there was to be a "hop," she believed, that night.

After tea we took chairs and sat out on the porch. I asked Laura, "Who was that gentleman?"

"A friend of mine."

"How came he a friend?"

"Oh, I don't know; I suppose because he sat opposite me at table."

"And made love to you with his eyes while he passed the peas and asparagus?"

"Just exactly; how smart you are, uncle!"

"Well, but you must have been introduced to him, or else I shouldn't have seen you walking with him, little mischief. You did not know your old uncle was looking at you."

"O yes; his mother introduced him to me, and he has been very kind. The fact is, uncle, that I never knew what it was to be lonely till I came here. I did not know any one but your friend, old Mr. Lee, and a dreadful prosy old fellow he is. When I had bathed and taken a walk, there was nothing to do till tea-time, and then I would rather have been alone than have to talk to Mr. Lee; so I wandered up and down the beach till I was tired, and then after tea I would saunter through the parlors, then up and down the porch till I felt as if I couldn't draw another breath. I was overcome with ennui. I had determined the third night on asking Mr. Lee to send me back to the city the next morning, and just as I thought of him, he came towards me, bringing a lady whom I recognized at once as my vis-à-vis at table; he introduced her as Mrs. Grantley. I found her very pleasant, and after we had chatted a little while I said how dreadfully dull I thought it, and how I longed to be at home; but she said she would not hear of such a thing till she had tried her powers on me, and then together we walked into the parlor and sat down. Just then the band commenced a quadrille, and Mrs. Grantley asked me if I would dance. Without waiting for an answer, he introduced me to her son, and directly I was at the head of the room, in my place, and dancing. Afterwards we walked out on the porch, then, after a pleasant little talk, he took me back to his mother. I had had no chance of seeing how he looked while I was dancing with him, so, as he moved away, stopping now and then to exchange a word with other little groups of persons, I scrutinized him closely.

"How true it is that a man's beauty is in the expression of the face, not in the features! Mr. Grantley was not even good-looking; his features were large, his eyes black, and his hair quite gray; he was neither young nor old, but in the prime of life; his figure was large and portly, and he stooped slightly when walking, but one would hardly notice it unless it was pointed out. The expression of his face and his whole bearing were rather stern and commanding, but when he smiled it changed him entirely; there was perfect sunshine in it, 'twas irresistibly pleasant, one looked at him in amazement, and as the smile faded away you lost something, and could not rest till you had provoked it again. It was his nature to like few persons or things, but what he liked he liked well. He was not at all a lady's man, but he liked to converse with them, and generally was a favorite. Among gentlemen, and particularly young men, he was universally liked, he adapted his conversation so perfectly to the persons with whom he conversed, and always seemed to feel such an interest in them."

"You surely did not find out so much about him in that one evening?" I said.

"Yes; that is, these were my first impressions, and I have never seen any reason to change them."

"Well, you have given him a most excellent character. Am I to understand he has no faults?"

"Indeed, uncle, it is hardly fair to ask me such a question; I suppose he has faults, but in the little time I have known him he has always been polite and kind. To be sure, at times, I have wondered whether he really liked me or not, as sometimes he has taken great pains to be near me, going out walking with me in the morning, reading to me in the afternoon, and promenading the porch with me in the evening; then I might not see him again for the next day or two unless meeting him at meals. But one doesn't mind that much, as you know, otherwise I might get tired of him; there, 'speak of the spirit, the ghost will appear.'"

Just then Mr. Grantley crossed the piazza near us, and Laura calling him, he came up and was introduced to me. We entered into conversation; Laura left us and joined Mrs. Grantley in the parlor, where she was soon the centre of a little group, looking so bright and beautiful that, like a foolish old fellow that I was, I would pause in the conversation and call Mr. Grantley's attention to her ringing laugh and happy face, and indeed he was looking her way himself, and seemed to enjoy hearing and seeing her as much as I did.

After a very pleasant week, I was obliged to return to the city, and Laura would not hear of my going home alone, so I took her with me. The night before we left we were all sitting in the parlor talking over pleasures past and of anticipated meetings in the future, when Mrs. Grantley said:

"Why can't you all go to Havana with me this winter? I am obliged to go on business; and if we could only make up a party, how delightful it would be! Won't you and Laura join us, Mr. Smith?"

"Why, my dear madam," said I, "you would not want me to take such a journey at my time of life? I should never survive it."

"Now, Mr. Smith, that excuse will never do.

You only want us to compliment you on your youthfulness, etc. etc."

"I think you would enjoy the trip very much, Mr. Smith," said Edward Grantley. "Indeed, it is not much of a voyage in a good ship, and it would, no doubt, be very interesting to Miss Laura as well as yourself."

"O do, uncle!" chimed in Laura. "I want to be on

The sea, the sea, the open sea,
The blue, the fresh, the ever free!

Just to think how glorious to be where one can see no land—nothing but sea and sky!"

"And here is Miss Gardner and her brother, and Mary Henry going; that will be three. Edward and I are five, and you and Laura seven. Now do say you will go!" said Mrs. Grantley.

"O please, Mr. Smith," resounded from all sides.

"Indeed, my dear ladies, I cannot think of such a thing for myself; but if Mrs. Grantley will take very good care of my little girl here, I can see no reason why she shouldn't go."

"O, uncle, how could you think I would be so selfish as to leave you at home all alone! If you do not go, neither do I."

"Yes, but, Miss Laura, it would only be three short weeks, and I'm sure your uncle would like you to go," said Miss Gardner.

"O, yes, do go!" insisted the others.

"But, Laura," said I, "the very time you are gone, I will take to travel on business and make a visit to Mr. Lee. So now, as you see I can enjoy myself, you won't hesitate about going?"

"No; if you can arrange your plans so nicely, I'm sure I should be delighted to go. What month will you start, Mrs. Grantley?"

"Not till the first of December, for Miss Gardner says that in November it is oppressively warm, and the fever still raging."

"Well, you know, Laura," said Mary Henry, "this is the last of September, and it is only two months to wait. Just think how delightful it will be to go from winter to summer! The climate in the winter months at Havana is perfectly delightful."

"Oh, I'm sure I shall be pleased with everything!" said Laura.

"Particularly the sea-sickness, Miss Laura," said Mr. Grantley.

"That is malicious; you shall not dance with me for being so impertinent; I only hope you may have it for the whole party. Come, uncle, let us finish the evening with an old-fashioned reel."

We all stood up, and when through the dance I told Laura she must bid them all good-by, for we were to start very early in the morning; so immediately there commenced a general leave-taking, accompanied with innumerable kisses. I was rather curious to see how Laura would part with Mr. Grantley, but I could see him nowhere; he left the room as we commenced dancing, and had not come back. Just then I heard Laura say:

"You must remember me to your son, Mrs. Grantley."

"He will be disappointed at not seeing you, I am sure. I wonder where he is! Just wait one minute, and I will find him."

"Not on any account, Mrs. Grantley. I don't want him to come if he can't come of his own accord."

The next morning early we were off, and reached home safely that evening. Altogether, both Laura and I thought our trip had been pleasant. I tried to tease Laura about Mr. Grantley letting her go away without bidding her good-by, when she very coolly told me she had bid good-by to him that morning.

"This morning!" I said; "why, Laura, where did you see him?"

"It was while you were attending to the baggage. I was sitting waiting in the stage when Mr. Grantley came up and bid me good-morning."

"What did he say?"

"O, I believe he remarked on the beauty of the morning, hoped I would have a pleasant journey, and that he might have the pleasure of calling on me in the city."

All through the months of October and November Laura was very busy. She took Spanish lessons three times a week with her friends who were going to Havana, and, besides, went to a great many parties. The Spanish class, I told her, I thought was a great humbug. It generally met at Miss Gardner's, a pleasant old maid with a handsome brother; and I used to call for Laura about ten o'clock in the evening, and I scarcely ever entered the parlor without being greeted with shouts of laughter, and there was generally a game going on, "Blind Man's Buff," or "Fox and Geese." As for books, there was not a sign of them. I used to think, therefore, that they had not learned much; but Mrs. Grantley assured me that the young folks behaved very well during the lesson, and these games were only the winding up of the evening.

Laura and Mary Henry became quite intimate. They were hardly ever apart, and seemed to enjoy each other's society very much. They read together, made calls, and if I took Laura to the theatre or opera, we generally called at Miss Gardner's for Mary, who was her niece.

One evening I was reading out aloud a new novel to Laura and Mary, while they were busied over some laces and ribbons, when there was a ring at the door, and the maid handed in a basket of flowers with a card for "Miss Laura Evans." Mary began to admire the flowers, and I to guess at the donor, but there was not a single clue. I asked Laura if she could guess who sent them. She laughed and blushed, but said: "O, no! she could not guess, but the flowers were beautiful, and that was enough for her."

At length the day approached for them to sail; and on Tuesday morning, the first of December, we were all assembled on the deck of the steamer to bid adieu to the gay party. It was rather cold; so I proposed going down in the cabin to look at their state-rooms. We all went down and spent an hour very pleasantly in conversation, till the call came to clear the decks, and away we went down the side of the vessel, calling out little forgotten last words. The cannon boomed over the waters, and right gallantly the vessel glided away. I waited till Laura's handkerchief was no longer visible, and then hurried back to my office.

Laura's Diary.

Dec. 1st. After we were well under way, and the vessel as yet steady, Mrs. Grantley proposed that we should each retire to our state-room, take off our bonnets and cloaks, and prepare everything in case we should be sick. Mary Henry and I occupied a state-room opposite to Mrs. Grantley and Miss Gardner; the gentlemen were several rooms distant. When we were in our room, I asked Mary "if she did not think Mr. Grantley was uncommonly pleasant this morning?"

She said, "Yes, and no wonder, for he had met an old acquaintance on board, one of the loveliest-looking women she had ever seen, with a little boy about six years old."

"Then I suppose she was married?" I said, in as unconcerned a voice as I could.

"O, yes—a widow; and I think it is her cap that makes her so bewitching."

"A widow! Then it is Mrs. Ellis. I have often heard him speak of her."

"Why," said Mary, "if that is Mrs. Ellis, Mr. Grantley is guardian to her little boy."

"Indeed," I said, and then, not caring to hear any more about her, I walked out into the cabin, and sitting down upon the sofa, gazed long and earnestly at a very pretty group. There was Mr. Grantley sitting at a table writing, while Mrs. Ellis, leaning over his chair, dictated a list of things she was sure she would want, as she expected, she said, to be dreadfully seasick. Mr. Grantley was much amused at her decided manner and coquettish little ways, and at the unavailing attempts she made to keep her little boy still, who was racing up and down the cabin, striking against the chairs and tables with his little whip, and then trying to climb into Mr. Grantley's lap. After a while she coaxed him into a chair, set his nurse to watch him, then, sitting down beside Mr. Grantley, they spoke much lower, and seemed absorbed in their subject of conversation.

Gradually most of the ladies had taken seats, some with fancy work, others with books, all looking very sober. All our party but Mr. Grantley were sitting together. Occasionally Mrs. Grantley would pass her smelling-bottle around with a most significant smile, and if we looked at all sober she would scold us.

At last the vessel commenced to rock slowly from side to side, and the ladies standing around the stove took seats. As the motion increased, I threw a shawl around my shoulders, vowed I would go on deck, and persuaded Mary to accompany me. We made our way up the stairs, and stepped out on deck. For a time the change was pleasant, and we quite revived; but the wind seemed to freshen so fast that Mary said she could stand it no longer; so down we went into the cabin. A great many ladies had disappeared, among them Mrs. Grantley and Miss Gardner. I left Mary lying on a sofa, and hastened to their rooms. They were in their berths, but only complained of headache. I returned to Mary, sat down beside her, and bathed her head with bay-water. I glanced around the cabin. The ladies gradually laid down their work and books, then lanned their heads on their hands, and then one by one retreated to their state-rooms. Mary also I helped into her berth; then returned for the bay-water. I had just time to see Mr. Grantley and Mrs. Ellis still earnestly engaged in talking, when the vessel lurched, and losing my balance, I fell, but immediately getting up I protested I wasn't hurt, although Mr. Grantley had rushed to help me.

Dec. 2d and 3d. The next two days are blanks. I was seasick, and I know of no more dreadful sensation. Occasionally I would hear voices in the cabin, and sometimes I could distinguish the conversation. Regularly every meal Mr.

Grantley knocked at his mother's door, and then at ours, endeavoring to make us more comfortable, and vainly urging us to make an effort and come on deck, declaring we would never be well till we did.

Dec. 4th. This morning I felt so miserably weak from having eaten nothing, and lying so long in my berth, that I got up and dressed as well as I was able, threw a shawl around me, and staggered out to the cabin, when I sank down on a sofa in perfect despair. Oh, how I wished for home and my dear uncle! I felt how absolutely alone I was, no one to care for me, and, burying my face in my handkerchief, I sobbed from very weakness.

"How glad I am, my dear Miss Laura, to see you up once more! How do you feel this morning?" said Mr. Grantley.

I partly lifted my head, and then, to cover the blush I felt rising, I dropped it again, when he sat down beside me, and said he was quite a doctor, and would have to prescribe for his little patient. I told him I was not sick, but felt so weak and faint that I could not rise.

"Yes, yes," he said, "and a little homesick;" and then he softly stroked my hair, and said, "Poor child, I will soon make you well." Soon after the steward brought him a wineglassful of brandy, which he made me drink. A moment after he asked me if I could stand, and I did. He put my arm through his, and helped me up on deck. I never shall forget how glorious the ocean looked that bright, warm day; and after Mr. Grantley had fixed me in an arm-chair, and placed another for me to rest my feet on, he went down to look after his other patients, and I was all alone on the sea.

There are some scenes which are so grand, so wondrously beautiful, that one gazes with awe upon them, and forgets, for a time, one's personality in their greatness.

"Oh, who can tell, save he whose heart hath tried,
And danced in triumph o'er the waters wide,
The exulting sense, the pulse's madd'ning play,
That thrills the wanderer of that trackless way?"

I watch the waves ever shifting, now rearing aloft, now dissolving away in some deep cavern, dashing their spray high over the deck, foaming under the wheels, till my eyes tire of the never ceasing motion.

At last I began to wonder where all the ladies were, and to dislike being the only one on deck. There are plenty of gentlemen up here, and it is such a novel sight to see a lady on deck that they really stare at me till I am quite uncomfortable. What a pair of eyes that is sitting round the corner there! I wonder why they look so strange? Ah, their owner is coming this way. When he passes, I'll take a look at him. He walks well. I do not think he minds this unsteady deck any more than if he were on Broadway. Oh, no! not Broadway; he is a Spaniard. That olive skin, those piercing eyes and jetty hair betray him. Perhaps he is going to Havana. He looks intelligent; he comes this way as if he would speak to me if he dared. It almost makes me laugh to think how I look—my hair all uncombed, my boots unlaced (I tried my best this morning to lace them, but it made my head swim so to stoop I had to give it up), not a bit of a collar. Ah! what would I have thought of myself a week ago in this plight? If I were asked what would cure vanity, I should recommend sea-sickness. Here comes Mr. Grantley at last.

"I am sorry I had to leave you alone so long, Miss Laura, but I was getting the rest of the party up. And now what will you have for breakfast?"

I thanked him, but was sure I could eat nothing.

"Now, my dear child, you must do as your doctor says."

"Well, what does he say?"

"He says eat a little dry toast, and have a tumbler of lemonade. Ah, there come the rest of the party!"

Sure enough, there they were. Mrs. Grantley first, looking a little pale; Mary on her arm, paler; and Mr. and Miss Gardner, quite natural; and, to my surprise, last of all came my friend with the handsome eyes, all but concealed with shawls. Who can he be, I wonder? As Mrs. Grantley came up, I tried to rise to get her a chair; but she would not let me; said she was better than I was, and indeed they were quite gay. For my part, I was anything but well; my head ached so I could scarcely see, and I told Mrs. Grantley I must go down again; but she said it wouldn't do, and she made me lie down on a long bench while Mr. Grantley brought some pillows for my head and the Spaniard gave me a shawl. When I was fixed, Mary Henry said:—

"Wouldn't it be nice to have breakfast up here?"

"Indeed, I am going down to the table," said Miss Gardner. "You'll never get anything up here."

"Yes; but if I assure you that you shall have everything that you want?" said Mr. Grantley. "At any rate, Miss Laura shall have her toast here, and whoever will stay, speak."

"I'll stay with Laura, and you can all go down to the table," said Mrs. Grantley.

Miss Gardner was going, and taking Mary's arm, said she should accompany her.

"Miss Mary, you surely won't desert us!" said Mr. Grantley.

"Why, Mr. Grantley, you could not expect me to leave you all alone at the table!" Mary looked at me mischievously, and then walked off with Mr. Gardner, his sister having disappeared. Mr. Grantley followed.

I leaned over to Mrs. Grantley, and asked her, "How old she thought Mr. Gardner?"

"Too old for you, my dear, but not for Mary Henry."

I laughed a quiet laugh to myself, for Mr. Gardner was several years younger than Edward Grantley. But then what was Edward to me? He was so kind, and he seemed to watch so closely to see if I wanted anything; and then I so often meet his eye, and, I am sure, always blush. I am almost afraid he thinks I like him. This will never do, and I am determined I shall not let him think I care anything for him. I will try the Spaniard. See if I can't flirt a little, too; it seems the order of the day on board ship. Let me see; how shall I begin? When he talks, I must appear much interested, not say much myself, and then he will be so in love with the sound of his own voice that he will want to come and talk to me again. I will promenade this evening; that will be an excellent idea, and we will have some music, and I will ask him what is his favorite song, and sing to him.

But I wonder where Mr. Grantley is all this time? Mrs. Grantley and I have finished our breakfast. I thought he was going to take his breakfast with us. What can he want to go to the table for? Suddenly it flashed on my mind that Mrs. Ellis had not been sick, and he was most likely with her. I was on the point of asking Mrs. Grantley if she had seen Mrs. Ellis, when I thought how ridiculous it would sound, as I had never been introduced to her.

How should I meet Mr. Grantley? I felt aggravated to think I should so easily have allowed myself to care for him, and he had only treated me as a friend. To be sure he had sent me baskets of flowers all winter, had always sought my society, and his eyes had spoken more than was right if he never loved me. I should like to be indignant, and not look at him again; but then of course he would think I was jealous; much better to be perfectly oblivious outwardly to everything that is passing around me, but inwardly form my own resolutions. I suppose I was so excited by all the events of the morning that out of weariness I fell asleep, for the next thing I remember was a clear, ringing laugh, joined by several other voices, and, hastily rising, there I saw our whole party, and the centre of the group was Mrs. Ellis. She was just finishing some anecdote, her eyes sparkling full of fun, and every one around looked amused. They had not noticed my rising, and not until I was preparing to go down into the cabin. Mrs. Grantley said: "Why, Laura, are you going down? Edward, do help Miss Evans."

Mr. Grantley came forward and offered me his arm. I would rather not have taken it, particularly as I saw Mrs. Ellis give me anything but an agreeable look; still I was determined to act as if nothing had happened to either of us, although we were scarcely the same persons four days ago. I was surprised to find how much better I felt. At the state-room door Mr. Grantley said he hoped I would soon be ready to come up again, and that I must try to eat some dinner; he would give me half an hour to dress, and then would come after me. I asked what time it was, and was surprised to find it was almost three o'clock. What a long time I must have slept!

After plaiting my hair, I coiled it around my head à la couronne, and then, to help me in my proposed flirtation, dressed all in black, and threw a long lace veil over my head and shoulders. But it was no use; I couldn't look Spanish. I was ready before the half hour was out, so, throwing a shawl around me, I hurried up on deck.

Mrs. Grantley gave me a seat beside her, and then introduced me to Mrs. Ellis and the Spaniard, whom they called Mr. Domine.

"You have just come in time, Laura," said Mary Henry, "for Mr. Grantley is going to repeat 'The Twa Dogs' for us."

"Indeed, Miss Laura, your friend is romancing, for there is the gong, and this dog is ravenous. How do you feel, mother? Mrs. Ellis looks as if she were quite ready for something eatable, and Mr. Gardner has been consulting his watch for the last hour."

"That is a base calumny," said Mr. Gardner, "and I appeal to Miss Henry to support me."

"O no, Mr. Gardner; pray support me down to dinner."

"Now, then, Gardner, lead off; and Miss Laura—"

"Comes next with me," said Mrs. Grantley.

"No, indeed; that will never do. Here, mother, you come with me and Mrs. Ellis. Mr. Domine, take good care of Miss Laura."

I asked Mr. Domine if he had seen Miss Gardner. He said yes; she had gone down with her brother. At the table Mr. Domine sat between me and Mary Henry. He was very pleasant and intelligent; he had read a great deal, and travelled over half the globe. I had determined to like him before I was introduced to him, and there was that in his manner so bold and energetic that one's good opinion was fairly taken by storm.

After dinner he took a seat by me in the cabin, and entertained me exceedingly with his adventures by sea and land. It seemed that he lived mostly in Havana, but was often in New York. He said he was well acquainted with uncle, and had often taken dinner with him, but I had always been at school. I asked him how he became acquainted with the Grantleys. He said his mother and Mrs. Grantley were own cousins, and that he had been there spending the evening the night before they sailed; and they had persuaded him to join their party, although he had not intended leaving New York until the next steamer.

After tea Mary asked me if I was able to walk. 'Twas a beautiful night, with a new moon, and I felt able to do anything; so we walked up and down, not gracefully, for we had a great deal of fun swaying from side to side with the rocking of the vessel. Mrs. Ellis was fortunately down stairs, and Mr. Grantley and Mr. Domine were smoking together. They soon joined us, and Mr. Grantley asked me if I would take his arm. I was amused to see how disappointed Mr. Domine looked, although he very politely offered his arm to Mary.

How pleasant Mr. Grantley was to-night, although more reserved than usual! I felt there was something between us, a coolness I could not exactly account for; still I enjoyed my walk very much.

Presently Mary and Mr. Domine sat down, and Mrs. Ellis joined them; then I noticed that Mr. Grantley's manner changed, and supposing of course that he wanted to go and talk to Mrs. Ellis, I said I would go down in the cabin if he would excuse me. He bowed very gravely, I thought, and then went over to Mrs. Ellis and sat down. I knew he would, and yet there was a strange pang at my heart as I saw it.

Nearly every one had left the cabin, so I took a book and opened it, not to read, but to think. At first it seemed as if it was my fault that Mr. Grantley had changed so, and I thought over and over again all that had passed since I left

New York (and each day seemed a year), and of all the pleasure I had anticipated in being so much with my dear friends; and now how bitterly I felt that all pleasure was gone because he had changed!

Then I could scarcely bear to think of Mrs. Ellis. How I hated her clear, pleasant laugh, which I could hear distinctly through the port-holes! and I thought with contempt of her pretty, coquettish ways. At any other time I would have admired her; but now that all the attention that Mr. Grantley had once paid me was given to her, I viewed her every action with a jealous eye.

About nine o'clock Mr. Domine came up to my sofa. I bent on carrying out the flirtation so prosperously begun, asked him to sit down, and in the midst of a spicy argument Mr. Grantley and Mrs. Ellis came down, and then Mrs. Grantley, with the rest of the party; they all joined Mr. Domine and me but Mr. Grantley, and he, after glancing towards us, walked off to the other end of the cabin. Seeing that he was annoyed at finding Mr. Domine with me (as if he had any right!), I suddenly felt a wonderful impulse to talk which I could not control, and never was I so gay as that evening. A surprised glance ever and anon from Mr. Grantley only heightened my excitement; and at last, on bidding them good-night, every one seemed to be amazed at the new phase in my character. Mrs. Grantley kissed me, and said I was quite myself again. Strange to say, Mrs. Ellis shook hands very cordially with me, and said she knew we should be good friends. I said yes; she would find me merry as she was. Mr. Domine said only "Good-night," but I am sure I blushed as I met his earnest glance of admiration, and Mr. Grantley saw it as well as I.

LETTERS FROM AUNT BETSY BROOMCORN.

LETTER II.

DEAR MR. GODEY.—Brewstir got my fotygraff took the other day, with my new goldy brown silk frock, with black satin flowers up and down the sides. I can't hardly think it's me a settin' in that great chair with such a glistin'-in' frock on, and my poor little fan peekin' out of such a fixed up pile of close; but then everybody says it's a perfect picter of Miss Broomcorn. Brewstir says so, too. I wonder what Susan and the boys would say if they could see it. I 'speat they would say it was drefle funnyfined for aunty.

Well, where did I leave off in my last letter, about my schoolkeepin' over in Pendle Holler? Oh, I was goin' to Parson Jones's to board the next week. Well, I went home with the little Joneses. There was Ganis, and Gamaliel, and Japha, and Mercy Ann, and Mehitabel, and Content, six, all there was of them but the baby, went to my school. I couldn't help thinkin' that I must look some like a little old hen with a passle of chickens, when I went along the road with such a flock of little ones with me. I noticed that the square room door was open when we come to the gate. The children run up the path and hollered, "mother, here's the schoolma'am." Miss Jones come to the door and asked me how I did, and sot out a chair, and introduced me to the Elder and Deacon Moody, and his wife who was there a visitin'. Deacon Moody was a little glum man, and looked as if he was asleep half the time; but if ever you see anybody wide awake it was his wife. Her eyes was big, and round, and black, and she would look at you over her specs for ever so long without winkin'. She was so fat and round that she looked for all the world jest like a great bolster tied in the middle. She had on a black bombazine frock, a checked apron, a black silk neck hankercher on her neck, and a great red knittin' sheath, shaped like a heart pinned on her side. She sot in the big rockin'-chair, and rocked, and knit, and talked all the afternoon. Says she:

"Now, Elder Jones, I want to know what you think about Tild Button's verses. Seems to me her mother's too sensible a woman to let Tild grow up a wuthless kind of a verse-maker, while she does all the potwraslin' herself. If Tild was my girl, she should spin somethin' else besides rhymes, I can tell you. Now, what do you think, Elder?"

"Well," the Elder said, "he didn't know Matilda Button wasn't so good-lookin' as some, but he believed she was pious."

"I dunno about folks's looks bein' much 'count in this world, Elder," says she, lookin' over at me; "I never reckon on Polly Mariar's havin' such oncommon eyes, and hair, or such pink cheeks, and such a slim figger, for I know things of this world pass away; but Polly Mariar will make as stiddy a woman as Tild Button. Some folks' piety goes further than others, though, and as for them verses in the 'Starry Banner,' why, I hearn folks say Tild Button never wrote them verses, she took 'em out of a book. They do say she stays up in the garret half the time, readin' a passle of old books and papers. A putty show she 'll make when she gits married and goes to housekeepin', for I can tell you that's what 'll show off whether she has got any 'conomy and knack of turmin' off work or not. Needn't anybody ask me how many tablecloths, and towels, and kiverlids and quilts Polly Mariar's got, for I sha'n't tell, though she ain't but nineteen come March. Miss Broomcorn, how do you git along keepin' school?"

She took me up so sudden that I didn't know what to say at first, but I finally said I believed I did as well as could be expected.

"My Brother Jeff used to keep school," says she. "You've heard of him, ain't you, Elder? Well, Jeff kep school twice in Pendle Holler, once on Harrinton Hill, three times on Coot Hill, and the last winter before he died, he kep the school over in the Kingdom. Jeff saved a nice passle of money keepin' school. Poor feller! he had the fever and died at our house, and his coffin was cherry, and cost twelve dollars, but I didn't grudge it a bit. I reckon there ain't many school-teachers like Jeff. Deacon Moody, what on airth be you a doin' with your head agin Miss Jones's white winder curtains? As if bleached muslin wouldn't sile any quicker than new tow. Seems to me you'd better go and see if Dolly ain't got into mischief, or don't want to be watered, nor nothing. It 'll wake you up to stir round."

The Deacon went out, and Miss Jones went to settin' the table in the kitchen; so the Elder and I had Miss Moody all to ourselves. She talked and talked, and the Elder seemed to be listenin' all the time; but when she asked him a question he didn't always answer, just as if he knew what she'd been a saying.

When Miss Jones got tea ready, Miss Moody was ready, too. She folded up her knittin' and unfolded her pocket hankercher, and set down by the warm biscuits, just as calm as ever could be, while the Elder asked a blessin'. When Miss Jones passed the plum sass round, Miss Moody asked her where she got the plums.

"Why," says Miss Jones, "they come from my sister's over in Mullintop."

"Dear me," says Miss Moody, "I wonder what's the reason somebody at the Holler hadn't got plums to spare for their paschure."

When I have anything good I always says to the Deacon: 'We must save some for our paschure. There's nothing too good for a good paschure; and I bleve it does 'em good to let 'em know you 'preesheate 'em.'"

Parson Jones said he thought she was very kind to think of the paschure. Miss Moody was jest butterin' her third biscuit when all the little Joneses come rushin' in cryin' for their suppers, but, somehow, it didn't disturb Miss Moody a bit. She seemed to 'preesheate Miss Jones's supper, and laid into the soft gingerbread and cookies as if she'd been without a good while. After she had declared to Miss Jones that she hadn't but a slim appetite, she pushed back from the table with the rest, and took out her knittin' agin. Just about that time Squire Kenyon come along and stopped to speak to the Elder, and Miss Moody took off her specs, and asked him if his family was well. Says she:

"You have my sympathy, Square. You're a forlorn creetur in that lonesome house with that little touty child. Elder Jones here don't know nothin' about it. Look at all the olives round his table, and his pardner ready to anticipate his woes. I tell you, Square, nobody can feel for you as well as them that's been in a similar predicament. But you mustn't let it wear on you, Square; you're a young man yet, and your little gal must have somebody to larn her to work. A good stiddy, sensible gal. One that knows enough to presheate a man of your parts, Square. For pitty's sake, don't be bamboozled into marryin' a soft headed gal that is always full of feelings, and never has a mind to work, as some folks I know on. A woman like that is wuss than nothin'. I've seen such matches afore now as would scare a man out of all notion of matrimony. I would not advise ye to be in a hurry, either; better wait awhile, Square. Ef you git lonesome, come up and see the Deacon. We'd be dreffle glad to have ye come. Won't we, Deacon?"

Deacon Moody said something, I couldn't hear what, and Miss Moody begun agin. She asked him fifty questions about his wife, and who doctored her. Says she:

"Square Kinyon, I believe my soul your wife would a been alive this minit, if you hadn't employed that are old goose of a Dr. Stirrup. I tell you what, I've known ever so many cases where he as good as killed 'em. There was Jemima Smith, used to be Jemima Kibbin. He doctored her a year stiddy, and kep a tellin' the poor soul she was 'gettin' better all the time, and after all, I vow, the creeter died. I allers laid it to Stirrup a killin' her. Well, Square, you 'll be sure to come and fetch your little gal. Polly Mariar's 'mazin' fond of children. Miss Jones, do you and the Elder come over, too. It's a'most a year sense you've been to our house. Dew come, Elder. I allers enjoy a visit from the paschere."

All this time she 'd been a puttin' on her things, and so she went out bobbin' her head all round for a good-by. After they 'd fairly gone, I went and offered to help Miss Jones do up her work. You 'd better believe there was a nice lot of it to do. While we was washin' the dishes Miss Jones bust out a laffin', and said, "She might as well laff as cry." She felt like cryin', but a good laugh was better for a body than a cry any time.

"Would you believe, now," says she, "Miss Moody brought me six eggs and a pint of caraway seed? and she kep me at work the whole afternoon. First I plaited a cap border for her. Then I cut a pattern for Polly Mariar's new frock, and another for a sunbunnet, and then she lugged in a bundle of piller covers, and wanted me to mark 'em all with copperas-colored thread. I told her I hadn't time, but I sent Polly Mariar my sampler, and told her how to do it herself. Then she managed to tell me what she 'd like best for supper; and if I didn't want to offend a deacon's wife, who has a sharp tongue, I must make some hot biscuits and soft gingerbread. Then the Deacon's horse couldn't go in the paster 'cause she jumps fences, and she musn't eat musty hay, for she has the heaves, and so the end of it was that the Elder had to borrow oats of Deacon Pendle, and a scythe, and a chance to mow a little clover in Square Kinyon's medder, and make Miss Moody comfortable about Dolly. O, dear, if I was a minister I 'd quit preachin', and go to peddlin' tin, or tappin' shoes for a livin' before I 'd wear a coat for everybody to pick holes in!"

After Miss Jones had got all the children washed and put to bed, she had to take her needle and go over their clothes. 'Twas a rip here and a tear there; a button gone in one place, and a buttonhole broke in another. Then the boys wore their father's old clothes made over, and you needn't wonder they come to pieces.

Well, I boarded at Elder Jones's a week before I come home without findin' somebody there a visitin'. The Elder didn't go about among the folks much, they said, and so they come to see him. They was out of meal, and butter, and flour half a dozen times, but somehow Miss Jones managed to git a good meal always. She was a drestle proud woman; she would have died before owned to anybody that she couldn't do as well as the best, and she did contrive to make a drestle little do as well as most folks do a good deal. The Elder wasn't so cute as she by a long reach; and I ruther 'speat the folks took some advantage of him, because he wasn't sharp.

One day, after school, I took little Hetty Jones, and went over into Square Kinyon's medder after strawberries. Hetty said she knew a place where they got ripe ever so early. The clover was just beginning to blow, and all along the wet places silver weed and evan root grow, and lilies showed their red buds round among the grass. The bobolinks fluttered around the willers, and sung as if they was distracted. Well, Hetty and I couldn't find any early strawberries ripe, so we went along the fences, and got our hands full of posies. While we was picking the white silver weed blows, Nat Stowers, a big, shambling goose of a boy, come running along by us, with a face as white as a miller's, and eyes fairly dartin' out of his head. When he see us, he stopped short.

"Hetty Jones, schoolma'am," says he, "if you don't want to see a ghost, you 'd better run."

"Where, where?" says Hetty and I.

"Over in the Perkin lot. I seen it myself—an offle-looking creetur, with a hairy face, an eel-skin hat on his head, with a brim as broad as Tild Button's Sunday bunnit, and a white sheet round him, and a-settin' under a white umberill, a-chalkin' on a board, with a cudgill in t'other hand. Better b'l'eve I run sum! My patience! you don't catch me goin' where sich things walks day times agin, though."

"Let's go home," says Hetty. "I don't want to see a ghost."

So we went right home, Nat keeping close to us, and talkin' about the ghost every minit, till we was about as scared as he was.

Well, from that day the Perkin lot was haunted. Not a soul dared to go there, because the ghost with the white umberell was seen a few days after in a field close by; then it was seen walkin' round on a hill, with a pack on its back and the white umberell over its shoulder. A story got out that it was the spirit of Gran'ther Lambert, who used to be an old Revolutioner, and got all cut up with troopers' swords at Yorktown, and lived to make a vow that he 'd kill a British soldier for every one of them fourteen bloody gashes, and a general officer for the print of horseshoes on his breast when they rode him down and crushed him under their horses' feet. He used to say he should sartinly walk if he died afore he accomplished it. And he died without killin' but twelve, and lamented it to the very last. So of course it was Gran'ther Lambert, luggin' round his wife's old faded out green umberell and his knapsack, and allers chalkin' down twelve on a paper before him.

When I'd been school-keepin' about six weeks, I went over to Deacon Pendle's to stay over Sunday, and Miss Button come in to see me. She and I sot in the front room together. While Miss Pendle was at work in the kitchen, Miss Button come and stood before me, and throwed back her head, and put her hands behind her. Says she: "Betsy, you've a tender, sympathizin' mind; you can appresheate my trials and share my joys. Prepare now to be suffused with anger." And she took a letter out of her pocket, and held it up before me. "I blush to show it to you," says she; "but I did think Square Kinyon had a mind above common men. I was fool enough to want to hear him talk, to see if he knew anything; if there was a single strain of music in his soul; and now, the—the—the—poor old fool, he thinks I'd like to marry him, and he's wrote to me about it. Oh, Betsy, to think that I should be suspected of courtin' a widower, with a red-headed little girl to bring up! Oh, it's terribly mortifyin' to me! But I know now just adactly what I'll say to him. Let's you and I go up stairs and write a letter to him." So we went up stairs. Miss Button put the winder-curtains down part way, and sot down and begun to read me the letter. It was a ruther funny love-letter. He said he had ten cows, and he'd give her the likeliest of the gray colts, and he had a famous lot of new geese feathers to make into beds and pillows, and with the best medder land in the Holler, he reckoned a body could live tolerable comfortable, if they tried. He should have asked her before, only she must take into 'count his bereaved state of mind sence Miss Kinyon's death. Every line or two Miss Button would stop and laugh. After she'd gone over it all, says she: "I know what I'll say to him. Give me your pen." So she began to scratch, scratch, lookin' as tickled as could be all the time. I declare, I begun to think she was handsome. Her big brown eyes had long, curled-up lashes. She had a straight nose, short upper lip, and the dimples danced over her cheeks like a baby's. All at once she laughed right out. "Hark," says she:—

"MOST RESPECTED SIR: I was surprised to get your letter offerin' to marry me. I should be obliged to ye, and proud into the bargain, if I only thought I was the properest girl you could find for a wife; but there's Dolly Jinks is ever so much better-lookin', besides being a good deal younger, and Polly Mariar Moody's not very old, if you wa'n't very strict about age, and she's got a good settin' out, everybody knows; Jane Darrer, Rowa Stirrup, Liddy Perkin, and the two Stowers' girls would either of 'em suit you better than me, bein' younger, and so better suited to your age, handsome, and of course a better match for a handsome man like Squire Kinyon. I might mention the schoolma'am; but I don't know as the trustees would consent to let her go these two months, less you paid another to finish the school, which wouldn't be convenient. As for me, I'm a disconsolite, forlorn creetur, and when you are married and gone, you won't be disconsolite any longer.

"The moon is shinin' like a bride
Arrayed in silver white;
I'll go and bathe my burnin' brows
All in her coolin' light.

"But you, beside your kitchen fire,
On smilin' beauty gaze;
Her eyes like sparks, with beauty bright,
Her young cheeks all ablaze.

"Your most obedient servant, I take my leaf of you, SERAPHINA MATILDA M. BUTTON."

When she'd read it all, she laughed so loud and so long that Miss Pendle come up to see what was the matter. She looked surprised enuff when Miss Button said she was only answerin' one of her love-letters. I didn't feel just right about her puttin' in somethin' about me; but then such a girl as she was always would do just about as she pleased. She folded up the letter, put it in her pocket, and said she meant to send it to him next day. And says she: "I'll bet a bundle of goose-quills he will run right off to see Dolly Jinks or some of them girls. I hope they will give him the mitten. The old goose! to think he thought a body couldn't ever be civil without being purrin' round for a chance to be Miss Kinyon second. Well, I give him a dose; but la sakes, he won't take the hint what I think about him." All the rest of the evenin' she kept laughin' about Squire Kinyon and his medder land, his cows and geese feathers. "Oh," says she, "what a prospect for a nice young woman! And that long-tailed gray colt, which the Squire would always want to use, and yet be so clever as to 'low me to call it mine! Oh, the dear old cleverly! he shall have a wife, and a pretty young fool, too!" I declare, I begun to pity the Squire, she run on so about him.

But it wasn't long before we had something else to talk about, for Nat Stowers come in, lookin' as if he couldn't hardly keep still, he was so runnin' over full of news. It stuck out of his eyes, and almost pushed his hat off, and he had to cram his hands into his pockets pretty nigh up to his elbows to keep it from flyin' out of them.

After he'd sot down, the Deacon said: "What's the news, Nat?"

Poor fellow! his eyes rolled in his head, and he grinned at us without sayin' a word. Of course we begun to want to know what it was.

"Come," says the Deacon, "what is it, Nat?"

Nat chuckled to himself a minit. Says he at last: "You hain't seen nary ghost around here lately, have you?"

The Deacon said he thought we hadn't, though he did see a big-horned owl t'other night, round after a hen.

"Well," says Nat, "I seen one, Sam Jinks seen one, 'n' to-day Tom Potter seen one, 'n' spoke to him, too. 'Twa'n't Gran'ther Lambert, either; you never would guess who 'twas, for you don't know. It's a feller from York, I s'pose; any way he's got a tailor made coat 'n' shiny boots. I swaow, I dunno what on airth his hat must a been. 'Twa'n't pickety straw, nor pam leaf, but a kind of Lagehorn, like Tild's flat. His trowsers was some kind of store cloth, any way. Tom said so, and I seen him arter Tom did, a-settin' on a log, markin' on a piece of paseboard, 'n' I crept up close, 'n' looked at him. Tell you what, he's got an offle-lookin' mess of hair on his chin! Reckon he don't peddle razor straps any way! He! he! he!"

"Nat," says Miss Button, "you don't mean that you see this chap, when he wasn't a ghost, and he goes round markin' on a piece of paper, and wears store clothes all the time."

"Wall, yes, I dew, Tild. I was hoein' corn over in the ten acre lot, 'n' I watched him. He sat ever so long a-lookin' at that old elm tree down by the pond, 'n' markin' on his board; but bimeby he got up 'n' went off to them rocks, 'n' looked about a spell, 'n' then he went across the hill out of sight. He's got a regular umbrella, on'y it's pooty light-colored; s'pose it's the fashion in York. Reckon Tild'll be arter gittin one."

"O dear," says Miss Button, "I'm disappointed. I did hope it was a real live ghost at last, and I wanted to see it myself. It's such a comfortable feelin' to get over a good scare. How I should have liked to seen that old Granny Endor!"

"O yes, Tild," says Nat, "you're allers diggin' back into futurity. I don't know about witches. Ef I did, I'd be sartin to catch it. Gran'ther does cuss 'n' swear 'bout this here ghost enuff to scare a feller. Wish to goodness gran'ther'd get religion; I'd go fishin' every Sunday, then, for he wouldn't make me work so stiddy. I say, Tild, that 'ere York chap had a pictur of your dad's old mill, jest as nateral as could be. He showed Tom ever so many picters; he's a-makin' 'em all the time. I swaow, I didn't know anybody follered that bizness."

Well, after we had talked the matter over and over, and asked Nat ever so many questions, and he had told us that he was "a proper, handsome feller," Miss Button put on her bunnit and asked Nat if he wouldn't go home with her. Oh, if you could have seen Nat's face! He blushed up to his hair, and grinned so's to show every tooth in his head. When they went out, he crammed his hands into his pockets, and shied off one side, considerably ahead of Miss Button. Deacon Pendle laughed to see 'em.

A spell after that Miss Button come in to see me one Saturday night. I asked her if she had seen the ghost yet. She looked as red as fire, and turned me off by askin if Square Kinyon had offered to give me one of the gray colts yet? I wouldn't tell her a word about it, because Nat Stowers had come in only the day before, and told us that York chap had been to Bethuel Button's two or three times, and made picters of all the old trees round, and Bethuel himself into the bargain. He'd seen them, and after a good deal of coaxin', he owned that he made a picter of him, too, jest as nateral as life. Miss Button said she come to tell me what a good time I should have, a boardin' with the Jinkses. Marm Jinks was a regular subjeck for 'notomy. Poor thing! She was always havin' her throat burnt out with fustick for some trouble or other with the tonsors in her throat. She had the bronika, and everything else under the sun; and she kep and took more medicin' than all the rest of the folks in Pendle Holler put together. I never saw Miss Button in such good spirits as she was that night. She laughed, and told stories, and, finally, she got to repeatin' poetry. The Deacon and Miss Pendle laughed dreflively over some of her funny stories about the rest of the folks. And after she'd gone, the Deacon said he was afraid something would happen to Matilda, she was so uncommon happy. I don't know whether he dreamed it or guessed it, but as true as I live, about three weeks afterwards, Nat Stowers come into Miss Jones's one morning, when I was there, to tell us that Tild Button had drowned herself in her father's mill-pond the night before, leavin' a paper on her table, sayin' it was for love she did it. He s'posed it was for love of the picter-maker. We was dreflely horryfied about it. About noon, Nat come in agin, and said as they hadn't found her body in the water, they 'sposed she'd hung herself. Elder Jones went right over there to see about it. Towards night he come back, and said that the unfortunit girl wasn't dead, but she 'd run off with a painter—a city chap without an acre of land in the world; and her father said he s'posed he was as poor as a shin bone. Squire Kinyon come in to inquire about it; and when Elder Jones told him that, he kind of grinned, and said he didn't feel surpris'd at it. He knew long ago that Tild, poor thing! had a good deal more genius than common sense. She hadn't a mite of 'presheashun for anything real solid and substanshal. Her taste run to poetry and other flummiddles. Guess she 'd find out, in course of time, that there were some sense in havin' a comfortable property. In his opinion, she 'd only jest done as we might have expected long ago.

Of course, there was a good deal said about it. Custard pies, sponge cake, and tea was used extravagantly; and even the Widder Soule, who hadn't been a visitin' before in ten years, did go out of an afternoon a dozen times, jest to talk about poor Miss Button. But no more this time from

Your obedient friend,
BETSY BROOMCORN.

CHAPTER II.

"By the strong spirit's discipline,
By the fierce wrong forgiven,
By all that turns the heart from sin,
Are mortals won to heaven."

THE little church in the Pennsylvanian village of —— had been greatly blest. Luke-warm professors had been aroused, past differences and animosities had been permitted to sink into oblivion, and when from united hearts the voice of strong supplication had been lifted up in behalf of the thoughtless throng of spectators, God had answered prayer by causing many hitherto careless ones to ask what they should do to be saved. The meeting had been prolonged many weeks, and must now close; but the minister seemed loth to dismiss his congregation on this the last night of the "special effort." He stood for a moment looking at the expectant throng, then requested that the seats nearest the altar should be filled by those who had lately joined the church. In answer to his wish, there came, as room was made for them, eighty-three, who professed to have lately "passed from death unto life."

"There was woman's fearless eye,
Lit by her deep love's truth;
There was manhood's brow, serenely high,
And the fiery heart of youth."

There came, with quick, impulsive steps, many whose young, ardent manhood exulted in the new title they had won, and whose untried hearts fully believed that the hopes which friends indulged of their future usefulness would not be disappointed; and there was also the calm, measured tread of thoughtful, far-seeing middle age; there was the graceful maiden, gliding timidly to the place of which she felt unworthy; and the serious matron, whose earnest eyes seemed to glance after those whom she would fain bring with her. What various wants, what various needs were there! Mr. H. was not one of those whose tears have such ready flow that their congregations grow indifferent to them; but now his eyes were filled to overflowing as he looked at those who would, if faithful, be "stars in his crown of rejoicing." Would they prove faithful? How earnestly he besought them to do so! how imploringly he urged them to use aright the talents which God had given them! to make every blessing which He had bestowed a something which should advance His interest! How many hearts recorded in that solemn hour the promise that they would be valiant soldiers of the cross; that neither "height, nor depth, nor any other creature" should be enabled to separate them from the love which passeth understanding! How many resolved that they would never again murmur at poverty, but would strive even in its midst to show that the religion of Christ was more than a recompense! and how many of those blest with this world's goods inly vowed that they would "feed the hungry, clothe the naked, and help to send the Gospel to distant lands!"

One of the number, a most lovely girl, had been escorted to church by our former friend, Lester Howard, now a noble-looking young man, within a few months of his majority. She was his betrothed wife, the sister of his college friend, Harry White, with whom he had spent a number of vacations. He and Harry had arrived in the village that afternoon, but he had had no opportunity to converse with Ellen till they started for church, when she seemed timid, as if desiring to speak, but lacking courage. He had thought it singular that she should wish to go to church on the first evening of his visit; but it was all explained when, as the call was made for the new members to come forward, she arose and passed him with downcast eyes. She found a seat in one of the side pews, and he could see her plainly. He watched her jealously, but she was listening to her minister so attentively that she seemed to have forgotten his presence. The small, gloved hands were clasped together, and the graceful form was bent slightly forward, while the red lips trembled, and the soft brown eyes looked strangely bright, shining as they did through tears. Could it be that that earnest-looking girl was the darling, frolicsome Nellie, whose ringing laugh had been such music to his ears? How purely beautiful she looked as she stood with bowed head to receive the closing benediction, then turned with sweetly serious eyes, and moved quietly with the throng who were pressing their way along the aisles! He almost dreaded to have her reach the spot where he stood. What had they in common now? Would she not desire to break their engagement? For in that moment Lester seemed to feel that there was a measureless distance between himself and the followers of Jesus.

For some moments after they left the church they walked in silence; then Ellen said: "You were surprised, were you not, Lester?"

"Yes," he answered, briefly.

"But not displeased, I hope? You would not be if you knew how far happier I am than I used to be."

"No," he said, hesitatingly, "not displeased. But oh, Nellie, you were good enough before."

"What do you mean by good enough, Lester? We cannot be good enough so long as we remain unfit for heaven, can we?"

"But you always were fit for heaven," he replied, resolutely.

"Oh, Lester, how mistaken you are!"

"Not at all; and besides they can get along without you up in heaven, and I need you here; so why not be contented where you are?"

"I am contented, more than contented to stay my allotted time in this beautiful world, where I hope to be so useful and so happy; but, believe me, I am far more so since I have been enabled to look fearlessly into the future, to consider this life as a bright pathway leading to a more glorious one."

Again did Lester ask himself if this could be the Nellie who used to declare in her laughing way that the butterflies and herself were exceptions to all general rules, being created merely that they might enjoy themselves.

"I suppose," said he, speaking slowly, and, as he fancied, very calmly, "you will wish to have our engagement broken, now that you have become pious?"

She looked into his face. The bright moonbeams falling upon her own showed him how pale and startled it was.

"Do you wish it, Lester?"

"No," he answered, his assumed indifference giving way, "I do not wish it. It would be like tearing my heart in two to give you up, but I supposed I should have to do it."

"Not unless you wish to," she whispered, clinging to his arm; "only you must promise not to retard me in my Christian course. I hope, I believe that you will yet be brought to see as I have seen."

"I cannot say I see much hope of that," he answered, lightly. "But now that you have made a profession, I have no wish that you should, as Christians say, backslide; I always despised such fickleness."

And who will not echo the sentiment? Who but has a measure of scorn mingled with the pity they feel for those who have professed the name of Jesus, and then renounced Him?

The next morning Lester had an interview with Mr. White, whose consent to their engagement had not before been asked. That gentleman looked grave, and replied that, if he were to take into account nothing but his personal liking, he would say yes at once; yet, as he really knew nothing about him except that he was Harry's college friend, he must defer his answer till he could write to a friend residing in Kentucky, who would make all necessary inquiries. To so reasonable a proposition our young friend could make no objection, nor did he desire to do so. There was nothing in his past life nor in his position at home which he cared to conceal from his future father-in-law.

The next day there was a picnic at "The Oaks," a much frequented resort for pleasure-parties. Every kind of carriage was in demand in the village that day, and it was with some difficulty that Lester secured a small buggy, and had Ellen to himself during the ride. Harry and a number of others were going in Mr. White's carriage; but such arrangements did not suit our lovers, who preferred to be alone, and soon permitted the rest of the gay party to distance them.

"Now, Nellie," said Lester, suddenly turning his handsome, wilful face toward her, "I hope you will not refuse to dance with me to-day?"

A delicate color tinged the young convert's cheek. "I hope not, Lester; for I hope you will not ask me."

"You must have a high opinion of my gallantry! But, seriously, dearest Nellie, what possible harm is there in one moving to music more than without it?"

"I don't think there is any harm in dancing of itself; but you know how everybody looks upon it."

"What of that? You ought to judge for yourself," he said, though, in his heart, he thought it would answer as well as if she would let him judge for her. "And if you think it intrinsically wrong, give it up; but if not, do not be bound by the narrow prejudices of others."

"But my church forbids it, Lester; and, surely, I should be an unworthy member if I could not give up so slight a thing in compliance with her demands; and, besides, you know what you said about my giving up."

"Why, I said I did not wish you to give up your profession of religion; but if your church makes such ridiculous demands, why, join one that does not."

"I do not wish to join any other; and, besides, if I am not able to see any wrong in dancing, it has been called wrong till almost every one thinks it out of place in a Christian, and I will not so shame my profession." The sweet voice was low, but very firm, and Lester was puzzled and annoyed.

He had grown up thinking "will" and "will not" very unrefined, improper words for a lady to use. His ideal of feminine loveliness was his gentle, yielding, clinging mother. True, she had committed a grave error in submitting so blindly to his stepfather's will, but he argued he himself was an honorable man, very different from William Allen. So there would be no danger of any one's acting wrongfully while obeying him; and he did so detest those loud-voiced, strong-minded women. Ellen, with all her vivacity, had hitherto been very gentle; and now it dawned upon him, for the first time, that she could also be very firm. He could not tell whether to like or dislike this new phase of her character. If she displayed it to all the rest of the world, and remained yielding to him, it would be all right; but he had an unpleasant feeling that, if he interfered with her ideas of what was duty, she would not do so. A very unpalatable thought was that to our Lester, who had lost none of his old self-will. He struck his horse a quick blow, and drove on rapidly and in silence. Ellen was deeply pained.

"Lester," she said, humbly, "you are not angry at me for refusing to do what I believe is wrong?"

"No. If you believed it wrong, I wouldn't be. But you said you did not. You yield to the foolish whims of others, and refuse to oblige me."

"I did not mean that," she said, eagerly. "I only meant I did not think it in itself wrong; but, knowing as I do how the world views it, I could not conscientiously dance. But I cannot bear to see you look angry!" The young head, with its wealth of smooth, brown hair, was leaned lovingly on his shoulder, and Lester Howard, as he kissed the tearful face, said she should do as she chose in all things.

The picnic passed off pleasantly. Ellen was importuned again and again to dance, but she steadily refused. Her happy, smiling face was perfectly unclouded, even while uttering her firmest denials; and those whose invitations she declined turned away, admiring and respecting her as they had never done before.

Two weeks passed rapidly away, and Lester came to the sage conclusion that to a woman religion was certainly a beautifier, for each day his Nellie grew dearer, and her love more precious.

One evening they were sitting together, Mrs. White, Ellen, Harry, and Lester, when Mr. White entered the room with an open letter in his hand. "Well, Lester," he said, joyously, "I have news from Kentucky."

"All right, I hope," said Lester, with a smile.

"Yes, all right. And what is more, I have made a very pleasant discovery."

"Are we to share the pleasure?"

"To be sure you are; but in the first place, I suppose you know that I have been married twice; and that Harry and Ellen are the children of my first wife; though," he added, looking affectionately at his wife, "there has never been any difference between them and the others."

"I am aware of all this," said Lester, wonderingly.

"Well, and do you know who my first wife was?"

"No, sir. I have never heard anything about her."

"She was Alice Allen; and her only brother, of whom I have for many years lost sight, is your mother's husband. Why didn't you tell us your stepfather's name was Allen? We should have traced up the relationship long ago."

"I never mention Mr. Allen when I can possibly avoid it," was the haughty reply, spoken with a flushed face. "And had I known of the relationship, as you term it, I should probably never have been here."

"Nonsense! nonsense! Didn't he and you agree?"

"No, sir; we did not. My uncle and guardian took me from my mother nearly eight years ago, to save me from his abuse."

"There must have been wrong on both sides," said philosophic Mr. White.

"No, there was not," replied Lester, hotly. Then, meeting Ellen's pained, astonished look, he turned quickly away and walked into the street, questioning himself as he did so: "Could he marry William Allen's niece?" It seemed impossible; yet could he give up his Ellen? No, no! that he could not. Love and hate were holding a fierce conflict in his heart; but love, all-conquering love triumphed. And when he returned, he hastened to apologize for his rudeness.

This was in June; and the wedding was appointed for the following November. Lester would be of age in September, and he had long since determined to celebrate his birthday by warning his stepfather to leave his house. But now he feared, if he did so, he would lose his bride, and concluded to adjourn this (to him, pleasant task) until after his marriage. But in the midst of his plans he was summoned home to his mother's deathbed. He started without delay. How slowly the cars seemed to creep along! How harshly the gay laughter of his fellow passengers grated on the ears, which were in fancy listening to Lizzie Howard's loving cradle-songs. The journey accomplished, he alighted at the door of his childhood's home. Old Tom was there, with great tears rolling down his honest black face.

"O, Massa Letter, she gone! The bestest mistress ever lived!"

Lester wrung the hard, old hand, and followed Tom to the parlor. There she lay—the thin face and thinner hands cold and pale, and the pulseless heart still in death. Lizzie was now, for the first time, deaf to the sorrow of her son, who threw himself on his knees beside her in an agony of grief. The many times when his boyish waywardness had brought tears to the gentle eyes, and the bitterer tears which he knew she had shed at being separated from him, seemed all before him.

"O, mother, mother! O, my mother!" he said, as he bent to kiss the clammy brow.

"Almost her last breath was spent in blessing you," said the kind-hearted minister, who was standing near. "She had learned to take her troubles to her Redeemer, and she wanted you to fly to the same gracious refuge."

The young man arose, and, sitting down, buried his face in his hands, while his companion, after hesitating a moment, left him alone with his dead. What his thoughts were during that silent communion we may not tell. But when, at last, little Alice came softly into the room, with her hands full of flowers, her brother took her on his knee, and eagerly scanned her face.

Yes, she was like her mother. There was no trace of her father in the delicate features and deep blue eyes. She laid her little weary head against him, and they mingled their tears together.

"O, Brother Lester," sobbed the child, "mamma wanted to see you so much, and now she's dead!"

He held her closely to him as he answered:

"We will try to think she is better off, Ally."

Before the little girl could reply, her father came slowly into the room, and, after looking for a moment sadly at his dead wife, turned and offered his hand to her son, who, however, drew back.

"Lester," said Mr. Allen, "let us forget our past animosity. Your mother begged that it might be so, and made me promise to offer you my friendship. Here, in this solemn presence, I do so."

"It is useless," answered Lester, "for, until I learn to forget how unhappy she was as your wife, I cannot have any friendly feelings toward you, and this is not a good place in which to forget it."

He placed Alice on the floor, and abruptly left the room, and they did not meet again till they silently took their places at the funeral. From his mother's grave Lester went to his uncle's house, leaving Mr. Allen for the present in possession of the old homestead. Poor Mr. Allen! his was indeed a hard position. His wife's annuity died with her, and he had nothing upon which to depend. The comfortable fortune which he had inherited from his father had long before been exhausted; and now, with failing health, he had no profession, no means of supporting himself or his daughter, the daughter who was dearer to him than any human being, save Lizzie, had ever been, for he had really loved Lizzie as much as his selfish heart could love. He could think of nothing except becoming a hanger-on and decoy for the gamblers with whom he had associated; and the prematurely old and broken man really shrank from his former life, and longed to lead a new one. He thought once or twice of applying to Mr. White for a situation, but did not know what kind of one to mention, being aware that there was none which he could fill. Then, too, how could he appear in poverty before the man whom he had entirely lost sight of in his days of affluence? How bitterly he regretted having attempted that dark crime! That wild, hopeless longing to recall the miserable past—pray God thou mayest never feel it, dear reader! His days were spent in the library, where he would sit for hours by the table, with his head resting on his folded arms, silent and motionless, till the entrance of his little Alice would rouse him for a time from hopeless to agonizing grief.

It was some relief when, two weeks after his wife's death, Mr. James Howard rode over, saying he had come to propose to him a plan by which he would be at liberty to retain possession of the establishment till winter, when Lester would be married and want it himself.

"What is the plan?" he moodily asked.

"Why," said Mr. Howard, striking his boot smartly with his riding-whip, "Lester has heard that you are likely to be in some embarrassment from having your income so suddenly cut off; and, as he is anxious to keep his sister with him, he wished me to tell you that, if you will give her entirely to his care, and will leave Kentucky in November, you can stay here till then, and he will give you five hundred dollars to start with. But you must agree to stay away when you go."

"Give up my child, and for such a paltry sum! Does he think I will do it?" ejaculated Mr. Allen, indignantly.

"No," replied Mr. Howard, calmly, "he does not suppose you will if you can do any better; but the question is, can you? If you take your daughter with you now, where will you go? Five hundred, though, as you say, a paltry sum, will yet supply your necessities until you can get into some business, and send for Alice, who will in the mean time be tenderly cared for by Lester, who is going to marry your niece, Ellen White. There can be no doubt that she will feel kindly towards your child, who is her cousin, and is, I believe, a namesake of her mother's."

Mr. Howard spoke as if he thought Mr. Allen's getting into business would be an easy task; but in his heart he knew he had neither energy nor health to enable him to do so; that Alice, once given to her brother, would never be reclaimed. How dreadful are the effects of indolence upon our nature, both moral and physical! How the skillless hands fall wearily, and the enervated brain refuses to arouse from its helpless torpor, even when stern necessity bids us work or die! If we turn in pitying sadness from those who are by nature rendered incapable of planning or working out anything good or useful, should we not shrink in horror from allowing our God-given activity and vigor to be thus prostrated?

William Allen arose and paced the room with slow, despairing steps. Oh, if he only possessed his former neglected, wasted power to act, how quickly would he give to this haughty man scorn for scorn! But—but—he could not now; both head and hands were weak; there was no upspringing power to do or dare within him. He must take what was thus doled out to him; there was nothing left for him but submission. He must leave his child with her brother, and perhaps with the money thus obtained he might regain a portion of what he had lost at the gaming table. "Luck must change some time."

With a flush of shame on his once handsome face, with tears of bitter humiliation in his eyes, and with the feeling in his heart that of all the despicable objects on the face of the earth he was the most abject, he said he would consent to Lester's proposition.

Mr. James Howard's house was superbly illuminated, and its parlors were thronging with guests called together to welcome "Cousin Lester and his bride," who had arrived, and were to stop there before going to their own house. The bride charmed every one by her graceful ease; yet she seemed to be watching for some one, and glanced up brightly every time an elderly gentleman came to be presented to her, for each time she expected to see her uncle. Lester surmised what was in her thoughts, but he skilfully avoided giving her a chance to question him till all the company were gone, and they sat with his aunt and uncle in the now quiet parlor.

"How have you enjoyed yourself, Cousin Ellen?" said Mrs. Howard.

"Very well; only I was disappointed in not seeing Uncle William. Is he sick?"

The gentlemen exchanged glances, and Mrs. Howard looked a little discomfited.

"Why, no, he isn't sick; but you know he and Lester are not on good terms; so we did not invite him."

"I thought," said Ellen, looking beseechingly at Lester, "that you had overcome your past dislike."

"Not a bit of it," he said, carelessly. "But don't look so disturbed, Nellie; he is not worth any trouble."

"Oh, Lester, to speak so of your father!"

"He is not my father."

"Well, your stepfather, then."

"That is a very different name, Nellie; one to which I owe no respect."

"Don't say so, Letty. I love my stepmother as much as I could an own mother."

"You would not if she had made your father miserable, and abused and worried you every way she could," said Lester, earnestly. "Indeed, Nellie, I have every reason to detest him. When I tell you what he did, you will not wonder that I could not willingly see him at a party made for us."

The young wife looked very much distressed. "But your sister, little Alice—you surely do not feel so toward her?"

"No; and I am in hopes her father will let her stay with us."

"He has promised to do so, for the present at least," said Mr. Howard. "But do not let us annoy ourselves by talking about him any more at present. It is time we were all seeking rest."

Ellen sighed. This was a state of affairs very different from what she had expected. The next day Lester rode over to his old home, and returned, bringing his sister with him. The little girl was warmly welcomed and caressed; but she looked depressed and troubled. Her dark blue eyes fixed themselves on her new sister's face with a timid, questioning look which brought Lizzie Howard very freshly to her son's memory.

"Well, Ally," he said, placing an arm lovingly around her, "what do you think? Is she as pretty as I told you?"

"Yes," said the child, with slightly quivering lips. "She is pretty; and I think she looks some like papa. Don't you think so, Brother Lester?"

"No," he said, shortly. And the encircling arm was quickly withdrawn.

Ellen took her hand in hers. "Come to my room, dear. I want to show you some things I brought for you." They left the room, and Lester sat wondering if it could be possible that his sweet, young wife resembled his hated stepfather.

"So you think I look like your father?" said the bride, when Alice had examined and admired the presents.

"Yes, I do; and I think Lester would say so, only he don't like papa. Can't you coax him to like him?" The little face and the sweet tremulous voice were both good pleaders, but Ellen required no such argument.

"I will certainly try, dear Ally. But why does he dislike him?"

"I don't know; he always did, and mamma used to cry about it. Papa tried to make up after she died. I heard him; but Lester would not."

"Where is your father now?"

"I don't know. He went away to-day, and he is going to write to me. He would have taken me with him, only he is too poor. I wish he wasn't so poor. I want to be with him, now mamma is gone," said the child, with choking sobs.

Ellen's eyes filled; and her voice trembled as she drew the delicate little creature closer to her, and tried to soothe her grief.

"Hush, darling! God will make it all right. We must pray to him."

"That is what mamma said, and I do pray; but it doesn't do any good."

"Don't say that. God answers our prayers in the way that is best for us, even if it is not in the way we wish."

"If you had seen Lester to-day, when papa went away, you would feel as badly as I do," persisted Alice. "He stood on the steps, and watched him get on his horse, and he looked so glad and so strange. I can't tell you how he looked, only he seemed to hate dear papa."

If the generous little heart could have imagined the pain her words gave, they would not have been spoken. But in happy ignorance she went on. "We are going there to-morrow; but it won't seem like home without any mother or father either."

Just then the tea-bell rang, and Lester was heard coming for them. "Come, Ally, bathe your face, and get ready for supper," said Ellen, glad of the interruption.

When the meal was over, Mrs. Howard persuaded Alice to go to the nursery with the other little ones; and the young husband and wife, going away by themselves, talked long and earnestly. She told him of Alice's grief, and begged him to forget past animosities, and permit her to invite Mr. Allen to visit them as her uncle, if he could not receive him as his stepfather. But he absolutely refused, telling her it was a murderer at heart with whom she wished to associate. Then Ellen, for the first time, heard of the fearful peril in which he had once been placed, and, as she clung to his arm, that thought for a time absorbed all others.

The old homestead was beautifully refurnished, and Lester proudly introduced his lovely wife to her new home. Guests came thronging there, and each one declared there could be no pleasanter place to visit. But let us ask: Was the affable master of the mansion as happy as he had expected to be? Young, handsome, talented, of high social position, in possession of a beautiful home and an ample income, loving and beloved, his seemed an enviable lot in life. That which he had panted to do was accomplished. Mr. Allen had been driven away in childless poverty, and was, no doubt, as unhappy as his stepson could desire. Yet that stepson walked through his splendid parlors, rode by the beautiful river, conversed with his wife, chatted with his friends, and vainly tried to still the upbraiding conscience, which would whisper that the mercy he had shown was not that which he would wish to receive.

Every letter Alice received from her father added to his discomfort. What would he not have given to prevent their corresponding? The little girl did not try to talk to him of her father, or tell him the news which came in her frequent letters. But his presence did not prevent her from drawing her little stool to Ellen's feet, and resting her arms upon her lap, while, with the sweet delicate face so like her mother's, upraised toward them both, she would tell how "Papa says his health is so poor now, he is hardly able to walk around;" or, "Papa boards at a little country tavern, in the northern part of Ohio. He says it is not very comfortable, but it is cheap." Or else,

"Papa says he wonders if you look as his sister used to; I am named for her, you know;" and still again, "Papa says he would give anything he has in the world for a kiss from his little daughter." Often these revelations would be interrupted by passionate bursts of sobs, and Ellen would soothe and caress her; every caress seeming to Lester like a reproach to himself. He began to think that, after all, he did not possess the generous, noble nature for which he had given himself credit; but still he resolved that he would not yield. He would not give up his revenge.

The nearest church was three miles distant; yet, to please his wife, he attended regularly with her. But this only added to his unhappiness. Why was it he had never before heard such sermons? Were they all aimed at him? or was it mere accident that the errors of his past life, the sins which he had glossed over as trifles, and really considered as of small account, should now be painted before him as hideous deformities—acts which must bring the wrath of God upon him? Without telling Ellen his destination, he rode over many times to see their minister, who saw, with joy, how deep were his convictions of sin, how ardent his longings for peace, and gladly pointed him to the Lamb of God. They prayed together, and the good man repeated to him many precious promises from Scripture, which he felt he dared not claim, for he had of late examined the Bible, and had read there: "If ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses." And his stubborn heart still resolved that, though he would give up all things else, he would not yield the hatred which had "grown with his growth, and strengthened with his strength." He was willing, he said to himself, to give to the poor; to forsake all sinful amusements; to be a faithful attendant at the house of God. And he tried to shut his eyes to the fact that he was keeping back anything, to make himself believe that he had taken away every hindrance which it was in his power to remove, and had, as his minister told him, nothing to do but to have faith in Jesus. But he could not so deceive himself. He knew he had not done all he could. He could invite Mr. Allen to his former home; or he could, without any inconvenience, grant him an annuity, and let him claim his child. Then he tried to justify himself: "He had not injured Mr. Allen. He had done nothing positively bad; in fact, he had given him money, though he had no claim upon him; and had only obliged one he de-tested to leave the country. The unhappiness which Mr. Allen suffered in his solitary poverty was the just penalty of his crimes."

If the just penalty of yours was visited upon you, where would you be? "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again. Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord. How dare you assume to yourself the prerogative of the Most High?" answered the inward monitor.

His misery became too great to hide. Ellen saw, and looked forward with trembling hope; but he would not talk with her, for he felt that, knowing all as she did, she would detect the wrong which his minister had failed to discover. All this time he thought only of fleeing from the wrath to come, and thought that this great sacrifice was demanded of him before God would fit him to stand when the heavens should be rolled together as a scroll.

One evening he sat with his wife and sister, and tried for some time to join in their conversation; but, finding it impossible, arose and threw himself in a most uncomfortable position on the sofa. Ellen looked at him for a moment; then, seating herself at the piano, played several of his favorite pieces of music, after which little Alice came to her to bid her good-night. A few pleasant words of conversation ensued, and when the child left the room, her brother seemed relieved, for he composed himself in an easy attitude on the sofa, and his wife looked pleased as she saw him do so. Turning again to the piano, her fingers wandered over the keys, and now her voice blended with the notes.

She sang several hymns, but they were all joyful ones; they told of the happiness of heaven, of the joy the believer feels, of the faith which looks beyond the tomb, and brings the invisible to view; and the singer's voice grew exultant, and there came to her face the same expression which he remembered to have seen that never-to-be-forgotten evening when he first saw her stand among the children of the Heavenly King. Ah! there was another part to the story, a part to which he had given little heed. There was happiness to be obtained as well as misery to be avoided; there was love, boundless love to be gained and enjoyed; love which could pardon even his transgressions, and fill and bless his anguished soul.

His heart seemed to expand. How strange that he should ever have felt hatred toward one for whom Christ died! He resolved that the tenderness of the future should, if possible, atone to Mr. Allen for the harshness of the past. And now the precious promises which he had been unable to claim came to his heart with thrilling power. By faith he laid hold upon them, and the voice of God whispered: "Thy sins be forgiven thee!"

One week later he alighted at his own door, bringing with him a wayworn, weary man, to whose arms little Alice sprang with a wild cry of joy. As Mr. Allen lay that evening on the sofa, the one where Lester had reclined a week before, with Ellen and his daughter beside him, he suddenly turned toward his stepson.

"Lester, I feel overpowered by your generosity. Can you forgive all my wickedness and injustice toward you?"

"Do not speak so, father," was the humble reply. "I have more need to ask forgiveness than to give it." And so Lester's revenge was consummated.

Could his mother have been there, how would she have rejoiced! Perchance she did, for "there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth," may we not suppose that the most rapturous note in all that burst of gladness will be sounded by those who have loved the erring one while on earth, and now exult in the anticipation of spending with them a blissful immortality?

THE LIKENESS.

BY JOSEPHINE POLLARD.

SWEET semblance of a living joy!

I gaze upon the pictured face,
And think I feel the warm embrace
Of him, our Albert, our dear baby-boy.

Not less beloved, because the least
Of the dear "trio" who so bless
The hearts that answer each caress,
Welcome to Love's imparadising feast!

'Tis morn to thee, thou little one;
Oh, mayest thou have as bright a noon!
An eve illumined by a moon
To shed sweet peace when this thy day is done.

There are bright flowers clust'ring round,
Filling thy path with odors sweet;
With satisfying joys replete:
Within thy happy home those flowers abound.

Might I annihilate the space
That intervenes 'twixt thee and me,
Dear little one, how sweet 'twould be
To clasp thee in a lingering embrace!

I gaze upon the shadowy brow—
I meet no glances from thine eyes,
No baby laughs I hear, no cries;
'Tis for thy mother's sake I love thee now.

And so shall grow my love, sweet elf,
Until we meet, and thou shalt be
Dear as the home-brood are to me;
And I shall love thee for thine own sweet self.

ESTABLISHMENT,

No. 473 Broadway, New York.

Carriage Dress.—Material of slate-colored silk, or fine mohair, trimmed with Humboldt blue glace or black, according to the taste of the wearer. Plain high body, with Ceinture Suisse of blue silk, and a scarf of the same, terminating in a bow, and ends rather low in the neck; the body itself is, however, close at the neck. The sleeves are slightly shaped at the elbow, and trimmed with bands of silk.

Mignon.—A full bishop sleeve, box-plaited, and set on a plain cap, top and bottom. At the top the box plaits are trimmed and laid on to form a frill, with an epaulette cap falling below. The bottom is plaited to a plain band, over which a deep cuff is set; this cuff has a second row of trimming set on in points.

Boy's Sack.—A plain high neck sack, made of drab alpaca, and braided with crimson; it is confined at the waist by a pointed belt, braided to match. The sleeve has but one seam, and that is at the back; it is open, and the band braided, but displays the shirt sleeve. The style is suitable for a boy from three to five years, and requires from three to four yards of material.

Baby's Bib.—May be quilted or made of bird's-eye diaper, worked on the edge, and lined with fine white muslin. The strings, which may be observed hanging down, pass through the loops on the shoulders, and tie behind, securing it firmly in its place.

Infant's Wrapper.—Made of a delicate corn-colored cashmere, and lined with white flannel. The body is plaited in to a yoke. The trimming is a broad band of blue wool de laine, stitched on. The skirt is long, and is intended for the comfort of an infant in cold weather.

LADY'S CARD-CASE, IN GOLD THREAD AND STEEL BEADS ON KID.

THE card-case is one of those articles so necessary for use that it can never be dispensed with, but must in reality be the companion in hand of every morning visit. The design we are now giving is arranged for working on kid, in an outline of gold thread, the interior parts being filled with the very smallest of the cut steel beads that can be procured. The end of the gold thread must be passed through to the back of the kid on commencing the outline of the pattern, and the same must be repeated on the return of the gold thread at its conclusion. The border round the edge is formed of a loop of the gold thread, having a single steel bead placed in its centre, carried round with as much regularity as possible. The color of the kid may be either bronze or gray, either of which contrasts well with the gold and steel color of the work. When the work has been completed it may be sent to the proper persons for making up; or if in the country, where doing this might be difficult, then the lady herself may stitch it over a cardboard shape, lining the inside with silk, carrying a row of fine steel beads round the edges, as closely as possible together, so as to cover the stitches; sewing up the side and one end in the same way, and only leaving one end open for receiving the cards. The cotton for this bead-work should be No. 40.

CROCHET MUFF.

BEFORE giving directions for the muff we will explain the stitches. For the fur stitch, pick up three stitches in one row, then three in the under row, then three in the first row, and so on to the end of the row, just as you would do Afghan stitch; you will have all the stitches on your needle. Then make a chain of three and pull it through one stitch, then a chain of three and pull it through the second stitch, and so continue; this makes the fur part of the muff.

In Gobelin stitch you make the first row of Afghan stitch; then after that you pick up between the stitches instead of taking up the stitch.

To widen, you pick up between the stitches, besides taking up the regular stitches.

DIRECTIONS FOR MUFF.

The muff consists of two pieces, an outside and lining.

Set up with No. 5 needle 49 stitches with white zephyr for the under part of the fur, and work 53 rows of Afghan stitch. In each stitch of white work one stitch of the fur (as we explained) with chinee worsted. For the pink lining of the muff set up 41 stitches, and work in single Gobelin stitch 60 rows with No. 4 needle.

A piece of muslin with wadding is placed between the lining and muff; they are sewed together, and on the ends the muff and lining are caught together with a row of plain crochet, then a row of open crochet or holes, through which are run cords and tassels.

KNITTED COUNTERPANE, IN BREADTHS.

Materials.—Knitting cotton, No. 6, four threads; about five pounds is sufficient.

CAST on 107 stitches.

1st row. Plain knitting.

2d. Seamed.

3d. Plain knitting.

4th. Seamed.

5th. Plain knitting.

6th. Slip 1 *, knit 2 together, knit 7, make 1, knit 1, make 1, knit 9, knit 2 together, repeat from *, knit the last stitch.

7th. Seamed.

Repeat the 6th and 7th rows alternately 8 times more, then repeat from the beginning, till you have the stripe the length you wish it; for the close stripe that unites the breadths, cast on 27 stitches.

1st row. Plain knitting.

2d. Knit 2 plain at each end, seam the remainder.

3d. Knit 5, *, seam 1, knit 7, repeat from * once, seam 1, knit 5.

4th. Seamed, except the 2 stitches at the end, which knit.

16th. Knit 2 plain stitches at each end, seam the remainder.

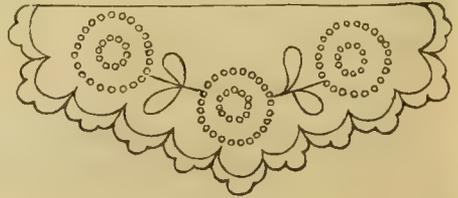

17th. Knit 6, seam 7, knit 1, seam 7, knit 6.

18th. Knit two plain stitches at each end, seam the remainder.

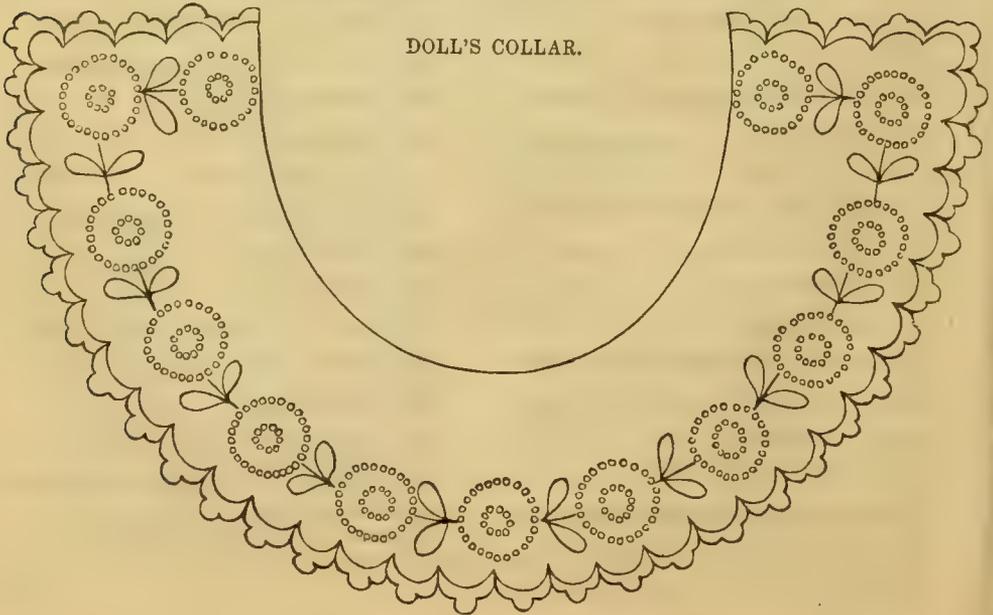

Repeat from 3d row, till you have done the length of the breadth.

FOR THE JUVENILES.

DOLL'S CUFF.

DOLL'S COLLAR.

BAG PURSE IN SILK KNITTING.

THESE very pretty little purses are now much used. They are knitted in rather coarse knitting-silk, of two or more colors, according to taste—blue and brown, or violet and scarlet, or pink and black; but as this is entirely a matter of taste, we only suggest these colors as contrasting well together. To commence: Cast on to a steel knitting-needle of a fine size forty-five loops; knit the first row, purl the second, knit the third, purl the fourth. The fifth row is the open row. Knit the first loop, silk forward, knit two together, silk forward, knit two together to the end of the row. Knit the sixth row, purl the seventh, purl the eighth. These eight rows form the stripe. The next row is the commencement of another stripe, and must, therefore, be again a knitted row. Repeat these stripes until there are twenty. Join the two edges together, and gather one end in for the bottom of the purse. The top is to be finished with a narrow crochet border. A pretty ornamental cord is then inserted through the knitted holes close to the crochet edge, and finished with three tassels to match, one on each side, and one where it is gathered in at the bottom; and this very useful and very pretty purse is completed.

GENTLEMAN'S BRACES IN SILK EMBROIDERY.

THIS sort of work allows much taste to be displayed in it, as, a variety of colors being employed, the advantageous effect of shading can be introduced, which, however slight, is still a great improvement to all flower-work. The material on which the embroidery is executed should for this purpose be a stout ribbon, either plain or watered; the latter looks the most handsome. The color of the ribbon must depend on the taste of the worker, as well as the arrangement of the work; the leaves of the pattern must be in a variety of greens, from light to dark; and the more different shades of green, the better the work looks. The color of the flowers must depend upon the color chosen for the ribbon; if a white or a black watered ribbon were selected, then the flowers might be in various colors; crimson, violet, and maize look well among the green leaves, on either a white or black ground. This sort of embroidery is worked in the same manner as muslin—that is, in satin stitch; the silk used should be the proper embroidery silk, which is less twisted than sewing silk, and fills up better. When the ornamental part of the work is completed, it must be sent to a proper person, accustomed to the manner of making up these articles, the work being previously covered with a strip of muslin to preserve it from either being frayed or soiled. When finished, they will be found a very ornamental and suitable present.

VARIOUS HERRING-BONE STITCHES AND MODES OF WORKING THEM.

BOTH the plain and fancy herring-bone stitches are much used in ornamenting children's garments, and as very little expense is incurred, this trimming is likely to continue long in favor. The stitch in all its varieties makes a pretty heading to embroidered borders, and often saves the expense of an insertion. Washing colored jackets and little frocks worked with two rows of this stitch in coarse cotton look neat and pretty; and for infants' clothing, such as robes, gowns, etc., the introduction of the stitch as a finish to the embroidery is now very general. The borders of cambric handkerchiefs look very nicely worked in red embroidery cotton in any of the stitches we have illustrated, and an ordinary worker could accomplish this in two hours—not a long time, considering the result. The stitches need little description, as the mode of working can be so easily seen on referring to our illustrations.

Fig. 1.

Fig. 1 is the simple herring-bone stitch, with which we feel sure all our readers are acquainted.

Fig. 2

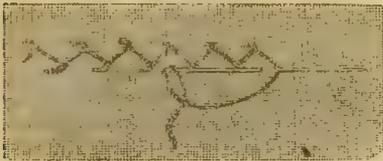

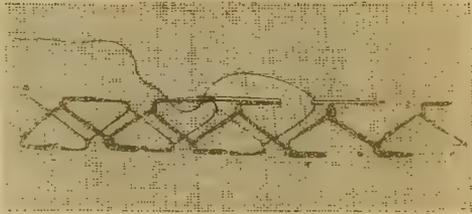

Fig. 2 is another form of herring-bone stitch, which is worked by placing the needle straight in the material, and always keeping the thread underneath the needle. Two little dots show plainly how the needle is to be inserted for the next stitch.

Figs. 3 and 4. The first illustration shows the manner in which the stitch is worked, and the second the appearance of it when finished. The first half of the stitch is executed in the same manner as Fig. 2, but spreading it out a little, and the other half is the stitch repeated, the contrary way. That our readers may more clearly understand the method of working this stitch, it is shown with two different sized cottons, and small dots are engraved, showing where the needle is to be put in for the completion of the stitch.

We have more of these stitches, which we will give in our next number.

BRADING PATTERN.

CORAL PATTERN ANTIMACASSAR IN APPLIQUE.

THE style in which this antimacassar is arranged is one that is just now very much in favor. The work itself is executed on mosquito net, the applique being in a medium muslin, neither too thick nor too clear. It is on this muslin, that the pattern should first be traced before the two materials are tacked together, which must be done carefully, not only all round, but in many of the parts not occupied by any portion of the design. The outline must then be worked either in chain stitch or with a sewn, over line, the first of these being recommended by its ease and quickness, the second being a little richer and more desirable. In whichever way the coral part of the pattern may be done, the spots should all be worked in chain-stitch, commencing with a little raised spot in the centre of each, and working round and round in a continuous line, each circle as close as possible to the last, until the right size has been reached. All the superfluous muslin must then be cut away and a rich fringe carried all round. The proper cotton for working this coral pattern is No. 20, the spots being No. 16.

ECONOMY OF THE TEA-TABLE.

As a test in general to distinguish genuine tea from the substituted let it be infused, and some of the largest leaves spread out to dry; when the real tea-leaf will be found narrow in proportion to its length, and deeply notched at the edges with a sharp point, whilst the shoe-leaf is notched very slightly, is darker in color, rounder at the point, and of a coarser texture.

In preparing the tea, a good economist will be careful to have the best water—that is, the softest and freest from foreign mixtures. If tea be infused in hard and in soft water, the latter will always yield the greatest quantity of the tanning matter, and will strike the deepest black with the sulphate of iron in solution; consequently, according to the technical term, it will always be found “to draw best.”

In the management of the tea-urn it may be observed that a polished urn may be kept boiling with a much smaller quantity of spirits of wine than when a varnished or bronzed urn is used, so that a silver urn is absolutely an object of economy.

In order to make a good cup of tea M Sayer recommends that, before pouring in any water, the teapot, with the tea in it, shall be placed in the oven till hot, or heated by means of a spirit-lamp, or in front of the fire (not to class, of course, and the pot then filled with boiling water. The result, he says, will be in about a minute a delicious cup of tea, much superior to that drawn in the ordinary way.

Tastes differ regarding the flavor of teas; some preferring all black, others all green, and many a mixture of both in different quantities, though most persons, when not fearful of their nerves, agree that fine hyson is the best. A good mixture, in point of flavor, we know to be two-fifths black, two-fifths green, and one-fifth gunpowder, all being, of course, of superior quality.

Presuming all ladies to be intimately acquainted with the mode of making tea, yet to some a few hints may be serviceable:—

First, never make tea in any other than a highly-polished teapot; for it is a chemical fact that metal retains the heat longer than earthenware, and the better it is polished the more completely will the liquid be kept hot, and the essence of the tea be extracted.

Secondly, see that the water be really boiling, not simmering, as is too commonly the case when taken from an urn, but kept either on the fire until boiled, or in one of those metal tea-kettles warmed by a spirit-lamp.

Tea retains its fine flavor better if kept in little tin canisters, instead of a caddy. It is impossible to prevent the admission of air into caddies; therefore it is better only to put a small quantity of tea into them at a time.

With regard to coffee, the best kind is always the cheapest. Burn it at home in small quantities, taking care, in using a close roaster, never to fill it more than half. Turn the roaster slowly at first, more rapidly as the process advances, and keep up a lively fire by the repeated addition of chips or other inflammable materials in small quantities. Burn it until of a light chestnut color. Keep it in close canisters or bottles. Grind it as wanted. Boil it in a vessel only half full, to prevent boiling over, in the proportion of one ounce and a half to a pint of water. Put in a few hartshorn shavings or isinglass, if you will; but if the coffee is taken off the fire whilst boiling, and set on again alternately, until nothing remains on the top but a clear bubble, and then some poured out to clear the pipe, and poured back again, it will be as fine as if cleared artificially. Long boiling does not make coffee stronger, but destroys its color, and renders it turbid. In making coffee, the broader the bottom and the smaller the top of the vessel, the better it will prove.

MISCELLANEOUS COOKING.

SHOULDER OF VEAL ROASTED.—It is best to have the knuckle cut off. In the under part will be found a good place to deposit some stuffing. Roast and serve up as the fillet or loin. A shoulder weighing twelve pounds will require full two hours and a half to roast. It is well to have the thick part near the knuckle placed before the fire, so as to get more roasting than the thinner part.

The breast of veal, though far from profitable, is very savory. Paper the joint, and roast for about an hour and a half. Serve with gravy and melted butter. The sweetbread may be skewered to the breast, and roasted at the same time.

The neck of veal is rather a lean joint for roasting, and requires to be larded with bacon, or well buttered, and frequently basted. The scrag end must, of course, be cut away, so that six or seven chops only remain. An ordinary sized neck will take two hours' roasting. The larding is done thus: Cut some fat bacon into pieces two inches long and a quarter of an inch square; put the larding-needle through the flesh about an inch and a half, then put one-third of the length of the piece of bacon on it, draw the needle out, and it will leave the bacon in the meat, about a quarter of an inch sticking up outside. Such a joint will require about two hours' roasting.

OYSTER PIE.—Take a large dish, butter it, and spread a rich paste over the sides and round the edge, but not at the bottom. The oysters should be fresh, and as large and as fine as possible. Drain off part of the liquor from the oysters. Put them into a pan, and season them with pepper, salt, and spice. Stir them well with the seasoning. Have ready the yolks of eggs, chopped fine, and the grated bread. Pour the oysters, with as much of their liquor as you please, into the dish that has the paste on it. Straw over them the chopped egg and grated bread. Roll out the lid of the pie, and put it on, crimping the edges handsomely. Take a small sheet of paste, cut it into a square, and roll it up. Cut it with a sharp knife into the form of a double tulip. Make a slit in the centre of the upper crust, and sneak the tulip in it. Cut out eight large leaves of paste, and lay them on the lid. Bake the pie in a quick oven.

OMELET.—Twelve eggs beaten as for custard, one cup of thick, sweet cream, and a little salt; have your spider well buttered; pour in your mixture, set it over a slow fire, stir it occasionally until it thickens; pour it immediately into a deep dish. This makes a very nice dish for breakfast.

BAKED MUTTON CHOPS.—A FRENCH RECEIPT.—Put each chop into a piece of paper with pepper and salt, and seasoning of such herbs as are agreeable. Add a little butter; put each into another piece of paper before baking. When done sufficiently, in a quick oven, they are to be served, having the outer paper removed, the first paper being left in order to retain the heat and gravy.

POTATO PUFFS.—Take cold roast meat, either beef, mutton, or veal and ham, clear it from gistle, chop small, and season with pepper, salt, and cut pickles. Boil and mash some potatoes, and make them into a paste with one or two eggs, roll it out with a dust of flour, cut it round with a saucer, put some of your seasoned meat on one-half, and fold it over like a puff, prick or nick it neatly round, and fry it a light brown. This is an excellent method of cooking up cold meat.

FRENCH STEAKS.—Cut some cold veal into the form of mutton chops; season them well with Cayenne pepper and salt. Put some butter into a pan, and melt it over the fire; dredge in some flour, and add some good gravy. Put in the slices of veal, after having sprinkled them over with egg and bread-crumbs, and stir all well together. When sufficiently cooked, lay them neatly round the dish, and put into the middle of it some kidney beans or mashed potatoes, over which pour a rich white sauce.

DRIED BEEF.—Slice dried beef very thin, put it in the spider with water sufficient to cook it tender; add sweet cream (or sweet milk with a little butter will answer); let the milk come to a boil, stir in a little flour, previously wet with cold milk, and let it boil long enough to cook the flour. This is an excellent dish to eat with baked potatoes.

FRIED POTATOES.—How few cooks know how to fry potatoes! There is nothing so easy to get, and yet so palatable for breakfast, with a thick tender beefsteak or a mutton-chop fizzing from the gridiron. To fry raw potatoes properly, they should be pared, cut lengthwise into slices, an eighth of an inch in thickness, dropped into a pan over the fire containing hot beef drippings, turned frequently, nicely browned all over, but never burned. The addition of a little salt and pepper while in the pan, and a little flour dredged over them, is an improvement. We have, however, found that a thick slice of good salt pork instead of the beef drippings, answered well. Every one to his taste.

SALAD DRESSING.—Rub through a fine sieve a middle-sized mealy potato and the yolk of two hard-boiled eggs, both cold. Put this into a basin, with a dessertspoonful of dry mustard, a saltspoonful of salt, a small quantity of pepper, and a pinch of Cayenne; and mix it well with a wooden spoon. Add to this a fresh egg, well beaten, and a tablespoonful of anchovy sauce, and work the whole together; and then, stirring it with the right hand, with the left pour in oil by degrees until it forms a thick paste; now add two teaspoonfuls of common vinegar by degrees, still keeping it stirred, and continue the addition of oil and vinegar in corresponding quantities till, by continued working it forms a stiffish, but perfectly smooth, cream-like sauce. Add a little more anchovy sauce or seasoning, if required; and, if too thick, dilute it by adding a little milk. This dressing will keep some days if no milk is used; or for a small salad half the above quantities will be sufficient.

POACHED EGGS.—Poached eggs make several excellent dishes, but poaching them is rather a delicate operation, as in breaking the egg into the water particular care must be taken to keep the white round the yolk. The best way is to open the small end of the egg with a knife. When the egg is done (it must be very soft), it should be thrown into cold water, where it may be pared, and its appearance improved before it is dished up. Poached eggs are served up upon spinach, or stewed endive, or alone with rich gravy, or with stewed Spanish onions. They may also be fried in oil until they are brown, when they form a good dish with rich gravy.

CAKES, PUDDINGS, ETC.

A PLAIN CAKE.—To three or four pounds of the best flour put two teaspoonfuls of yeast, and a tumbler and a half of lukewarm milk. Leave it half an hour to rise; then take six eggs, a little rose-water, and a quarter of a pound of pounded sugar; work it all well together, and beat it thoroughly for three quarters of an hour. Butter a mould, put in the dough, let it rise, and then bake it.

Another.—One pound of flour, half a pound of currants, half a pound of moist sugar, half a pound of treacle, a quarter of a pound of candied peel, half an ounce of allspice, half a pound of butter, two eggs, a teaspoonful of pearlsh to be dissolved in a teacup of warm milk. The above ingredients make a very excellent and inexpensive luncheon cake—one which keeps well some weeks, and can be highly recommended.

Another.—Take one pound of flour, a quarter of a pound of butter, a quarter of a pound of moist sugar, two eggs, a few caraway seeds, one gill of milk, a teaspoonful of baking powder. Bake it in a nice oven, not too quick.

ALMOND PUDDING.—Beat in a mortar half a pound of sweet, and a very few bitter, almonds with a spoonful of water; then mix four ounces of butter, four eggs (which should be well beaten), two spoonfuls of cream, and one of brandy; nutmeg and sugar to taste. (The brandy should be warmed with the butter.) Butter some cups well, and fill them half-full with the above mixture. Bake them thoroughly, and serve with butter, wine, and sugar.

SNOWDON PUDDING.—Quarter of a pound of bread-crumbs, the same of suet, and also of sugar, four well-beaten eggs, the rind and juice of a lemon, four table-spoonfuls of preserves, two ounces of candied citron or lemon cut into slices. Butter a mould, and stick it over with some of the pieces of candied citron; pour the above mixture into it, and boil it for four hours. Melt a little of the same preserve, and pour it over for sauce.

MALTESE CREAM.—Steep a quarter of a pound of macaroons at the bottom of a glass dish, in brandy. Cover them with some choice preserves, such as apricot or pine-apple, pound two ounces of the best sweet almonds, mix them with the yolks of three hard-boiled eggs, butter to the size of a walnut, a little white sugar, and lemon-peel. Rub these through a fine colander, with a wooden spoon, on to the preserves. Surround the whole with a whip of thick cream, white wine, lemon-peel and juice, and loaf-sugar.

GROUND RICE CAKE.—Break five eggs into a stew-pan, which place in another containing hot water; whip the eggs ten minutes till very light, then mix in by degrees half a pound of ground rice, six ounces of powdered sugar; beat it well; any flavor may be introduced; pour into the buttered pan, and bake half an hour.

CURRENT CAKE.—One cup of butter, three eggs, one cup of water or milk, half a teaspoonful of saleratus, nutmeg, cup of currants.

LIGHT CAKES.—Put a small quantity of flour into a mug, mix it with very good milk, with a lump of butter the size of an egg, a little barm, an egg, a teaspoonful of honey, and a little ginger; beat them well, and let them rise before baking.

PAN CAKES.—One pint milk, four eggs, half teaspoonful saleratus, a little salt, stiff enough for batter; serve with sauce.

GRAHAM CAKE.—Two cups of sour milk, two cups sugar, one nutmeg, two teaspoonfuls saleratus.

WAFER GINGERBREAD.—Equal quantities of flour, butter, treacle, and loaf-sugar. The butter, sugar, and treacle to be made warm, then mixed with the flour; add the grated rind of a lemon, ginger to your taste, and some candied citron and lemon cut into small pieces. Butter the tin well, and run this mixture thinly over them. Bake in rather a quick oven. When done, remove the gingerbread with a knife, cut it into square pieces, and roll them over a stick, in imitation of wafer cakes.

BRANDY CREAM.—A pint of cream, the juice of two lemons, sugar to your taste, two ounces of isinglass dissolved in a teacupful of water; whisk the cream a little by itself, then whisk in the lemon-juice and sugar, then the brandy (a large wineglassful), then the isinglass, strained and cool. If put in too warm, it will turn the cream. This quantity is sufficient to fill two moulds.

IRISH CAKES.—Melt one ounce of butter in one pint of boiling water, and pour it on two and a half pounds of whole meal; mix it well up, and knead it into a stiff dough; make the cakes an inch thick, any size or shape you please; though the triangular form is best. Bake them on a bakestone, and butter them whilst they are hot, and before sending them to table.

RAISED CAKE.—Three cups of dough, three cups of sugar, one cup butter, three eggs, one nutmeg, and raisins, one teaspoonful of soda.

FRIED WAFERS.—Two eggs, two large spoonfuls of sugar, one nutmeg, flour enough to knead up hard; roll thin.

THE TOILET.

POMADE DIVINE.—Take a pound and a half of beef marrow, put it into spring water ten days, changing the water twice each day; then drain it, put it into a pint of rose-water for twenty-four hours, and drain it in a cloth quite dry. Then add storax, benjamin, cypress, and orris, of each one and a half ounce, half an ounce of cinnamon, two drachms of cloves and nutmeg, all finely powdered and well mixed with the marrow. Then put it into a pewter vessel with a top that screws on, and over that a paste, that nothing may evaporate. Hang the vessel in a copper of boiling water, and let it boil two hours without ceasing; then put it through fine muslin into pots for keeping, and when cold cover it closely. If a pewter vessel is not at hand, a stone jar, with a paste between two bladders, will do.

Another receipt.—Take four pounds of mutton suet, one pound of white wax, an ounce and a half each of essence of bergamot and essence of lemon, and half an ounce each of oil of lavender and oil of organum. Melt the suet, and when nearly cold stir in the other ingredients. The organum has considerable power in stimulating the growth of the hair.

HONEY WATER.—Take a pint of proof spirit, as above, and three drachms of essence of ambergris; shake them well daily.

HUNGARY WATER.—To one pint of proof spirits of wine put an ounce of oil of rosemary, and two drachms of essence of ambergris; shake the bottle well several times, then let the cork remain out twenty-four hours. After a month, during which time shake it daily, put the water into small bottles.

COLD CREAM.—Take a quarter of an ounce of white wax, and shred it into a basin with one ounce of almond oil. Place the basin by the fire till the wax is dissolved; then add very slowly one ounce of rose-water, little by little, and during this beat smartly with a fork, to make the water incorporate, and continue beating till it is accomplished; then pour it into jars for use.

Another receipt.—Take of best lard one pound, spermaceti four ounces; melt the two together, and add one ounce of rose-water, beating it as above directed.

RED LIP SALVE.—Take of white wax, four ounces; olive oil, four ounces; spermaceti, half an ounce; oil of lavender twenty drops; alkanet root, two ounces. Macerate the alkanet for three or four days in the olive oil; then strain and melt in it the wax and spermaceti; when nearly cold, add the oil of lavender, and stir it till quite firmly set.

LAVENDER WATER.—Take a pint of proof spirit, as above, essential oil of lavender, one ounce; essence of ambergris, two drachms. Put all into a quart bottle, and shake it extremely well.

PRESENCE OF MIND.

(From Hall's Journal of Health.)

1. If a man faints, place him flat on his back, and let him alone.

2. If any poison is swallowed, drink instantly half a glass of cold water with a heaping teaspoonful each of common salt and ground mustard stirred into it; this vomits as soon as it reaches the stomach; but for fear some of the poison may still remain, swallow the white of one or two raw eggs, or drink a cup of strong coffee; these two being antidotes for a greater number of poisons than any dozen other articles known, with the advantage of their being always at hand; if not, a half pint of sweet oil, or lamp oil, or "drippings," or melted butter, or lard are good substitutes, especially if they vomit quickly.

3. The best thing to stop the bleeding of a moderate cut instantly is to cover it profusely with cobweb, or flour and salt, half and half.

4. If the blood comes from a wound by jets or spurts, be spry, or the man will be dead in a few minutes, because an artery is severed; tie a handkerchief loosely around near the part between the wound and the heart; put a stick between the handkerchief and the skin, twist it round until the blood ceases to flow, and keep it there until the doctor comes; if in a position where the handkerchief cannot be used, press the thumb on a spot near the wound, between the wound and the heart; increase the pressure until the bleeding ceases, but do not lessen that pressure for an instant, until the physician arrives so as to gine up the wound by the coagulation or hardening of the cooling blood.

5. If your clothing takes fire, slide the hands down the dress, keeping them as close to the body as possible, at the same time sinking to the floor by bending the knees; this has a smothering effect on the flames; if not extinguished, or a great headway is gotten, lie down on the floor, roll over and over, or better, envelop yourself in a carpet, bedcloth, or any garment you can get hold of, always preferring woollen.

6. If a man asks you to go his security, say "No," and run; otherwise you may be enslaved for life, or your wife and children may spend a weary existence, in want, sickness and beggary.

7. If you find yourself in possession of a counterfeit note or coin, throw it in the fire on the instant; otherwise you may be tempted to pass it, and may pass it, to feel mean therefor as long as you live, then it may pass into some man's hands as mean as yourself, with a new perpetration of iniquity, the loss to fall eventually on some poor, struggling widow, whose "all" it may be.

8. Never laugh at the mishaps of any fellow mortal.

9. The very instant you perceive yourself in a passion shut your mouth; this is one among the best precepts outside of inspiration.

MISCELLANEOUS.

OIL STAINS IN SILK AND OTHER FABRICS.—Benzine collas is most effectual, not only for silk, but in any other material whatever. It can be procured from any chemist. By simply covering both sides of greased silk with magnesia, and allowing it to remain for a few hours, the oil is absorbed by the powder. Should the first application be insufficient, it may be repeated, and even rubbed in with the hand. Should the silk be Tussah or Indian silk, it will wash.

Oil stains can also be entirely removed from silks and all dress materials, also leather, paper, etc., by applying pipe-clay, powdered and moistened with water to the consistency of thick cream, laid on the stain, and left to dry some hours, then lightly scraped or rubbed off with a knife or flannel, so as not to injure the surface. If the pipe-clay dries off quite light in color, all oil has been removed; if it comes off dark-looking, then more should be laid on, as grease still remains to be removed. Pipe-clay will not injure the most delicate tints of silk or paper.

GINGER ALE.—To ten gallons of water, put twelve pounds of sugar, six ounces of bruised ginger (unbleached is the best). Boil it one hour, put it into a barrel with one ounce of hops and three or four spoonfuls of yeast. Let it stand three days; then close the barrel, putting in one ounce of isinglass. In a week it is fit for use. Draw out in a jug, and use as beer.

TO TAKE THE BLACK OFF BRIGHT BARS.—Boil one pound of soft soap in two quarts of water, slowly, till it is reduced to one. Take as much of this jelly as may be required, and mix to the thickness of cream with emory. Rub with this mixture on a piece of woollen cloth, till all the dirt is removed, then wipe clean, and polish up with fine glass (not sand) paper.

TO CLEAR WHITE OSTRICH FEATHERS.—Wash the feathers by passing them through a strong and hot solution of white soap, rinse in tepid, then in cold water, then bleach with sulphur vapor, and placing them near the fire, pick out every part with a bodkin.

ARTIFICIAL CHEESE.—Well pound some nutmeg, mace, and cinnamon, to which add a gallon of new milk, two quarts of cream; boil these in the milk; put in eight eggs, six or eight spoonfuls of wine vinegar to turn the milk; let it boil till it comes to a curd, tie it up in a cheese cloth, and let it hang six or eight hours to drain, then open it, take out the spice, sweeten it with sugar and rosewater, put it into a colander, let it stand an hour more, then turn it out, and serve it up in a dish with cream under it.

HOW TO MAKE ARTIFICIAL MOSS.—Form a piece of plain knitting with some green wool; after you have knitted as much as you will require, put it into cold water for some time, and then bake it in a slow oven; after which, carefully unravel it, when it will present the appearance of moss, and is extremely useful in the making of artificial flowers, baskets, and other ornaments.

SPECIFIC AGAINST SEASICKNESS.—Many of our readers are accustomed to feel "sensational" qualms on leaving land; and a specific to give relief will, by them, be welcomed. Dr. Hastings, of Cheltenham, communicates a plan which he has adopted with frequent and complete success to prevent nausea: "Let the voyager provide himself with about a dozen yards of a common calico bandage, and directly he goes on board, bandage his abdomen, beginning low down over the haunches, and bandaging up over the pit of the stomach, not too tight, and then let him lie down, and go asleep, as he is almost certain to do, unless kept awake by the noise and tossing of the vessel." The Doctor asserts that this treatment is based on true physiological principles, and its simplicity renders it worthy of a trial by any one who is, as he states himself to be, "a martyr to seasickness."

TO PREVENT MRSLIN OR CHILDREN'S CLOTHES BLAZING.—The light fabrics manufactured for ladies' dresses may easily be made blaze-proof. The most delicate white cambric handkerchief, or fleecy gauze, or the finest lace, may, by simply soaking in a weak solution of chloride of zinc, be so protected from blaze that, if held in the flame of a candle, they may be reduced to tinder without blazing. Dresses, so prepared, might be burnt by accident, without the other garments worn by the lady being injured.

Or,—after the clothes are washed, let them be rinsed in water in which a small quantity of saltpetre is dissolved. It improves the appearance, and renders the linen or cotton proof against blazing. Window and bed curtains should also be so rinsed.

HOW TO MAKE ROSE-WATER.—When the roses are in full bloom, pick the leaves carefully off, and to every quart of water put a peck of them; put them in a cold still over a slow fire, and distil gradually; then bottle the water; let it stand in the bottle three days, and then cork it close.

TO DESTROY BUGS.—When bugs have obtained a lodgment in walls or timber, the surest mode of overcoming the nuisance is, to putty up every hole that is moderately large, and oil-paint the whole wall or timber. In bed-furniture, a mixture of soft soap with snuff, or arsenic, is useful to fill up the holes where the bolts or fastenings are fixed, etc. French polish may be applied to smoother parts of the wood.

TO PUT MEAT.—Take two pounds of rump steak, and cut it up in very small pieces, and put it into an earthen jar, having first placed half a pound of fresh butter at the bottom of it. Cover the jar well over with paper, which should be tied or stuck down with paste. Place the jar in a saucpan of water, and let it simmer gently. When nearly done, season the meat well by adding salt, Cayenne pepper, cloves, allspice, and a pinch of ground mace. Tie the jar up again, and let its contents boil until tender, and then let it get cold. Wash, scrape, and bone half a dozen anchovies, and pound them with the meat, adding six ounces of oiled butter. This will take some time to do well, as the gravy should be worked in with the meat. Take some small open pots, press the meat into them, and pour some oiled butter at the top of each.

HOME AND ITS INFLUENCES

I love that dear old home! My mother lived there
Her first sweet marriage years and last sad widowed ones.

The sunlight there seems to me brighter far
Than wheresoever else.—MRS. KEMBLE BETTER.

Oh, it was pitiful!
Near a whole city full,
Home had she none.—THOMAS HOOD.

HAPPINESS is the magnet that draws all hearts; in giving this precious blessing on earth the influences of domestic life can hardly be over-estimated.

A child born and trained in a happy, well-ordered, and religious home has a blessed lot; no matter how lovely the home may be, in memory it is a joy forever. The reality of home happiness must have for its foundation faith in God and obedience to His laws; those who make the home must illustrate its happiness by tender love, gentle, yet careful watchfulness, cheerful discretion, wise self-control, and gay, good temper; these feelings and graces will insure an amount of innocent enjoyment which the wealth of the world could not purchase.

The young married pair who commence housekeeping in a cottage of two rooms may be far happier than the family in a palatial residence, if the cottage is rightly managed and the palace is not; and these results are in a great measure dependent on the character and conduct of the mistress of the home. Woman has, by her influence, the power to make or mar domestic life.

We have often urged these truths on our readers, but general propositions are not so impressive as living illustrations, and a work recently published in London* throws new light on the hidden causes of the dreadful degradation exhibited by women in a penal prison, which seem to have their root in the utter want of good home training. A writer in an English journal remarks justly on this subject: "The book is a suggestive one. Here are the extremes of vices to which we only see remote tendencies in ourselves, our friends, our acquaintances, and the outer world; but enough to wake painful sympathies, to see horrible likenesses, to make us own common nature. We begin to realize, more than in thoughtless security men care to do, all we owe to the beneficent chains of decorous habit, to humanity from extreme temptation, to training in the humanities of life." The authoress gives an appalling picture of the wickedness of these wretched women; but the key is furnished in her graphic description of their neglected childhood and evil homes:—

"In the prison the teaching that should have begun with the women in their girlhood is commenced, and executed in a few instances, a sanitary influence; but ignorance, deep-besotted ignorance, displays itself with almost every fresh woman on whom the key turns in her cell. It is the great reason for keeping our prisons full, our judges always busy; three-fourths of our prisoners, before their conviction, were unable to read a word, had no knowledge of a Bible or what was in it, had never heard of a saviour, and only remembered God's name as always coupled with a curse. Some women have been trained to be thieves and worse than thieves by their mothers, taking their lessons in crime with a regularity and a persistence that, turned to better things, would have made them loved and honored all their lives. They have been taught all that is evil, and the evil tree has flourished and borne fruit; it is the hardest task to train so warped and distorted a creature to the right and fitting way. Praise be to those hard-working, unflinching prison chaplains who strive to their utmost, and are not always unsuccessful!"

On the other hand, wherever there has been some good seed dropped into the tender heart of the little girl, however imperfect and sparingly it may have been imparted, its beneficial tendencies were apparent. To this the Reviewer alludes as a great matter for encouragement "that good teaching is seldom absolutely thrown away. The mind which, however unwillingly, or with however little seeming profit, has received some religious truths in childhood, is in a different condition from one whose earliest impressions were all evil. As far as appearances go, a tender mother, a careful home, school, and church may be forgotten, their good influences disregarded, their memory trampled upon; yet every seed that is sown is not wholly and utterly eradicated." The Prison Matron remarks that something of a soothing Sunday influence is to be found even in a prison, some little respect for the Sabbath by the most obstinate prisoners:—

"It has struck me more than once that the best women—the good conduct women of all classes—are often grave and thoughtful (on Sunday). Now and then a matron, suddenly entering a cell, may find a prisoner in tears; and it is always a prisoner who has had some semblance of a home in early days, or some well-meaning father or mother."

Then the capabilities of these sin-darkened minds for the reception of God's glorious truths are shown in many minute yet striking particulars which the writer gives us, and remarkable traits are disclosed of the innate love of beauty and ornament in the feminine mind. One suffering common to all these women is the absence of anything to please the taste. They evidently hunger for some gratification to the eye, will tear out the pictures from the library books to stick them on the walls of their cells, though only for an hour or two, and snatch at the few homely flowers in the airing-ground, which become such objects of envy and contention that the theft is soon discovered and punished. Says the authoress:—

"I have a remembrance of looking through the inspection of a cell some years ago, and perceiving a prisoner, with her elbows on the table, staring at a common daisy, which she had plucked from the central patch of grass during her rounds—one of those rude, repulsive, yet not wholly bad prisoners, from whom good-splendour of sentiment was anticipated. Yet the wistful look of that woman at her stolen prize was a gleam of as true sentiment as ever breathed in a poet's lines. A painter might have made much of her position, and a philosopher might have moralized concerning it; for the woman wept at last, dropped her head down on the table between her clasped hands, and shed her bitter tears silently and noiselessly."

These painful pictures are relieved to us by the knowledge that as yet we have no such places in our country filled with multitudes of miserable women, as this book describes the inmates of English prisons. As yet the crushing poverty of European civilization is not felt in our land. To keep this humanity we must cultivate the virtues of home. We women must be in earnest to aid the instruction of the poor. There should not be a little girl permitted to run the streets in rags and beggary. An institution is needed in every large city where such neglected girls may be sent and well cared for; but much might now be done by private benevolence. We lately saw it recorded that the wife of a Brooklyn lawyer has for some time past opened her house every Saturday to receive the little daughters of the poor; that about forty gather around her; to these she gives a dinner, and then instructs them in sewing; and in other ways, by conversation, reading, and singing, is not only making their lot happier, but preparing them by her wise and tender care to become useful girls and good women. Such private charities are among the noblest deeds of humanity.

WOMAN'S WORK AND ITS REMUNERATION.

In the last "Table" we gave an excellent "letter," setting forth the benefits of "Household Work." It will, we are sure, be approved by thoughtful men as well as by our constant readers—the best and kindest women of the land. There is need of keeping this subject before public sympathy till it shall become the universal heart-feeling—that women, who are obliged to support themselves, shall have the opportunity of finding employment. The time is fast approaching, indeed has already come to many individuals, when all the aid we can give to bereaved widows, fatherless girls, and destitute women, will be sorely needed.

Still we have great cause of thankfulness as we compare the poverty and suffering of women and children in our country with those of the two greatest nations of Europe—England and France. The miserable condition of the poor, especially women, in England, need not here be described; we hear it in every report from that Old World metropolis. But the equally hard fate of women in France has not been so familiar to Americans. We have thought French women shared more equally with the men of that nation in work, and its just remuneration.

A very sad description of the condition of workwomen in France has lately appeared.* One short quotation will put the case very clearly:—

"A workwoman who labors twelve hours daily, receives barely enough to satisfy hunger, and has nothing left to pay for her clothes and lodgings. In the country the wages of factory girls and dayworkers are tenpence; these, however, are the lucky or skillful ones; for many get no more than sevenpence half-penny, sixpence, or fivepence a day. I know some who, when working at home, cannot obtain more than fourpence by twelve hours' work. Be it understood, that they are neither fed nor lodged, receive neither fuel nor candles; they get fourpence and nothing more. There are some who hire themselves for food alone, and others who work for absolutely nothing, being obliged to serve an apprenticeship, which lasts several years. Such, in the state of our civilization, is the lot of an indigent woman."

"Surely," says a British Reviewer, "M. Texier is fully justified in asserting that many Frenchwomen might envy the condition of negro slaves. Slave women have to work, but they do not die of hunger or cold. We know why these workers are so badly paid—they are too numerous. In France, as in England, the complaint is general, that men are superseding women in many branches of industry. The Emperor can do much; but as for a remedy for this evil, it will puzzle the greatest statesman to suggest one. It is clear, however, that something must be done, and that speedily. Why are the soldiers in the French army deteriorating every generation? Because their mothers are half-starved. Why is woman's virtue but a name among a certain class? Because Frenchwomen cannot live by the work of their hands. The importance of the subject is overwhelming."

Let us American women be thankful that our country does not permit her daughters to be thus degraded.

OUR POETS.

"Even copious Dryden wanted, or forgot
The last and greatest art—the art to blot."

So sang Pope, and matters have not mended, practically, since his day.

We have warm sympathy for young poets, even when one sends us his or her "first piece." With all its crudities, we feel loath to dash the high hopes of the writer; and we have been happy to encourage all whom we found had sense to understand that study and labor must perfect the poet, that the rejection of worthless verses was the kindest course we could take to help the author. The many letters we receive on this subject cannot be, generally, answered—we have not the time; therefore, we give these few remarks as a reply to those who have asked our counsel, or a place in the "Lady's Book," which we have been obliged to decline.

Concerning poetry, which most surely and deeply moves the popular mind, it must be fraught with human interest; it must portray human feelings, affections, passions; the more truly and vividly it does this, the greater will be its influence, and of course its popularity.

Metaphor, simile, and allegory are but the drapery of the spirit of poetry, which must breathe the language of the human soul, in its most secret communings with itself, or with nature, and nature's God. This poesy, when it reveals most truly the terrible struggles of the soul with the temptations of earth and sin, as well as its most earnest hopes of forgiveness and heavenly happiness, assumes its highest character. In these revelations of the heart's history, men have, naturally, the advantage over women, because the former are not usually troubled with that delicate reticence of sentiment which the latter cannot easily lay aside. Therefore men speak out their feelings, and give expression to their passions. This was the secret of Byron's power. Had Mrs. Hemans chosen thus to unveil the sanctuary of her domestic griefs and wrongs, she might have moved the world to tears, and made herself the idol of popular sympathy. But she, woman-like, preferred to be the silent victim rather than the accuser of the husband she had loved, whom she no doubt always continued to love.

Mrs. Norton is the only poetess, we recollect, who has given expression to her own domestic miseries and heart sorrows. She has been complimented with the title of "the Female Byron!" We do not consider this an enviable distinction; but Mrs. Norton is a writer of true genius, a real poetess; yet, in comparison with Mrs. Browning, she falls in tenderness, sympathy, and piety. We would prefer our young countrywomen should study the works of the latter in their efforts after the highest model of woman's poetic genius.

Man has a different standard; we do not know that it is higher; measured by its moral power, it is often lower; but there is no need of comparisons.

We usually place, in our Editors' Table, some poetic offering from the hand of a lady; this month, we give the place of honor to the poem of a gentleman; it cannot fail of favor from our readers.

LITTLE WIFE.

I care not for the rising storm,
I do not heed the wind,
Nor listen to the angry wind
That roars around the wood.
I only know my joy my sister,
If 't is just ahead I see,
The light that tells my little wife
Is waiting there for me.

My gentle wife! my darling wife!
My soul's own joy and pride!
Ten thousand blessings on the day
When you became my bride.
I've never known a weary hour
Since I have held your hand—
I would not change my worldly lot
For any in the land.

Oh, sweetly from her loving lips
The blissful words she says!
There is no happier voice to me
Than she and her lullaby waves.
Ah! and indeed would he my heart,
And dark the world would be
If not for this dear, little wife
That ever waits for me.

GEORGE COOPER

SCHOOL OF DESIGN FOR WOMEN IN NEW YORK.—We have had recent notice of this noble Free School, now open at the Cooper Institute. In some respects it has been more successful than the "School of Design for Women in Philadelphia." The New York School is under the entire supervision of a lady, Mrs. Henry M. Field, eminently accomplished and fitted for the post, and who is engaged in the service from an earnest devotion to its object. Mrs. F., as principal, is aided by several competent teachers, and the school is organized into classes, according to their tastes, objects, and advancement, by the judgment of the Principal, and all in successful operation. There are classes for beginners, classes in drawing, in landscape, in wood-engraving, and it is hoped to add, ere long, a class in modelling. There are now about 150 pupils, mostly free. An article in The Commercial Advertiser says:—

"One effect of the hard times is seen in the superior class of pupils who now enter the school. In a time of war the very poor cannot commence a long course of instruction. They must turn their hands to work which will yield immediate support. They cannot wait a year or two to earn a profession. At the same time, thousands who hitherto have been in good circumstances now find their incomes cut off or greatly reduced, and in this uncertainty as to what may be their condition hereafter, they look forward to some resource for their daughters, and hence seek the advantages of such an institution as this.

"Nor is there change in the character of the pupils to be regretted. The institution is indeed open to all with the utmost liberality. Yet it is evident that to pursue art with a prospect of success, requires a natural taste and capacity for it, and at least some degree of previous culture. It is from this class of young women, belonging to families of good position, and who are themselves beloved and refined, that must come the pupils who will do most honor to the institution, and be most successful in the study and practice of art."

FRENCH ON FRENCH FASHIONS.—A grand ball was held at the Imperial Villa at Biarritz, and according to a letter from that place:—

"The toilettes of the ladies were richer than ever. Hair-powder seems to be coming into vogue again, for many of the ladies used it on this occasion."

Very probably. The admirable revival of hoops should naturally be followed by a return to hair-powder. The saucy, gregariousness with which the French ladies follow their leader, and the English ladies them, is, though a gosselike, a gratifying attestation of their attachment to the Grinoline Dynasty. Venus forbid that the Empress of the French should wear rings in her nose; but if she were to adopt such ornaments, her example would doubtless be followed by our wives and daughters.

THE SEWING-MACHINE.—The benefits of this wonderful invention increase every year of its trial. There are no dangers attending its use, but real pleasure as well as profit in its results. Indeed it seems to realize the power of good fairies, such as children love and to have in their elders often regret that they have outlived this pleasant faith—more than any other of the labor-saving inventions. The Sewing-Machine comes into the heart of home; it helps in the domestic circle; it has an important influence on family comfort and social happiness. No wonder that good men are willing to sound its praises, that "poets, orators, divines, philosophers, and economists have decanted upon its bearings on social interests and the destiny of woman." It is worthy of this praise.

Last month the "Fairy Sewing-Machine" was introduced to our readers by an artist, that not only every lady who has a taste for needle-work should have a household help, such an one as comes from the manufactory of Wheeler & Wilson, in the perfection of its work and equal to all kinds and varieties of stitching, is the Queen of Sewing-Machines, which we wish could be introduced into every home where women are found.

Mrs. Mary Howitt says of this machine: "It is an ever ready, ever capable friend in need; one who never wearies, never loses its eyesight over the most delicate work, nor ever, in fact, can be overworked. It can be going suddenly to the Antipodes, or a distant part of the world, or if your benevolence longs in the cold winter weather to clothe the poor in warm garments, you need not hesitate as to what shall do this noble and necessary needle-work. These machines are good general help in every household, with the advantages, especially of the ever-ready threaded needle ready to do your bidding. Such has been the experience in our family. Need I say more?"

MISS S. J. HALE'S BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES, 1223 Rittenhouse Square, Philadelphia, Penna.

This school has now entered on its seventh year; the success and present prosperity are very satisfactory to its friends.

The design of the Principal is to give a thorough and liberal English education, to furnish the best facilities for acquiring the French language, and the best instruction in music and the other accomplishments. The Assistants employed are of the first class and highest merit. French is taught by an experienced instructress, a lady lately from France who resides in the family; and thus the pupils have ample opportunities of acquiring the accomplishment of speaking the language.

Particular and continued attention is paid to the moral training, and also to the health and physical development of the young ladies.

These articles are declined: "Thrilling Days"—"Jo Hartley, or Spring"—"Amis"—"Too Soon"—"Burnside's March"—"Evaline"—"Xarifa"—"Song"—"My Experience in Fishing" (we have no need of new contributors at present)—"Coming home from the war"—"Thou art gone" (too long for the space we can spare our poets)—"Charles Seymour, or The Promise Fulfilled"—"Unreal"—"Madrigal"—"Gone"—"An Apologue"—"Who was to blame?"—"A Love Story"—"Carrie Belmont"—"Social Parties"—and "Growing Poor."

We have many MSS. on hand not yet examined.

Those who desire a reply to letters must inclose an envelope stamped. If articles are to be returned, stamps must be sent.

Health Department.

BY JNO STAINBACK WILSON, M. D.

THRUSH.—This is a very common disorder of children. It is, perhaps, more generally known among the people as "the thrush." The symptoms are redness and dryness of the mouth, fretfulness, feverishness, difficulty in sucking, and frequently more or less disturbance of the stomach and bowels. The inflammation of the mouth is followed or accompanied by the appearance of small white or yellow specks on the tongue, lips, inside of the cheeks, and sometimes on the gums. These deposits or specks may fall off, leaving the surface of the mouth healthy; but most commonly the curdy exudation continues to spread until the whole, or the greater part of the membrane lining the lips, gums, etc. is involved. The patches may remain distinct, or they may run together. They are renewed as long as the inflammation continues; and they sometimes extend to the throat and upper part of the windpipe. Recent investigations seem to prove that the exudation of thrush consists of, or is caused by certain microscopical parasitic plants, to which learned men of course give a very long hard name. Thrush prevails most extensively, and in its worst forms, in hospitals, and other places where a number of children are collected together, and where they are exposed to the evils of impure air, innutritious or insufficient food, uncleanliness, and other depressing influences. It should be remembered always that thrush is not so much a disease in itself as it is a symptom of general constitutional debility, and more particularly of derangement of the digestive organs, caused by bad air and bad food.

The treatment should be directed mainly, then, to the improvement of the general health. For this purpose the great, and generally all-sufficient remedies are pure air, proper nourishment, and the warm bath. The nursery-room should be well ventilated, and in pleasant weather the little one should be carried out in a carriage or in the nurse's arms. But remember that the carriage should be open, so that the little patient can have the full benefit of the free air and the bright sunshine. And if the child is toted in the nurse's arms, see to it that its head is not enveloped in cloaks or shawls.

If the child is still at the breast, the mother should give special attention to her own health, carefully guarding against excessive drugging, late hours, depressing mental influences, unwholesome food, and in short everything that tends to disturb the mental and physical equilibrium. If the child is weaned, the diet should be pretty much the same as that before recommended under the head of "Diet after Weaning." Sour and unripe fruits should be particularly avoided. The warm bath will have a fine effect in soothing irritation, in equalizing the circulation, and in eliminating morbid matters from the system. It should be used at least once a day.

If the discharges from the bowels are green and offensive, small doses of magnesia, or rhubarb and magnesia may be given; but this will not often be necessary, with proper attention to the directions above.

In the way of local treatment the mouth should be frequently and gently washed out with a rag wet in cold water. For the removal of the curd-like exudation, borax may be regarded as almost a specific; but it should never be forgotten that the mere removal of this is the smallest and least essential part of the treatment. The borax may, however, be properly conjoined with the other measures recommended. The best form of using borax is in solution. This is made by dissolving the salt in cold water. The strength of the solution should be varied according to the degree of sensibility, but as a general rule the water may be saturated, that is, as much may be put into it as it will dissolve. With nurses, a mixture of borax and honey is a favorite remedy. Equal parts of powdered borax and loaf sugar we have found to be an excellent and convenient application; but some writers suppose that all sweet things tend to favor the production of the microscopic growths to which we have alluded.

(Selected From Hall's Journal of Health.)

HINTS ABOUT THE TEETH.—Natural teeth, clean, perfect, and sound, are essential to the comeliness of any face; they not only add to the comfort and personal appearance, but contribute largely to the health of all; hence, special and scrupulous attention should be paid to them daily, from the fifth year, each tooth being minutely examined by a skilful, intelligent, and conscientious dentist every third month, up to the age of twenty-five, when they may be considered safe, with semi-annual inspection. Avoid cold and hot food and drinks most sedulously. If a "pick" is ever employed, let it be of wood or quill. Never use a dentifrice prepared by stranger hands. Tartar on the teeth is formed by animalcules, some of which are instantly killed by soap; others by table-salt; hence wash the teeth with a wet brush drawn across a piece of white soap every other night at bed-time, using the salt but once a week, which, perhaps, whitens the teeth as safely and as well as anything else.

Pure sugar melts without a residue, and passes into the stomach at once, hence cannot possibly hurt the teeth by its adherence to them. Heat, and cold, and acids are the things which injure the teeth on the instant of touching them. Sugar can only act perniciously in so far as, by its too free use, it causes dyspepsia. A doughnut daily will sooner hurt the teeth than a lump of sugar. Teeth hereditarily poor may be kept in a good state of preservation for many years, if well watched, kept plugged in a finished style, cleaned as above, and the stomach is made to do its duty, by a temperate, active, and regular life.

The teeth should be washed with a stiff brush on rising, and with an old, used brush immediately after each meal, always employing lukewarm water, or holding cold water in the back part of the mouth until it is warmed. Never eat an atom after the teeth have been washed for the night. Always use the brush slowly, lest by a slip, a tooth may be scathed or broken. After meals, let the bristles of the brush be moved up and down by a twisting motion, making each one a tooth-pick. A yellowish tint to a tooth is proof of its soundness; hence do not seek to keep them of a pearly whiteness; it destroys them.

Literary Notices.

From PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

THE PIRATES OF THE PRAIRIES: or, Adventures in the American Desert. By Gustave A. Mard, author of "The Prairie Flower," "The Trail Hunter," etc. etc. Those who have been interested in the previous volumes of this series of novels will be looking anxiously for the appearance of the present work. A. Mard well sustains his reputation as one of the best writers of fiction of this peculiar class.

From Geo. W. CHILDS, Philadelphia:—

THE SIEGE OF RICHMOND: A Narrative of the Military Operations of Major General George B. McClellan during the months of May and June, 1862. By Joel Cook, Special Correspondent of the Philadelphia Press with the Army of the Potomac. An interesting and well-written narrative, laying modest, and we venture, therefore, to say, just claim to truthfulness, to the extent of its author's own personal knowledge and observation. We may regret that it is not so complete, in many important particulars, as a history of the memorable siege of Richmond ought to be; but at the same time we can be thankful for what is afforded us, meanwhile waiting patiently till the period when the restraints of military prudence shall be removed from our obtaining a full knowledge of all the facts.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

A HISTORY OF FRANCE, from the earliest Times to the Establishment of the Second Empire in 1852. This work is one that admirably fills a hitherto vacant place in our literature. Though embracing in the limited compass of some seven hundred pages a general history of France from the earliest to the present times, it exhibits few of the dry characteristics of an abridgment in its style, and is really an interesting and readable volume, even to those who have had the opportunity to peruse the fuller and more detailed general and special histories of France, by French authors of undoubted genius and research. As a convenient book for reference, containing all necessary facts for a clear understanding of French history, this volume will prove of invaluable service.

CAMP AND OUTPOST DUTY FOR INFANTRY. By Daniel Butterfield, Brigadier General Volunteers, U. S. A. The present war has occasioned the publication of numerous works designed for the instruction and convenience of the soldier, among which not the least important and interesting is the little volume before us. It contains full, yet concise, directions concerning outpost duty, together with standing orders, extracts from the army regulations, rules of health, and much other necessary information for both officer and soldier. The book is not too large for even a soldier's limited means of conveyance, and is substantially bound.

MISTRESS AND MAID: A Horaeobol Story. By Miss Muloch, author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," etc. etc. This is a simple, unpretending novel, detailing the various incidents and events in the lives of three sisters, the Misses Leaf. It describes first their humble way of living, with their little village school, then their removal to London, in the hope of providing a home for, and retaining an influence over their scapegrace of a nephew. Then come trials unforeseen, yet which must be, and are bravely met, until the story is finally brought to a satisfactory end. Elizabeth Hand, the "maid," is a striking character; and being placed in favorable circumstances, develops many noble traits, which, even in her humble position, make her almost, if not quite, a heroine.

From D. APPLETON & Co., New York, through W. F. HAZARD, Philadelphia:—

THE PENTATEUCH AND BOOK OF JOSHUA CRITICALLY EXAMINED. By the Right Rev. John Wm. Colenso, D. D., Bishop of Natal. The author of this work gives a careful review of the Pentateuch, and records his impressions, convictions, and doubts concerning it. Some of his criticisms, it cannot be denied, are of a character to challenge serious consideration, and to lead the believer in the inspiration of the Bible to seek anxiously for explanation and reconciliation. Others, meanwhile, seem to us too trivial to deserve as much importance as he gives them. Strangely enough, there appears to be at this time almost a rivalry among certain Christians as to who shall succeed in casting the most doubt upon the reliability of the Scriptures. At all events their criticisms upon it in many portions will not compare unfavorably with those of noted infidel philosophers of both the past and the present. All this may betoken, and we may, at least, hope that it does, an agitation in religion which will result in the final justification and triumph of truth.

From ABBEY & ABBOT, New York:—

MAY DREAMS. By Henry L. Abbey. This is apparently the production of a young poet, and bears the impress of more than ordinary talent. Whether its author does or does not possess the higher gift of genius time alone can definitely answer. What he has already written gives good promise; but reminiscences and half-echoes of the strains of Shelley are not to be relied upon as proof positive of any unusual degree of poetic genius.

From TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston, through W. P. HAZARD, Philadelphia:—

THE CANOE AND THE SADDLE. Adventures among the Northwestern Rivers and Forests; and Ishmitians. By Theodore Winthrop, author of "Cord Dreams," "John Brent," etc. Theodore Winthrop was a rare spirit. An ardent lover of nature, thoroughly enjoying the adventurous life of a wanderer in the wilds of the North-west, he was also endowed with high intellectual gifts, among which was that of being enabled to perpetuate his enjoyment upon paper for the gratification of others. His descriptions are vivid, and his feelings are preserved in all their keenness; so that one can almost hear the dash of the waves, and delight in the sound of the wind among the pines. His command of language is remarkable, and in its use he is sometimes extravagant. The major portion of the book before us is a narrative of a hasty journey, with Indian companions, from Port Townsend to the Dalles of the Columbia. It is not beyond criticism, but there is a vigor and dash about the style that charms us in spite of all.

THE POET'S JOURNAL. By Bayard Taylor. In the poems forming the first portion of this volume, and from which it derives its title, few readers not wholly unacquainted with the personal history of Mr. Taylor will fail to recognize what may be presumed to be a fair transcript of their author's past, so far, at least, as the poetic side of his life is concerned. Melodious and smooth in versification, and almost faultless in finish, they nevertheless lack that warmth of passion which is the life of all heart histories, and without which the poetry of love, sorrow, and happiness has few attractions for any but those metaphysical sentimentalists who find in the transcendental effusions of the German muse their model of poetic excellence. However, where Mr. Taylor is not seemingly overborne by the influence of a foreign literature, he presents us with many fine passages, and even with whole poems, worthy of a high place in our imaginative literature.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

OUR EMBELLISHMENTS FOR FEBRUARY NUMBER.—"The Duet," an admirable engraving, as all our subscribers will pronounce it; and an excellent story will be found illustrative of it. It is seldom that eleven figures in a picture are so distinctively made out, and yet each figure has an individuality about it that is unmistakable.

Our Fashion-plate—well! our Fashion-plates require nothing said about them; they are a speciality of Godey, and are now recognized as the only true exponent of the fashions. We feel proud of them; proud because ours is the only magazine in this country that surpasses those of England and France. In this country no attempt at imitating them has yet been made.

"Chair Seat." This pattern is worked on canvas. The small pattern in the corner has no connection with the seat.

"The New Sewing-Machine" will appear in our March number.

MIXED JOY.—We are receiving more subscribers now than we ever did any previous year that we have been in business; this is joy unmixed. Now comes the mix. We shall have to pay nearly all we receive to the paper-makers; but—and here comes the inevitable but—we think we do not fare the worst. We deal with a firm that think that they have souls to be saved, and do not take the advantage of the combination, for combination it is in some respects; for we are informed that many of the Eastern dealers, who have no souls, have a year's stock on hand, and are grinding the publishers to the utmost extent. We hope these men will be marked for a future time. We do not wish them eventually to return to that condition from which their stock is formed—rags! for we have a more forgiving disposition.

FIVE COPIES FOR $3.—We have no such clubs, and will not send even under the old terms five copies for $3. We publish our terms, and whatever they are we abide by them, and any attempt to make us swerve from them is in vain.

PANIC IN PAPER.—The rise we make of club subscribers to $2 a copy will not begin to pay us, but we do not increase more in hopes that before long the price of paper may decrease. It is how about 100 per cent. above what it was when we issued our December number, and still going up. The small amount we have increased is but a trifle compared to that of the daily papers. They have raised 50 per cent. Papers formerly issued at two cents are now sold at three. This will pay; but our rise is very small. Could we raise our price 50 per cent., we would smile at the rise of paper. Our present prices will be found on the cover of this number, and these terms we cannot depart from. We annex an article from the Baltimore American:—

"At the present price of printing paper the subscribers to newspapers are scarcely paying more for their printed sheets than the prime cost of the white paper on which they are printed. The advance in price in the last ten days is fully twenty-five per cent., or nearly one dollar per ream on the paper used by the American. But this is not all. We are threatened with a still further advance, and the probability is that the white sheet will soon cost more than the subscriber pays for the printed sheet. This condition of affairs cannot, of course, be sustained by the press, and we look to a very general advance in the charge to subscribers and agents for their papers. Some of the Northern papers have already advanced from two to three cents per copy, and the New York dailies are said to be discussing the imperative necessity of an advance."

Since the above was written, the prices of the New York dailies have been advanced from two to three cents.

"This increase in the cost of paper is said to be mainly caused by the fact that the government contractors are using rags in the manufacture of blankets and cloth for the army, producing the article called 'shoddy.' They have bought up all the stock in the market, and will in due time force upon the government this miserable substitute for cloth. Another cause of the advance is the government tax on paper, and all the chemicals used in its manufacture.

There is probably no species of business so heavily taxed as the newspaper proprietor. He is required to pay all these combined taxes on the paper manufacture, has an additional tax of three per cent. on all the advertisements in his paper, and pays the tax on all other material used in his business. Then his income, if any should be left, is taxed, and, unless he advances the price to be paid by his readers—which will be light to them—the probability is that he will at least escape the tax on incomes."

THE AMERICAN PUZZLE was sent us for a notice in our December number; it is just in time for February. When will people learn that our immense editions require us to be out and stirring early? Well, the American Puzzle is a very ingenious matter, and will well repay a patient study. It is ingenious, and is somewhat like the old Chinese puzzles, so rife with us some years since. The inventor, J. M. Mueller, Detroit, Michigan, did not mention the price, but we presume it can be had on application to him.

SEASONABLE CONUNDRUMS:—

By what female name would a hen object to be called?—Addie-laid (Adeidae).

What part of India resembles another part!—The one that's Simla.

When is an artist like a cook?—When he's drawing a little duck.

On what food should a prizefighter train?—Mussels.

Why are the wearers of moustaches and beards the most modest men in society?—Because they are the least bare-faced.

A question for Coroners.—Must a man have "wound himself up to a pitch," before jumping off Waterloo Bridge?

OUR MUSICAL COLUMN.

A MONTH ago and we were hopeful at the prospect of a protracted opera season, but we have given up now. Two or three indifferent performances by troupes that come here to make good their losses in other cities are all that we dare expect. Will the time ever come that the plans and purposes for which the Academy was built—to establish a resident opera, with a school for the education of home talent—shall be realized? While we await a reply we walk down to that cosy little Opera House in Eleventh Street, where Carnacross & Dixey put everybody in a good humor with their burlesques and exaggerations. Here we see scenes from Trovatore, and Concerts à la Musard in a style that would astonish Verdi and make Jullien roar. Of one thing we are satisfied—that burnt cork and broad caricature are not of necessity a drawback to good music.

New Sheet Music for the Piano. Horace Waters, New York, publishes President Lincoln's Grand March, by Helmsmuller, embellished with the best likeness of the President we have seen, 50 cents. Music Box Galop, by Hering, beautiful composition, seven pages, 35 cents. L'Etoile de la Mer, fine valse, 35. Hillside Polka Quickstep, very pretty, 35. Volunteer's Polka, by Goldbeck, 25. New Katy Did Schottische, 25. Also the following three pieces by Baker, as played at Laura Keane's Theatre: Love Waltz, Seven Sons' Galop, played in the popular burlesque, and Laura Keane Waltz. Each 35 cents, or the three for $1.

Mr. Waters also issues the following songs and ballads, each 25 cents: Fond Mother, thou art Fading Now. Pleasant Words for All, pretty song and chorus, by Roberts. Shall we Know Each Other There? Come Sing with Me, song and chorus. Flora Lyle, and Mother's Love is true, two sweet songs by Keller, sung by Bryant's Minstrels. Was my Brother in the Battle? Jenny's Coming o'er the Green, No Home, no Home, Slumber, my Darling, and I Will be true to Thee, five of the latest songs by Foster, author of Gentle Annie and other popular melodies.

Prof. Grobe's latest compositions comprise Variations of No One to Love, ten pages, 50 cents. Himmel's noble Battle Prayer, transcribed, 50. Variations of Foster's Fairy Belle, 50. Also the following easy pieces, at 25 cents each: Gideon's Polka, New York Mazourka, Somerset Schottische, Banjo Polka, Krentzer Minuet, Battle of Winchester, and Airs of the 16th, 17th, and 18th Centuries.

The Skating Quadrille is a fine seasonable composition by Vaas, ornamented with handsome moonlight skating scene, 50. Snowflake Polka is another piece for the season, and very pretty, 25. Still another fine seasonable composition is the Skating Polka, by Franz Seab, 25. Volunteer's Quickstep is a fine easy piece by F. Karl, author of our music in this number, 25. The Lafner, beautiful waltz by Otto, 25. Fairy Polka Redowa, pleasing, graceful piece by Vaas, 25. Schreiber's Band Drum Polka, capital composition, played by many of the military bands, 25. The last five 25 cent pieces we can send for $1, and they are all very pretty.

New Music by the Editor.—We have published new editions of the following songs: Beautiful Valley (third edition in a few weeks). Poor Ben the Piper (seventh edition). O Lady, Touch those Chords Again. The Minstrel's Grave; and The Passing Bell, or Home Returning from the Wars. Price 25 cents each, or we will send the five to any address for $1.

Orders for any of the foregoing carefully attended to, and the music mailed promptly and carefully. Address the Musical Editor, at Philadelphia,

J. STARR HOLLOWAY.

FITZGERALD'S CITY ITEM.—The New Year commenced the thirty-third volume and sixteenth year of this valuable family journal, and we are glad to see in its interesting columns renewed proofs of its popularity and prosperity. It deserves its long success. Its political course is eminently national and independent. In regard to the business interests of Philadelphia it has shown enterprise, and integrity, which entitle it to the confidence of our merchants and manufacturers. As a literary journal the reputation of the City Item is unsurpassed. Its novellettes and tales are admirable, its poetry is far above the ordinary average, and among its contributors are many writers of celebrity. Its criticisms on the drama and the fine arts are intelligent and discriminating. In wishing our contemporary a happy New Year our wishes ask no more than it well deserves, and we take pleasure in expressing this brief opinion of a journal which has so long been an honor to the American Press. The City Item is published at 112 S. Third St., at two dollars a year.

NOTICE TO THOSE WHO SEND US DRAFTS OR CHECKS.—Be particular, when you purchase a draft or check to send us, that the same has the proper stamp affixed to it by the person from whom you procure it.

Extracts from the Law.

"Stamps must be affixed to all documents by the party issuing the same."

"The person using or affixing a stamp must write thereupon the initials of his name, and the date when used."

"The penalty for making, signing, or issuing any instrument, document, or paper of any kind without the same having thereon a stamp to denote the duty, is $50, and such a paper will be invalid and of no effect."

Any check on a bank, or sight draft, over $20 requires a two cent stamp; $20 and under no stamp is required.

MISSING NUMBERS.—Those who do not receive a January number must write for it at once, and so with every other number of the year; if they do not, we do not feel obliged to supply them. A club will be sent for 1863, we will say, and we are then informed that certain numbers in 1862 never came to hand. This may be so, and then again it may not; they may have lost the numbers by lending them, and then call upon us to supply the deficiency. Now let it be distinctly understood that we will only supply missing numbers when they are written for at the time. When you receive a February number, and the January number has not been received, then write.

MESSRS. J. E. TILTON & Co., Boston, have for sale all materials for the different styles of Painting and Drawing taught in their book, ART RECREATIONS. They will send a price list, if requested, and answer necessary questions, and will send, post paid, the book for $1.50. It teaches Pencil and Crayon Drawing, Oil Painting of every kind, Wax-work, Leather-work, Water Color Painting, and hundreds of fancy kinds of drawing, painting, etc. etc.

LOSS OF DECEMBER NUMBERS.—We have had many applications for duplicate December numbers. We wish it understood that no fault lies with us. A large western mail was destroyed by fire that contained an immense quantity of our December issue intended for our subscribers.

HERE IS A CHANCE FOR SOME FAIR LADY.

A BACHELOR'S THOUGHTS ABOUT MATRIMONY.

DEAR MR. GODEY: Your Lady's Book has so long supplied to me the place of a refined, agreeable, and entertaining companion that I had scarce felt the forlornness of bachelorhood until reminded of my miserable condition by a recent visit to my friend Joe Hopkins, which, I must confess, has seriously disturbed my mental equilibrium. You see I am a bachelor, and Joe was my college chum and classmate. Well, Joe is married and settled in life, and as happy a man as the sun shines on. He declares matrimony to be the ultimatum of human happiness, the grand panacea for all ills, the last lingering remnant of paradise below. His wife is the sweetest thing in nature, the sum total of human excellence; no man ever so blessed in a companion as he; in fact, his is the most felicitous union ever formed since Father Adam gave a rib to get his Eve. The dear creature is consulted on all matters of taste, propriety, and expediency, and everything is referred to her consideration as though she were an oracle. I don't believe Joe has bought a hat since his marriage without her approval. He goes and comes at her bidding like a well-trained spaniel, and seems to delight in the service. All my persuasions to get him into the country for a little rustication were of no avail, because he could not leave "wife." Well I wonder how I would like such matrimonial servitude? such absolute subjugation to petticoated angel! But I suppose love's silken chain is no more burdensome than the glossy ringlets that cluster about the face of a fair maiden, or the white plume that decks the head of the victorious general.

The contemplation of Joe's felicitous condition causes very uncomfortable sensations about my heart, and makes me almost willing to submit to the bondage of this mysterious matrimonial chain. But then what if the silken should vanish with the sweetness of the "honeymoon," and I should hear the clank of iron and feel the irksomeness of perpetual bondage, from which no magistrate could release me? That would be misery past endurance. To be sure, if my spouse had sense and skill, I never should feel the weight of chain nor hear the clank of bondage. But how could I secure such an one? The getting of a wife is such a hazardous undertaking, there is so much of the uncertainty and risk of the lottery about it that I am almost afraid to incur the risks and responsibilities. What if she should beguile me with all the sweetness of a Desdemona until she had bound me fast, and then transform herself into a veritable shrew? What if to kisses and caresses should succeed frowns and repulses? All the horrors of old bachelorhood would be preferable to such a catastrophe. If I could get the right kind of a wife—a woman with sense and soul, affection and emotion, intelligence and discretion—in whose judgment I could confide, and in the lovingness of whose nature I could repose; one whose sympathies would beat responsive to my own; and when a thrill of joy gladdened my heart, it would glow in her eye; when grief and trouble agitated my breast, it would quiver in her lip; and when oppressed and dejected in spirit, I should hear words of encouragement in her gentle tones; if such a wife were mine, there would not be a happier man in existence than I. I would like, too, that she should possess some originality, some hidden resources of mind and character for varied circumstances to develop, so that I might discover occasionally new beauties and virtues. I would weary of a monotonous being, were she ever so good and sweet.

Sameness, even though flavored with the essence of goodness, would soon become insipid. I want something more pungent, something of the flash and sparkle of spirit that can foam occasionally. I like a demonstrative nature that can give expression to the inner life, so that I may know when hopes elate, and when fears depress; when the soul is stirred with joyful emotion, and when deep grief broods upon the spirit. I like the natural play of feeling, well regulated by amiability; in short, I want a woman, modest, unaffected, and refined, whose emotions spring spontaneous, like the song of birds; whose conversation flows with graceful ease and lively interest; with a soul to appreciate the good and beautiful, and a hand and heart to will and do. If I could find such a woman, I would commit myself to the matrimonial noose in less than a week. "Would that Heaven had made me such a wife!"

TO CHARITABLE SOCIETIES.—We hope a different plan will be practised than that of former years. For instance, a visitor will go into a house and find everything looking clean and somewhat comfortable; the inference is that no charity is wanting here, because the woman of the house happens to be tidy, and the children's clothes whole, though, God help her! she has struggled hard and worked late to make things look comfortable. The same visitor will enter another house, and find everything dirty; children ragged, and the mother, perhaps, under the influence of liquor, but he doesn't see it. She tells a lamentable story, and charity is bestowed without stint. The really poor, but modest woman is chary of her words, and her chance of help is small. "Reform it altogether, I pray you."

"THE SKETCH-BOOK."—A collection of easy landscape studies, drawn from nature by E. W. Holmes, 1711 Filbert Street, Philadelphia. We commend this series of sketches to all beginners. Mr. Holmes is a well-known drawing-master of this city, and would not publish anything but what would be useful to the student. There are fifteen sketches in the number now before us, and all admirably drawn.

EXTRACT from a letter:—

GALENA, ILL.

I have again busied myself in renewing my old club; happy to find its price remains the same, although every other article has so increased in price.

MRS. R.

Very glad you availed yourself of the present low prices. After the issuing of the February number, you will see that they are increased.

VALENTINE MONTH.—This is the month when Valentines are sent. A most agreeable one to send us would be a $3 note, for one year's subscription to the Lady's Book.

THE MUSIC IN THE LADY'S BOOK.—Various complimentary letters have been received upon our music. There is one advantage that our subscribers have. They receive the music in the Book long before the music publishers issue it. By the time it is in others' hands, our friends are perfect in it. In fact, it is an "old song" to them.

BOOKS BY MAIL.—We do not send books by mail—it costing us much more than we receive, and the books being lost, occasioning us a great deal of trouble. We mean bound books, published by others.

THE CRAIG MICROSCOPE.—We furnish an engraving of the celebrated "Craig Microscope," a description of which we published in our last November number. This is the only instrument of high power that requires no local adjustment, and can therefore be readily used by every one, even by children. It magnifies about 100 diameters, or 10,000 times. As a Gift or a Present to a friend or child, it is excellent, being elegant, instructive, amusing, and cheap. The Microscope will be sent by mail, postage paid, on the receipt of $2 25; or, for $3 00 the Microscope and six mounted objects will be sent, postage paid. A box containing twelve different mounted objects will be sent by mail, postage paid, on the receipt of $1 50. Address HENRY CRAIG, Homoeopathic College, Cleveland, Ohio.

GODEY'S NEEDLES.—It will be seen by the advertisement on our cover that these useful little articles have advanced in price. The increased duty and premium on exchange, now nearly 50 per cent., and the premium on gold to pay duties, have obliged us to increase the price to 30 cents per 100, including, of course, the case that contains them.

Dec. 1862.

DEAR SIR: I must be exceedingly poor when I have decided to do without your Book. I take it to endeavor to become a judicious economist. Believe me, you have no greater devotee than myself. Mrs. S., Maryland.

CANADA WEST.

MR. GODEY—DEAR SIR: I have succeeded in getting a club for your truly valuable book. I am, dear sir, fond of your book, and most happy to recommend it to my acquaintances. It has been taken in our family for the last year. Its moral purity and ennobling sentiments make it worthy a place in every family. I wish you increased prosperity. B.

TO COLOR PHOTOGRAPHS.—A new preparation called Newton's Prepared Colors for Albumen pictures is for sale by J. E. Tilton & Co., Boston. Price, with a bottle of Reducing Liquid complete, with full directions for painting, so that any person, though not an artist, may paint in a most beautiful manner, and very rapidly, the cartes de visite and photograph, etc., $3 25.

There has been offered for sale a worthless imitation that will injure the photograph. See that the box obtained has the name and seal of J. E. Tilton & Co., Boston, who are sole agents for the United States.

J. E. T. & Co. have also beautiful copies of flowers from nature (photographs) for coloring with these colors, or for copies for drawing and painting, which they will send by mail for 25 cents each. Also, cartes de visite of all distinguished persons.

THE Fashion Editor desires us to say that she receives orders from those who are subscribers and those who are not; in fact, she never stops to inquire whether they are or are not subscribers to the Lady's Book.

LETTER from an editor:—

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 8th came duly to hand, and I hasten to reply. My P. O. address is ———; and I already get your valuable magazine in exchange. Could you witness the effect of the intelligence of the receipt of Godey on our better half, you would rest assured that it is one of the "indispensables" of our household. Hoping that we may ever receive your valuable magazine in exchange, I remain, with due respects, Very truly yours, D. F. S.

"HRSKE."—We are glad, though not surprised to find that this story is creating a great sensation. In answer to the editor of the Matison Herald, and the same answer will do for all others, the story is copyrighted, and cannot be copied.

"I KNOW I am a perfect bear in my manners," said a young farmer to his sweetheart.

"No, indeed, John; you have never hugged me yet. You are more sheep than bear."

PARENTS HAVE MUCH TO ANSWER FOR.—At one of our dancing-schools for juveniles one of them was overheard to say to another: "My ma allows me to speak to you here, but I musn't anywhere else. You all try to imitate me, and you do in some things; but my dresses you cannot imitate, as they are made in Paris." When this child grows older, will she not remember the parental instructions of her youth?

The above memorandum was made ten years since. We came across it recently, and now state that the father of the child above referred to failed, took to bad habits, and soon died. The family is now very poor.

POSTAGE ON THE LADY'S BOOK.—Postage for three months, if paid in advance at the office where it is received, four and a half cents.

BARNUM OUTDONE.—A Berlin letter tells the following amusing story of a hoax:—

"I cannot conclude the present letter without mentioning a little incident that occurred here in the course of the present week, and in which some ingenious rogue has verily out-Barnumed Barnum. A member of the company of players at Callenbach's Theatre was to have a benefit night, and the question was how to get together a good audience, as the usual attendance at that place of amusement, even if doubled, would produce far too slender a sum to satisfy the expectations of a benefit night. Accordingly, some days before the memorable evening, there appeared in all the Berlin papers an advertisement to the following effect: 'A gentleman, who has a niece and ward possessing a disposable property of 15,000 thalers, together with a mercantile establishment, desires to find a young man who would be able to manage the business and become the husband of the young lady. The possession of property or other qualifications is no object. Apply to —.' Hundreds upon hundreds of letters poured in, in reply to this advertisement. On the morning of the benefit day each person who had sent a reply received the following note: 'The most important point is, of course, that you should like one another. I and my niece are going to Callenbach's Theatre this evening, and you can just drop in upon us in box No. 1.' Of course the theatre was crammed. All the boxes, all the best-paying places in the house, were filled early in the evening by a mostly male public, got up in a style which is seldom seen at the Royal Opera itself. Glasses were levelled on all sides in the direction of box No. 1, and eyes were strained to catch the first glimpse of the niece when she should appear in company with the uncle. But uncles are proverbially 'wicked old men;' and in the present case neither uncle nor niece was to be found, and the disconsolate lovers—of a fortune—were left to clear up the mystery as best they could. The theatre has not had such an audience for years, and of course the chief person concerned reaped a rich harvest by the trick."

CLUB of $10.

Your Lady's Book has afforded us so much pleasure for the last two years that I have found very little trouble in making up a club. Miss H., Ohio.

LET it be distinctly understood that we have no agents for whose acts we are responsible, and we are only accountable to those who remit directly to us. We have no agents that solicit subscribers. Money must be sent to the publisher, L. A. Godey, Philadelphia.

PUT UP THE NAMES.—Why don't all the railroad stations in this country follow the English practice, and have the name of each distinctly and conspicuously put up for the information of passing travellers? In New England the fashion is common, but not in New York, Pennsylvania, and some of the Western States. Why do the latter neglect such a convenience? Is every stopping place supposed to be so well known to strangers that exhibiting its name might be a superfluous accommodation? What complacency! Or is the accommodation of strangers a matter of no consequence? What a business idea! Reform it altogether, gentlemen. Put up the names—put up the names!

A COUNTRY editor, speaking of a blind sawyer, says: "Although he can't see, he can saw."

MACKINAC, MICH.

DEAR SIR: Would you like to know the mode of conveyance by which the Lady's Book reaches these almost Arctic Regions? It is by dog-teams. From Saginaw to this place, a distance of over two hundred miles, our mail matter, in the winter season, is brought to us on men's backs, and dog-teams. We have a weekly mail; and each weekly party consists of two men and three dogs, with a long traine de glisse, to which the latter are harnessed. This traine is generally made of an oak board two or three-eighths of an inch thick, about a foot wide, and eight or ten feet long, with the forward part nicely turned up. On this are strapped mail-bags, and the provisions for the men and dogs. This would sound strange to those who live in well-improved parts of the country. Yesterday the thermometer ranged between four and twenty degrees below zero; and this morning it stood twenty-four degrees below. The ice in these straits, and Lake Huron in this vicinity, is from eighteen to twenty-eight inches thick; no sign of an early opening of navigation.

I hear that your subscribers at this place are much pleased with the Lady's Book. A. H.

WE commend the following to the publisher who gives place to the remarkable sayings of children:—

ON THE IRREVERENT USE OF THE BIBLE.—The introduction of God's Holy Word, when accompanied by a light and trifling remark, is a palpable abuse of its sacred truths. And can any language be too severe, in reprehension of conduct so repulsive, which is not only an offence to all Christian principles, but a gross insult to the Almighty? And those persons who value not the Holy Scriptures for the blessed Gospel which they contain, would do well to reflect upon the remark of a celebrated author, whom the world hath styled "a Colossus of literature," that "A jest drawn from the Bible is the most vulgar, because the easiest of all jests." Thus considered, even in a worldly point, it is conduct so perfectly low, that no gentleman would be guilty of such coarse profanity, which proves at once a deficiency of intelligence and common sense.

"Within that awful volume lies
The mystery of mysteries,
Happiest they of human race
To whom God has granted grace;
To read, to fear, to hope, to pray,
To lift the latch, and force the way,
And better had they ne'er been born,
Who read to doubt, or read to scorn."

A RULE THAT DOESN'T WORK BOTH WAYS.—A mail has been burnt somewhere. Well, we are asked with the utmost nonchalance to supply the numbers lost therein. We do so. A steamer is sunk carrying the mail. We are again asked to supply the deficiency. We do so. When money is mailed to us, and a mail car is burnt, or the money lost, or a steamer sunk, we are asked to sustain the loss. Really the rule should be established that we are free somewhere. If we were not obliged to furnish numbers lost, we could sustain the loss by mail, or vice versa. Fix it as you please, we are content; but don't let all losses fall on our shoulders. Sometimes a person in California will send a letter containing $10 by express. It is delivered to us with a charge of $3 upon it, when the same by mail would only cost ten cents. We are asked to supply the deficiency. Do we do it? That question will be answered only on application at our office.

JUVENILE DEPARTMENT.

ART IN SPORT.

AN almost endless source of amusement, combining at the same time a considerable amount of instruction, may be obtained in the following manner: Take a card or piece of pasteboard, or even stiff paper, such as cartridge paper, and draw upon it the form of an egg—an oval in outline. The dimensions of the oval are immaterial, and the experimenter may suit his own fancy in this respect. With a stout needle, or tracing point, prick quite through the outline, for the purposes of tracing. Some of our readers may be unacquainted with the mode of tracing an outline, and it may be advisable to particularize one method among many. Having pricked out the oval upon the card, get a little red or black lead, powdered, and, placing the card upon a piece of drawing-paper—any white paper will, however, do—rub it over the pricked-out oval, which will be found to be transferred to the white paper beneath, thus:

The powder may be applied either with a piece of wool or wadding, or by means of a dry camel's-hair pencil: care should be taken not to let the tracing-powder get beyond the edge of the pricked card, as in that case a soiled, dirty appearance is given to the tracing. The pierced card will serve, if carefully done, for hundreds of tracings, and it is obviously the best plan to take a little extra pains with that in the first instance.

With this traced oval for a basis, any one with a very little skill will be able to form an infinite number of objects.

The best drawing-tool will be found to be an ordinary black-lead pencil.

Figs. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6 are very easy results, suggestive also of others. The rules of procedure are the same in all. Leaving the traced-out oval at first in its dotted form, with the pencil you draw a horizontal line, as the basis of your figure. Let this and the other lines, which serve merely as the scaffolding of your figure, be done faintly or in dots. Next, draw a line through the centre of the oval and perpendicular to the first. These will insure your making the object square and properly balanced. After this you may draw lines parallel to the others; but these are not so material, although they serve as guides.

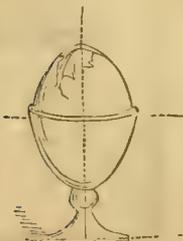

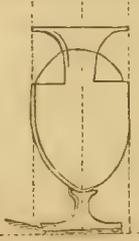

Fig. 2.

Now the imagination and fancy may step in to produce forms having the oval for a foundation; and not only is a very rational source of amusement opened out but the opportunity is given to a cultivation of the noble art of design, whether as applied to utility or ornament.

It is obvious to remark that the hand of many an amateur artist will readily be able to form the oval without having recourse to the pierced card: but as this portion of our work is intended for all, we have suggested the above mode as sure to succeed under every circumstance.

Fig. 3.

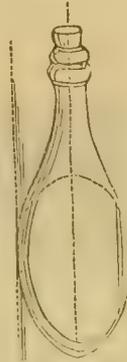

Fig. 4.

Following the same plan in every particular, we subjoin some examples of what may be done with the square.

Fig. 8.

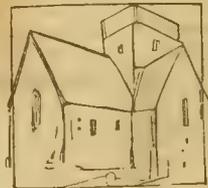

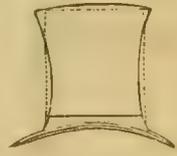

Fig. 9.

The dotted lines (Figs. 7, 8) represent the traced or sketched square and plan lines; the firmer lines suggest objects formed upon that figure. In the same way the thin square outline (Fig. 9) suggests the inner sketch of a church.

SOME HINTS.

In remitting, try to procure a draft, and don't fail to endorse it.

Address L. A. Godey, Philadelphia, Pa. That is sufficient.

If a lady is the writer, always prefix Mrs. or Miss to her signature, that we may know how to address a reply.

Town, County, and State, always in your letter.

If you miss a number of any magazine, always write to the publishers of the magazine. If Arthur's, address T. S. Arthur & Co., Philadelphia; if Harper's, address Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York.

When a number of the Lady's Book is not received, write at once for it; don't wait until the end of the year.

When inclosing money, do not trust to the sealing matter on an envelope, but use a wafer in addition.

Mrs. Habis is not the Fashion Editress. Address "Fashion Editress, care L. A. Godey, Philadelphia."

When you send money for any other publication, we pay it over to the publisher, and there our responsibility ceases.

We can always supply back numbers.

Subscriptions may commence with any number of the year.

The postage on the Lady's Book, if paid three months in advance at the office where it is received, is four and a half cents for three monthly numbers.

Let the names of the subscribers and your own signature be written so that they can be easily made out.

EMBROIDERING STAMPS.—We take pleasure in announcing to the public that S. P. Borden still continues to manufacture his celebrated Premium Embroidery and Branding Stamps. The stamps are in general use in the United States and Canadas, and have never failed to give satisfaction to those who have them. Stamps from any design made to order. They are warranted to stamp on any material. Those engaged in any fancy business would do well to send for a few dozen. Send to S. P. Borden, Massillon, O., or his agents, J. M. Pickering, No. 90, West Fourth St., Cincinnati, O.; Mrs. Sylvie Harrington, Potsdam, N. Y.; Miss Carrie P. Aydon, Wilmington, Del.; Mrs. A. Brooks, 1208 Poplar St., Philadelphia, and Mrs. E. C. Borden, travelling agent. Inked cushion, pattern book, and full instructions with each order. Price $5 per dozen.

PHILADELPHIA AGENCY.

No order attended to unless the cash accompanies it. All persons requiring answers by mail must send a post-office stamp; and for all articles that are to be sent by mail, stamps must be sent to pay return postage.

Be particular, when writing, to mention the town, county, and State you reside in. Nothing can be made out of post-marks.

Miss S. T. O.—We abominate the system of presents at marriages; they are productive of much mischief. We know a party in this city that issued on their cards "No presents received;" and we approve of such an announcement. Many persons are invited to the ceremony in the mere hope of receiving a present from them, it being understood that those who are invited to the ceremony are expected to contribute. It is a most beggarly system.

Miss V. R. T.—Several of our papers have annexed to the advertisements of marriages, "No cards sent." This is good. Many persons not receiving a card might suppose themselves slighted, but the announcement explains all.

Mary T.—We should not like to ask such a question of the parties. We presume they are engaged, but we have not received any announcement of the fact.

E. D. R.—In the December number for 1862 you will find it.

A Subscriber.—Our receipt was to present and not remove, and so it reads. There is nothing that can remove the marks as they now are.

Mrs. S. H. C.—We do not see why calico dresses should not be as well made as those of a finer material. Surely we furnish trimming enough for any person to select from; and as for bonnets, it is left to the good taste of the wearer to have them fully trimmed or not, to suit their taste or their pocket. There is where the French women excel those of any other country. No matter what the material, the dress fits beautifully, and is trimmed tastefully. Your calico dress can be made after any of the patterns furnished by us, but, of course, not as fully trimmed.

B. A. R.—We cannot advise. We neither know the man or his circumstances.

Miss E. L. A.—We cannot recommend anything to remove freckles, and we have repeatedly said so. You cannot be an "old subscriber" to the Lady's Book, or do not read it thoroughly, or you would have seen our remarks before on this subject. If you use any of the nostrums published, you do it at your own peril.

S. V. O.—Such an announcement was made by the so-called publishers, but unfortunately the magazine never was published.

C. M.—Do not hesitate a single moment. To miss doing a kind action is to miss doing a good one, and how do we know that the opportunity will ever come again? Certainly that opportunity never can return. It has gone to the grave of time in this world, to be inscribed on the great Day Book of another.

Miss R. A. S.—You need not rise from your seat when the introduction takes place.

B. R. K.—According to your notion, the ark would not have held many crinolined ladies.

M. V. A.—Before this reaches you, skating will probably be over. The skates you mention we can procure in New York, but not here. Straps are used in addition to the fastenings you mention.

Mrs. E. R.—Cannot tell how you can dispose of them here. No sale now for such articles.

Mrs. B. R. A.—Yes! no more healthy exercise. Teach your children to ride if you can afford it. It is a useful and healthy exercise. As regards your daughter as a beginner, we would say, commence without the second horn. It is somewhat of a circus trick, yet still useful at a more advanced stage.

Mrs. A. L. B.—Nurses in France all wear caps.

E. A. B.—If it is a genuine Rubens, it would probably sell in London for $10,000. We doubt its genuineness.

E. S. D.—We don't purchase hair to make hair-ornaments. This answer will do for about a dozen inquirers.

Miss E. R. G.—A lady of our acquaintance uses the following for her complexion: The last thing, before going to bed, she takes a wash rag saturated with warm water and well rubbed with castile soap. She then folds the rag in two, washes her face—but not applying the soaped side to the skin; added to this, she is an early riser, and takes plenty of exercise.

Mrs. G. V. R. O.—$2 a copy for every copy over two copies. That is, you can get three copies for $6, and every other copy after that is $2 a copy, until you reach the club of eleven for $20, and cheap enough at that.

Miss H. A. S.—You will find it in December number. For your suggestion accept our thanks.

Chemistry for the Young.

LESSON XXII.—(Continued.)

538. Does the solution contain any metal? Evaporate a few drops in succession over a spirit lamp, on the same spot of a piece of platinum foil. Then, increasing the temperature, heat the solid residue remaining to redness. Either there may or may not be something evolved, according as the alkaline oxide under consideration may be combined with an acid, or the contrary; but, at any rate, a non-volatile and fusible residue will remain, easily soluble in water; therefore the solution contains a metal, and the metal must be kaligenous.

539. The compound of which of the kaligenous metals is it? Not of ammonium assuredly; because the red heat (470) would have dissipated it. Lithium we put out of the field altogether on account of its extreme rarity. Therefore, we must be dealing with potassium or sodium, in some state of combination.

540. The preceding remarks not only apply to solutions of potash and soda, but their salts. Were our researches limited to solution of simple potash or soda, or either of these in combination with carbonic acid, and, indeed, a few other acids, the test of reddened litmus-paper, or yellow turmeric paper, would be an additional proof of alkalinity.*

541. It appears, then, we are dealing either with a compound of potassium or of sodium.

542. Take a small portion of the metal sodium, cut it, and examine the cut surfaces. Remark the difference of color between the metals: one is white, verging on blue; the other white, verging on yellow. Throw a little sodium on the surface of water; the resulting decomposition is exceedingly violent, but combustion does not usually ensue. If, however, the sodium be prevented rolling about—for instance, if it be poured on the surface of some thick gum-water—then combustion ensues. Burn a little sodium in this way, and a little potassium in another vessel by its side; observe the difference in the first of the two resulting flames. Potassium burns with a pinkish flame—sodium with a yellow flame. The same remark applies to all the combinations of sodium and potassium, and serves as a means of distinguishing one from the other. Probably, you are familiar with the yellow tinge imparted to a common fire when table salt (chloride of sodium) is thrown upon it. Probably, too, with the ghastly yellow imparted by a lighted mixture of alcohol and common salt. If not, try the experiment in a dark room. This yellow tinge, more or less, is imparted to flame by all sodium combinations; but for chemical purposes, the best way of applying this flame test is by means of a thread, as described at 490.

543. Treat the water in which sodium has been plunged, and which has become a solution of soda, exactly as we have directed for the water in which potassium has been immersed. Remark the general similarity of the two solutions—one containing potash, the other soda in solution. We now have to distinguish these alkaline solutions from each other.

544. Prepare aqueous solutions of soda and potash, either by the contact of sodium and potassium respectively with water, or by dissolving potash and soda. (It is as well to prepare the potash solution, not using liquor potassæ, both in order to impress upon the mind a fact, and to generate potash and soda solutions of equal strength.) Divide each solution into three portions; call the potash solutions a b c, and the soda solutions a' b' c'. Let the solutions be rather dilute; say 1 of potash (weight) to 20 of water.

545. To a and a' respectively, add a saturated aqueous solution of tartaric acid. Put a and a' aside for some hours; finally, it will be observed that crystals have formed in a, but none in a'. These crystals are bitartrate of potash; in other words—cream of tartar—a somewhat insoluble body. This is one means of distinguishing soda from potash.

546. To b and to b' add respectively a little bichloride of platinum. With b a yellow precipitate falls; with b' none. Ammonia also produces this colored precipitate (340); but ammonia is already demonstrated absent. Hence we are dealing with potash. Hydro-fluo-silicic acid is also a test for potash. Add some aqueous solution of this acid (511) to c and c' respectively; with c there is a precipitate, with c' none. There is one positive test for soda, namely, antimoniate of soda, which throws down crystals of antimoniate of soda. These tests are not only applicable to solutions of potash and soda, but to nearly all soluble compounds of potassium and sodium.

* As the rule, these papers are a test for the pure alkalis, but the presence of carbonic acid, and some other weak acids, does not interfere with the result.

Fashions.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

HAVING had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editor of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Spring and autumn bonnets, materials for dresses, jewelry, envelopes, hair-work, worsteds, children's wardrobes, mantillas, and mantelets, will be chosen with a view to economy, as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Gealey, Esq.

No order will be attended to unless the money is first received. Neither the Editor nor Publisher will be accountable for losses that may occur in remitting.

The Publisher of the Lady's Book has no interest in this department, and knows nothing of the transactions; and whether the person sending the order is or is not a subscriber to the Lady's Book, the Fashion editor does not know.

Instructions to be as minute as is possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice. Dress goods from Evans & Co.'s; mourning goods from Besson & Son; cloaks, mantillas, or talmas, from Brodie's, 51 Canal Street, New York; bonnets from the most celebrated establishments; jewelry from Wriggins & Warden, or Caldwell's, Philadelphia.

When goods are ordered, the fashions that prevail here govern the purchase; therefore, no articles will be taken back. When the goods are sent, the transaction must be considered final.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION-PLATE FOR FEBRUARY.

Fig. 1.—Light tan-colored French poplin, braided with narrow black velvet, and trimmed with pinked ruffles of violet silk. The girdle is pointed in front, but at the back is merely a narrow band. Underskirt of fine cambric, trimmed with three rows of magic ruffling. Plain linen collar and cuffs, with shell and marquise pin and sleeve buttons. Back and side combs, studded with coral.

Fig. 2.—Lavender poplin dress, with black velvet figures. Black velvet buttons down the front of the dress. A quilting of alternate pieces of black and lavender silk is placed at the edge of the skirt, and forms a rich side trimming on either side of the dress. The corsage and sleeves are trimmed to match. Fluted ruff and thick undersleeves. White flush bonnet, trimmed with violet velvet, with inside trimming of scarlet geraniums.

Fig. 3.—Black alpaca dress, with two gaufered ruffles on the edge of the skirt. Corsage, with square jockey at the back and fan front, richly trimmed with blue velvet, and made with very deep points. Sleeves trimmed to match. White quilted bonnet, trimmed with blue velvet in the Marie Stuart style.

Fig. 4.—Visiting dress of green changeable silk, trimmed on the skirt with bands of green silk, stitched on with white. Corsage with revers coat sleeves trimmed to match the skirt. Thick muslin set. Bonnet with white uncut velvet front, green velvet cap crown, point applique cape, and trimmed with Marabout feathers.

Fig. 5.—Dark cuir-colored alpaca, trimmed with narrow black silk bouces and braided medallions. Corsage made with very deep points, both back and front, and braided revers. The sleeves are trimmed to suit the skirt. Linen collar and cuffs. Coral back and side combs.

CHILDREN'S FASHIONS.

(See engraving, page 119.)

Fig. 1.—Cuir-colored poplin dress, trimmed with quiltings of porcelain blue ribbon. White felt hat, trimmed with black velvet and gay flowers.

Fig. 2.—Dress of bull merino, braided with black plaited white gimp and black velvet neck-tie. Gray beaver maletot hat, with black velvet band and ends.

Fig. 3.—Azurline blue quilting silk dress, with black velvet point and steel buckles. Standing collar, with black neck-tie.

CHITCHAT UPON NEW YORK AND PHILADELPHIA FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

We have already announced to our readers the colors and styles for mantles, dresses, and bonnets for the present season, and but few novelties have appeared lately.

It is evident that the tastes of our ladies incline towards simplicity for promenade toilet, subdued shades being decidedly la mode. But for carriage or evening costume, they are more extravagant than ever.

Among the most elegant silks of the season, is a rich green, with ostrich plumes in embossed velvet thrown gracefully over it. Others with a delicate silk embroidery resembling lace; others again with a pattern seemingly of velvet ribbon carelessly folded, yet forming a most beautiful design. On some of these elegant robes we see the Grecian border woven in black velvet, one half yard in width. All these expensive dresses have the same designs reduced for trimming the corsage, sleeves, and sashes.

The newest moiré antiques are studded with velvet spots or figures. Others are striped or figured with satin; but in our opinion, these figured ones do not compare in richness with the plain moiré which, being so elegant of themselves, require but little trimming.

A new style of trimming is of leather, about three inches in width, with rows of steel or gilt knobs inserted at regular distances. The leather should either be a good match for the dress, or else a strong contrast.

Leather bows are also worn for the neck. Of the leather points, which are now to be had of almost all colors, we have spoken in a previous Chat.

The latest style of fringe is twisted cord, the lower part of each strand resembling a drop button. It is, as it were, a drop button continued up to a heading. We have seen this in three widths, the widest about four inches.

Deep chenille fringe is also worn. We saw lately on Broadway two costumes made alike, one blue, and the other violet reps. A band of velvet was around the bottom of the skirt. The wearers had talmas to match trimmed with a deep black velvet, and below it a black chenille fringe. There were cords and tassels around the neck, which hung down behind. These costumes were stylish and pretty. Talmas and sacks, like the dress, are much worn, and generally trimmed with braiding, which is still in favor, and likely to be, as it is easy, pleasant work, and does not require the patience and skill of ordinary embroidery. Arabesque patterns, executed with very heavy mohair braid, are the most fashionable. We give in our fashion-plate some very pretty styles of braiding, intermixed with other trimmings. Another very effective trimming, which can be arranged in a variety of styles, is insertions of black lace sewed over white ribbon, the exact width of the lace. We have seen some dresses with quilted velvet sewed on to give the appearance of a corsage or point, also on the skirt to imitate a sash. This is very pretty, and, of course, more economical.

Many of the dresses are made with a swallow tail jockey at the back, and very deep points in front.

Another style of trimming is the crochet and jet ornaments, now made in so many different styles. We see them graduated for the fronts of dresses, pocket pieces, bretelles, sashes, bows, and pyramidal ornaments for each breadth; and for the centre of the back, reaching almost to the waist, also for the sleeves. Velvet buttons, mixed with mother-of-pearl, steel, gilt and jet, are very fashionable.

Braid, instead of being used as a binding for dresses, is now quilted and stitched in between the facings and the dress. It is decidedly prettier, and also a great protection to the dress. Embroidery is also now used on dresses, and the most elegant is steel beads in black velvet. This style is brilliantly effective, and, though expensive, will be much worn.

The newest merinoes and cashmeres are printed to imitate braiding, and, unless closely examined, the deception is complete. The designs are en tablier in pyramids on each breadth, or in cordons round the skirt.

There seems to be a tendency to shorten cloaks; and Brodie's "Spring Styles" will be quite short, though longer than the Senté en barque. We saw a very beautiful velvet talma with a deep bordering of feather trimming, which was very stylish. One of the newest designs we have seen was trimmed with ribbons stitched on in "true lover's knots," the flying ends also closely stitched down. A very large bow was in the centre of the back, and smaller ones all round the cloak. All cloak sleeves are now made with a seam from the elbow, and with a turned-up cuff. The collars are small, and, in some instances, stand up like a gentleman's shirt collar.

Narrow bands of sable, mink, and chinchilla form a beautiful bordering for the blue drap de velours mantles. They are also handsome for a promenade dress. Plush is much used both for bonnets and cloaks.

Children's coats and hats are frequently trimmed with fur, and for that purpose the Siberian squirrel is generally used. Half capes and small pointed collars are now taking the place of the large fur capes and talmas of last season. The collars are universally worn both by boys and girls. The squirrel lapped for large children, and the ermine for infants, are the favorite furs.

Muffs are about the same size—they may be a trifle larger. We have noticed some very fanciful ones. A white velvet, bordered with ermine on each end; another of white velvet, with a Grecian border in Magenta woven on each edge; still another white one, with a brilliant plaid running through the centre of the muff; others of black velvet were studded with tiny spots in high colors.

The present furor is for muslin bows and scarfs; of which we spoke in our last Chat. The scarfs being more difficult to arrange, and not fitting the neck as neatly as a collar, the bows are generally preferred. We see large bows and small bows, wide bows and narrow bows, long bows and short bows, bows plain and bows highly ornamented. The styles are so varied we can give but a faint idea of them. In general the bows are plain, the ends only being ornamented. Some have straight ends, others pointed, and the trimmings are medallions, tucks, Valenciennes insertions, and lace; also braiding, chain stitching, and rows of black velvet. Some of the bands are straight pieces one yard and a quarter long and a little over a finger wide, with hemmed sides and trimmed ends. Others are double, the seam running down the centre, and graduated in width to the centre of the neck, and the ends pointed.

There is no great variety in headdresses. Detached bouquets of flowers, or bows of velvet, have taken the place of wreaths. The largest tuft is on the centre of the forehead, and the others must be arranged to suit the dressing of the hair. When tastefully arranged, this coiffure is much more successful than the formal wreath. Nets are now only worn for simple toilet, the invisible ones being the most desirable. Knots or bows of ribbon over the forehead or at the side of the head is the prettiest coiffure for a young lady.

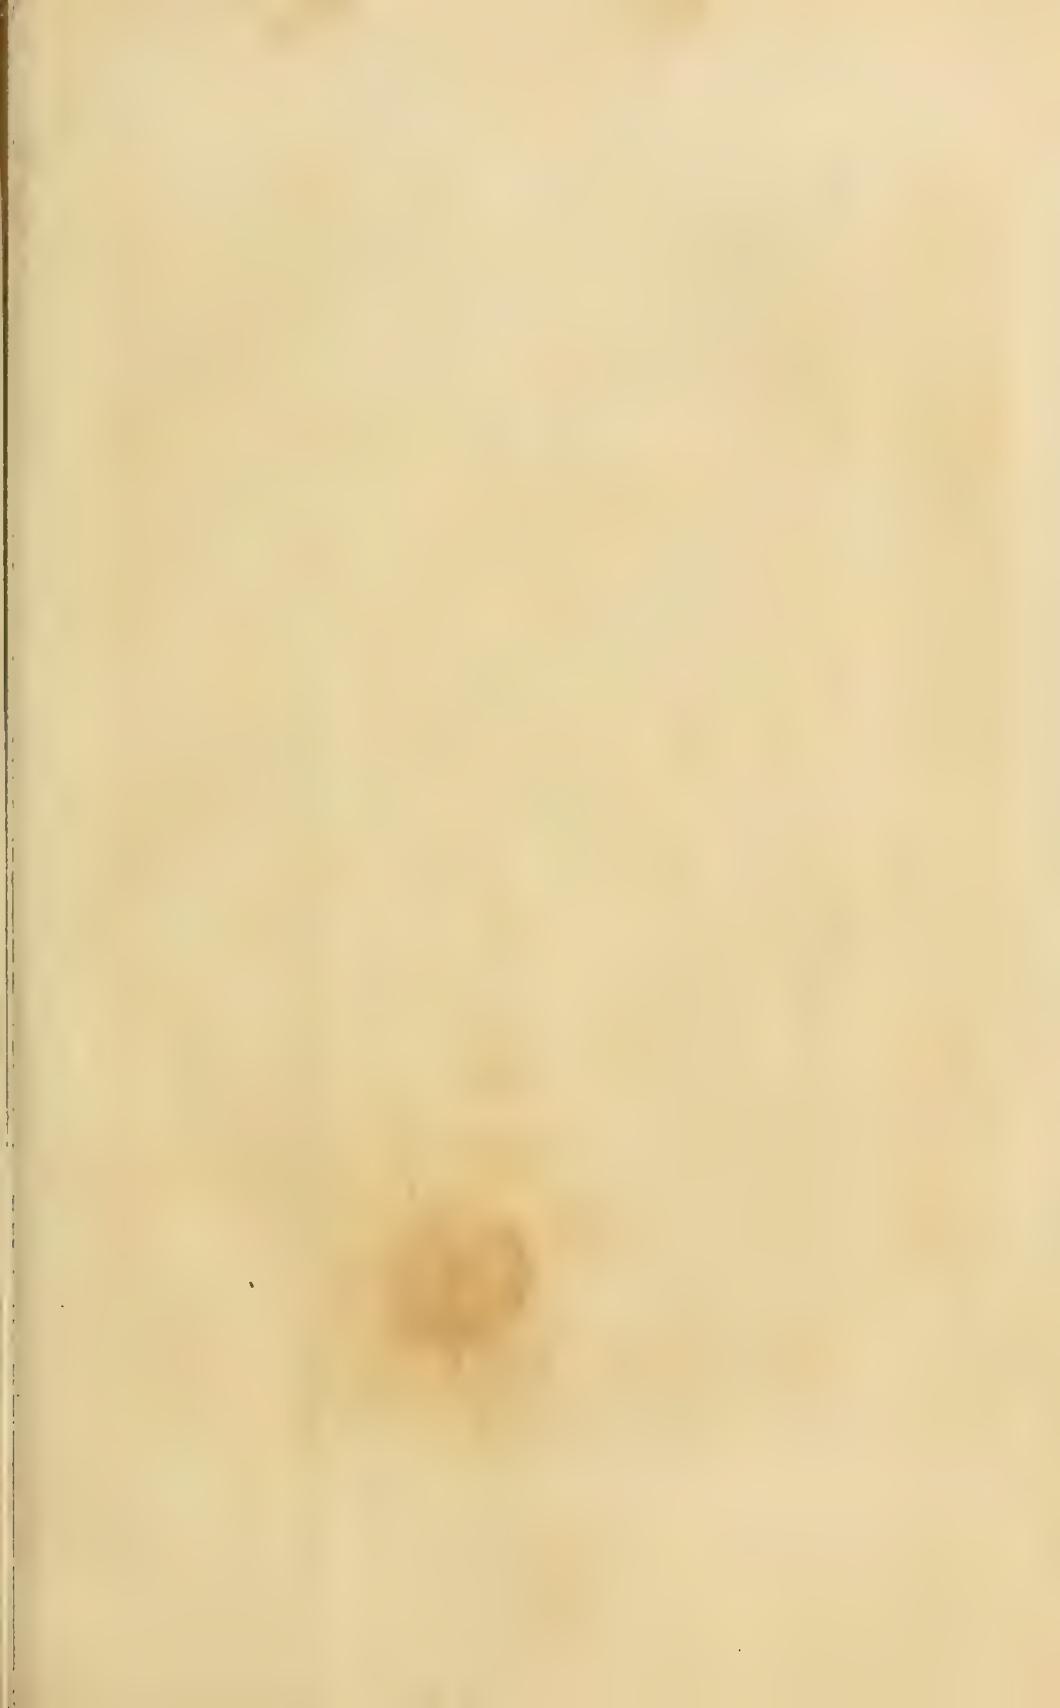

The ornamental back and side combs which we have before noticed still continue very fashionable, and are more beautiful every day. The classical designs are in the best taste, most of them being of the Etruscan or Grecian styles. The hair should be arranged in a bow at the back and very low in the neck. The front can be either braided, rolled, or waved.

Tortoise shell is being worked in much more elaborate designs than formerly. The bow combs are very tasteful, and we see whole sets, consisting of combs, dress and sleeve-buttons, pins, earrings, and buckles to match, made of shell, onyx, marquisite, and enamel. The rage at present is for initials, and we see a delicate Grecian border in gilt or shell, with a large gilt initial in the centre; the same design is in marquisite (a fine steel) on onyx. The sleeve-buttons are all made as in Fig. 1 of our Fashion-plate, one large button, with two small fastenings underneath. Initial buttons are made to order in ivory or colored bone; but the other styles are, we believe, all imported. The more expensive sets have the initials in diamonds; others have a black initial on a gold ground. We have seen a number of sets of buttons enamelled on copper, and set round with the most brilliant brilliants, which have the effect of diamonds. They are often imitated in the present style of jewelry. Fancies, violets, and daisies being among the prettiest. Some of the pins are a single roseleaf, upon which a dewdrop is represented by a diamond. Onyx and pearl or onyx and marquisite combine beautifully. Fancy rings are also worn by ladies for the cravats worn with the standing collars.

For our skating friends there is a new crochet cap, a turban with pompon and knit feather, something new and pretty, and equally suitable for children. The handsomest skating skirt we have seen is of silk, quilted with white in arabesque design, and those, with the warm woven or knit Garibaldi shirts, make an exceedingly pretty costume.

Sister! sister! don't you remember
The days when we were young?
The homely house in the far, far away,
Where the love of our childhood clung?
There is naught to mark that sacred spot,
Save now the beaten loam;
Yet distant altars have we reared
In the blessed name of home.

Sister! sister! don't you remember
The days when we were young?
The mates of childhood—the friends of our youth—
We companioned and loved among?
Some are wand'ring far, and some in death
Have closed their weary eyes;
But we rejoice in new-found friends,
While we weep for broken ties.

SPRING TRAVELLING COSTUME.

Dress of mode-color summer poplin, with two rows of box-plaited ribbon sewed in waves just above the hem or facing. Talma of the same material, and trimmed to match. Mode-color straw bonnet, trimmed with ribbon of the same color. The face trimming consists of blonde tabs and apple-green ribbon.

SPRING TRAVELLING DRESS FOR A CHILD.

THE GUADIANA.

[From the establishment of G. BRODIE, 51 Canal Street, New York. Drawn by L. T. VOIGT, from actual articles of costume.]

This peculiarly neat and piquant toilet for the street is made in all shades of light cloth, adapted to the spring season. It will be observed that it is constructed with a gilet. The edges are trimmed with taffeta of the same shade of color as the cloth; they are variously ornamented with braid-work, buttons, etc. For a lady of fine figure, especially, a more becoming style could scarcely be devised.

A LADY'S GLANCE AT THE LONDON INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

PRECIOUS STONES.

THE development of taste and powers of execution made evident in the display of English jewelry, to be found in the central division of the South Court, seem to us more than proportioned to the time which has elapsed since the former general competition of forces eleven years ago. No one would then have sustained for a moment the pretensions of our own chefs-d'œuvre against those of the French jewellers, with Lemonnier (this time unrepresented) at their head; but now the position of things is somewhat changed. Not only is our exhibition of jewelry incomparably richer and more extensive, but distinguished by greater novelty and more enticeable achievements in the art of setting. We can scarcely suppose our fanciful and ingenious neighbors have been idle of late: a double portion of applause is therefore due to the activity which has given us the vantage-ground in an unexpected quarter.

In glancing at the contributions, honorable precedence is due to those of Messrs. Hunt and Roskell. The most remarkable gems in this collection are the Nassuck and Arcot diamonds, belonging to the Marquis of Westminster; a splendid suite of diamonds and sapphires exhibited by permission of the Earl Dudley; a remarkably fine ruby, a pietre chantillant, set in a tiara, the property of Mr. Holford; and a row of pearl beads, each worth £250. But even more attractive, in our eyes as ornaments, are a parure of diamonds intermingled with very large turquoises of perfect color; another, very delicate, of brilliants and pale coral-tinted pearls; a bouquet of diamonds, consisting of full-blown rose, carnations, fuchsias, and other flowers, tied with a ribbon, and mounted on springs to form a stomacher; various tiaras of excellent arabesque, star, and scroll patterns; and a dazzling bracelet, with emerald set diamond-wise in the centre. Among the smaller objects, which could only appear trifling in such a neighborhood, a brooch and earrings of small diamonds, each representing a leaf with pink coral berry adhering to it, and a mossrose-bud with leaves, also imitated in diamonds, the flower alone being shaped from pink topaz, are beautiful, and should not be passed unnoticed. Messrs. Hunt and Roskell have contributed to the exhibition, besides this fine display of mounted gems, a mill for cutting diamonds, where the process is explained by the superintendent of this branch of their business. It is, of course, well known that the diamond can only be cut by itself. The first step, then, with stones of ordinary size—for very large ones are not exposed to the possible danger of this process—is to set them in cement on the ends of two pieces of wood, and to grind them together by hand until something like the desired form is attained; the diamond is afterwards embedded in soft metal, well secured by clamps, and subjected to the action of machinery brought to bear in this wise: A horizontal plate of soft iron, about twelve inches in diameter, well charged with diamond powder and oil, is set in rapid motion, performing upwards of 2000 revolutions per minute; the stone, placed in contact with it at the proper angles, presents in due time the required number of facets, sixty-two in the case of a double-cut gem. This part of the work completed, the same process is continued with diminished use of diamond-powder until the surface is sufficiently polished. Nothing can be more interesting than the illustration which different departments mutually afford, and we have drawn attention to this instance, believing that the exhibition of machinery would become a source of greater pleasure to lady visitors if they viewed it—not per se as a whole, but sought out in it from time to time a practical knowledge of the processes which lead to the results that specially interest themselves.

The privilege of exhibiting the Koh-i-noor, and the celebrated Lahore rubies, the property of her Majesty, renders the case of Messrs. Gerrard and Co. supremely attractive to the multitude: it is, of course, unrivalled in its display of precious stones. The three large uncut rubies, bearing Persian inscriptions, and set, in India fashion, with fine brilliant drops to form a necklace, now constitute the great subject of wonder, the Mountain of Light being familiar to the public eye, and somewhat reduced from its wondrous size by the further operation of cutting which it has lately undergone, and to which these marvellous rubies must also be subjected before they produce their just effect. In juxtaposition with these are many fine examples of our own more advantageous mode of displaying jewels: parures of diamonds mounted with emeralds, with sapphires, with pearls of divers colors; diamonds arranged in scroll pattern for tiaras; in festoons for necklaces; diamonds, in short, under every conjunction of circumstances, even representing a lion's head with water, expressed by flexible brilliant pendants, flowing from the mouth, to be worn in the form of a brooch.

The collection of first-class gems exhibited by Mr. Hancock, though rather less extensive than the two already mentioned, can scarcely be classed below them. Here, also, we find stones almost worth a king's ransom, and the style of mounting is in each case so very well designed as to give a remarkably striking character to the ornaments. The most prominent decoration of the case is a complete suite of magnificent emeralds and diamonds. The diadem consists of a very open scroll framework in diamonds, within the interstices of which are nine solid pendent emeralds, increasing in size to the centre, and in their tremulous motion flashing out each moment fresh effects of color. The necklace to match has also nine emerald ornaments, with light settings of diamonds and pear-shaped emerald drops. The brooch is of immense size, and is rivalled only by another, equally large, in which the centre stone is a sapphire of exquisite hue, a second having been found worthy to be a pendant to the first. These are surrounded by a broad arabesque open border of diamonds of simple but most effective design, which forms a complete frame angular on the four sides. Mere verbal description fails to do justice to its beauty, as our readers will admit if they see for themselves. Near at hand are other valuable necklaces, emeralds again, but this time arranged with studied negligence in block fashion; and fine opals with diamond entourage, and five large opal drops. Scarcely less precious than these dazzling jewels are a necklace, stomacher or comb, and head ornament of transparent stone intaglios with classical setting: they are masterpieces of the modern antique. Among the more unpretending ornaments, a brooch of the Louis XIV. style, with large pearl and pink coral coupled together, with drops, is worthy of admiration, as are likewise a négligé brooch and earrings of diamond form, the centre a chessboard pattern in turquoise and diamonds, with border of pearls, a diamond forming each angle.

The ebony and bronze trophy of Mr. Emanuel, forming so very conspicuous and elegant an object in the nave, is scarcely less thronged with visitors than the three great collections already alluded to, although its contents are necessarily thrown somewhat in the shade by the excess of light elsewhere. The cheval de bataille in this instance is the emerald brooch mounted in diamonds, valued at £10,000. Passing over a fine suite of opals and diamonds, for such things become almost common in our eyes when we have spent half an hour in the jewelry department, we may particularly refer to an effective diamond and pearl bracelet, with butterfly clasp—the centre, pearl, with diamond and emerald wings—and to the examples here put forth of Mr. Emanuel's spécialité ornaments, made in a kind of pink ivory and gold, inlaid with different gems. This pink substance, closely resembling pale coral, is cut from a rare shell found in the West Indies, and is, from its hardness, susceptible of a high degree of polish, and of being very variously applied.

By no means less noteworthy, though, from its position, less likely to obtain due recognition, is the case of Messrs. London and Ryder, to be sought for in the intricacies of the South Court. Here we find an opal which claims to be the finest in the building. It is not, we believe, the only one with such pretension; but a more perfect specimen of the magic stone could scarcely be desired than the one in question, set as a brooch, with floral margin of brilliants, large emerald drop, and ruby button. Near it, a fine contrast in color, is a wonderful carbuncle, forming a bracelet clasp, which we are well disposed to accept on its own showing as the finest in the world; and a singular heart-shaped pearl which once enriched a crucifix, very large, but more curious than beautiful. The style of a diamond tiara exhibited here, and copied from the antique, is excellent; and another of pearls, lightly set in the form of scallop-shells, with branches of pink coral between, is, to our own thinking, a really covetable adornment. There is also an exquisite bijou in the shape of a carbuncle watch with radii of small brilliants, suspended from chain and brooch en suite. Very delicate to our modern ideas, though barbaric to those of the Greeks, as developed in the collection of M. Castellani, is a bracelet of the lightest pink coral cut into small lily-shaped cup-flowers, with gold stamen tipped with minute gems. This design is also to be met with elsewhere, as likewise the bracelet with revolving clasp pierced to display four small miniatures or photographs, which is somewhat of a novelty. To complete the attraction of this case, we have the Emperor of China's sceptre taken at the sack of the Summer Palace, and an illustration of the art of diamond-setting afforded in the progress of a bracelet. First is given the rough design on a card (commonly called the working model); next, the tracing of the pattern in red lines on black wax, with the stones arranged on a section of it; the silver form prepared, mounted, and pierced to receive the brilliants; and, finally, the half bracelet completed.

It is not a little pleasant, when due tribute has been paid to the gems par excellence, and our every faculty seems dulled by their dazzling brightness, to pause before the collections of one or two exhibitors, who may be said to have quitted the beaten track in this art, and to have sought in its byways a field for their skill. If, for example, the visitor seeks out the standing of Mr. Phillips, its chastened coloring affords relief to the eye, whilst the character of its contents well repays curious inspection. A large division of this case is appropriated to the exhibition of Neapolitan coral, at present held in peculiar estimation as one of the most recherché styles of feminine ornament. Fashion has for once set her approving seal on what is intrinsically beautiful, and ladies whose possessions are limited only by their desires will have reason to congratulate themselves on the power of substituting at will this simple yet finished style of ornament for others which bear more ostentatiously the impress of their value. Pink coral we have there before us in all its manifold varieties, from the delicate hue of the blush-rose to a deep tint of cerise, just falling short of the old-fashioned red of nursery associations, which is scarcely admitted to be kindred with these refined treasures of the deep. The value of each rough specimen as won from its rocky bed is dependent on size, form, freedom from flaws, unity of coloring, but above all, on the comparative paleness of its tints; thus a parure consisting of tiara, bracelets, négligé, brooch, etc., of the tenderest approach to pink must be regarded as the pride of the collection, though it would be less effective for wear than others of warmer shade which surround it. The beauty of the carving, designed and executed by Italian skill, cannot be too highly praised. The brooches, bracelet, clasps, and other articles of that kind are generally fashioned into beautiful bouquets with fruit forms mingled by the fanciful taste of the artist, who not seldom finds his inspiration in the material, and, by yielding to Nature's suggestions, produces something worthy to become a model, if not exactly recognizable as an imitation. There are, of course, some examples of coral cameos; the favorite design of cherub's head with wings, and a more appropriate one of sea nymphs at play, are well executed; but this style of workmanship appears to be less in request than the groups of flowers. In the tiaras for the head, composed of branch coral variously arranged, the chief novelty we observed was the introduction of little berries or beads among the branches; and in one instance a combination of white and red, which had a striking appearance. For the information of persons who, like ourselves, have had very inadequate notions of the value of such manufactured coral, we may mention that the price of the coronets ranges from £6 to £30; and that the other articles constituting a complete suite would, if fine specimens, cost about £100. Turning from this division of Mr. Phillips' case, we find in another some remarkable ornaments in antique styles, executed under his own superintendence. Unrivalled in its way is a cinque-cento bracelet, opal centre, with elaborate mounting of grotesque masks and many-tinted gems. It is en suite with a small tripod jewel-stand, originally designed for a snuff-box, but finally deemed worthy of more honorable office. In necklaces there are specimens of each one of the classical styles—Etruscan with scarabei; Greek with medallion female heads in English porcelain enamel; Egyptian, copied from the original found on a mummy, by permission of Lord Henry Scott; and also a noticeable collection of Oriental onyxes with cinque-cento setting. Nor must we overlook a bracelet formed of a massive gold band into which are introduced the beautiful green Brazilian beetles, which, by a peculiar process of drying, become hard and durable as stone. A variety of brooches, etc., with Roman, Greek, and Etruscan settings, complete this display of modern antiques. There may be a diversity of opinion as to the real value of such revivals applied to personal ornament; but the highest fashion of the day sanctions them, and, as works of art demanding research and careful study of detail in their workmanship, they are well worthy of examination.

The old-established firm of Lambert and Co., well known as producers of fine church plate, have likewise been fortunate in opening out a new style of jewelry peculiar to themselves. They exhibit, besides mounted specimens, a case of crystals, within which the semblance of some brilliant bird or characteristic head of dog, horse, or stag is rendered with the colors and roundness of nature. This effect is gained by cutting into the reverse of the crystal an intaglio of the form and depth required, which is afterwards carefully colored. Only one artist, we believe, can as yet compass this difficult task to perfection. His designs are evidently studies after nature, so that persons who can afford expensive fancies might probably wear in this form the portrait of some individual favorite. This invention is adapted to pins, rings, and brooches. The price of an average-sized crystal intaglio, mounted, would vary from seven to ten pounds.

Messrs. Howell and James make a fair show in this as in other departments. They exhibit a small suite of white Sidmouth pebbles with antique setting brightened with small beads of purple enamel; also some intaglios belonging to the Marquis of Breadalbane; and a variety of jewelry in the ordinary styles without character enough to claim description. The novelties in Mr. Attenborough's collection are gold ornaments of a large buttercup pattern, the open petals forming a shallow basin with central tuft in jewels; but its best features are a diamond butterfly brooch and an emerald and diamond locket, with green enamel and diamond chain. Messrs. Widdowson and Veale present large coral cameos mounted in diamonds, amethysts, with brilliants inserted, etc.; Messrs. Angell a tasteful collection of average value, adapted to the requirements of ordinary purchasers. Colored enamel, beautiful but fragile, is very successfully applied as a background for jewels by these exhibitors; and we must direct attention to a geometrical-shaped reversible brooch, the central part of which turns on a swivel, and the mourning onyx and diamond give place in a second to some gayer device. This idea, susceptible of so many different modes of execution, will be rather attractive to ladies who are indifferent to variety for its own sake, and only desire in their ornaments the change of color which will adapt them to different dresses.

Among the various representations of Scotch jewelry, those contributed by Messrs. Muirhead display native minerals in very attractive dress. A cairngorm brooch, in which the stone is supported by diminutive stags' heads and antlers in silver, is very well designed; also a suite of the same stone mounted in gold inlaid with pebbles, imitative of the popular cinque-cento. Such memorials of tours in the north may now, if well chosen, have a value apart from that of association, which was formerly the only one we could attach to them.

FOOLISH THOUGHTS.—We are apt to believe in Providence so long as we have our own way; but if things are awry, then we think, if there is a God, He is in heaven and not on earth. The cricket in the spring builds its little house in the meadow, and chirps for joy, because all is going so well with him. But when he hears the sound of the plough a few furrows off, and the thunder of the oxen's tread, then the skies begin to look dark, and his heart fails him. The plough comes crunching along, and turns his dwelling bottom side up, and as he is rolling over and over without a home, his heart says, "Oh, the foundations of the world are destroyed, and everything is going to ruin!" But the husbandman, who walks behind his plow, singing and whistling as he goes, does he think the foundations of the world are breaking up? Why, he does not so much as know there was any house or cricket there. He thinks of the harvest that is to follow the track of the plough; and the cricket, too, if he will but wait, will find a thousand blades of grass where there was but one before. We are all like the crickets. If anything happens to overthrow our plans, we think all is gone to ruin.

A SMILE may be bright while the heart is sad. The rainbow is beautiful in the air, while beneath is the moaning of the sea.

GIVE a wise man health, and he will give himself everything else.

THE EXPECTED LETTER.

BY AMY GRAHAM.

(See Plate.)

"MAGGIE, lass! come in! 'Tis too late for Roger to-day, and you are at the door all the day long."

"Nay, only when the work is all done up, father. I can see Roger so much sooner, and my heart is heavy waiting for news."

"You heard last month."

"Last month! Yes, early in May, and 'tis now the last of June. O, father, the days are long where the ocean rolls between Martin and me!"

"You think he will send for you soon, lass?"

"If it were not for leaving you, I should say, I hope so. But when I think of you and Annie here—" And Maggie's voice faltered as she bent over the babe in her arms.

"Well, well, we must get on as best we can. There, my iron is hot, and I must stop chattering."

The heavy clang of the falling hammer filled the blacksmith's shop; but Maggie, who had been hushed to sleep by such music from her babyhood, mused, unheeding the clear, ringing sound.

She was very pretty, this lowly heroine of mine, of the true English type, with rosy cheeks, and a complexion pure and white as ivory. She had dainty rows of white even teeth, which, with a pretty winsome mouth, made her smile very beautiful. Her brown, waving hair was the true chestnut, throwing back in the sunlight rays of golden threads as bright as those of the invader who brought them into sight. She was the eldest child of Mark Lee, the blacksmith of the pretty hamlet of Landsdale, and one of the belles of the village. Yet with the beaux of the whole neighborhood at her feet, Maggie's constant heart had clung to the first love of her childhood—the manly wooer of her girlhood, Martin Hayes. Martin was her cousin by courtesy, the stepson of her aunt, and as handsome a young English boy as ever drove a plough, or made his bow at beauty's shrine. It would have been a difficult matter for either of these young lovers to tell when they first loved. From the time when Martin, some five years old, was first permitted to hold his baby cousin in his arms, his life's devotion was hers, and she gave him a sincere, earnest love in return. So as they grew to maturity they learned how sad life must be to either were they parted, and, with the same trusting love that had submitted her baby steps to his sturdy little arm, Maggie gave her woman's heart to his honest, manly care. They were very young when the blacksmith opened his large eyes wide at the love-story; but he gave them his hearty consent, only stipulating that Martin should have something wherewith to support a family before he took a wife. Now, as Martin was the eldest of nine children, and the son of a farmer not very well to do in life, this condition cost him many an anxious hour. His time was valuable to his father, so like a dutiful son he worked away, hoping for a turn of Fortune's wheel until he came of age; then, leaving two brothers to take his place, he bade adieu to Maggie, and emigrated to America to win the right to claim his wife.

Poor Maggie! It was the beginning of sorrow for her when Martin pressed the farewell kiss upon her lips, with a promise to send for her as soon as the New World had given him a niche to place her in. The winter which followed his departure was a hard one, and the blacksmith's wife died, leaving a baby only a week old to Maggie's care. She had never had brother nor sister before, and this wee burden became to her tender heart a sore weight. She loved it passionately; but this very love added to her fear lest through her ignorance it should sicken, perhaps die. Mark watched with a father's love over both, worried, too, lest Maggie should tire of her charge, or the babe suffer in such young, inexperienced hands. Yet, as the child grew older, and every steamer brought good news from Martin, the old light came back to Maggie's eye, the smiles to her lips, the roses to her cheeks. Martin was in a pleasant situation in the large wholesale store of Symmes & Brother, of New York. He had entered into their employ as porter; but his honesty, intelligence, and good parts had made his services more valuable till he was admitted as confidential messenger of the counting-house, respected and trusted, with a salary that would soon warrant his sending for Maggie to join him in America. This was the news in his last letter, written just two years after his departure from England, and Maggie sat in the doorway of the blacksmith's shop musing over it all, thinking proudly of her Martin, tenderly of his love, regretfully of her father, and oh! so anxiously of the little sister on her knee.

Sometimes raising her soft, dark eyes from Annie's laughing face, she looked longingly down the sunny road, as if her very wishes could bring Roger's red coat and gold-banded hat in sight. Roger was the Queen's mail for Landsdale; and Roger was a boy lover of Maggie's. He dearly loved to tease her about the letters, certain that his reward for bringing one would be the sweetest dish of fruit and best glass of ale from Maggie's cellar. The long summer afternoon was fast turning to twilight, and Maggie had determined to go in, thinking her hope and watching over for the day, when Annie, sitting up, clapped her hands to greet Roger's pony as it came down the road on a full gallop.

"Roger! Father! He is coming!"

Mark looked up, gave a little grunt of approval, and then resumed his hammering.

"No letter for me, Roger?" said Maggie, half crying, as he made a feint of dashing past.

"Letter for you, Miss Maggie! Letter—for—you? Why, now you mention it, I think there is a letter for you."

"Quick! Oh, Roger, how long you fumble in that bag! Give it to me."

"Can't. It's against orders to trust the mail out of our own hands. Ah!" and he slowly dismounted and stood leaning against a tree, just out of the reach of Maggie's impatient hand.

"Oh, Roger, give it to me!"

"Miss Maggie Lee," read the provoking Roger, "per Asia's mail. America. Oh, pshaw! it can't be for you. You have no beau away out there."

"Oh, Roger, don't tease me! Come, give me the letter, and you shall have a draught of the old ale you like so well."

"You are sure it is for you?" he said, holding it out, and looking with mischievous eyes into her smiling face, lighted by the pleasant certainty of her anxiously expected letter being there at last.

"Give the lass her letter," said Mark, gruffly, looking up from his eternal hammering; and, with a comic affectation of extreme terror, Roger tossed the letter into the baby's lap, sprang upon his pony, and was off like a shot.

There was a long, long silence. Annie had let the soft white eyelashes fall over her blue eyes; the long shadows were falling round the house before Maggie raised her eyes from her letter. Then her father's "Well, Maggie," roused her.

"He wants me to return in the Asia, father; or, if that is too soon, to write by her at what time I can come."

"Well, Maggie," for her voice had faltered and her eyes filled.

"Oh, father! you—and—Annie—"

"You expected it, Maggie. You are all ready."

"Yes; but—"

"But you think the little lassie and I will miss you. So we will, no doubt we will, for you've been a good girl, Maggie; but I have been waiting for that letter to tell you a piece of news."

"News?" she looked up, wonderingly.

"I never would have placed a stepmother over you, Maggie, for you've been housekeeper and mother; but as you are to go away to—I pray and trust—a happy home, I am going to marry again."

"Yes—" she gasped, "yes—who?"

"Mrs. Lawrence. She—"

"Oh, father!" cried Maggie, joyfully.

"You are willing to trust Annie and me to her?"

"Annie would have died in the first month of her life if Mrs. Lawrence had not been so kind to her, and so willing to teach me. O, father, she is so good, so gentle! Oh you must be happy; only," and she laid her head lovingly on her father's arm, "she must not make you forget Maggie."

"Nothing can make me forget Maggie. She has been too long the sunshine of my home for that," said her father. "Write to Martin by the Asia that you will leave in the next steamer, for you must stay to the wedding, lass."

It was a quiet, happy wedding a few days later; and accompanied by her father, sister, and the new mother, Maggie went to Liverpool. The parting was sad; but that once over, the young girl would let none but happy, hopeful thoughts fill the hours of the long voyage across the Atlantic. She was going to Martin. Fifty times a day she looked into her little mirror to see if she was as fair as when Martin left her, and the little locket that contained his picture was consulted as often, with speculations as to where and how the past two years had changed him. An old Irish woman, who was on her way to join her "two gurls, shure, in Ameriky," became Maggie's especial friend and confidant; and many an hour was spent in telling her old friend of her true-hearted, manly lover.

"You'll see him at the landing; he'll meet me there. I'm sure he'll meet me, for I wrote by what steamer I would come."

At last the long, weary voyage was over, and the vessel arrived at the port of New York. Maggie's heart beat high; but she kept near her Irish friend, Mrs. Michaelhenny, watching from the deck for the face and form she was sure she could distinguish even in that confusing, crowded mass of human beings. Mrs. Michaelhenny's two "gurls," Mary and Nora, the latter leaning on the arm of "John Murphy, my husband," as she proudly introduced him, good-naturedly waited with the pretty English girl, cheering her with hope, as her heart grew heavy with long, weary waiting. The long day drew to a close; four, five o'clock went by slowly, and all the passengers had left the vessel; the wharf was cleared of its bustling crowd, the heavily laden drays had rolled off with their burdens, hacks full of smiling friends had claimed their relations or visitors from the steamer and driven away, yet Martin did not come.

"Come home with us the night," urged Nora Murphy, "and you'll have the clear day to-morrow to hunt him, sure. John'll show you the way, if you know the store."

"Symmes & Brother, —— Street," said Maggie.

"Och! Ain't I working just forninst it, the other side of the street? I'll take ye in the morning early. Come home now, honey; you are white as a sheet with the worry."

"But I am strange to you," faltered Maggie.

"Never mind that," said Nora, kindly; "you can stay the one night, at any rate. Perhaps he is extra busy, and can't get off."

But poor Maggie could not admit that comforting assurance. She felt sure that no trifle would keep Martin from meeting her at that time, and his employers, of whom she had had many accounts, were not, she was certain, the men to detain him. With a very anxious heart, she accepted the kindly offered hospitality of her new friends, passing a wakeful night full of sad forebodings. He must be sick; perhaps, she shudderingly thought—dead. Oh for morning to see those who knew him!

At last the long night was over, and she could start upon her expedition. John was her polite escort, and left her at the door of Symmes & Brother, promising to come over in a "wee bit" to see if she needed him again.

Through the long store, filled with bales and boxes of merchandise, the trembling girl threaded her way, looking for some one to question. At last she reached the counting-house. A tall, handsome, rather over-dressed young man stepped down from his high stool to meet her, as she came timidly forward. Her neat, quiet dress and pale face, with the timid manner, gave her an air of interest, and he spoke to her courteously.

"You wish to see some one?"

"Martin Hayes, if you please, sir," said Maggie, raising her eyes, almost imploringly.

If she had struck him a heavy blow, the face of the clerk could not have grown whiter. His eyes fairly glared for a moment, as he repeated hoarsely:

"Martin Hayes!"

With a new terror, as she marked this agitation, Maggie cried:

"Where is he? He is not dead!"

"What is the matter?" asked a gentleman, opening the door of a small private room leading out of the large counting-house. "Who is this woman?"

Maggie looked up. A kind, good face with the silvered hair of some sixty winters met her eye. He was good and gentle; that was written on his face; and she went as quickly as her trembling steps would take her to the newcomer.

"Martin Hayes! Oh, sir, where is he?"

"I cannot tell you." And the kind face grew stern and cold. "Who are you?"

"Maggie Lee," she said, simply.

"And who," he asked, half smiling, as he stepped back and took the seat at a desk in the little room, "is Maggie Lee?"

"I have just come from England, sir, to Martin. We were to be married. Oh tell me, sir, where to find him!"

"This is a bad business, a bad business," said Mr. Symmes, shaking his head. "There, sit down there. Poor child!" for Maggie's white face was quivering with emotion. "I am sorry to say that Hayes has proved a bad fellow."

"Martin!" cried Maggie, the quick indignant blood staining her cheek, as she sprang to her feet.

"Yes; he has disappeared with five hundred dollars of our money in his pocket."

"A thief! Oh, sir, it is impossible! Martin, my Martin a thief? It must be false!" She spoke hurriedly, with crimson cheeks and flashing eyes; then, as she stood facing him, the old man's face seemed to fade away dimly, the heavy whirl of the steamer's machinery sounded in her ears, and she fell fainting to the ground.

"Poor child! poor girl!" and he raised her gently, and placed her on a sofa. "This is a bad business."

Maggie soon regained her consciousness to look around the office with a bewildered face.

"Lie still for a few minutes," said Mr. Symmes. "So Martin Hayes sent for you, did he?"

For answer, Maggie put Martin's last letter in his hand. It was a letter that made the old man pause and consider. Could the writer of such sentences be anything but an honorable man? Such love, trust, and hope breathed in every line! He spoke with such noble, manly pride of his position of trust in the counting-house, so confidently of winning his way to still further advancement, with such grateful affection of his employers—could this man be a thief! As he read, he recalled the many acts of noble honesty and manliness that had made him confide in Martin; and, for the first time, there crept into his heart a doubt. The detective police were in his employ, but had no trace of the culprit; could he escape them?

Maggie watched the varying emotions that crossed the frank, kindly face.

"Will you please tell me about it?" she said, as he placed the letter in her hand.

"Martin has already told you that he occupied the position of messenger for the counting-house. One of his duties was to carry money to the bank for deposit, and draw it out for use here. Some two weeks ago, I had a payment of five hundred dollars made late in the afternoon, and gave it to Martin with directions to carry it, as he went home, to pay to a man who lives quite near where he boarded. He took the note, and I find went where I directed. Finding the person out, he started in the direction of my house; since then we have no trace of him. The supposition is that he has left the city, probably disguised. He did not go to his boarding-house, and—and—really, my child, I am afraid—yet how he could when he was expecting you—after writing such a letter as that—dear, dear! it's a bad business!"

"He has been murdered! He never stole your money! He could not do it! Why, he is the soul of honesty. Oh, sir, I have known him since he was a little boy; we have been like brother and sister, and—" and here the proud flush came to her face, and she sat up—"I would stake my life on his honesty."

"Then where is he?"

"God only knows," she said, sadly.

At that moment a loud noise and bustle were heard in the store, and the door of the room was thrown violently open. Two men dragged in a pale, emaciated form with the cry, "Here he is! We found him in the street. Here he is, sir."

The prisoner shook himself free, and stood erect before Mr. Symmes.

"I was on my way here, sir—Maggie!"

She had been looking with strained eyes at his pale, thin face, and in another moment was sobbing in his arms.

"Oh, Martin! I knew you couldn't do it. Tell him, Martin; tell him you are no thief!" "Thief!"

How the angry blood crimsoned his face! By this time the little room was filled with the men, and near the door, with pallid face, stood the clerk who had greeted Maggie as she entered the counting-house.

Mr. Symmes had not yet spoken, but now he stood up.

"There is no one who will more gladly hear you prove your innocence than I will, Martin. Speak, man! Stay, all of you. You all know the suspicion; stay and hear his defence."

With his arm still around Maggie, Martin spoke:

"I left the counting-house two weeks ago, yesterday, with a note for five hundred dollars in my pocket for Mr. Walsh, to be paid him by Mr. Symmes' orders. But one person in the store knew that I held this money. Stop that man!" and he pointed to the clerk, who was stealing across the room. The others looked at Mr. Symmes.

"Stop him!" he said shortly, and two others forced the clerk back to his old position.

"James Reeves was the man who saw me take the money, and heard the directions given. As I left Mr. Walsh's door, I saw him watching me from the curbstone. He heard the servant tell me that Mr. Walsh had gone to Philadelphia for a week. As I started to come back to Mr. Symmes' house, for I was afraid to take the money home, I was attacked from behind, and struck senseless with a loaded cane. When I recovered my senses, I was in the house of a woman who had found me on the pavement, and had me taken in. I have been there delirious for two weeks. To-day is the first day I have been able to speak a coherent word, and I started to come here; two of the porters, seeing me coming, dragged me, like a culprit, to this room. Mr. Symmes, if you want an account of your money, ask John Reeves; where he dealt the last blow with the loaded cane he always carries."

One look at the miserable clerk was enough. With a cry, he threw himself before his employer, pouring out prayers for mercy with a confused account of debt, poverty, embarrassment, and penitence.

Of course Martin stood acquitted; but the excitement which had borne him through this trying scene once over, he grew pale and faint again. Mr. Symmes insisted upon accompanying him to the little house he had prepared for Maggie, and giving away the bride in the wedding that followed instantly, leaving the pale invalid to the care of his loving little wife.

John Reeves, the thief and would-be murderer, for he had supposed his blow fatal, was discharged, and left for parts unknown.

BERTHA.

BY BEATA.

DARK-EYED Bertha sat alone
By the silent, dim hearth-stone;
No loved footstep now drew near,
No cheerful greeting met her ear.
Heaven help her, sister dear.

Where are ye, oh, ye priceless dead,
From my side forever fled;
Speechless, pale, beneath the pall,
Hearing not, though loud I call?
Said a voice, "In heaven all."

Raised she then her eyelids wet
With the tears unshed as yet,
Raised them to the picture-frame
Whence the pitying sentence came,
Fanning hope's exhausted flame.

There a white dove stood above,
Looking the sure type of love;
On his portrait frame it stood,
Pure and white as he was good.
Looking as naught earthly could.

"Tell me, oh, white dove," she said,
"Whence thou comest, holy shade?
Art thou not from regions far,
High boy and such distant star?"
Said the voice, "From heaven afar."

"Canst thou ease my weary heart,
Worn with watching—lone—apart?
Longing—never more to see
Those dear as vital breath to me,
Living in eternity.

"Parents, all too soon removed,
Scarcely known, yet fondly loved;
She, who long their place supplied,
Fair and grave, and tender-eyed,
Resting calmly by their side.

"He who died in early youth,
Full of promise, strong in truth;
One who would the world explore,
Came and went, then came no more,
Gathered to that solemn shore.

"He who lightened every care,
Each burden lifted or would share;
Brightest, fondest, and the last
That binds me to the happier past,
All the future overcast!

"Tell me, O thou murmuring dove,
By all that's dear to thee in love,
Those my lips in vain recall,
Shall I meet them, find them all?"
Said the voice, "In heaven all."

"Weep no more, the race is run,
The battle fought, the victory won;
He who loved them hath said,
'Weep not for the faithful dead,'
The grave and death both conquered."

Slowly from a swelling throat,
Dropped the bird each silvery note,
Sinking then to Bertha's breast,
Sought and found a welcome rest,
Singing ever of the blest.

Bertha weeps no more alone,
Mourning joys forever gone;
Now no more would she recall
Silent voices 'neath the pall,
Waiting to meet in heaven all.

EARLY WALKING.—Walking, for young and active people, is by far the best exercise; riding is good for the elderly, the middle aged and invalids. The abuse of these exercises consists in taking them when the system is exhausted, more or less, by previous fasting or mental labor. Some persons injudiciously attempt a long walk before breakfast, under the belief that it is conducive to health. Others will get up early to work three hours at some abstruse mental toil. The effect in both instances is the same; it subtracts from the powers of exertion in the after part of the day. A short saunter, or some light reading before this meal, is the best indulgence of the kind; otherwise the waste occasioned by labor must be supplied by nourishment, and the breakfast will necessarily become a heavy meal, and the whole morning's comfort sacrificed by a weight at the chest from imperfect digestion of food. These observations apply especially to elderly persons, who are prone to flatter themselves into the persuasion that they can use their mental or bodily powers in age as in youth.

READING.—The amusement of reading is among the greatest consolations of life; it is the nurse of virtue, the upholder in adversity, the prop of independence, the support of a just pride, the strengthener of elevated opinions; it is the repeller of the scoff and the knave's poison.

THE WRONG HOUSE.

BY EDITH WOODLEY.

CHAPTER I.

THE strong family resemblance which each of the houses composing Brook Village bore to all of the others, often proved no less puzzling than vexatious to such as were strangers in the place, when in pursuit of friends and acquaintances, or persons with whom they wished to communicate in the way of business. Among the number who had successfully performed the feat in question, there being a total absence of knockers and door bells, those who came off with unscathed knuckles, had reason to bless their stars.

The only domicile which possessed any claim to individuality was owned by Mr. Benjamin Sedley. This, however, was not owing to any difference in size or structure, as in both of these respects it was precisely similar to the others, and occupied its place with the same defiance of the laws of order and regularity. The distinction arose from the abundance of flowing vines of various descriptions, which, having overrun one end of the house, crept over the roof, spreading a profusion of foliage over the shining shingles, and hanging in many a rich and graceful festoon from the eaves. Thus, whenever a stranger inquired for the house of Mr. Sedley, he needed only to be told that it was the one with the vines running over it. Some, however, were so particular as to give the additional information that the grass-plot, in front of the house, and the paths winding towards it in different directions were bordered with flowers, when peas and beans would have been altogether more profitable, and that lots of rosebushes, in every nook and corner, stood ready with their thorns to lay hold of whatever garment that was so unlucky as to come within their reach.

But there would sometimes be added, "Mr. Sedley is as easy as an old shoe. He knows that, aside from the income of his farm, he has enough to give him and his family a good living, and so he not only lets many an hour slip away reading a newspaper or some book which, ten to one, isn't true, but lets Mabel have as many flowers as she wants. His wife is a great worker; and sometimes it frets her a good deal to see him waste his time in that way, and to have their daughter out watering her flowers and clipping off the dead leaves, when she might, like other girls of the village, be knitting socks to pay for her ribbons and laces."

It had long been the secret and fondly cherished wish of Mr. Sedley to have Mabel—who, of several children, had alone survived her infancy—when she should arrive at a suitable age, united in marriage to a young man by the name of Philip Inglis. Philip was the only child of a dear friend of Mr. Sedley long since deceased; who, being several years older than he was, and possessing much force of character and a well balanced mind, had, in their earlier days, been to him his good genius. When they were both married, their friendship for each other, as is sometimes the case on entering into this new relation, lost none of its warmth; and after a while, first in a laughing way, and afterwards more seriously, they used to speak of the marriage of their children as something which might be looked forward to as pleasant and desirable.

Ultimately as Philip, who was six years older than Mabel, approached the period of adolescence, the two friends entered into a sort of compact to do what they could when the fitting time should arrive to bring about an event, which, on many accounts, it appeared to them would be an excellent match. But as their object was to promote the happiness of their children, as well as to gratify themselves, the agreement was not made without expressly premising that no coercion should be made use of to realize their wishes.

Mr. Sedley might have thought less of this compact had it not formed the principal theme of conversation between them the last time that he and Mr. Inglis ever met. They parted in the evening at rather a late hour. The next morning Mr. Inglis started for the West, whence he never returned; an illness contracted soon after his arrival having proved fatal. The promise thus consecrated by death assumed to the survivor an importance and a solemnity which made it still more binding. He had, however, abstained from making any mention of it, even to his wife, although by some inadvertent remark, made now and then, she shrewdly suspected that he had some one in his eye whom he would like for a son-in-law.

The suspicion led her much oftener and more seriously than she otherwise would have done, to think on the subject of Mabel's marriage as an event which, in the common course of things, would be likely to take place at no distant period. Hence, as was natural enough, the slight resentment occasioned by not being consulted relative to what she considered, to say the least, was of equal importance to her as to her husband, rapidly assumed a graver aspect, till she finally believed herself an injured and slighted woman.

Things were in this state when one day a neighbor, who had just returned from a visit to her friends in a distant town, came to the door as Mrs. Sedley was passing, and handed her a letter. It proved to be from an old schoolmate, and among much miscellaneous matter, interesting only to themselves, contained the following paragraph:—

"By the way, I have been confidentially informed, and the information may be depended on as correct—that a certain gentleman, who at present is boarding with me, contemplates a visit to Brook Village; not for the purpose of spying out the land, but, by personal inspection, to ascertain if the fame which has gone abroad concerning Miss Mabel Sedley's personal charms—superior moral and intellectual qualities inclusive—does not transcend the reality. You may expect him the twenty-fifth of January; and, knowing by experience that it is sometimes productive of much inconvenience to be taken by surprise, I thought I could do no less than to let you know. I am not at liberty to tell his name; but I think there can be no doubt but that you will like him."

In the mean time Mr. Sedley called at the post-office, and, as he expected, found an answer to a letter he had two or three days previously sent to Philip Inglis, inviting him to Brook Village. Young Inglis, who had only a few weeks since returned from Europe, where he had for the most part resided since the death of his father, accepted Mr. Sedley's invitation with much apparent pleasure, and named the twenty-fifth of January as the day, when, no unforeseen occurrence preventing, he should be at Brook Village.

"Well," thought Mrs. Sedley, having read her letter and put it in her pocket, "I shall make a confidant of no one. If Mr. Sedley chooses to be so private about the person he wishes Mabel to marry, I will pay him in his own coin. I rather think, if I am a woman, I can keep a secret."

And to confess the truth, she did not overrate her reticive capabilities; although, had any one observed her closely, it would have been readily perceived that she had the appearance of one who had a tremendous amount of responsibility resting on her shoulders. If she had actually been one of the pillars of state, it apparently could not have been greater.

CHAPTER II.

"I BELIEVE," said Mrs. Sedley, addressing Peggy, her able and faithful assistant, "that to-morrow is the twenty-fifth of January."

"Yes 'm, it is," replied Peggy.

"If nothing happens more than I know of, you and I must be up an hour before light to-morrow morning."

"Why, to-morrow isn't washin'-day," replied Peggy, who entertained a decided repugnance to rising in the dark, when the weather was bleak and cold.

"I know 'tisn't; but the truth is, I want to have a good lot of pies, cakes, and other things baked."

"Do tell!" said Peggy. "You're expectin' company, I s'pose."

"Yes, I am. But don't say a word about it to Mabel. I shall tell her myself, when the proper time comes."

"You're expectin' quite a number, I take it."

"No, only one; but then he may stay a number of days."

"That is, if Miss Mabel pleases him; and there's no danger but what she will."

"What put that into your head, Peggy?"

"Oh, I kind of mistrusted when I found there was only one comin', and that one a gentleman."

"Well, I must own that you're not fur out of the way; but then, as I've already said, don't say a word to Mabel about it."

"I don't know," said Mr. Sedley, as he rose from the breakfast-table the next morning, "but that we may have a gentleman—a friend of mine—to take tea with us, and, probably, to pass the night. I thought I would mention it in season, so as to give you time to make whatever preparation you may think necessary." And without waiting to give his wife or daughter an opportunity to ask questions, he left the room.

The manners and customs of Brook Village retained so much of the patriarchal simplicity of the olden time, that the "hired girl," as the maid-of-all-work was generally termed, so far partook of the privileges and immunities of the family she served, as to always sit at the same table, and in the evening, when the toils of the day were ended, at the same fireside. Nor did the mistress of the household disdain to hold council with her assistant in a case of emergency, as in the present instance.

For some little time, after her husband had informed her of the anticipated arrival of a friend, Mrs. Sedley was in a state of great perplexity, from which she fell by degrees into what is commonly called a brown-study. She soon roused herself, however, and went to the kitchen, where Peggy had already preceded her.

"Now, Peggy," said she, "kindle a fire in the oven, the first thing you do; and if we step round lively, we've got things in such a good way, we can have the baking all done before dinner. Mabel, as soon as she puts the sitting-room in order, will come and make the loaf of plum-cake."

"Who is the gentleman Mr. Sedley is expectin'?" inquired Peggy.

"Of that, I'm as ignorant as you are; but let it be who it will, I must say that I wish he hadn't hit on the twenty-fifth of January to make his visit. Where the gentleman I'm expectin' is going to sleep, is more than I can tell."

"You think 'twill be best for the other one to have the parlor chamber?"

"He must have it. You know that Mr. Sedley said 'twas a friend of his."

"Well, accordin' to my mind, the room over the kitchen is good enough for anybody."

"So it is; but then you know there's no getting to it without going up the back stairs."

"It's the best thing that can be done, anyhow. After dinner, if I furbish up the old bureau and tables—they're real mahogany and no make-believe—and put the best patchwork quilt on the bed, and a fresh wreath of winter-green around the lookin'-glass, I kind of think 'twill do."

"It will be comfortable, to say the least. Now, Peggy, I will tell you what I mistrust," said Mrs. Sedley, lowering her voice, and assuming a confidential air.

"I shouldn't wonder," said Peggy, "if your thoughts have taken the same turn mine have."

"You remember that, one day a few weeks ago, I told you I had a strong suspicion Mr. Sedley had some-body in his mind he intended for a son-in-law."

"Yes, indeed, I remember every word you told me. I knew well enough that was what you were thinking about."

"Well, between you and me, I hav'n't the least doubt but that the friend he is expecting to-day, is the identical person he has had so long in his eye."

"It is plain as day that it is. Have you any idea who it is?"

"None in the world; but I do think that a mother should be allowed to have a voice in selecting a husband for her only daughter."

"Just my mind."

"If he should prove to be awkward and ill-bred, Mabel won't have anything to say to him, I know."

"That's what she won't."

"And it's a comfort to me to know it."

"And to me, too," replied Peggy.

CHAPTER III.

As was mentioned in the first chapter, the vines clambering up the side, and spreading themselves over the roof of Mr. Sedley's house, made it easy to be recognized by the stranger, that is, in the milder seasons of the year; but in the winter, when roofs, gardens, and fields, and not unfrequently, even the fences were buried beneath the snow, it lost its individuality. This, particularly when it was a busier day than usual, was the cause of much annoyance, on account of the frequency which a sharp, impatient rap was heard at the outer door, which commonly proved to proceed from a stranger in pursuit of some one quite different from the gentlemanly owner.

The twenty-fifth of January proved to be no exception. Peggy, in an earnest, energetic way, which showed that she fully realized the importance of her task, was rolling out some puff paste for cranberry tarts; and Mabel, under the eye of her mother, who, at the same time, was attending to such miscellaneous duties as always will come up ready to be done, was deep in the mysteries of mixing, in due proportion, the numerous ingredients for a plum cake, when there was a summons at the door, louder, and more imperative than usual.

"There, Mabel," said Peggy, "you must go this time, for my hands are all covered with flour."

"No, I'll go myself," said Mrs. Sedley, glancing as she spoke at the coarse homespun apron, which her daughter had put on to shield her neat gingham dress, and the impromptu turban made of a gay silk handkerchief.

This last picturesque addition to her toilet had been hastily assumed for the purpose of saving her hair from being powdered by the vigorous way Peggy had of bringing her rolling-pin down upon the puff-paste, after giving it a plentiful sprinkling of flour.

"There 's no knowing," thought Mrs. Sedley, as she hastened to the door, "but 'tis the very gentleman I'm expecting; and I should be sorry to have him see Mabel at such a disadvantage, as first impressions are sometimes hard to get rid of."

It, however, proved to be the wife of a well-to-do villager by the name of Grant.

"Will you walk in?" said Mrs. Sedley in an absent manner; for her heart, the moment she found that instead of the gentleman it was nobody but Mrs. Grant, went back to the kitchen; and her thoughts, in some inexplicable way, were getting tangled up with the sugar, citron, spices, and plums, and other good things destined to enter into the composition of the cake, which, in her own mind, she intended should be a satisfactory proof of her daughter's culinary skill.

But Mrs. Grant was full of her own thoughts and plans, which prevented her from noticing the lack of cordiality in Mrs. Sedley's invitation.

"Well, there 's such a cold, biting air, I guess I will," she replied; "but I'm in a desp'rate hurry, and mustn't stop more 'n two minutes."

Mrs. Sedley conducted her into the sitting-room, and handed her a chair.

"Now this is what I call comfortable," said Mrs. Grant, bending over the fire, and spreading her hands so as to catch the warm, crimson glow. "I shouldn't have ventured out this sharp morning, hadn't it been a case of necessity. A certain person, who lives at a distance, is coming to the village to-day, and we're expecting that he will come and take tea with us. We shall be obliged to make rather a substantial meal of it, for 't isn't much likely he'll stop by the way to get any dinner, and so as Mr. Grant was busy, I had to go to the store myself for a few necessities. I might have sent Dolly, but she 's no hand at a bargain, and besides, I wanted her to finish her new dress to wear this evening. You're naturally of a quick discernment, and will understand why I want her to look well as possible, when I tell you that the person we're expecting is a bachelor, well off in the world, and a suitable age for her. They've never seen each other yet; but my brother Sam's wife sent us word about him—he's her nephew—and says he's one of the steadiest, most industrious young men she ever saw."

VOL. LXVI.—20

"But I thought Dolly was to be married to Alfred March, in a few months?"

"Well, I suppose she's made up her mind to have him. In her eye, there isn't another person in the whole world equal to him, and he thinks the same of her. But Mr. Grant has given out word, since we heard about this other one, that if she does have Alfred, he'll cut her off with a single shilling."

"And you are expecting this other one to-day?" said Mrs. Sedley, emphasizing the last word, and who was so much struck with the similarity of Mrs. Grant's expectations and her own, that for the moment she ceased to think of the jeopardy to which the plum-cake might be subjected.

"Yes, sister Lucy said that he would be obliged to come to Brook Village, the twenty-fifth, on business."

At this moment the clock commenced striking ten.

"I'd no thought 'twas so late," said Mrs. Grant, quickly rising, and muffling her throat and chin with two or three extra folds of her scarlet comforter.

Ere the last stroke of the clock had died away, the door was closed behind her, and in breathless haste Mrs. Sedley went back to the kitchen.

"I was so afraid that you would make some mistake about the cake," said she.

Her mind, however, was put to rest by the satisfactory manner in which Mabel went through the strict questioning to which she subjected her, and she resumed her task as superintendent, undisturbed by any misgivings.

"You think my young friend is a regular gormandizer, I imagine," said Mr. Sedley, who had occasion to enter the kitchen.

"There 's no knowing that he will be the only one who will be here to-night," said Mrs. Sedley, which, by the peculiar way in which she modulated her voice, amounted to an assertion.

Mr. Sedley directed his eyes towards his wife, for a moment, with a questioning look, but perceiving that her attention was, apparently, concentrated on some culinary process, without further remark left the room.

CHAPTER IV.

"THERE, Peggy, we can have supper ready at ten minutes' warning," said Mrs. Sedley, with a look of satisfaction, as her eye, for a moment, rested on the cold chicken and nicely sliced ham which filled two large plates, and then ran along the row of pies, and other etceteras, which she considered proper for the occasion.

"Yes, and less, too, if it wasn't for the toast."

"We must wait till they both come," said Mrs. Sedley.

"Yes, till they both come," repeated Peggy, "and that won't be till the stage comes, half an hour after sunset."

"I shouldn't wonder if the gentleman I'm looking for should come in some kind of vehicle of his own."

"You don't think," said Peggy, opening her eyes considerably wider than usual, "that he will come with a carriage on runners, and a span of horses?"

"'Twouldn't be a mite strange if he should."

"Well, I never."

"You've put the chamber to rights?"

"Certainly; everything is just like wax-work."

"Has Mabel done dressing yet?"

"Yes'm, and has come down into the settin'-room, lookin' as fresh and beautiful as a pink posy."

"You had better go and change your dress now."

"Well, it is about time, I believe. Which do you advise me to wear, my purple calico, or crimson cashmere?"

"Your cashmere, by all means. With such black hair and eyes as yours, 'twill be altogether the most becoming."

Half an hour afterward they were all sitting by the fire—Mr. Sedley reading a newspaper, Mrs. Sedley and Peggy with their knitting, and Mabel looking at the plates of the Lady's Book, being too full of expectation to read, when there was a loud knock at the door.

"Them raps were given by a hand that has a good deal of muscle and sinner in it—one that's more used to wieldin' an axe than rappin' at a door, if I've any skill at guessin'," said Peggy.

At the same time she started up from her chair and threw aside her knitting-work in so much haste, and in such a flurry of spirits, that the ball of yarn fell to the floor, which puss, still retaining a vivid recollection of the frolicsome days of her kittenhood, and forgetting that her toilet was unfinished, one side of her face still remaining unwashed, proceeded to put in motion.

"There, I'll give up beat," said Peggy, nearly out of breath, and assuming an upright position, after numerous futile attempts—some of which involved the necessity of dodging the corner of a table, others of ducking beneath it—to follow and capture puss in her lively and nimble gyrations.

And it was provoking, the audacious way in which the cat would hit the ball, sending it half way across the floor, and then, with a saucy, hilarious bound, spring after it, just in time to escape the upraised hand, ready to pounce upon her. Meanwhile the yarn, in rapid convolutions winding in and out among the legs of chairs and tables, must, in its devious and intricate course, have been a match for the clue which guided fair Rosamond to her bower.

There now came a second knock louder than the first.

"I'll go to the door, Peggy," said Mr. Sedley, putting aside his newspaper.

"Well, Squire, I shall be dreadful obleeged to you if you will," she replied; "and I'll try and get the yarn untangled and wound up; for if I don't, it's crossed this way, that way, and t'other, so that whoever is come will think we've been spreadin' a net for him. And now, Miss Mabel, if you don't want to have Tiny's ears cuffed, you must put her away from here."

"She seems to know how to take care of her ears pretty well," said Mabel, laughing, at the same time putting Tiny into the kitchen, who was much less shy of her than Peggy. She then so energetically and successfully addressed herself to the task of assisting Peggy to disentangle the yarn, that, by the time her father returned, conducting a man who might have been thirty years old, there was little reason to apprehend that Peggy's fears would be realized.

The stranger was a large, full-breasted man, several inches above the medium height. He entered the room with a careless, swinging gait, as if he felt certain that he could not be otherwise than a welcome guest. It was easy to see that his coarse, flaxen hair had been accustomed to have its own will and way, by the manner it bristled up in little obstinate, independent tufts, round a forehead neither high nor expansive, and of a hue which might with as much propriety have been likened to bronze as Parian marble. But if his forehead was small, the same could not be said of the rest of his face, which had in breadth attained a development truly surprising, and to which his nose—diminutive by contrast—on account of the sudden and unexpected upward turn of its snubbed extremity, gave an expression which seemed to waver in a singular manner between gayety and gravity.

If the width of his face was remarkable, that of his mouth was marvellous. It was, however, a good-natured looking mouth, suggestive of what is termed a good hearty laugh. As for his hand, Peggy made a good guess when she said it was one that had a good deal of "muscle and sinner" in it, while the space covered by his feet gave ample assurance that he was supported on a firm foundation.

"The gentleman, I apprehend, you mentioned that you were expecting," said Mr. Sedley, addressing his wife, a merry smile lurking in his bright gray eyes.

"I supposed it to be the one you were expecting," said she, in a suppressed voice.

"Yes, she was expecting me," answered the stranger, and I supposed you were too." Then turning to Mrs. Sedley, "You of course got the letter telling you that I should be here the twenty-fifth of January."

"Yes, I received a letter telling me that I might expect a gentleman the twenty-fifth," she replied.

"Well, she told me that she wrote to you, and glad enough was I; for, as you're all a set of strangers to me, I should 'ave felt kind of shame-faced—bashful like, to come without you're expectin' me. My name is Simon Dowley, as I s'pose she told you."

"You had better lay aside your thick great-coat, and take a seat by the fire, Mr. Dowley," said Mr. Sedley, with an amused look.

"Don't care if I do," was Simon's answer.

There was a silence after he had divested himself of his outside garment, and took the proffered chair, during which he looked intently into the fire. After awhile he turned towards Mrs. Sedley, apparently with the intention of addressing her, but seemed at a loss what to say.

"She told you what I was coming for, didn't she?" said he, at last, after several times clearing his throat.

Mrs. Sedley assented by a slight and rather stiff inclination of her head.

"I thought so," said he, with a little satisfied nod at the perfect understanding which he imagined existed between them, and then, passing over Mabel with a quick, careless glance, his eyes rested with a look of great complacency on Peggy, who, at the same moment being occupied in looking at him, was taken by surprise, and so abashed that she turned nearly the color of her crimson cashmere.

After this there was another lapse into silence, during which Simon Dowley's hand was buried in the depths of his coat-pocket. At length it was slowly drawn thence, with an orange in it.

"She sent her love to you," said he to Mrs. Sedley, "and told me to give you this, 'cause oranges, perhaps, were scarce in Brook Village. There, I'll lay it down on the table, seein' that you're busy with your knittin'-work."

The hand was a second time buried in the coat-pocket, and another orange, much larger and finer looking than the first, was brought to light.

"I beg your pardon, ma'am," said he, nodding to Mrs. Sedley, "but she told me that I must give her the big one. You'd understand such matters," she said, and without turning his head in the least, though he threw a glance towards her out of the corner of his eye, he offered the orange to Peggy.

Looking still redder than before, if that were possible, she took it mechanically. For nearly a minute, as if she had discovered something quite out of the common way about it, she kept her eyes fastened on its golden rind, at the same time turning it nervously over and over in her hands. She then rose, and with a solemn, half regretful, yet very positive look, approached Mabel.

"The orange was sent to you," said she. "He has made a mistake."

"No, no, I hav'n't," interposed Dowley, eagerly. "She told me how you looked, and I knew you the minute I set eyes on you. I like your looks—like 'em better'n I expected to. And the little one, she's well enough—good in her place, I dare say; hav'n't a word to say against her—don't wish to slight her. But what do you s'pose such little morsels of hands as hers would be good for to make butter and cheese, and to do the b'ilin' and bakin', washin' and ironin' for a dozen or more, to say nothin' of—"

What more there was to be added to the list remained undisclosed, the enumeration being cut short by another knock at the door.

Peggy, not without a secret longing to retain the gift so persistently pressed upon her, had, after placing it by the orange presented to Mrs. Sedley, gone back to her chair; and as the only available resource to throw off a little of the nervous excitement occasioned by being the object of Simon Dowley's admiration instead of Mabel, bent over her knitting, and commenced making her needles fly, as if she was working on a wager. She started at this second summons at the door, as if roused from a dream. But Mr. Sedley had already risen.

"Sit still, Peggy, I prefer to go myself," said he; for, seen through the dimness of the twilight shadows, there was something in the air of the person he caught a glance of, as he passed the window, so strongly reminding him of the friend of his earlier days, that he knew it must be Philip Inglis.

After an absence of a few moments, during which could be heard words of warm and cordial greeting, Mr. Sedley returned with a young man whose appearance, in every respect, formed the greatest possible contrast to Simon Dowley's.

The very atmosphere of the room seemed to change at his entrance, bringing with him, as he did, that peculiar air of elegance and refinement, the charm of which lies in its being perfectly simple and unostentatious, and above all, the true type of sincerity, which artifice, however carefully veiled, must ever fail to successfully imitate. That he possessed this last-named attribute, which the poet apostrophizes as the first of virtues, Mabel seemed to have an intuitive perception; though it was not till weeks afterward that she realized with what certainty, by the confidence it inspires, it finds its way to the heart, appealing to its sympathies, and holding dominion over its affections.

Now, at his first arrival, she thought comparatively little of him, except in connection with her father, whom never in her life had she seen look so noble and so animated, and with a countenance so radiant with those kindlier feelings of humanity, of which, had circumstances permitted him to find his true place in society, it would have been seen that he possessed a liberal share.

Long before the evening drew to a close, Mabel saw that the intellectual resources of his young friend were such as to oblige him to look about him rather sharply. This afforded her great satisfaction; for she had many times thought, since she had been old enough to turn her attention to such subjects, that the treasures of her father's mind were running to waste; or what was nearly as bad, lying dormant, from the lack of opportunity to bring them into action.

Mr. Sedley had lost no time in introducing the newly-arrived guest as Philip Inglis, who had recently returned from England, where he had resided for the last ten years.

"Then," said Mrs. Sedley, "he must be the son of the deceased friend of yours, to whom, as you have often told me, you were in your youthful days much indebted."

"Yes," he replied.

"Which of itself would be sufficient to insure him a warm and hearty welcome," said she, offering him her hand.

As for Simon Dowley, when he found that the name of the lady with whom he had placed himself on such easy, familiar footing, was Sedley, words would fail to describe the look of astonishment and blank dismay which took the place of the self-satisfied expression which had pervaded his broad, shining countenance. He looked alternately at her and Mr. Sedley, now and then snatching a furtive, jealous glance at the newly-arrived guest, as if he feared that his presence might endanger his chance of obtaining the good graces of Peggy. Meanwhile, he listened intently to all that was said, never once closing his mouth, as if he imagined it was a medium through which information might be received, as well as communicated.

But as nothing occurred to confirm the suspicion that in Philip Inglis he would find a rival, he began to feel easier in his mind; and seizing the opportunity afforded by the first pause in the conversation, he took his stand in the centre of the apartment, and first, with a blue and white cotton handkerchief, wiping the perspiration from his forehead, he gave it a flourish by way of commanding attention.

"Good people," said he, "it makes me feel kind of sorry to break in upon you when you seem so glad and sociable; but I want to jest say a few words, for I begin to kind of mistrust that I've got into the wrong pew, as the sayin' is. Now, in the first place, ma'am," and he looked at Mrs. Sedley, "if you think it isn't ill-mannered to ask, I should like to know if the letter you and I said somethin' about, was from my Aunt Lucy Dowley?"

"It was not. I didn't even know that there was such a person."

"Jest as I mistrusted. I've got into the wrong pew—that is to say, into the wrong house."

"And where did you intend to go?" inquired Mr. Sedley.

"To Mr. Grant's. You know Jonathan Grant?"

"Yes, very well."

"You see that Miss Grant is my Aunt Lucy's sister by the way of marriage; but this is the first time I was ever in Brook Village, and she and Mr. Grant are both strangers to me, and so is their darter. When I first come I thought that was she." And he pointed to Peggy. I seemed to have an idee all the time, that Aunt Lucy said that the gal's name was Dolly; but concluded that my memory didn't serve me. I'd ruther 'ave given the best pair of oxen I have in the barn, than that she—I mean her you call Peggy—should turn out to be the wrong one, partly 'cause Aunt Lucy wrote to Miss Grant to give her a hint that I was on the look-out for somebody to take care of the dairy, and do the cookin', and sich like—a pardner for life, you know—not hired help—and gave her to understand that it was more likely than not, that her darter Dolly would suit me."

"You thought there was no danger but that you would suit her," said Mrs. Sedley.

"I declare, now, I never thought of that, and I don't believe that Aunt Lucy did."

"If I'm not much mistaken," said Mr. Sedley, "a worthy, industrious young man by the name of Alfred March, would be Dolly Grant's choice before you, or any one else."

"I wonder if she'd be his?" said Simon.

"There can be no doubt of it," replied Mrs. Sedley. "Mrs. Grant said as much to me, no longer ago than this morning. She told me, too, that she was expecting some one from out of town, and you are undoubtedly the person she meant."

"Well," said Simon, "now that I've got the lay of the land, as 'twere, I'm glad I come to the wrong house, for I don't believe that Dolly Grant can hold a candle to this black-eyed gal. There are a good many sects in the world, and among the rest, the fair sect; but for all so many belong to it, I've lived hard upon forty year, though folks say I might pass for thirty, and never came across one of 'em before that suited me. And now," and he edged up to the place where Peggy sat knitting fast as ever, "if you're willin' to be my pardner for life, I'm willin' to be yours. If you ain't willin' jest say so; if you are, say nothin', for silence gives consent, you know. Maybe, I may as well tell you now, for 'twill help you to make up your mind, that I own a hundred acre farm, well stocked, and that nobody raises more corn, pertaters, wheat, and all kinds of grain than I do. The house and the other buildin's are in good repair, all of 'em painted red, and look gay as a lark. And then I've a good horse, and a purty little shay; and when I don't want the horse to plough or harrow, he and the shay will be at your service, to go to the store and trade, or ride round jest where you've a fancy to. The horse is as steady as a mill, and a woman can drive him as well as a man.

This off-hand, business-like manner presented a new phase, in the art of courtship, to the mind of Peggy, conflicting with all her preconceived opinions of its peculiar usages and proprieties. At first there were vague, half-formed thoughts floating in her mind, which, had her skill in language enabled her to utter them, would have been not unlike those expressed by Juliet, when she said to Romeo,

"I'll frown and be perverse, and say thee nay,
So thou wilt woo."

But the panoramic view of the hundred-acre farm, with its herds and flocks, its waving fields of corn and grain, and last, not least, of herself, seated in the "purty little shay" on her way to the store "to trade," which presented itself to her mental vision, outweighed her scruples when put in the balance against them. She, therefore, kept her eyes steadfastly fixed on her work, and "gave no sign," except the involuntary one of reddening up to the roots of her hair.

"It's a bargain!" exclaimed Dowley, after waiting long enough to feel satisfied that she intended to remain silent, and, at the same time, bringing his hands together as a visible sign of ratifying the compact, so suddenly and with so much force, as to sound like the explosion of a pistol, and so startling his intended, that she dropped at least half a dozen stitches.

"Now," said he, "I'll go to Mr. Grant's, and tell 'em about Aunt Lucy, and try and get a chance to let Dolly know that I sha'n't put myself in the way of this Alfred March you think she has a likin' for."

"What if you should like Dolly better than you expect?" asked Mabel, a little mischievously.

"No danger of that," he replied. "I ain't one of your whiffle-minded ones. Besides, a bargain is a bargain; when I make one, I al'ays calc'late to stick to it, and so will you," said he, directing his speech to Peggy. "I know by your looks that you're no more whiffle-minded than I am."

At first Mr. Sedley insisted that he should stay to supper; but he said that he was expected to Mr. Grant's; and Mrs. Sedley, recalling to mind the preparation they had made for him, knew that they would be disappointed should he fail to go. She, however, in consideration of the pains Peggy had been at in "furbishing up the chamber," invited him to return, and pass the night with them, an invitation which he accepted with undisguised gratification.

"But how am I to find where they live?" said Simon, when he had put on his great coat, and was ready to start; "for the houses here are all as much alike as so many peas."

His anxiety was speedily terminated by the entrance of the man who superintended the farm-work, who undertook to be his escort.

CHAPTER V.

"So, after all, Mr. Simon Dowley wasn't the gentleman you were expecting?" said Mr. Sedley to his wife, in a slightly bantering tone.

She made an unsuccessful attempt to call up an angry frown, but smiled instead, as she answered in the negative.

Before there was time to say anything more, Philip Inglis rose, and presented to Mrs. Sedley a little billet.

"Pardon my forgetfulness in not handing it to you before," said he. "It is from Mrs. Leonard, the lady with whom I've been boarding since my return to my native land, who informed me that you were an old friend and schoolmate of hers."

"The bearer of this, Mr. Philip Inglis, is the gentleman I wrote you about," was all that the billet contained.

"You wish to know if I was expecting Simon Dowley," said she to her husband, when she had finished reading it, "and I now ask you if Mr. Inglis is the gentleman you were expecting?"

"He is."

"As I suspected; and I am glad to find that we agree, where I supposed we disagreed," she added, mentally.

Mrs. Sedley answered the questioning looks of her husband and daughter, which her inquiry and remark had involuntarily elicited, by informing them that Mrs. Leonard had written her, some week or two since, that she might expect a visit from a gentleman the twenty-fifth of January, whose name she did not mention, but who, as she found by the line just received, was Mr. Inglis.

"At which I am heartily glad," said Mr. Sedley; "for, to confess the truth, though I hope I'm not deficient in what is required by the laws of hospitality, another guest, while Philip Inglis is here, would, I believe, as far as I am concerned, be regarded as a kind of supernumerary, whose presence would willingly be dispensed with—always excepting"—and he looked at Peggy—"our newly-acquired friend, Simon Dowley."

Instead of remaining only a few days at Brook Village, as he had at first intended, Philip Inglis continued to linger till the days grew into weeks. His ostensible reason for so doing was to sketch some of the fine mountain scenery in the vicinity of Brook Village, presenting, at this season of the year, as at all others, new and varied aspects with each atmospherical change; for, though a lawyer by profession, he was an amateur artist.

For a time he suffered himself to be deluded into the belief that this was the real cause of his delay. At last, however, he could deceive himself no longer, and when fully convinced of the fallacy in which he had been indulging, he was not long in becoming aware that he had yielded himself to the thrall of the sweet and silent spells which Mabel innocently and unwittingly had woven around him, and which, for that very reason, were more irresistibly fascinating. But the golden meshes, such as held him in bondage, had not spared her. She, too, was a prisoner.

Thus, when in due time winter had again spread his ermine robe over plain and upland, Mr. Sedley's long cherished wish was realized by seeing his daughter the wife of his deceased friend's son. Nor was Mrs. Sedley less pleased with the match than her husband.

Simon Dowley proved that he was as stable-minded as he had claimed to be; the attractions of Dolly Grant having had no power to make him waver in his affection and loyalty to the less youthful Peggy, however hastily they had been bestowed.

They were married soon after the gathering in of the next harvest. Simon having no little pride in being able to install his newly-married wife as mistress of his home, at a time when the cellar, granary, and other places of storage were filled to overflowing with the produce of his farm.

"I ain't sorry yet, and guess I sha'n't be very soon, that I went to the wrong house," said he, in answer to an old acquaintance, who undertook to rally him about falling in love at first sight. "I al'ays used to kind of dread to go into the house rainy days; my old house-keeper, who was a well-meanin' woman in her way, used to look so dull and gloomy. But Peggy al'ays looks so cheery, and steps round so brisk and lively, that I don't care the value of a straw whether it rains or shines. I can tell you that the sunshine of a bright, comely-lookin' face will go a deal further in the way of cheerin' a man up, when he's down-hearted, than the brightest that ever shone from a June sky.'

And Peggy appeared to be well-satisfied to be the mistress of the red house, and with the enjoyment of the privileges thereto annexed, particularly when her domestic duties for the day—to make use of her own expression—were fairly and squarely done, that of taking an airing in the "shay," either with or without her husband, as might be most convenient.

"If Simon isn't handsome, he is good," she said, the first time Mrs. Sedley made her a visit: "and then his takin' a fancy to me was the means of making Mr. Grant and his wife consent to the match between Dolly and Alfred March, who were just suited to each other."

If additional proof were wanting that Simon Dowley was sincere in felicitating himself on his good fortune in going to the wrong house, it might have been found in the following record in his Account Book, hedged in, so as to keep it from being mixed up with charges of sundry edibles, furnished to some neighbor not so fortunate as to own a farm, by some very remarkable-looking scrollwork done in red and blue ink:—

"PRIVIT MEMRANDUM.

25th of Jinwerry, 18—, the most fortinit day of my life. Take notis. It was the day I went to the 'rong howse. S. D."

RIDING.

A FEW REMARKS ABOUT RIDING, FOR LADIES AND CHILDREN.

BY G. L.

BEFORE I commence my subject, I must offer a few of those generally and justly-execrated things—a few prefatory remarks. I offer them in order that my purpose may be clearly understood at this the starting-point, and that so my endeavors may not lay me open to the derision of the thoroughly initiated.

It is a very customary thing to say, that a writer treats the special subject he writes upon as if he alone knew aught about it; and as if the subject alone was an interesting thing to the world at large. And this is stated in a manner that implies that a certain amount of self-sufficiency is imputed to him; and a certain amount of discredit is, therefore, attached to his manner of carrying through that which he has undertaken.

Now this is a natural, but at the same time permit me to observe, an unjust accusation. It is utterly impossible to teach the few who need teaching, and who wish to be taught, without boring the many who do not require it, with that of which they have heard before.

Another thing; the subject treated of may not be an all-absorbing one, or pre-eminent above all others, even in the mind of the author; still, unless he writes as if it were, he will not write well. Precision and earnestness must be his down to the smallest point, if a single lesson is to be conveyed, a single attention claimed.

Now I have not taken up a subject on which I am indifferent, consequently there will be no assumption of interest in my manner of writing, for not only do I dearly love riding, but I dearly love horses. I have had many happy hours in their company—much cordial, quiet sympathy from them—many true-hearted friends amongst them. This being the case, that which I say about them comes from the heart, and is not got up for the occasion with labor and difficulty.

These remarks can hardly be hoped to benefit the small town-bred lady, who, at the age of five, is placed on the back of an even-minded, smooth-stepping pony, and under the vigilant supervision of a riding-master. They are for the use of those who, like myself, may have to practise riding in a very rough school and owe to it all the pleasure of a far-off country life.

The little child—and it is for childish learners that these first pages are penned—running wild in the freedom of the country, will be sure, when very young indeed to find her way into the stables. The horses will "draw" her surely—the great strong horses, who carry Papa to the hunting-field or over the farm. Let her go; do not attempt to check her, if you mean that she shall ride in after-life, not simply sit upon a horse. Above all, do not check her, if she is going up fearlessly to the horses. A generous-tempered horse will never kick, step upon, or bite a child, if that child is taught that it must not clap, pinch, or startle the horse, that to do so is to tease, and that teasing is another word for cruelty, and, therefore will be deservedly punished.

If the child likes the horse, is not afraid of it, and never teases it, the horse will like the child, and will soon go over, at the sound of the little voice or step, with a promptitude not even its groom can command. Take her in with you when you visit your horses in the morning; let your little daughter's be the hand that gives the bit of sugar or the carrot; these trifling attentions will cement the friendship wonderfully. The bond will soon be a strong one, and when the child is old enough to sit upon its back, that horse may be trusted to carry her.

No matter what he is; he may be the showiest goer in the stable; he may have a mouth so hard that he tests the muscles of a man's arm; or one so fine that an untoward jerk will bring him upon his haunches. For the child he knows and likes—for the child who knows, likes, and is not afraid of him, he will be perfectly safe. Let him feel—no human being will be quicker to feel it—that the responsibility is with him, and he will deserve it.

The child must possess unbounded confidence in the horse, and in her own intentions, but not a fool-hardy reliance on a skill she does not possess. Teach her, before she begins to practise the accomplishments, that when the horse simply purposes to do that which is right and proper for him to do, that he is not to be idly thwarted.

Place her before him as he stands ready saddled: let him be patted by her, and spoken to by her. Encourage him to lower his crest and turn his head round sufficiently to enable him to see who it is that you are putting on his back (make the youthful equestrian mount from your hand if she possibly can). Then place the reins (they had better be double ones) rapidly and correctly in her hands, and make the groom quit hold of his head directly. Leave the horse and the child alone together, if neither have before approved themselves to be of a bad disposition. He has a little friend on his back, she is only "on" instead of "by the side of," an animal she loves; they may be safely trusted to their own devices.

I say the reins had better be double, because I think those who commence with the single rein will not afterwards adjust their fingers to the double ones with the rapidity that is not only desirable but essential. Whereas, if accustomed to it from the first, the tiny hand of the lady and the reins arrange themselves to each other in a moment.

The little girl should be made to stand in the correct position for mounting, even if she is too small to place her hand on the pommel. Her weight will be too small to render aid from herself necessary; but teach her that there are only two ways of getting on a horse—a right way and a wrong way: and that you intend from the first that she shall mount properly.

She must stand close to the horse's side with the reins already in her hands. I think it has a slovenly air, and is a sort of tacit admission that your horse is a poor-spirited Dobbin, if you wait till you are firmly seated in the saddle before you gather up your reins.

Now that she is properly settled in the saddle with the reins properly adjusted in her hand, with the whip held with the handle under the palm, and the lash slanting away over the near side of the horse's neck. Now that all this is done, she should be made to understand that the next grand point is, that she should sit firmly, gracefully, easily.

The foot, whether it be placed in the old-fashioned slipper, or newer-fashioned Victoria stirrup, should be planted with the toe up, but inclining towards the side of the horse. The knee should be pressed against the saddle. Here I would observe, if you value your daughter's having a thoroughly good seat in the future, do not let her commence with the third crutch; it will give her a false balance, a false security and a false position. But to go on with what "should," and not diverge to what "should not" be. She should be "well-placed" immediately in the centre of the saddle; to hang the idea of an inch to the near or off-side is both hideous and unsafe. The elbow of the bridle-hand should be in so much of a line with the shoulder—straight down—as is consistent with ease; the hand should not be permitted to rest on anything, nor should it be allowed to hover, as it were, in an uncertain way in mid-air. The whip-hand should also be brought up to the front, in order (not only that it may be used, but) that it may keep the right shoulder from falling away, as it surely will if the whip-hand is permitted to hang down inanely over the saddle-pocket. For why should it be in the latter position? None but an inefficient watering-place riding-master will hit, or teach to hit, on the flank; it has an awkward, ungainly look; it is essentially bad style; it tells the horse nothing if he has been well-trained, save that you are of a pugilistic turn.

Having told her so far, what to do and what to avoid, let her go off at a walk, and put your instructions into practice. Till she can perfectly balance herself, and accommodate herself to every swerve when the horse is walking, it is hopeless to expect her to do so when he trots. Make her "let her arms go" when he ducks his head suddenly, but be cautious to impress upon her that she holds the reins very firmly the while. She must let her arm go down with his head—not bending her body more than is necessary—and come back with it; in fact she must let her arm act like a spring.

Do not keep her entirely to a straight piece of ground; give her an opportunity of turning a corner, or, at least, of turning her horse. From a child, the turn-back of the wrist will not be a sufficient indication to the horse, if she desires him to go to the left. Make her, therefore, take the near-snaffle rein in her right, or whip hand, and bend him round. She must take the rein close up against the bridle-hand, and she must place the hand with which she grasps it palm upwards, else the action will be ungraceful. If, however, she should want to turn him to the right, she must take an over-hand grasp of the off-rein with her whip-hand. In either case she is to avoid leaning forward and taking a far-off clasp of the rein, as if her arm was going out walking, and the precise spot she desired to touch of the rein was a long way off.

The horse you teach your daughter to ride upon should be no wooden goer, no stiff-legged awkward pony; he should be a smooth, elastic-paced horse, with a fine action in order that she may learn at once what is good, and so by-and-by correct what is amiss in the gait of less perfectly trained horses. Teach her that she is never to let a horse continue in its evil ways. When it starts in a canter with its wrong, or left leg foremost, she must bring him up directly in order that he may feel that he has done something that he ought not to have done. Some horses are clever enough to alter at once in their stride without stopping; but this can scarcely be expected of them under a childish hand. Be very particular on this point; do not allow her to let her horse drop into this evil habit; tell her (the first day you put her on horseback) that if her horse canters with his wrong leg forward (after having clearly explained to her what that means) it will give her a bad seat, and her steed an awkward gait. Tell her also that she is never, on any pretence whatever, to draw her reins up sharp (in the way children too often indulge in) in a purposeless manner, and that she is to understand that if her horse throws his head about, or tosses it up and down, that she must be holding the reins too tightly. Then make her sit "well back" in the saddle, with her head carried "forward" enough not to look as if it were blowing off behind, and let her have a short canter—just one—as a reward for the patience she has shown under your instructions; but the canter had better not be repeated; so, before she is permitted to indulge in that luxurious pace, she must learn to trot.

Vice can never know itself and virtue; but virtue knows both itself and vice.

GOOD-NIGHT.

BY M. C. GORDON.

As a weary child on its mother's breast
Sinks sweetly to repose,
So droops the sun, in the golden west,
As the evening shadows close.
The day is done, and the fading light
Gently whispers, Good-night! good-night!

Good-night, good-night, to careless youth,
With their ringing laugh of glee,
They only dream of love and truth,
Their hearts are wild and free;
Life still to them is clear and bright,
Gay, happy ones, Good-night! good-night!

Good-night, good-night, to the sad and weary,
Whose hearts are filled with grief;
Oh, life to them is lone and dreary!
Despairing of relief.

But joy may come with the morrow's light,
Poor, suffering ones, Good-night! good-night.

Good-night, good-night, to the aged sire,
Whose form is bent with years,
His eyes once full of youthful fire
Are dim with unshed tears:
His steps may fall ere the morrow's light,
Poor, weary one, Good-night! good-night!

Good-night to the Christian, bearing
His banner of light above;
Neither cares nor dangers fearing,
Secure of Jesus' love.
Soon! soon! may be thine upward flight,
Beloved of God! Good-night! good-night!

THE GLASS ON THE WALL.

BY MRS. S. P. MESERVE HAYES.

LONG years had it hung in the ducal hall,
In its antique frame on the oaken wall;
Many bright faces had gazed therein,
And faces dark with the impress of sin;
Years of sorrow and smiles of mirth,
The glass on the wall had mirrored forth.

The high-born dame had blushed with pride,
As she saw her charms in the mirror wide;
The pure white brow of the maiden fair,
And the stern dark knight were reflected there.
And many a tale may the glass on the wall
Tell of days by-gone in Argyle's hall.

For every year, when the holly bright
Is woven in wreaths on the Christmas night,
Visions weird and wild are seen
By those who gaze in the glass I ween;
Ladies fair and cavaliers true
The glass on the wall brings back to view.

Once more is heard the haughty tread
Of knights and nobles long since dead;
Passing along in phantom train,
Breathing with hope and life again;
All those who have dwelt in Argyle's hall,
Are seen again in the glass on the wall.

“HUSKS.”

“And he would fain have filled himself with the husks that the swine did eat; and no man gave unto him.”

CHAPTER V.

On a pleasant, although rather cloudy forenoon in July, our young pleasure-seekers carried into execution a long-talked-of expedition to the Deal Beach, distant about ten miles from Shrewsbury.

By Aunt Sarah's arrangement, Charley and Jeannie occupied the back seat of the light wagon, and Sarah was to sit by Philip in front, that she “might see the country.” Having accomplished this apparently artless manoeuvre, the good woman handed up to them a portly basket of luncheon, and two or three additional shawls, in case of rain or change of weather, and bade the gay party “Good-by” with a satisfied glow in heart and face. To her guileless apprehension there was no question how affairs were progressing between her niece and her nephew-in-law; and in sundry conferences on the subject between “husband” and herself, it had been agreed that a matrimonial alliance would be the best thing that could happen to either of the supposed lovers. In her simple, pious soul, the dear old lady already blessed the Providence that had accomplished the meeting and intercourse under her roof, while she wondered at “the strange things that come about in this world.”

Philip had been aware of her innocent attempts to facilitate his suit for several days past, and Sarah's blush, as she hesitated, before accepting the proffered seat by the driver, showed that this move was so transparent as to convey the alarm to her also. For a full half-mile, Philip did not speak, except a word now and then to the pair of stout grays, who were Uncle Nathan's greatest earthly boast. He appeared thoughtful, perhaps perturbed—so Sarah's single stolen glance at him showed, and in the eyes that looked straight onward to the horizon, there was a hardness she had never seen there before. She was surprised, therefore, when he broke the silence by an unimportant observation, uttered in his usual friendly tone, and for the remainder of the ride was gay and kind, with a show of light-heartedness that was not surpassed by the merry children behind them.

There was hardly enough variety in the unpicturesque country bordering their route to give the shadow of reasonableness to Aunt Sarah's pretext in selecting her namesake's seat, and despite her escort's considerate attentions Sarah had an uncomfortable ride; while her manner evinced more of the haughty reserve of their introduction than she had shown at any subsequent stage of their acquaintance. The grays travelled well, and a little after noon they were detached from the carriage, and tied in the grove of scrub-oaks skirting the beach.

While Philip was busied with them, the others continued their course down to the shore; the children, hand-in-hand, skipping over sand-hills, and stopping to pick up stones; Sarah strolling slowly after them. She had seen the ocean-surf before, but never aught like this, with its huge swells of water, a mile in length, gathering blackness and height on their landward career; as they struck the invisible barrier that commanded “Thus far and no further!” breaking in white fury, with the leap of a baffled fiend, and a roar like thunder, against their resistless opponent, then recoiling, sullenly, to gather new force for another, and as useless an attack. The beach was wide and uneven, of sand, whose whiteness would have glared intolerably had the day been sunny, drifted into hillocks and undulating ridges, like the waves of the sea. Here and there the hardy heather found a foothold amid the otherwise blank sterility, the green patches adding to, rather than lessening the wild, desolate aspect of the tract. Fragments of timber were strewn in all directions, and Sarah's quick eye perceived that it was not formless, chance drift-wood. There were hewn beams and shapely spars, and planks in which great iron bolts were still fast. When Philip overtook her, she was standing by an immense piece of solid wood, lying far beyond the reach of the highest summer tides. One end was buried in the sand; the other, bleached by sun and wind, and seamed with cracks, was curved like the extremity of a bow. Her late embarrassment or hauteur was forgotten in the direct earnestness of her appealing look.

"Am I mistaken?" she said, in a low, awed tone. "Is not this the keel of a ship?"

"It is. There have been many wrecked on this coast."

"Here!" She glanced from the fierce, bellying breakers to the melancholy testimonial of their destructive might. "I have never heard that this was esteemed a dangerous point."

"You can form but an imperfect idea of what this beach is in winter," remarked Philip, signing to her to seat herself upon the sand, and throwing himself down beside her. "I was here once, late in the autumn, and saw a vessel go to pieces, scarcely a stone's throw from where we are now sitting. The sea was high, the wind blowing a perfect gale, and this schooner, having lost one of her most important sails, was at the mercy of the elements. She was cast upon the shore, and her crew, watching their opportunity, sprang overboard as the waves receded, and reached firm ground in safety. Then came a monster billow, and lifting the vessel further upon the sand left her careened towards the land. It was pitiful to see the poor thing! so like life were her shudders and groans, as the cruel surf beat against her, that my heart fairly ached. The spray, at every dash, arose nearly as high as her mast-head, and a cataract of water swept over her deck. Piece by piece she broke up, and we could only stand and look on, while the scattered portions were thrown to our very feet. I shall never forget the sight. It taught me the truth of man's impotence and nature's strength as I had never read it before."

"But there were no lives lost! You were spared the spectacle of that most terrible scene in the tragedy of shipwreck."

"Yes. But the light of many a life has been quenched in that raging chaldron. A young man, a resident of Shrewsbury, with whom I hunted last year, described to me a catalogue of horrors which he had beheld here, that has visited me in dreams often since. An emigrant ship was cast away on this coast, in midwinter. High above the roar of the wind and the booming surf, was heard the cry of the doomed wretches, perishing within hail of the crowd of fellow-beings who had collected at news of the catastrophe. The cold was intense; mast, and sail, and rope were coated with ice, and the benumbed, freezing wretches were exposed every instant to the torrents of brine that swept over them like sleet. The agony was horrible beyond description, but it was soon over. Before the vessel parted the accent of mortal woe was lushed. Not a man survived to tell the tale!"

For an hour, they sat thus and talked. The subject had, for Sarah, a fearful fascination, and, led on by her absorbed attention, Philip rehearsed to her wonders and stories of the mysterious old ocean, that to-day stretched before them, blanched and angry, under the veil of summer cloud, until to his auditor there were bitter wailings blent with the surge's roar; arms, strained and bare, were tossed above the dark, serpent-like swell of water, in unavailing supplication, and livid, dead faces stared upon her from beneath the curling crests of the breakers.

That day on the Deal Beach! How quietly happy was its seeming! how full of event, emotion, fate—was its reality! Charlie and Jeannie wandered up and down the coast, filling their baskets with shells and pebbles; chasing the retiring waves as far as they dared, and scampering back, with shrieks of laughter, as the succeeding billow rolled rapidly after them; building sand-houses, and digging wells to be filled by the salt-water; exulting greatly when a rough coralline fragment, or a jelly-fish of unusual dimensions was thrown in their way. They all lunched together, seated upon the heather-clumps, around Aunt Sarah's liberal hamper.

"Sister!" said Jeannie, when the edge of her sea-side appetite was somewhat blunted by her repast, "I like living here better than in New York—don't you?"

"It is more pleasant in summer, my dear."

"But I mean that I am happier here! I wish you would write to mother, and ask her to let us live here always."

"But what would she do without her baby?" asked Philip, emphasizing the last word.

The little lady bridled instantly.

"Cousin Phil! I do wish you would never call me a 'baby' again! I am seven years and two weeks old. I could get along very well without mother for a while. Of course, I would go over sometimes, and pay her a visit and get new dresses. Shrewsbury is a nice place; I would like to buy that pretty white house next to Uncle Nathan's, and live there—Sister, and Charley, and I—and you—if you would promise not to teaze me ever!"

"Thank you!" said Philip, with admirable gravity, seeming not to note Sarah's heightened color at this proposal of co-partnership. "You are very kind to include me in your household arrangements, and nothing would please me better, if I could stay here. But you know, Jeannie, my dear little cousin, that my home is far away from this quarter of the world. I have remained here too long already." There was a touch of feeling or nervousness in his voice. "I had a letter, last night, reminding me that I ought to have left, a week ago, to join a party of friends, whom I promised to meet in New York, and travel with them until the time for our return to the South."

He did not look at Sarah, but she felt that the explanation was intended for her—that, whether intentionally or not, he was preparing her for a blow to heart and hope.

"I shall be obliged to leave Shrewsbury and all my friends there, to-morrow morning, Jeannie!"

The child's exclamation of dismay, and Charles's quick, mute remonstrance to his cousin, as his playfellow communicated the news to him, gave Sarah time to rally firmness and words.

"This is unexpected intelligence," she said, calmly. "We shall miss you. Your kindness has, directly and indirectly, been the means of affording us much pleasure during our visit to our good aunt. It will seem dull when you are gone."

There was a flash in Philip's eye that looked like pleasure—a mixture of relief and surprise, as he turned to her.

"I am selfish enough to hope that you will miss me for a time, at least. I shall not then be so soon forgotten. We have had some pleasant days and weeks together; have we not?"

"I have enjoyed them, assuredly."

She was a little pale, Philip thought, but that might be the effect of fatigue. Her cheek was seldom blooming, unless when flushed in animated speech, or by brisk exercise. She spoke of his going with politeness, that seemed scarce one remove from carelessness; and, man-like, his pleasure at the thought that their association in the country-house had not been followed by the results Aunt Sarah wished and predicted, gave way to a feeling of wounded vanity and vexation, that his summer's companion could relinquish him so easily. While he repeated to himself his congratulations that his friendly and gallant attentions had not been misconstrued, had not awakened any inconvenient, because futile "expectations," he wondered if it were a possibility for a girl of so much sense and feeling, such genuine appreciation of his talents and tastes, to know him well—even intimately—without experiencing a warmer sentiment than mere approval of an agreeable associate's mind and manners, and Platonic liking for him on these accounts.

With the respectful familiarity of a privileged acquaintance, he drew her hand within his arm, as they arose at the conclusion of the collation.

"We have yet two hours and more to spend here, before we set out for home. We can have one more walk and talk together."

They took but one turn on the beach, and returning to their morning's seat beside the half-buried keel, tried to talk as they had done then. It was hard work, even to the man of the world, the heart-free student of human nature. Gradually the conversation languished and died away, and, for a while, both sat silent, looking out upon the sea. Then Philip's gaze came back to his companion—stealthily at first, and, as she remained unconscious of his scrutiny, it lingered long and searchingly upon features, form, and attire.

There were white, tight lines about her mouth, and a slight knitting of the brow, that imparted a care-worn look to the young face, it pained him to see. Her hands were clasped upon her knee, and the fingers were bloodless where they interlaced one another. Was she suffering? Was the threatened parting the cause of her disquiet? If this were so, what was his duty as a man of honor—of common humanity? And if he were forced to admit that he held her happiness in his power, and to accept the consequences that must ensue from his idle gallantry and her mistaken reading of the same, was the thought really repulsive? Would it be a total sacrifice of feeling to a sense of right? It was a repetition, grave and careful, of the reverie of that July night, two weeks ago.

Sarah's hat—a broad-brimmed "flat" of brown straw—had fallen back upon her shoulders, and the sea-breeze played in her hair, raising the short and loose strands, and giving to the whole a rough, "frowzy" look. Her plain linen collar and undersleeves showed her complexion and hands to the worst possible advantage. Upon her cheeks, this same unfriendly wind had bestowed a coat of tan and a few freckles, that were all the more conspicuous from her pallor, while her fingers were as brown as a gypsy's. Her gray poplin dress had lost most of its original gloss, and being one of Mrs. Hunt's bargains—"a cheap thing, but plenty good for that outlandish Shrewsbury"—already betrayed its cotton warp by creases that would not be smoothed, and an aspect of general lumpness—a prophecy of speedy, irremediable shabbiness. Cast loosely about her shoulders was a light shawl, green, with black sprigs—another bargain; and beyond the skirt of her robe appeared the toe and instep of a thick-soled gaiter, very suitable for a tramp through damp sand, yet anything but becoming to the foot it protected.

With an impatient shake of the head, involuntary and positive, Philip closed his final observation. And cutting off a large splinter from the weather-beaten timber, against which he leaned, set about trimming it, wearing a serious, settled face, that said his mind was fully made up.

What had Sarah seen all this while?

Heavens, over which the films of the forenoon had thickened into dun cloud-curtains, stretching above, and enveloping the world; a wild, dreary expanse of troubled waters, whose horizon line was lost in the misty blending of sea and sky, ever hurrying and heaving to moan out their unrest upon the barren beach. In the distance was a solitary sail; nearer to the land, a large sea-bird flew heavily against the wind. In such mateless, weary flight, must her life be passed; that lone, frail craft was not so hopelessly forlorn upon a gloomy sea, beneath a sky that gloomed yet more darkly—as was her heart, torn suddenly from its moorings—anchor, and rudder, and compass gone! Yet who could syllable the mighty sorrow of the complaining sea? And were there words in human language, that could tell the anguish of the swelling flood beating within her breast?

"Going away! To-morrow!" For a little space this was all the lament she kept repeating over to herself. Pregnant with woe she knew it to be, yet it was not until she was allowed to meditate in silence upon the meaning of the words that she realized what had truly come upon her. She had thrown away all her hope of earthly happiness—risked it as madly, lost it as surely, as if she had tossed it—a tangible pearl—into the yawning ocean. Her instinct assured her that, were it otherwise, the tidings of Philip's intended departure, his suddenly formed resolution to leave her, would have been conveyed to her in a far different manner. Her keen backward glance penetrated Aunt Sarah's simple wiles; his obvious annoyance thereat; his determination to save himself from suspicion; his honorable fear lest she, too, should imagine him loving, where he was only civil and kind. Yes, it was all over! The best thing she could hope to do; the brightest prospect life had now for her was that her secret should remain hers alone, until the troubled heart moaned itself into the rest which knows no waking. She was used to concealment. All her existence, excepting the sweet delusive dream of the past three weeks, had been a stern preparation for this trial. But she was already weary and faint—fit to lie down and die, so intense had been the throes of this one struggle.

"How long is this to last? How long?"

The exclamation actually broke, in an inarticulate murmur, from her lips.

"Did you speak?" inquired Philip.

"I think not. I am not sure. I did not intend to do so!"

"Grant me credit for my forbearance in not obtruding my prosaic talk upon your musings," he went on, playfully. "It was a powerful temptation—for I remember, constantly, that this is our last opportunity for a genuine heart and head confabulation, such as I shall often linger for, after I leave you—and sincerity! You have done me good, Miss Sarah; taught me Faith, Hope, Charity—a blessed sisterhood!"

"May they ever attend you!"

"Amen! and thank you! And what wish shall I make in return for your beautiful benediction?"

"Whatever you like. My desires are not many or extravagant."

"You are wrong. You have a craving heart and a craving mind. May both be fed to the full, with food convenient for them—in measures pressed down, shaken together, and running over."

"Of what? Husks?" was Sarah's unspoken and bitter reply. She could not thank him, as he had done her. She only bowed, and bending forward, took up a handful of the fine white sand that formed the shore. Slowly sifting it through her fingers, she waited for him to speak again.

Was this careless equanimity real or feigned? The judge of character, the harpist upon heart-strings, made the next move—not the candid, manly friend.

"I am going to ask a favor of you—a bold one."

"Say on."

"By the time I am ready to retrace my steps southward, you will be again settled in New York. Will you think me presumptuous, if I call at your father's house to continue an acquaintance, which has been, to me, at once agreeable and profitable?"

The fingers were still, suddenly. A warm glow, like sunrise, swept over cheek and forehead. A smile, slight, but sweet, quivered upon her lips. Drowning in the depths, she heard across the billow a hail that spoke of hope, life, happiness.

"We will all be glad to see you," she said, with affected composure.

"Not half so glad as I shall be to come. Will you now, while you think of it, give me your address?"

He handed her a card and a pencil. She wrote the required direction, and received in exchange for it the new smooth bit of wood, which had afforded occupation to Philip for half an hour past. It was tendered in mock ceremony, and accepted smilingly. Upon the gray tablet was inscribed, "Philip Benson, Deal Beach, July 27th, 18—." A playful or thoughtless impulse caused him to extend his hand for it, after she had read it, and to add a motto, stale as innocent in his eyes. "Pensez à moi!"

"I shall preserve it as a souvenir of the day and place," observed Sarah, slipping it into her pocket.

Twilight overtook them before they reached home, and the night was too cloudy and damp for a promenade, such as they often had in the garden walks and lane, or for the customary family gathering in the long porch. Yet Aunt Sarah was surprised that Philip was apparently content to spend the evening in the sitting-room, with herself and husband by, to spoil the tête-à-tête he must be longing for.

Still more confounded was she, when, after her clever strategy of coaxing Uncle Nathan into the kitchen, that the coast might be clear, she heard Philip's step close behind them.

"I must clean my gun to-night, aunt," he said, taking it from the corner; "I shall not have time to do it to-morrow."

With the utmost nonchalance he began the operation, whistling softly a lively air over his work. Aunt Sarah gave her partner a look of bewildered despair, which he returned by a confirmatory nod, and a smile, half comic, half regretful.

After breakfast next morning, the nephew-guest said affectionate farewells to his relatives and Jeannie; a grave, gentle adieu to Sarah, accompanied by a momentary pressure of the hand, that may have meant much or little; and upon the snug homestead, settled a quiet that was dreariness itself to one of its inmates.

CHAPTER VI.

MEANWHILE, how had the time sped to the nominal head of the Hunt household—the solitary, toiling father and husband? The servants were dismissed, when "the family" left town, although Mr. Hunt continued to sleep at home. A peripatetic maid-of-all-work—what the English denominate a char-woman—was engaged to come early every morning, to clear up the only room in the establishment that was used, before the Cashier went out for his breakfast, which he procured at a restaurant pretty far down town. The same quiet coffee-house furnished him with dinner and an early tea, after which last refreshment he was at liberty to pass the evening in whatever manner he liked best. There was nothing in the city worth seeing at this season, even if he had not lost all taste for shows and gayety. Those of his acquaintances who were not absent with their wives and daughters, were living like himself, furniture in overalls; carpets covered; apartments closed, with the exception, perhaps, of one bed-room; and had no place in which to receive him, if he had been in the habit of visiting, which he was not. He was very tired, moreover, by the time night came on, and as the heat increased, and the days grew longer, his strength waned more and more, and his spirits with it. Meekly and uncomplainingly, he plodded through his routine of bank duties, so steady and so faithful, that his fellow-workers and customers had come to regard him as a reliable fixture; a piece of machinery, whose winding up was self-performed, and whose accuracy was infallible.

When, therefore, on a sultry August afternoon, he turned to leave his desk, at the close of business hours, grew terribly pale, and dropped upon the floor in a fit of death-like faintness, there was great consternation, and as much wonder as if no human clock-work had ever given out before, under a like process of exhausting demands.

Clumsily, but with the best of intentions, they brought him to his senses, and in half an hour, or so, he was sufficiently recovered to be taken home. There was a twitching of the lips that might have passed for a sarcastic smile, as he heard the proposal to convey him to his house, but he only gave his street and number, and lay silently back in the carriage, supported by his friends, two of whom insisted upon seeing him safely to his own abode.

"Is this the place? Why, it is all shut up!” exclaimed one of these gentlemen, as the driver drew up before the dusty steps.

Mrs. Hunt's orders were that the entrance to her mansion should present the most desolate air possible during her absence. It had “an aristocratical look in the summer time, when everybody but nobodies was rustivating.”

Again that singular contortion of the mouth, and the master (?) of the forlorn-looking habitation prepared to descend, fumbling in his pocket for his pass-key.

“I am obliged to you, gentlemen, for your great kindness, and will—not—trouble—you—longer.”

In trying to raise his hand to his hat, for a bow, the ghastly line again overspread his face, and he staggered. Without farther parley, his two aids laid hold of him—one on each side—and supported him into the house, up one, two flights of linen-draped stairs, to a back bed-room.

Mrs. Hunt would have let her husband faint on the sidewalk, before she would have received company in that chamber in its present condition; for the handsomest articles of furniture stood covered up in another apartment, and their place was supplied by a plain bureau, wash-stand, and bed belonging to the boys' room, a story higher up. The wisdom of this precaution was manifest in the signs of neglect and slovenliness displayed on all sides. One could have written his name in the dust upon the glass; there was dirt in every corner and under each chair and table; the wash-basin was partly full of dirty suds, and the towels and counterpane shockingly-dingy.

These things were not remarked by the intruders, until they had gotten their charge to bed, resisted no longer by him, for he began to comprehend his inability to help himself.

“There is no one beside ourselves on the premises—not even a servant,” one of them said apart to his associate, after a brief absence from the room. “If you will stay with him until I come back, I will go for a doctor.”

The invalid caught the last word.

“Indeed, Mr. Hammond, there is no need for you to do anything more—no necessity for calling in a physician. I am quite comfortable, now, and shall be well by morning.”

Mr. Hammond—who was a Director in the Bank, and sincerely honored the honest veteran, now prostrated by his devoted performance of duty—took the hot tremulous hand in his.

“I cannot allow you to peril your valuable health, my dear sir. Unless you positively forbid it, I shall not only call your physician, but drop in again myself this evening, and satisfy my mind as to whether you require my presence through the night.”

He was as good as his word; but no amount of persuasion could induce Mr. Hunt to accept his offered watch. He would be “uneasy, unhappy, if his young friend sacrificed his own rest so uselessly,” and loath as he was to leave him to solitude and suffering, Mr. Hammond had to yield. At his morning visit, he found the patient more tractable. After tedious hours of fevered wakefulness, he had endeavored to rise, only to sink back again upon his pillow—dizzy, sick, and now thoroughly alarmed at the state of his system. He did not combat his friend's proposal to obtain a competent nurse, and to look in on him in person as often as practicable; still utterly refused to allow his wife to be written to on the subject of his indisposition.

“I shall be better in a day or two—probably before she could reach me. I have never had a spell of illness. It is not likely that this will be anything of consequence. I greatly prefer that she should not be apprised of this attack.”

Mr. Hammond was resolute, on his part—the more determined, when the physician had paid another visit, and pronounced the malady a low fever, that would, doubtless, confine the sick man to his bed for several days—if not weeks.

“It is not just to your wife and children, Mr. Hunt, to keep them in ignorance of so important a matter!” he urged. “They will have cause to feel themselves aggrieved by you, and ill-treated by me, if we practise this deception upon them.”

Mr. Hunt lay quiet for some minutes.

“Perhaps you are in the right,” he said. “Sarah would be wounded, I know. I will send for her!” he concluded, with more animation. “She will come as soon as she receives the letter.”

“Of course, she will!” rejoined Mr. Hammond, confidently; “you are not able to write. Suffer me to be your amanuensis.” He sat down at a stand, and took out his pen. “Where is Mrs. Hunt, at present?”

“I am not sure. Either at Saratoga or Newport.”

Mr. Hammond looked surprised. “But it is necessary, sir, that we should know with some degree of certainty, or the letter may miscarry. Perhaps it would be well to write to both places.”

“The letter! Both places!” repeated Mr. Hunt, with perplexity. “I alluded to my daughter Sarah, sir—my second child, who is spending the summer with her aunt in Shrewsbury, New Jersey. May I take the liberty of asking you to write her a short note, mentioning my sickness in as guarded terms as you can use, and requesting her to come up to the city for a few days? She has my youngest child—a little girl—with her. If she can be contented to remain with her aunt, Sarah had better leave her there. She would be an additional burden to her sister if she were here."

Whatever Mr. Hammond thought of the marked preference shown to the daughter, above the wife, he said nothing, but proceeded to indite the desired epistle, adding, in a postscript, on his own account, that he would take pleasure in meeting Miss Hunt at the wharf, on her arrival, and for this purpose would be at the boat each day, until she made her appearance in New York.

He went, accordingly, the next afternoon, although very sure that she could not have received his letter in season to take that boat. Mr. Hunt had proved to him and to himself, the utter impossibility of her coming, yet his eyes brightened with expectancy as his friend entered, and faded into sadness as he reported the ill-success of his errand.

"He is evidently extremely partial to this one of his children," thought Mr. Hammond, as he paced the wharf on the second evening, watching, amid noisy hack-drivers and express-men, for the steamer. "I have seen the girls at parties, but do not remember their names. One of them is very pretty. I wonder if she is Sarah!"

It was growing dusk, as the boat touched the pier. So dim was the light, that Mr. Hammond was obliged to station himself close beside the gangway, and inspect the features of each lady-passenger more narrowly than politeness would, in other circumstances, have warranted. They hurried across—men and women, tall and short, stout and slender—until there tripped towards him the figure of a young girl, attired in a gray dress and mantle, and carrying a small travelling-bag in her hand. She would have passed him, had he not stepped forward and spoken.

"Miss Hunt, I believe!"

In the uncertain twilight, he could see that she grew very pale.

"How is my father?"

There was no preamble of civility or diffidence; no reserve in addressing him, a mere stranger; no trembling, preparatory queries: but a point-blank question, in a tone whose impatient anguish moved his kind heart; a piercing look, that would know the truth—then and there!

"He is better, to-day"—and he led her out of the press of the onward stream. "He has not been dangerously ill. We hope and believe that he will not be."

"Is that true?" Her fingers tightened upon his arm.

"It is! I would not, for the world, deceive you in such a matter."

"I believe you! Thank Heaven! I feared the worst!" She covered her face with her hands, and burst into tears.

Hammond beckoned to a hackman, close by, and when the short-lived reaction of overwrought feeling subsided so far as to allow Sarah to notice surrounding objects, she was seated in the carriage, screened from curious or impertinent gazers, and her escort was nowhere to be seen. Several minutes elapsed before he again showed himself at the window.

"I must trouble you for your checks, Miss Hunt, in order to get your baggage."

Already ashamed of her emotion, she obeyed his demand, without speaking.

"You have given me but one," he said, turning it over in his hand.

"That is all, sir."

"Indeed! You are a model traveller! I thought no young lady, in these days, ever stirred from home without half a dozen trunks." To himself, he added, "A sensible girl! An exception to most of her sex, in one thing, at any rate!"

Sarah sat well back into her corner, as they drove up lighted Broadway, and was almost rudely taciturn, while her companion related the particulars of her father's seizure and subsequent confinement to his room. Yet, that she listened with intense interest, the narrator knew by her irregular breathing and immovable attitude. As they neared their destination, this fixedness of attention and posture was exchanged for an eager restlessness. She leaned forward to look out of the window, and when they turned into the last street, quick as was Mr. Hammond's motion to unfasten the door of the vehicle, her hand was first upon the lock. It was cold as ice, and trembled so much as to be powerless. Gently removing it, he undid the catch, and assisted her to alight.

The hired nurse answered their ring, and while Sarah brushed past her, and flew up the stairway, Mr. Hammond detained the woman to make inquiries and issue directions.

"It is all very dreary-like, sir," she complained. "Everything is packed away and locked up. There's no getting at a lump of sugar, without a hunt for the key, and all he's seemed to care for this blessed day, was that his daughter should be made comfortable. He sent me out, this afternoon, to buy biscuits, and sardines, and peaches for her tea, and told me where I'd find silver and china. It is not at all the thing for him to be worrying at such a rate. He'll be the worse for it to-morrow, and so I've told him, Mr. Hammond."

"Perhaps not, Mrs. Kerr. His daughter's coming will cheer him and quiet him, too, I doubt not. I will not go up now. Please present my regards to Mr. Hunt, and say that I will call to-morrow."

He purposely deferred his visit until the afternoon, supposing that Miss Hunt might object to his early and unceremonious appearance in the realms now under her control; nor when he went, did he ascend at once to the sick-chamber, as was his custom before the transfer of its superintendence. Sending up his name by the nurse, he awaited a formal invitation, among the shrouded sofas and chairs of the sitting-room.

"You'll please to walk up, sir!" was the message he received; and the woman subjoined, confidentially, "Things is brighter to-day, sir."

They certainly were. With wonderfully little noise and confusion, Sarah, assisted by the nurse, had wrought an utter change in the desolate apartment. With the exception of the bureau, which had been drawn out of sight into the adjoining dressing-room, and the bedstead, the common, defaced furniture had disappeared, and its place was supplied by more comfortable and elegant articles. The windows were shaded, without giving an aspect of gloom to the chamber; the bed-coverings were clean and fresh; and the sick man, supported by larger and plumper pillows than those among which he had tossed for many weary nights, greeted his visitor with a cordial smile and outstretched hand.

"I thank you for your kind care of my daughter last evening, sir. Sarah, my dear, this is my friend, Mr. Hammond, to whose goodness I am so much indebted."

"The debt is mine no less," was the frank reply, as she shook hands with her new acquaintance. "We can never thank you sufficiently, Mr. Hammond, for all you have done for us, in taking care of him."

"A genuine woman! a dutiful, affectionate daughter!" was now Hammond's comment, as he disclaimed all right to her gratitude.

"None of your sentimental, affected absurdities, with nothing in either head or heart!"

This impression was confirmed by daily observation; for politeness first, then, inclination induced him to continue his "professional" calls, as Sarah styled them. He seemed to divide with her the responsibility of her position. Its duties were onerous; but for this she did not care. She was strong and active, and love made labor light—even welcome to her. A competent cook was inducted into office below-stairs, and household matters went forward with system and dispatch. The eye of the mistress, pro tem., was over all; her hand ever ready to lift her share of the load, yet her attendance at her father's bedside appeared unremitting. His disease, without being violent, was distressing and wearing, destroying sleep and appetite, and preying constantly upon the nerves. To soothe these, Sarah read and talked cheerfully, and often, at his request, sang old-time ballads and childish lullabys to court diversion and slumber.

Occasionally Lewis Hammond paused without the door until the strain was concluded, drinking in the notes with more pleasure than he was wont to feel in listening to the bravuras and startling, astonishing cadenzas that were warbled in his ears by the amateur cantatrices of the "best circles;" then, when the sounds from within ceased, he delayed his entrance some moments longer, lest the songstress should suspect his eaves-dropping. He ceased to speculate upon the reasons of Mrs. Hunt's protracted absence at a time when no true-hearted wife could, from choice, remain away from her rightful post. When, at the expiration of a fortnight from the day of the attack, the physician declared his patient feebly, but surely convalescent, his young friend had decided, to his entire satisfaction, that things were best as they were. Mr. Hunt had made a most judicious selection from the female portion of his family, and what need of more nurses when this one was so efficient and willing? He caught himself hoping that the fussy dame he had met in society would not abridge her summer's recreation on account of an ailing husband. He had designed going to Saratoga himself, for ten days or two weeks; but he was very well. It was difficult to get away from business, and this affair of Mr. Hunt's enlisted his sympathies so deeply, that he could not resolve upon leaving him. If he had never before enjoyed the bliss that flows from a disinterested action, he tasted it now.

Mrs. Hunt was not kept in total ignorance of what was transpiring at home. Sarah had written, cautiously and hopefully, of her father's sickness and her recall; repeating Mr. Hunt's wish that his consort should not hurry back through mistaken solicitude for his health and comfort; and they were taken at their word. A week elapsed before an answer arrived—a lengthy missive, that had cost the writer more pains and time than the preparation for her annual "crush" generally did. She was an indifferent penman, and sadly out of practice; but there was much to be said, and "Lucy, of course, circumstanced as she was, could not spare time to be her scribe."

The significant phrase underscored, quickened Sarah's curiosity; but there was nothing for the next three pages that fed or quieted it. They were filled with minute directions about housewifery—economical details, that would have served as capital illustrations of "Poor Richard's" maxims; injunctions, warnings, and receipts sufficient in quantity to last a young, frugally-disposed housekeeper for the remainder of her natural existence. It was a trial to this exemplary wife and mother, she confessed, to absent herself so long from her home-duties; but circumstances had compelled her stay at Saratoga. Of their nature, Sarah had already been informed in her sister's last letter.

"Which I cannot have received, then—" Sarah interrupted herself to say, as she read to her father: "I have not heard from Lucy in four weeks. I have thought hard of her for not writing."

"But," concluded Mrs. Hunt, "matters looks well just now, and I know your father will agree, when he hears all about our season's work, that our labor and Money has been a good investment. Take care of the keys yourself, Sarah. Be prudent, keep a sharp Look-out on the cook, and don't neglect your Poor father. Your Affectionate mother,

E. HUNT.

"P. S. Your kitchen Girl must have a Great deal of spair Time. Set her to work cleening the House, for you may expect us home in two weeks, or may Less. E. H."

Lucy had slipped a note in the same envelope—a thin, satiny sheet, hardly larger than the little hand that had moved over its perfumed page. Her chirography was very running, very light, very ladylike, and we need not say, very itical.

"Mamma tells me, Sarah dear, that she has given you a hint of how matters are progressing between your humble servant and our particular friend, of whom I wrote in my last. The poor, dear woman flatters herself that it is all her work; but somebody else may have his own opinion, and I certainly have mine. I have had to caution her repeatedly, to prevent her from showing her delight too plainly to my 'Goldfinch,' as Vic. and I have dubbed him. Don't be in a hurry with your congratulations, ma chère. 'There's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip;' and although the season is so near over, I may yet see some one whom I like better than His Highness. Vic. has a bean, too—a rich widower, less fascinating than my devoted; but a very agreeable man, without incumbrance, and very much smitten. So we pair off nicely in our rides and promenades, and, entre nous, are quite the talk. You are a good little thing to nurse papa so sweetly—a great deal better than I am. I told my knight of this proof of your excellence the other day, and he said that it was only what might have been expected from my sister! Don't you feel flattered? Poor fellow! Love is blind, you know.

"Love to papa. I am sorry he has been so unwell. I do not imagine that I shall have time to write again, before we leave this paradise. We will telegraph you when to expect us. Perhaps I may have an escort home—some one who would like to have a private conference with my respected father. Nous verrons!

Lovingly, LUCIE."

Mr. Hunt twisted himself uneasily in his arm-chair, as his daughter, by his desire, reluctantly read aloud the double letter. A shade of dissatisfaction and shame clouded his countenance when she finished, and he sighed heavily.

"I am glad they are still enjoying themselves," said Sarah, forcing a smile. "Lucy has secured a captive too, it appears—one whom she is likely to bring home at her chariot-wheels."

"In my day, daughters were in the habit of consulting their fathers before giving decided encouragement to any admirers—strangers especially," said Mr. Hunt, with displeasure. "In these times, there are no parents! There is the 'old man' and 'the Governor,' who makes the money his children honor him by wasting, and the 'poor, dear woman,' who plays propriety in the belle's flirtations, and helps, or hinders, in snaring some booby 'Goldfinch.' It is a lying, cheating, hollow world! I have been sick of it for twenty years!"

“Father! my dear father!” exclaimed Sarah, kneeling beside him, and winding her arm about his neck. “You misjudge your children, and their love for you!”

“I believe in you, child! I cannot understand how you have contrived to grow up so unlike your sister and your—” The recollection of the respect his daughter owed her mother, checked the word.

“You do not deal fairly with Lucy’s character, father. She has one of the kindest hearts and most amiable dispositions in the world. I wish I had caused you as little anxiety as she has. Remember her obedience and my wilfulness; her gentleness and my obstinacy, and blush at your verdict, Sir Judge!”

She seated herself upon his foot-cushion and rested her chin upon his knee, looking archly up in his face. She was surprised and troubled at this degree of acrimony in one whose habitual manner was so placid, and his judgment so mild; but for his sake, she was resolute not to show her feeling. He laid his hand caressingly upon her shoulder, and sank into a reverie, profound, and seemingly not pleasant.

Sarah took advantage of his abstraction to remove the wrapper of a newspaper, received by the same mail that had brought her letters. The operation was carefully performed, so as not to invite notice, and the envelope laid away in her work-box. She knew well who had traced the clear, bold superscription, and what initials composed the mysterious cipher in one corner of the cover; nor was this the only token of recollection she had from this source. The article marked in the number of the literary journal, he had selected as the medium of correspondence, was an exquisite little poem from an author, whose works Philip had read to her in the vine-covered porch at Shrewsbury. Slowly, longingly she perused it; gathering sweetness from every word, and fancying how his intonations would bring out beauties she could not of herself discover. Then she took out the wrapper again, and studied the post-mark. On the former papers he had sent, the stamp was illegible, but this was easily deciphered—“Albany.”

“So near! He is returning homewards!” was the glad reflection that flooded her face with joy.

“Sarah!” said her father, abruptly. “Do you ever think of marriage?”

“Sir?” stammered the girl, confused beyond measure.

“I mean, have you imbibed your sister’s ideas on this subject? the notions of ninety-nine hundredths of girls in your walk of life. Do you intend to seek a husband, boldly and unblushingly, in all public places? to degrade yourself by practising the arts they understand so well to catch an ‘eligible’ partner, who may repay your insincerity and mercenary views by insult and infidelity—at best, by indifference! Child! you do not know the risk match-making mothers and husband-hunting daughters run; the terrible retribution that may be—that often is in store for such! I had rather see you and your sister dead, than the victims of that most hateful of heartless shows—a fashionable marriage! Poor Lucy! poor Lucy!”

“I hope you are distressing yourself without reason, sir. Mother is not the person to surrender her child to one whose character and respectability are not indisputable. Nor is Lucy sentimental. I do not fear her suffering very acutely from any cause.”

“I grant that. You would be more to be pitied, as an unloved or unloving wife, than she. I tremble for you sometimes, when I think of this chance. My daughter, when you marry, look beyond the outside show. Seek for moral worth and a true heart, instead of dollars and cents!”

“I will, I promise!” said Sarah, her amazement at his earnestness and choice of topics combining to shake her voice and constrain her smile. “But there is time enough for that, father, dear. When the man of heart and worth sues for my poor hand, I will refer him to you, and abide entirely by your decision.”

“Mr. Hammond is down stairs,” said the servant at the door. And Sarah, gathering up her papers, escaped from the room before he entered.

FAVORITES.—“I have ever found,” says a sensible writer, “that men who are really most fond of the society of ladies, who cherish for them a high respect, nay, reverence them, are seldom most popular with the sex. Men of more assurance, whose tongues are lightly hung, who make words supply the place of ideas, and place compliment in the room of sentiment, are the favorites. A true respect for women leads to respectful actions towards them; and respect is usually a distant action, and this great distance is taken by them for neglect and want of interest.”

Most of the shadows that cross our path through life are caused by standing in our own light.

PHAETON; OR, PRIDE MUST HAVE A FALL.

A CLASSICAL EXTRAVAGANZA.

(As proposed to be represented in the Back Drawing Room.)

BY WILLIAM BROUGH.

Characters.

APOLLO (otherwise known as Phœbus, Sol, and by many other aliases), god of music, eloquence, poetry, and the fine arts generally; driver of the chariot of the sun—in fact, the sun himself, and therefore it need hardly be added, a shining character.

PHAETON (his son). Being the son of the sun, he naturally turned out a very grand-son indeed—an aspiring youth, having so great an opinion of himself that he cannot require any more of the author's.

EPAPHUS, the son of Io by Jove! (To avoid the possible suspicion that the author is here indulging in a comparatively harmless form of swearing, he would explain that Io was the mother, Jupiter the father, of the individual described.)

CYCENUS, a friend and relative of Phaeton, who is said by Ovid to have been changed into a swan in the midst of his lamentations for the death of Phaeton. As the present author has modified the fate of his hero, and only badly hurt instead of killing Phaeton, he has, in like manner, spared Cycenus the transformation into a swan, and only made a goose of him.

KURRYKOMON, ostler at the Rising Sun, principally employed in rubbing down the horses of the sun, but occasionally venturing to give a sly rub to their master. As this character is a very unobtrusive one, it is expected to be a great favorite with elderly ladies and gentlemen who like "a quiet rubber."

PROENOS,
JONESERON, } The Public in general, and no-
ROBINSONIDES, } body in particular.

CLYMENE, the mother of Phaeton, who, through the indiscretion of her "small fry," was nearly getting into a "great frizzle."

SCENE I.—The abode of Phaeton. A Classical Interior.

[NOTE. The author has purposely left the description of this scene as vague as possible. An "interior" is easily arranged in any drawing-room, and the manager can consult his own judgment and the resources of the establishment as to what style of furniture may or may not be "classical;" and at the worst, who knows how houses were really furnished at the time when Phaeton lived? The author hereby defies the archæologists!]

PHAETON discovered admiring himself in a mirror.

Phaeton. Thanks, gracious mirror! well, thou'st done thy duty

Phœbus, Apollo! But I am a beauty.

By Sol, my sire!—as Pat would say, "by dad!"

Good looking-glass! I'm a good-looking lad;
Perfect in feature, ditto in complexion,
That's my opinion, after due reflection.

[Puts down glass.

Enter EPAPHUS.

Epaphus. So, Phaeton, you're at it, then, again.

Strange that a youth of sense should be so vain.

Phae. Not so. In sober seriousness—

Epa. Alas!

You sober! No, you're too fond of your glass.

Phae. My friend, these observations are not kind;

I am not vain, but then I am not blind;

Sure I can see it (looks in glass again)—

Epa. That's it, I repeat;

You are blind, made so by your own can-see-it.

Phae. There, that's enough. I know—of course, you're jealous;

It's just the way with all you ugly fellows.

Handsome and witty both I needs must be,

Why, Beauty's Queen herself's in love with me.

Epa. Venus! Pooh, pooh! the ugliest, the most dull can Inflame her fancy. E'en the grimy Vulcan!

With that coarse blacksmith she for life would settle.

Phae. Well, Vulcan you'll admit's a man of metal.

Though with his lungs, like bellows, loud and clamorous,

His amorous wooing we may call sledge-hammerous.

But look at me, and tell me, did you ever

Behold a youth more lovely, witty, clever,

Brave, elegant, accomplished?

Epa. Pshaw! be still;

I'll fight you, race you, swim you, what you will,

To take out this conceit of you.

Phae. Have done!

Dare you in aught compare yourself to one

Of whom the Sun's the father?

Epa. Stuff!

Phae. D'y'e doubt it?
Epa. Not I; I feel quite confident about it,
 Phœbus-Apollo's not your father.
Phae. What?
 I tell you that he is.
Epa. I say he's not.
Phae. Then you're—I won't say what.
Epa. And you're another.
 D'y'e want to quarrel?
Phae. No! I'll tell my mother.
 And here she comes.

Enter CLYMENE.

Clymene. What's all this noise?
Phae. (Crying.) O ma!
 This fellow says Apollo's not my pa.
Cly. The wicked story! Nay, sweet, dry your tears. (To EPAPHUS.)
 And you be off, now, or I'll box your ears;
 How dare you come here, sir, and try to hammer
 Into my poor boy's head that dreadful crammer?
 I'll hammer you.
Epa. Nay, if my courage fails,
 'Tis not fear of your hammer, but your nails;
 Since I've been told no fury you can match
 At bringing folks who vex you to the scratch.

TRIO.

AIR. "The Perfect Cure."

[NOTE. If the saltatory powers of the company are equal to it, and the supply of wind admits of it, the effect of any words sung to this tune is much enhanced by the singers placing their arms straight down by their sides and jumping high in the air on the first note of every bar in the music. The author confesses himself unable to appreciate the wit or humor of this jumping obligato accompaniment: but as it is invariably hailed with roars of laughter when either the original silly song, or any one of the numerous parodies on it, which have been produced on almost every stage is attempted, he supposes there is some recondite joke therein contained of which he would be sorry that the actors in the Theatre, Back Drawing-Room, should lose the benefit.]

TRIO.

Epa. (Jumping.) So I'll not stay to say good day,
Phae. (Jumping.) You'd best not I advise;
Cly. Be off, don't stop. At once, sir, hop,
 If you regard your eyes.
Epa. Those fingers look as if by hook
 Or crook my eyes they'd skewer.
Phae. Preserve your sight, at once take flight,
 Your safety to secure.

Epa. Secure, secure, secure, secure,
 I shan't be here, I'm sure;
 If I don't mind, I soon shall find
 My case beyond a cure.

ENSEMBLE.

Pha. and Cly. Secure, secure, secure, secure,
 You'll not be here, be sure;
 At once then hence, for insolence,
 She knows } a perfect cure.
 I know }

Epa. (Repeating.) Secure, etc. (as before.)

[At the end of the Trio EPAPHUS hops out. CLYMENE hopping after him with threatening gestures, PHAETON indulging in a pas seul, expressing, by means of hopping in a corner by himself, his opinion of the fortunate escape of EPAPHUS from facial disfigurement.]

Cly. (Returning.) I'll serve him out yet, sure as any gun,
 To try to take the shine out of my son.
 To dare to say you're not the son of Phœbus!
Phae. Calm yourself, mother, "modus est in rebus;"
 That I'm the son of Sol full well I know;
 I am so bright myself it must be so.
 But how to prove this glorious birth of mine;
 Speak, mother. Can you not suggest some sign?
Cly. A sign! O! yes—that of "The Rising Sun."
 Sign of the house he starts from. Thither run,
 And seek your father—early in the morning.
 Tell him base slanders have your birth been scorning.
Phae. I'll hasten there. No more shall men deride me.
 You glorious ray, the road to take, shall guide me.
 Bright ray of far-off Sol, look down on me.
 Do, ray. I may add, "Me, far Sol, ah! see."
Cly. Sol far, so good. Excuse pronunciation.
 You've called up a sol-fa association.
 Sol, father of my boy! Sol, farther yet
 Than e'er—
Phae. Pooh! pooh! Try a sol-fa duet!

DUET.

AIR—"I'm off to Charlestown."

Phae. I'll seek the town where Sol resides, Where'er that town may be.
Cly. It's in the East. I know, at least,
 The postal district's E.
Phae. I'll there arrive, before to drive
 His stage-coach he sets out.

Cly. "The Rising Sun," from whence they run,

You'll find, I've little doubt.

Phae. I'm off to Sol's town
Early in the morning;
I'm off to Sol's town
Before the break of day.

Cly. Well, give my respects to Your father with the yellow curls.

Phae. I'm off to Sol's town.

Cly. I've nothing more to say. } Together.

Pha. You've nothing more to say? }
[Exeunt severally.]

SCENE II.—Atrium, pertaining to the Palace of the Sun, otherwise known as the stable-yard of the old original coaching-house, "The Rising Sun."

[NOTE.—To represent this scene without lavish outlay, it may be—the author would rather not endanger his reputation for knowledge of mise en scène by saying that it is—sufficient to have a board resembling a tavern sign placed over a door, if there be a door available; if not, projecting from the side where a door may be supposed to exist, though out of sight. On the board should be painted the words, "The Rising Sun. Good accommodation for Man and Horse." (If a pictorial representation of sunrise can be conveniently added, so much the better.) A placard should be exhibited in some portion of the scene, bearing the inscription, "Daily Excursion round the World! The celebrated fast four-horse coach, THE SUN, leaves this office every morning."]

Enter KURRYKOMON, the ostler.

Kur. I really never saw a team so nobby! I've seen all sorts of horses, from the hobby Up to the race-horse; but these spanking tits Of Mr. Phœbus beats all into fits. Not Rarey's self could tame them, if he tried. The air they breathe, I'm told, is Rarey-fied. The work they do each day, too! I declare, Right round the world, and never turn a hair. They never tire. Fresh with each morning's dawn,
They keep on running, like "The Colleen Bawn."
And then their speed! 'Twould beat, when at their full run,
A certain army's at certain Bull fun.
We feed them on chopp'd lightning, nicely stewed,
And give them for their drink electric fluid.

Enter APOLLO.

Ap. Now, ostler, are my steeds all ready?

Kur. Quite.

Ready to start, your honor.

Ap. That's all right.

Kur. Shall I go bring them out?

Ap. (Looking at watch.) No, not just yet. I've lots of time to write out that duet I've just composed.

Kur. What! are you then a dabbler In music, too, sir?

Ap. Am I what? Vile babbler! Shall I submit to this low peasant's sneers? I, who conduct the music of the spheres! Know I'm the god of music, fellow.

Kur. Be you?

I only know you as a first-rate Jehu.

Ap. I! Of mankind the musical instructor.

Kur. So then you're both a driver and conductor.

Then you could work a 'bus cheap, Mr. Phœbus.

Ap. This fellow thinks but de "omnibus" rebus!

I drive my team, and sing meanwhile.

Kur. Yes, sir.

I see, a sort of warbling wagoner.

Ap. Leave me.

Kur. I'm gone, sir. [Exit.]

Ap. Well, he's not far wrong.

I do combine the driver's art with song.

I am the warbling wagoner. No doubt of it.

I don't see the least chance of getting out of it.

Song.

Air—"The Jolly Wagoner."

I not alone go wagoning,
As wagoning folks go.
I fill the people's heads full
Of deathless song also,
And curious are the changes
Through which my two trades go.
"Gee up, my lads: gee woa."
Then "Do, re, mi, fa, do."
A curious combination
Is the warbling wagoner.

Phae. (Outside.) Ho! House here! Landlord! Hi! Where are you all?

[Enters.]

Ap. That's somewhat loud, sir, for a morning call.

So early, too. It's not yet time to rise.

Phae. Mighty Apollo, I apollo-gize.

Ap. Your name and business here? Speak, sir.

Phae. I will.

My name is Phaeton. On yonder hill My mother mends my socks. A worthy dame, Whose constant care is to increase my fame, And keep her only son, myself, a swell.

For I had heard of fashions, and—

Ap. Well—well.

Go on. Your story.

Phae. And I longed to follow
The peg-top trouser, and the all-round collar.

Ap. What is all this to me?

Phae. Nay, hear me, though.
My mother's name 's Clymene.

Ap. Say you so?
Come to my arms, my son—my boy—my treasure.

Embrace your father.

Phae. With the greatest pleasure.

[They embrace.]

Ap. What can I do for you?

Phae. I crave one favor.
There 's Epaphus, an insolent young shaver,
The son of Io, swears I 'm not your son.

Ap. That son of Io 'll find I owe him one.
How shall I punish him?

Phae. Not that I need.

I wish to prove I am your son, indeed.

Ap. Ask any proof you will—whate'er you choose.

I swear by Styx your boon I 'll not refuse.
That oath which even Jove himself would bind.
So now your wish make klymene.

Phae. You 're very kind.
Then, if I am your son, allow me, pray,
To guide the sun's bright chariot for a day.

Ap. Not that—not that. Ask any boon but that,

You stupid boy. You know not what you 're at.
You drive my chariot! None but I can do it.
In all Olympus there 's none equal to it.
The giddy height would turn your head. Less hope

For you there 'd be than if on Blondin's rope,
Or Leotard's trapeze. Nay—fate defend us!
Boucicault ne'er took "header" so tremendous

As you 'd take to the earth, if this you try on;

And there, like Boucicault, you 'd be a Dyin'.*

Phae. Never say die! Pshaw! who 's afraid? not I!

None know what they can do until they try;
Where there 's a will there is a way.

Ap. Not so.
If you 've your will you 'll lose your way, I know;

Your landmark 's gone, too late you 'll find you 've missed 'em

Amidst the turnings of the solar system;
While 'mongst the asteroids you 'll get astray,
And skim the cream off all the milky way.

* If the eminent tragedian playing Apollo can oblige by making the word "dying" sound anything like Mr.
Dion Boucicault's Christian name, the author will estimate it a favor.

Phae. Fear not for me, do you but grant my boon.

Skim off the cream! D 'ye take me for a spoon?
Come, let me mount the dickey.

Ap. O my oath!
I feel 'twill be all dickey with us both;
But since by Styx I 've sworn your prayer to grant—

Phae. The Styx I sticks to, so refuse you can't;
Come, let 's be off; give me the whip—

Ap. Alack!
Would I could give it you about your back,
To flog this notion out of you.

Phae. Old chap,
Will you be good enough to call your trap?
And shut up your potato one meanwhile.

[Takes whip from APOLLO.]

Ya-hup! my beauties! go it! that 's your style!

DEBT.

AIR.—"Dirie's Land."

Phae. Come, bring out the trap there, look alive!

It 's all right, gov'nor, I can drive,
Four in hand, four in hand, four in hand,
four in hand!

Ap. Well, the only rule I 've to prescribe, is In the road, "medio tutissimus ibis."
Understand? understand? understand?
understand?

Phae. All right, my bricksy-wicksy.

Ap. Oh! oh! oh!
Such confidence
Shows want of sense,
My steeds you 'll find are tricksy.

Phae. Well in hand, well in hand
I 'll keep them, as you 'll quick see.

Ap. Mind though, my son, the counsel I 've bestowed,

Be sure you keep the middle of the road;
"Medio ibis," as I said before,
"Tutissimus."

Phae. Oh! don't be an old bore.

Ap. He won't hear reason; oh, my vow so rash!

I know 'twill be an awful case of smash.
(Calling.) Ostler, bring out the steeds! It may be they

Are quieter than usual, p'r'aps, to-day,
To hope so I 'll at any rate endeavor.

(To OSTLER, who enters.)

How do they seem this morning?

Kur. Worse than ever.

One rears, one kicks, one prances, 'tother jibs,
And all their nostrils going off like squibs.

Ap. Hear that, my son, and pause in time.

Phae. Not I!

Come, ostler! time's up! now then!

(Holding up his whip in the style of omnibus drivers.) Sky! sky! sky!

[Exit, followed by OSTLER.

Ap. (Following.) Stay, Phaeton, let me come with you.

Phae. (Outside.) No!

Ap. To show the way.

Phae. (Outside.) I'll find it. Right! Let go!

[Cracking of whip outside.

Ap. They're off! The boy'll be killed; the rash young dunce!

I'll go and write his funeral dirge at once.

[Exit.

SCENE III.—The open country without the city gates.

[NOTE.—Under ordinary circumstances the introduction of a classical landscape scene in a drawing-room theatre might be attended with some slight difficulty: fortunately, however, for our purpose, we find the scene in the original legend described as above, "The open country without the city gates." Had it been "with" the city gates, there might be some carpentering needed; but as it is expressly stated to be "without" them, there are of course no gates required. As to the nature of the landscape itself, we find it is to be the "open" country. It can therefore safely be left an open question.]

ENTER Cygnus and Clymene.

Cygnus. Phaeton's not returned, you say?

Clymene. He's not.

Cyc. Doesn't it strike you that it's very hot?

Cly. Uncommonly so for the time of year.

Cyc. It's getting hotter, too; my stars!

(Fanning himself.)

Cly. Oh, dear! (Fanning herself.)

Cyc. Confound it! What's the matter? I'm half roasted.

Cly. No reigning beauty ever was so toasted.

Cyc. Hotter and hotter still; 'tis most amazing.

Cly. It's scorching, really.

Cyc. Scorching, ma'am, it's blazing.

Cly. Get me some water; quick! from yonder stream.

Cyc. (Looking off.) Horror! the brook has all gone off in steam;

Let's seek some shelter.

Cly. That, too, my advice is.

[They are going, but are met by BROUNOS, who runs against them.

Brounos. Which is the nearest shop for penny ices?

Cyc. Can't say. We're pressed for time. Get from our path.

[They are going again. JONESERON meets them.

Joneseron. Can you direct me to the nearest bath?

Cyc. No.

[Once more attempting to go. ROBINSONIDES rushes in.

Robinsonides. Horror!

Cyc. Well, what now, may I inquire?

Rob. Some one has been and set the Thames on fire.

Cyc. Dolt! no one knows as yet the Thames's whereabouts.

Rob. Pshaw! it's too hot geography to care about:

Some river's blazing—

Cly. Let your wonder cease;

It may well burn, since 'tis some stream of Greece.

But who comes here? Sure I should know that figure.

Enter EPAPHUS, with his face black.

Epa. See here, the heat has scorched me to a nigger,

Burned black, like o'er-baked bread.

Cyc. Quick, let's be takin'

Shelter, in hopes that we may save our bakin'.

Cly. But what has caused this universal stewing?

Enter KURRYKOMON, the ostler of the Rising Sun.

Kur. Your son, young Phaeton, it's all his doing;

You and your friends are frizzled up alive, 'Cause he the chariot of the sun would drive.

Cly. What mean you?

Kur. Well, at starting he was bid
To light the earth, and in one sense he did—

He's set it blazing.

Cyc. How?

Kur. Why, like a bonfire;

He came too nigh, and so he set it on fire.

The horses bolted, and he missed the road.

He call'd out "woa!" the horses never "woa'd,"

But through the sky went on a regular crash, Knocking the stars and planets into smash.

Cly. Where is he now?

Kur. Still in the trap.

Cly. No doubt of it;

Some trap he's fall'n in.

Kur. Well, he'll soon fall out of it.

Cly. Alas! that thought my terror but increases.

Kur. I've been sent here just to pick up the pieces.

'Twill be a sad drop for him.

Cly. That last drop

My cup of misery fills.

Phae. (Calling outside.) Woa, boys, there! stop! [*A crash* outside.*]

Cly. 'Tis he! it's all up. [Exit.]

Kur. Not so, it's all down. [Exit.]

Epa. Through me, who am done black, he's thus done brown.

[PHAETON is brought in by CLYMENE, CYCNS, and KURRYKOMON. He is suffering severely from a large dab of red paint upon his forehead, supposed to represent a wound, a handkerchief bound round his eye below the hair, suggestive of compound fracture of the tibia, with other indications of personal injury.]

Enter APOLLO.

Phae. Pardon me, Phœbus; I'm alone in fault.

Ap. Stop! (you're so lame I needn't bid you halt!)

You've had the lesson that you much required;
To more than mortal could you aspired;

You'd soar above the earth—in skies a rover—

Phae. Don't talk of soaring, I am sore all over.

Ap. I'll not. One lesson only I would teach,
Let man aspire to all that man can reach.

"Ne sutor ultra crepidam." That's all.

Bound your desires, or PRIDE MUST HAVE A FALL.

NOTE—Most of our readers are familiar with the story of Phaeton and Phœbus; but as some may have left school and their classical reading long enough to forget it, we insert the following note from Bretton's Dictionary of Universal Information. "Phaeton, according to Ovid, a son of the sun, or Phœbus. Venus became enamored of him, and intrusted him with the care of one of her temples. This favor of the goddess rendered him vain, and led to his asking his father's permission to drive his chariot for one day. Phœbus represented the dangers to which this would expose him, but in vain; he undertook the aerial journey, and the explicit directions of his father were forgotten. No sooner had Phaeton received the reins, than he betrayed his ignorance of guiding the chariot. The flying horses became sensible of the confusion of their driver, and immediately departed from their usual track. Phaeton repented too late of his rashness, and already heaven and earth were threatened with a universal conflagration, when Jupiter, who had perceived the disorder of the horses, struck the rider with a thunderbolt, and hurled him headlong from heaven into the river Po. His body, consumed by fire, was found by the nymphs of the place."

* A very effective "crash" may be produced by means of a tea-tray, on which are placed any little articles, such as flatirons, hotjacks, candlesticks, kitchen pokers, a scufflet of coals, and in fact anything that may suggest itself. The whole being thrown down upon an uncarpeted floor at the right moment, will produce an effect which, if not pleasing, will at any rate be startling—the chief end to be aimed at in these days of "sensational" dramas. If it be objected that the noise produced by these means will not be like that of a chariot breaking down, it will, at least, be quite as like as the usual "crash" of regular theatres, where a magnified policeman's rattle does duty for the breaking down of stone walls, wooden fences, iron gates, carriages, chairs, tables, anything, no matter how various in size or material.

SCARLET POPPIES.

BY ENUL.

WELL the slumb'rous flowers become her!

Like a dusky Indian summer

Looked she with their scarlet petals in the blackness of her hair,

As its heavy masses drifted

O'er the perfect arm she lifted,

While the mellow autumn sunlight lit her sumptuous beauty there.

But no hueless words may render

All the deep and liquid splendor—

All the oriental softness of those sleepy-lidded eyes;

Did those parted red lips ever

With a woman's sorrow quiver?

Was that bosom ever shaken with the tempest of her sighs?

No! some breathless eye hath found thee,

With the purple shadows round thee,

In a stierless tropic forest, hushed within a lonely dream.

Thou art Night, superb and lonely,

Crowned with humid blossoms only;

Or the warm and dusky naiad of some sleepy tropic stream.

Not for thee are care and duty;

In the noon-time of thy beauty

Thou shouldst be the young sultana of a swarthy Indian king,

And through fragrant gardens darkling

See the silvery fountains sparkling,

While the languid summer fans thee with her slowly passing wing.

SONNET.

BY MRS. A. M. BUTTERFIELD.

I EVER knew thou must depart from me.

That while my life was at the full high tide,

Thine own was ebbing to the far-off sea.

And so I kept me closely by thy side,

And strove with clinging arms to hold thee back;

Till thou like a sad mist didst glide away,

Leaving the bare waste sands of life's dull track

Stretching their gloom beneath the noontide ray,

O'er which my thoughts, like mournful sea-bird's flight,

Must wheel and circle restless evermore;

Mourning the day that took thee from my sight,

Living thy words and gentle kindness o'er,

Until within the vast and mighty main,

The parted streams shall mingle once again.

CROSS PURPOSES.

December 7th. We were six days in getting to Havana, and it was not until Tuesday at twelve M. that we entered the harbor. The last two days I spent almost entirely with Mr. Domine. He read, talked, and walked with me, and I became as well acquainted with him as I would have done in six months in the city. Of Mr. Grantley I saw but little; to my surprise, he and Mrs. Ellis were hardly ever together.

And now I might have preferred to drop Mr. Domine, but with singular infatuation I still kept up my flirtation, and at length Mr. Grantley hardly noticed me at all. Tuesday night I went to bed in such a maze of doubt and uncertainty, trying to fix some plan of action in my head, that at last I concluded to leave all to fate and abide by the consequences.

The last thing we heard on retiring was that we would reach Havana at midnight, but would anchor just outside the harbor till morning, as no vessels were allowed to enter after sunset or before sunrise. I slept soundly till six, and then was awakened by music from one of the neighboring vessels. The sweet notes of a French horn came wafting airily over the water a plaintive little melody, so slow, so harmonious that I thought to myself of “Minute drops of rain,

    Ringing in water silverly,
That, lingering, dropped and dropped again,
Till it was almost like a pain
    To listen when the next would be.”

As the last note died away, I rose, and, dressing quickly, hurried up on deck.

My first feeling was one of thankfulness for the danger past: then I looked around me; there was the Moro rising out of the sea and towering high above the surrounding landscape. Its time-worn walls and frowning battlements, and the bold surf, dashing and breaking at its base, thrilled me with its grandeur; there it has stood for ages commanding the entrance to the beautiful harbor, and guarding the quaint old city of Havana. I turned to look on my other side, at the queer, one-story houses, painted blue, yellow, and all the colors of the rainbow, and at the palm-trees, whose large, solid trunks, looking as if they were swathed in canvas, reached to a great height ere they branched forth. There, too, was the cocconut, similar to the palm, except the trunk, which is more like our own trees. The luxuriant vegetation so beautifully green, the blue water and bluer sky, formed a perfect picture of fairy-land.

We had to land in row-boats (as the vessels are not allowed to come up to the dock), and it is really a hazardous undertaking to get into one, for the steps down the vessel's side are of the shakiest description and almost perpendicular. We all went safely down except Mrs. Grantley, who was last; she would accept of no one's help, and as she stepped into the boat, her ankle turned and she fell forward. Mr. Grantley helped her up in a minute, but she had hurt her ankle severely, and was in great pain. If it had not been for my anxiety on her account, I should have been much alarmed in the boat, for there was quite a breeze blowing, and the Spanish sailors didn't seem to agree about the manner of sailing it; and were frantically gesticulating and screaming at each other all the way. Two or three times I involuntarily caught Mr. Domine's arm as he sat next me, when the boat was lying way over on her side, and the spray dashing in our faces.

However, we landed safely, and leaving to the rest of the party the delightful (?) custom-house squabbling, Mr. Grantley put his mother and me into a “volante,” and the old negro driver soon trotted us to the hotel, which was just outside the city proper.

For a week I did not leave the house. Mrs. Grantley was obliged to lie on a couch, and could not move. She preferred my being with her to any one else, although she tried not to keep me, as she was afraid I wanted to be off with the others, who were “sight-seeing” from morning till night; but I assured her it was a pleasure to me to be with her and wait upon her; so at last she consented.

Every afternoon, at four, I wheeled her couch into the adjoining parlor. The first afternoon I did so, Mr. Grantley brought Mr. Domine in to see his mother. While we were having a cosy, cheerful time, Mrs. Ellis came running in. After nodding to us all, she commenced explaining to Mr. Grantley, in a very excited manner, something about the “Serro,” “Harry,” and Eugene tumbling from a volante. What would she do, should she go to him? And by this time she had gradually led him out of the room.

I looked at Mrs. Grantley, and she at me, and then she said to Mr. Domine—

"Can you explain that tableau?"

"Very easily, my dear madam. Harry took Eugene out riding with him; he behaved very well going, and Harry left him with the driver while he went on an errand to the house; it seems that, as Harry vanished, Eugene insisted upon getting into the "volante" again, and jumping in and out he at length fell."

"I hope he was not hurt, Edouard?"

"No; he fell on the grass, and after a little fit of screaming, he was at length induced to sit between Harry and me. And that is how I came here, and also the cause of pretty Mrs. Ellis's excitement."

"Is your name Edward too, Mr. Domine?"

I said; "and who is Harry?"

"Didn't you know that it was, Laura?" said Mrs. Grantley; "they were both named for my father."

"I am always called Edouard, however, in compliment to my first nurse, I suppose, as she was the first to 'Frenchify' my name," said Mr. Domine. "As for Harry, he is my brother. And now, as I see you ladies are satisfied, I have brought you a book, which I hope will serve to lessen the tediousness of your confinement."

"You are very kind, Edouard; but you will have to add to the obligation by coming to read to us," said Mrs. Grantley.

I looked at Mr. Domine to see if he would consent; he met my look, and we both smiled.

So it was arranged, and every day punctually at four he came, almost always bringing flowers or bonbons. It was delightful to hear him read, his voice was so rich and clear, and after an hour's reading he regularly closed the book, and then we talked about what he had read, or on any other topic that happened to interest us. That would have been a happy time if I had never known Mr. Grantley; but that was my trial. And now everything around me seemed so mysterious; Mrs. Ellis was gone, and Mr. Grantley was away on his mother's business. Unfortunately for me, I saw him leave with Mrs. Ellis, and Mr. Domine went part of the way with them too; then Mr. and Miss Gardner had taken Mary Henry and gone to stay a week with some friends. I suspected Mary had an attachment for Mr. Gardner, and was sure that he had for her; but she went away without explaining anything, so that was another mystery. Mrs. Grantley could have solved them all; but I did not like to talk about her son to her, and indeed she never made him the subject of conversation.

One afternoon we were waiting as usual for Mr. Domine; Mrs. Grantley was getting better very fast; she had walked a few steps that day for the first time. After fixing her comfortably on her lounge, I looked at my watch, and found it was near four. Walking up to the window, I watched the people going by. I felt so sure of seeing Mr. Domine that I stood there for several minutes expecting to hear him enter the room; but the clock ticked away on the mantel, and struck the half hour.

"Come here, Laura," said Mrs. Grantley. "I want to tell you something."

I took my knitting, and drew a chair up to her couch.

"Did you ever think Mary Henry fancied, Mr. Gardner?"

"Indeed," I said, "Mary had never spoken of Mr. Gardner to me except in general terms; still I had thought that she cared for him. By noticing closely her manner, I found she was more attentive when he spoke to her, and hardly ever looked at him."

"If that is any proof of love, I should not think Edouard was in love with you; and yet the other night he told me he admired you more than any woman he had ever met; and he has seen a good deal of life for his years."

"I am so sorry you told me, Mrs. Grantley."

"You are a singular child, Laura. Any other girl would have been pleased. However, I'll not repeat any more of his rhapsodies. I am afraid he is not coming this afternoon; so you will be better able to appreciate my news."

"News!" I said. "It is a charity to tell me news. The world and all the people here seem to be stagnating. I am all curiosity."

"I know of two intended marriages, two weeks from to-day, here in Havana."

"Why," I said, "that is the day before we sail."

"Just so; and that is the very reason they are to be married. One I am not allowed to mention yet; and the other you must guess."

"I will guess both, Mrs. Grantley. One is Mary and Mr. Gardner; the other, Mrs. Ellis and—"

"Not another word, Laura. I'm afraid you will extract the secret from me. Ah! there comes Edouard, now."

Instead of Mr. Domine, it was a note from him, and to me, requesting to see me alone that evening. I handed the note to Mrs. Grantley.

"Well, what will you do?"

I said I would do as she thought best.

"Did I have any objection to see him?" she asked.

I thought of the other marriage, the one she would not tell me. Not for an instant did I doubt whose it was; and so I said I would see him.

Evening came at last. All the afternoon I had pondered on how I would act, and I resolved that henceforth I would never think of Mr. Grantley again, but consider him the husband of Mrs. Ellis. Hereafter that love of mine, that he had never asked for and did not want, was to be uprooted and flung away to the winds. How weak! how childish I had been! What a foolish fancy to waste my heart on a man who had never cared a rushlight for me! Others had loved me; why could I not have pleased him? They had raved about my beauty. What good was a pretty face and wavy hair when he did not admire them? They said I was intelligent, and that I sang like a bird. He did not care to talk with me, nor listen to my music. Truly, that afternoon, injured pride drove away all other feelings, and I really thought that all love for Edward Grantley had perished.

I sat upon the sofa waiting. Every footfall sent the blood bounding through my veins. My cheeks glowed with excitement. I could not have endured it much longer, when the door opened and shut. I sat frozen to my seat; I could not move. He came slowly along; he sat down by me on the sofa; he spoke. It aroused me at once. He only said something about "my being kind to have seen him;" but the shock had come and gone; I could feel once more. I tried to commence a commonplace remark, but he stopped me.

"I could not come again to you, Laura. I could not hear you call me Mr. Domine so coldly, so formally, while my whole being was wrapped in love for you! Ah! you know it. You have seen it all along, even from the first time I met you. So I trusted to-night to know all—to be released from the agony of suspense—this restless craving to know my fate! Dear Laura, can you love me? Tell me! Will you love me?"

I looked up in his eyes. They shone like bright stars; his teeth were firmly set; he sat expectant, waiting for my answer.

"Would I love him?" The soft air, fragrant with sweets, stole gently through the room; the cold moonlight shimmered on the floor; not a sound broke the cold silence which numbed my heart. "Would I love him?"

Suddenly a laugh rang out on the silence.

I knew it well. It was Mr. Grantley come back—come back from his intended bride—come from her soft caress and lingering kiss.

"Dearest, you will love me!" Edouard bent down and took my hand. It remained in his, and I had promised to be his wife.

Dec. 18th. All the next week was devoted to "sight-seeing;" Edouard Domine, my affianced husband, accompanying Mrs. Grantley and myself.

After bidding Mr. Domine good-night, I went and sat down by Mrs. Grantley's couch, and told her all. She said Edouard must write to uncle, and I must write too. And then she put her arms around me, and kissed and blessed me.

I retired to my room; but no blessed sleep visited my eyes. The excitement over, the wrong I had done to one who had been all goodness and truth to me, remained staring me in the face, and my overburdened conscience clamored loudly for relief. Still I might have conquered myself; but I had gone too far; and now all I could do was to try and love the one I had chosen, and make him happy.

After I had left, Mrs. Grantley must have told her son all; for the next morning, happening to meet him in the hall, I would have hurried past with a bow, but he stopped me, and said he was going away again in an hour. It was truly unfortunate now we were ready to go about with him, that business interfered; but "I leave you in good hands, Miss Laura; and Mr. Domine will fill my place with better satisfaction."

Here he bent down, and his voice sank into a low whisper which just reached my ear:

"I pray the good God to bless you, and make you happy with the one you have chosen."

He had-gone! But the low tones and trembling hand were still with me. I could not understand it. Had he really liked me so well as a friend, to be so strangely moved at what he had heard? I might have gone on wondering; but Mrs. Grantley called to know if I was ready, and I hurried to her.

We went to the Cathedral; the Captain General's Palace. And every afternoon Edouard called in a carriage for us, and we went out riding on the "Serro," which is the afternoon drive of the ladies. (They never walk, and the "Serro" takes the place of a Broadway.) While driving along, admiring the scenery, we were, at the same time, much amused by the extreme "toilettes" of the Havanese. They looked so odd in their singular "Volantes," all dressed as if for a ball, some of them exceedingly pretty, and others quite the reverse.

One evening we went to the "Bishop's Garden," just a pleasant drive from the city. Edouard insisted upon our getting out of the carriage, and we were well repaid; for he took us through long avenues of palms, so long indeed that, looking down from their entrances, we could not discover their end. Then he gathered us gorgeous bouquets of flowers. The house and grounds had long been deserted; but their decay only heightened the picturesqueness of the scene. Mosses covered the walls of the building, and when the dilapidated roof had fallen in branched forth a beautiful tree. What pleased me most were the clumps of canes—such a curious growth of trunks, so thickly woven together, and their light and graceful foliage.

I scarcely ever saw Mr. Domine alone. Occasionally we met in the parlor of an evening, and then he seemed perfectly contented. Sitting by me on the sofa, he would talk of his plans for the future, in all of which I was the central object. He spoke of his only brother, Harry, who was now confined to the house convalescent from a fever, and of a very pretty woman to whom he was going to be married; and he was sure I would like them both.

He was not in the least demonstrative, and never embarrassed me with kisses and caresses. Once or twice when he left me, he raised my hand to his lips, and left his eyes to say the rest. He repeated poetry, and sang for me. Although he was excessively proud and impulsive, yet I never had a thought of fear on account of his passionate temperament. I rather think it flattered my pride to see him so mild and calm with me—so dignified and unbending to others. He overwhelmed me with presents; and, being wealthy, they were always rare and costly.

One evening, two or three days before we started, he came in, his face beaming with pleasure at finding me alone. Truly, as I watched him, my heart smote me with my falsehood. To see him so devoted to me, and the little return I made, so worked on my feelings, that I rose to meet him, and gave him my hand. He held it a moment, and then placed in it a letter. It was from my uncle; very kind, and giving his full permission to the marriage.

After I had finished reading the letter, he slipped a glittering diamond on my finger, and said:

"Is not this the crowning of our happiness, dearest? Now I may accompany you back to New York?"

I murmured consent.

"How glorious it will be to go home on the sea, when I may walk the deck with you, and pour in your ear my overflowing love; where we will have no fear, for, if aught happened, surely we would die together; and the next best thing to living together is to die together. Oh, Laura, when I think of other women I have fancied I loved, how far superior you are to them all! How far above me in your youthful dignity and merry heart."

"A merry heart!" I echoed it silently. "You must not flatter me, Edouard," I said. "You will make me vain."

"Oh, Laura, how foolish to speak thus. You cannot help knowing your beauty, and you should be glad to hear it from me."

I saw he was rather excited, much more so than usual. I did not, therefore, stay very long with him, but made some excuse to leave. He did not attempt to detain me, although he looked disappointed; so I leaned over his chair, and gently brushed his hair off his temples. Then he threw his arm around my waist, and pressed kiss upon kiss on my lips. I struggled to release myself; for my gentle feelings were all gone, and a bitter feeling of dislike crept in their place. The door opened, and some one looked in. Edouard released me; the door shut again; but we were still alone.

I was not so excited by the whole occurrence as I would have been, had I known who had been witness of it. It seemed as if, at every step in my hateful courtship, I should be rendered miserable by the inopportune appearance of one I never wanted to see again.

I coolly told Edouard that I did not admire his savage way of embracing, begged that in future I might be spared the repetition of such a scene, and that the public parlor of a hotel should have been the last place for such an exhibition.

I was not only annoyed, but really angry. And, as we were to sail in two days, I spent the time in packing, and helping Mrs. Grantley. Not once did I see Edouard alone; although I had made up my mind that I was foolish to give way to my temper, and that I might as well make it up. Strange to say, he took my coolness in the way I least expected: there was no eagerness on his part for a reconciliation. He treated me with the same marked politeness. I was constantly in the society of Mr. Grantley, on account of our approaching departure; and I observed Edouard watched us both very closely.

January 1st. To-day was our last in Havana, and the day of the weddings. After dinner, Mrs. Grantley asked me to come and fix some black lace that she wanted to wear in her hair; and while I was sewing, she said:

"Well, Laura, I suppose Mrs. Ellis and Mary are very happy persons?"

"They should be," I said; "for they have selected fine and noble-hearted men to be their companions for life in this weary world. I know no men for whom I have greater respect than for Mr. Gardner and Mr. Grantley."

"You mean Mr. Domine. Indeed, Laura, you will have to like Mrs. Ellis now. I used to think you did not fancy her. She thought so too, and advised Edouard not to tell you of the near relation she would soon be."

"My relation! You speak in riddles, Mrs. Grantley. And I must be uncommonly dull to-night, for upon my life I cannot see how Mrs. Ellis's marriage with Mr. Grantley can affect either Edouard Domine or me."

"What are you saying about Mrs. Ellis and Edward Grantley? Why, child, Mrs. Ellis marries Harry Domine, Edouard's brother, to-night; and she has been engaged for a year."

"You cannot mean what you say. Mr. Grantley loves her, and she him. Why, then, does she not marry him? Why is she forced to marry another? Why doesn't Mr. Grantley prevent it? Where have they been this long time together? Oh, Mrs. Grantley, you must stop it—it will break his heart!"

"Now, Laura, do not get excited. And for pity's sake let me explain what you do not seem to know anything about. Mrs. Ellis's property was left in a rather embarrassed state, and to Edward she took all her troubles. He is guardian to her son, and has been a kind friend to her—nothing more. When they were away together, as you term it, Edward had taken her part of the way to Harry's home, where he lay sick of a fever. She is a warm-hearted little woman, and truly loving Harry, she risked the contagion, and went to nurse him. She wanted to surprise you; so she told Edouard not to tell you whom his brother was to marry. As for Edward Grantley loving Mrs. Ellis, that is a singular idea to come from you, Laura; for he never loved but one woman in his life, and that one was yourself."

"Loved me," I murmured, "loved me!" The room sped around me, the chairs and tables laughed with glee, they sang, the wind sang, the rattling carriages sang; and the burden of their song was "loved me—loved me!"

I must have fallen into a kind of trance; for when I awoke, a servant-maid was pulling my sleeve, and telling me it was time to dress. I got up, and, going to Mrs. Grantley's closet, I poured out a glass of wine, which I swallowed. Then bathing my face, and never stopping an instant to think, I dressed, and went down stairs. The carriage was waiting; we got in and drove to the church. I do not remember much that happened. I seemed as in a dream; and after the party had returned home and were all in high glee in the parlor, I apologized, left the room, and immediately retired. Alas! not to sleep, but to repeat those words, so full of lost happiness—"He loved me!"

Jan. 4th. Instead of going directly home, we went over to New Orleans. I was not seasick, but heart-sick, and never left my stateroom till we reached the "Belize."

The rest of the party, I believe, had a delightful time. And now, sitting on deck and watching the plantations as we pass up the Mississippi, they are talking and laughing away, all in exuberant spirits.

Edouard and I are sitting together a little apart from the others. I am not well yet. My sickness opened my eyes to all that had been passing around me. I could see that Mrs. Ellis had guessed my secret. Being attached to Edouard, and knowing how his happiness depended on me, she had resolutely kept from me her marriage, which would have explained all, and saved me from so much sorrow. From Mrs. Grantley I had learned that her son had truly loved me; but that from the first time he had seen Edouard and me together, he foresaw the end; and when he learned our engagement, gave me up forever. All these things were explained, and many more that had been mysteries to me.

There was but one thing to do: to forget Mr. Grantley, and devote myself entirely to Edouard—to try through life to make his happiness, and so secure my own. It was hard to do, but it might have been harder. I admired and appreciated his character, and loved him as a brother. I felt I could not fail to be calmly happy as his wife. Strange as it may appear, it suited Edouard's character better to love the most; and I am quite sure he preferred me as I was, than if I had been as eager and passionate as himself. I did not know whether I ought to tell Edouard of my love for Mr. Grantley, or not. Duty seemed to point that way; but I was so afraid of the effect it would have on one so impulsive and then the dreadful trial to me to tell him, of all others, what I had kept locked in my own breast so long, made me hesitate.

Edouard aroused me from my reverie.

"Laura, do look at Mrs. Gardner! Who would have supposed that Mary Henry could subside into such a quiet, demure little wife?"

"You do not speak as if you admired a quiet, demure little wife, Edouard. What do you think I shall be?"

"Oh! you will be perfection, of course. But, really, I think it is excessively tiresome for a woman to grow exactly like her husband. I like variety."

"Mr. and Mrs. Gardner were first cousins," I said, "and you could not expect them to look unlike. As to their characters, Mary is so easily influenced by any one she loves, that, doubtless, she will grow like her husband."

"Harry's wife is too much like him to suit my taste. Do you remember—

*'Complexion, stature, nature mateth it,
Not with its like, but with its opposite.'*

Now, for instance, I am dark, and you are a blonde—"

"Oh, I expect we will be another edition of 'Jack Sprat and his wife!' Isn't it tiresome to sit here and watch the never-ending plantations? Not a mountain, not a hill, not even a tree, except the orange groves, which are very beautiful with their golden fruit. But just think of one of our old oaks. The very idea makes one feel cool and refreshed. What are you looking at, Edouard?"

"I was thinking of the first place Edward Grantley would have to visit in New Orleans."

"What do you mean?"

"Why, the shoemaker's; for, ever since he has been on the steamer, he has kept up that everlasting walk, walk, from one end of the deck to the other. I declare, I'll call out to him to stop."

"Oh, no Edouard! I beg you won't. Surely, it can make no difference to you."

"Yes, it makes me nervous. However, your word is law. By the by, Laura, I thought, at one time, my worthy cousin was to gain the prize I have so fast and secure now. You are blushing! Did he ever propose?"

I saw that Mr. Grantley had just passed us.

"Oh, Edouard," I said, "how could you speak so loud? I am sure he heard you."

"And what harm if he did hear? Surely, I have a right to know."

The color which had flushed my face receded, and left me pale and quivering with fear.

"He never proposed to me," I said.

There was an awkward pause; and, as I could not renew the conversation, I went and sat down by Mrs. Grantley, and was wholly occupied till dinner with her opera-glass, gazing indefatigably at the scenery, which, hardly a minute before, I had so railed at.

Jan. 11th. A week passed away very pleasantly in New Orleans. We went to the opera twice, and our two pretty brides attracted a great deal of attention. Between the acts, the gentlemen came to our boxes, and we chatted away very pleasantly.

How different the audience was from the stiff, bonneted crowd at our Northern theatres! Here the beautiful Creole girls, robed in silk, satin, and gauze, with their rosy cheeks, black hair, soft, dreamy eyes, and easy, languishing attitudes, the blaze of light, and the sparkling of gems, made the scene one of dazzling splendor.

"Sight-seeing" is often tiresome work; but we were such a party in ourselves, that, on visiting the places of amusement and the "proper things" to be done in New Orleans (such as the French Market, Jackson Square, the Mint, etc. etc.), we experienced nothing but pleasure.

One morning I was sitting by the open window, busily engaged in copying a little drawing Edouard had given me, and thinking over the latest news. Mr. Grantley would not return with us to New York, so said his mother; but would leave to-morrow for Havana, and in a week would sail for Cadiz. Every one was taken by surprise, and Mr. Grantley would have been assailed with multitudinous questions, if he had been there. Fortunately, he had not yet returned from his drive, and fortunately for me, I was left behind this morning when all the rest went to the "French Market."

I well divined the reason for his going, and felt that it was the best for all. I knew how hard it was for me to act and look so unconcerned, and natural. I dropped my pencil, and stooped to pick it up; but it had rolled beyond my reach, and I was just pushing back my chair to reach it, when it was handed to me over my shoulder. Wonderingly, I turned, and saw Mr. Grantley.

"I came to bid you good-by, Miss Laura."

I played with my pencil, and did not answer.

"You must make my regards to your uncle, and tell him I would not have left you till I had brought you safely back, but that, as Edouard Domine returns with you, I am absolved from my part of the agreement. I shall now fulfil my original intention, and visit Spain."

"I did not know you had thought of going."

"No, I did not mention it, as I expected fully to return to New York, and then to go—but not alone," he hesitated. "Perhaps you think it unkind in me to stay and talk with you (he had taken a seat), but remember this is the last time; and last evening, Laura, my mother told me that you knew all, and she also explained some things that showed me at what cross-purposes we had been playing ever since we left New York. Your course now is the true one. I see that you intend fulfilling your engagement; I would not have it otherwise. It is happiness enough to know what might have been, and that I was not deceived in thinking that you once loved me."

I laid my head on the table, and wept bitter, bitter tears. Soon Mr. Grantley took his chair, and drew it to the table.

"Do not weep, dear child," he said, "but listen to me a little longer, I am going to advise you to tell Edouard all, before your marriage; for if he found it out afterwards it would be harder to bear than now, and besides it will relieve your mind."

"But I am afraid he will kill himself, or do something dreadful—he is so impulsive," I faltered.

"I do not think so; he loves you too well."

"Yes, he loves me," I said; "but for that very reason I am quite sure he would insist on releasing me from our engagement."

"And you would not be released?"

The words came slowly, as if every one was weighed as it was uttered. There was a dead silence.

"Yes, Mr. Grantley, I would take my release."

"And if after many years he married, and was happy, then, dearest, will you give me his place?"

Tremblingly I gave the promise. "But," I said, as I half opened the door, "if aught happens to Edouard, so help me Heaven, I will live and die alone for his sake."

The next morning Mr. Grantley left.

There was such a hurry and bustle till we left New Orleans that, although I saw Edouard alone, it was not a suitable time to tell him what I knew would give him so much pain to hear, and I put it off with a great dread at my heart.

It was a pleasant trip to Havana again; and as Mr. and Mrs. Domine were going ashore, Edouard tried to persuade me to go with them; but I had seen enough of Havana, and concluded to remain quietly on the steamer. Edouard stayed with me. Little Eugene, Mrs. Domine's little boy, a mischievous, lovable child, was left in Edouard's care; and I must confess I at last tired of their romps, and retreated to the cabin with a book.

The sun was just setting as I returned to the deck. Edouard was still amusing himself with Eugene, who was in a great gale. He handed me a chair, and then went on with his game.

"It is getting dark so fast, Edouard," I said, "that I hope your brother and sister will soon be back to relieve you of that child."

"Why, Laura? I rather like it; he is so smart, and has taken quite a fancy to me."

"Yes, but I would like to talk with you myself."

He took Eugene by the hand, and asked Mrs. Grantley to take care of him, and then send him back as soon as she was tired.

"Now, Laura, I am ready to hear all you have to say. I wonder what it is about? A regret for not going ashore this warm evening? Just think of an ice at Dominica's!"

"Edouard, do you believe in me?"

"Certainly. Why do you ask such a singular question?" he said, his face grave in a moment.

"And if any one should tell you that I did not love you, but loved another?"

"I would prevent their ever saying it again."

"But, Edouard," I said, keeping my eyes riveted on the chair in front of me, "although I do love you, I once, and that not long ago, loved some one better."

"Not better, Laura! Surely you do not mean that you have been deceiving me all this time?"

I got up and motioned him to come with me. We walked down to the end of the deck, and sitting down there in the stern of the vessel, the waning light wrapping everything around us in gloom, and gradually fading away, I told him all. He had sat so still and quiet through it all, that at last I glanced up in his face. I pray I may never see its like again.

"Laura," he said, and his voice was hoarse with passion, "I release you from our engagement, but on your head be the consequences. Remember, I will never live to see you Edward Grantley's wife."

"Edouard," I cried, throwing my arms around him, "Edouard, for the love of God, do not look so. I promise, Edouard; hear me"—for he had turned away—"Edouard." I held him tight, in the strength of my despair. "I promised to be your wife, and I will keep my promise." I let go my hold and sank into a chair.

"My wife you will never be," he said; "my love is turned to bitterness; my faith is lost, and my respect gone. I thought you a perfect woman; I find"—

"Oh, Edouard, spare me your reproaches! Think of what I have suffered, and be merciful."

"Merciful! It is well to talk of mercy. Had you any mercy for me? Is it nothing to have gained my love by every act in your power, to have recklessly deceived me, and wounded me past the power of expression? Oh no; it is nothing; I am a man, and have no feeling. I am to be trifled with, fooled; but I tell you you are mistaken. I am proud, passionate, and revengeful. Will you promise me never to marry?"

"I promise."

A piercing shriek rent the air.

Suddenly a dark object floated past us, and the cry "Child overboard!" was echoed in my ear. Edouard threw off his coat. It flashed upon me he was going after Eugene.

"For my sake, Edouard!" I cried.

But he tore away my arms, and sprang over the side. I fell, fainting, on the deck.

So ends "Laura's Diary."

From the time of the accident till a month afterwards she never spoke. The doctors said it was brain fever.

The child, little Eugene, was picked up by one of the boats sent after them, and restored unhurt to his mother's arms. But the one who, for him, so daringly risked his life, perished in his early manhood; his body was never recovered.

I told Laura as soon as she was able to hear it. She was not surprised, as she had guessed it long before.

Once I asked her to let me see her Diary, and after I had read it through I ventured to ask her if she thought Edouard would have jumped over after the child in any circumstances? She said yes, he might have done so, as he was very daring, an expert swimmer, and the child had been placed in his charge. From other things she said, I found she did not consider herself entirely the cause of his death; but her remorse was terrible.

She never recovered from the shock. A year flew by, and on the anniversary of the very day that Edouard was drowned, Laura died in my arms.

By a strange fatality, the terrible news of Edouard Domine's death reached Mr. Grantley at the same time that he learned Laura was no more. Heart-broken he travels from place to place;

"And long was to be seen
An old man wandering as in quest of something, Something he could not find—he knew not what."

WIDOWS: PART III.

THE GAY WIDOW.

But who is this, what thing of sea or land?
Female of sex it seems,
That so bedecked, ornate and gay,
Comes this way sailing
Like a stately ship
Of Tarsus, bound for the Isles
Of Javan or Gadire,
With all her bravery on, and tackle trim,
Sails filled and streamers waving,
Courtied by all the winds that hold them play.

MILTON.

ALL people are not made of the same paste, is an Italian proverb. No heterodoxy is intended by this saying of the land of the "plaster-of-Paris-image-boy." It is vain to declare that babies come into the world, their blank little souls like sheets of white paper, on which skillful educators may write what they will. The raw material is different, essentially different, and wise parents but try to work up to the best advantage the "paste" of which their Billies and Sallies chance to be made. Tough, coarse-grained stuff it is, too often, and yet if wrought in the right way, and in the right spirit, some valuable vessel is sure to be made which, if not the fine porcelain of the costly vase, may yet be as useful in its generation in our humbler sphere. If it be so difficult to change and modify the substantial foundation elements of which character is composed, what shall we say of the fixedness of the completed thing, the full-grown, well-hardened human soul, when it is fairly of age, and standing for itself among its fellows?

There is a Power that can clothe the sullied spirit with a purity as of the dove with silver wings, but only He who made the water wine can so remodel what He has created. All other energies are ineffectual for the work.

Time, change of scene, or even affliction cannot make the light-minded, frivolous, shallow-hearted Miss into a noble, whole-souled, high-principled woman. Even the difficult process of "braying a fool seven times in a mortar will not take the folly out of him." We speak on the authority of Solomon, that man of wisdom.

We all know this, theoretically; and yet the critical world holds up its hands in astonishment, when the silly, heartless girl, having been the fashionable, giddy wife, becomes that horror of horrors, the Gay Widow! What a tribute is this to the exalting power of affliction! Almost a miracle is expected of the discipline with which the merciful Father chastens his erring children! Yet even sorrow may fail to do its purifying work. The young girl whose dearest joy is a polka with a frisky foreigner; the mother who leaves her babies to nurses with paregoric bottles in their pockets while she spends her nights at parties where it is a breach of etiquette to speak to her own husband—the young girl and the wife made of such "paste" will not be radically changed by shedding a barrel-full of tears, or passing any number of months in a perfect disguise of crape and bombazine. She will surely come out of her black garments, like the butterfly from the dark chrysalis, to flutter abroad as the gay widow, unless a more than human touch has opened her eyes to the beauty of a better path.

Scorn her not, O World! She is a creature of your own making, fed with your milk, trained in your leading-strings, the full development and embodiment of all your theory and practice! We wonder you are not proud of her! She is queenly in the full perfection of her beauty. The willowy grace of girlhood is gone; but who would not prefer the rounded symmetry of the mature, dignified woman? She has gained all and lost nothing, as the swift years have gone by. There is no fluttering excitability in her manner now; she has the calm knowledge without the offensive consciousness of her charms. She feels her power as a queen knows the meaning of her sceptre, but she is like one of royal blood, accustomed to the emblem; she can bear it steadily, and without one hearty toss of the parvenu upon the throne.

Admirers throng around her to catch her winning smiles, or listen to the bewitching flow of her smooth, well-chosen words. She can reckon with wonderful accuracy as to who will send her a perfumed note of proposal in the morning, or who will seek her in the conservatory, whither she will stray at the close of the evening. She will not marry; she has no idea of being worshipped by only one, while she can continue to count her votaries by the dozen. This is her secret conclusion; yet she seems just yearning for an object on which to lavish her garnered wealth of affection, to lack but one thing, the strong arm to lean upon, the true heart where she may nestle.

So think her poor deluded followers, and one after another they are brought to the point, that terrible point for the masculines, more difficult to pass than Point Judith in the worst easterly storm of the season! Wrecked hopes and shattered plans of joy mark that dangerous spot, and its gale of despairing sighs is enough to scare away the timid, and prove for the hundredth time that "none but the brave deserve the fair."

The Gay Widow gives herself no trouble as to what may become of the hearts of her victims after they are fairly laid upon her altar; they may "fizzle" or dry up in the flames, it is all one to her; she has new aspirants to deal with; she cannot waste her time on the completed work. Hers is a cruel avarice! She is ever gathering that which she will not use, robbing the simple of their treasure that she may fill to the brim the coffers of her unsatisfied vanity. Yet she is poor, poor indeed, though on her has been lavished a wealth better than the gold of Ophir.

We have seen the Gay Widow in society, 'mid the glare of the gas-light and the flutter of the gossamer dresses. Could we look in upon her in her morning hours, our harsh condemnation might soften to the tenderness of pity.

How large, dark-rimmed, and sorrowful are the eyes that were so brilliant last night! How helplessly droop those idle hands! The cup of pleasure has ever its bitter dregs! The Gay Widow is still a woman; there is a something within her which cannot be satisfied by a career like hers. She has a dim notion of a better joy which is far removed from her. There is a pure fount which may spring and sparkle by the hearthstone, but there her feverish tongue cannot slake its unnatural thirst. The mutual love which may make glad the humblest fire-side is not for her; true hearts are offered her, but she has no responsive throb for their yearnings. Ever calling forth affection, but never feeling the sweet consciousness of the stirrings in her own bosom of a glad return, she is a starveling in a land of plenty; she is as one doomed to die with thirst, while the mocking waves are tossing around him.

"Water, water everywhere,
The boards begin to shrink!
Water, water everywhere,
And not a drop to drink!"

The Gay Widow is not always the cold, selfish being we have described. There are sisters who wear the same livery, yet are made of a far nobler "paste."

Snow sometimes comes like a hurricane, and sweeps away the clustering joys that have made glad some home of earthly love. 'Mid the ruins, a widow stands alone. She weeps, and groans, and agonizes, till a pathetic exhaustion brings a temporary relief. Again and again she suffers, till nature can no more. Who would not shrink from such a life? She needs some change; something must be done to rouse and cheer her; so say physicians and friends. (Ah, would she but turn to the Great Physician, all might yet be well!) Little by little she is won back into the social scenes where once she shone in the beauty of girlhood. She finds the old charm is not gone; she still can please and captivate; she can forget for the time the past in the excitement of the present. The taste grows upon her. In the bright evening hours, she is relieved from those haunting memories that crush her with sadness; yet they return anew every morning to call up the hot tears from her eyes. On she goes, seeking a forgetfulness in a draught almost as treacherous as the intoxicating cup. We may not too harshly condemn her, till we have tried to struggle in our own strength with a grief which only God can comfort.

She has fled from the thick darkness, but, alas, she will seek in vain for cheering light in the false glare of the ball-room! May she yet be won by the brightness of the Sun of Righteousness, and know the healing power of His sheltering wings!

THE PICNIC; OR, KATE BRYANT'S CONQUEST.

BY FANNIE S. THOMAS.

"So, Kate, you have decided not to go with us," said Mary Williams.

"How can I go, Mary?" was Kate's reply. "My German teacher comes to-day, and it will not be right for me to miss one lesson."

"Lessons! Who ever thought of lessons in summer-time? I, for one, am heartily glad that I am free from the dull routine of lessons. Thank the presiding Fates at my birth, because they never endowed me with a penchant for book-knowledge." And Mary Williams tossed her hat over and above her head, and danced with childish joy at her freedom from a love of study.

"What kind of conveyance will we have?" was Kate Bryant's next query.

"Oh, ah! How funny! We shall go as a kingly retinue." And Mary's clear voice rang peal after peal of merry laughter. "Let me see. There will be ten of us in one company. Thirty in all—a goodly number for plenty of fun. I do not know how the remainder of the party will reach the grounds." Thus Mary slyly avoided an answer to Kate's question.

"I have made no preparations for our dinner," said Kate Bryant.

"If you will only promise that you will 'do as Rome does,' you may dine with us. Get your bonnet, for here comes George Blewett—our chevalier," said Mary.

Kate hastily wrote a note, excusing herself to the German professor; and tying on her bonnet, ran down stairs, not wishing to keep her party waiting much longer. The sun was beginning to move hastily up in the sky; the streets were filling with people; men going to their daily labor; boys crying out the morning journals; bread-wagons and milk carts going their usual rounds; housemaids throwing open the front windows, prior to the morning's cleaning up. The sun had awakened the city from its sleep.

Kate loved the woods much as she loved her books. She was truly a child of Nature. Mental accomplishments had not weakened that strong, healthy nature, which so few women possess.

Kate moved to the door, really wishing to set out on their country jaunt.

"What is this, Mary? Your gay cavalier has brought, not a coach and four, but a butcher-wagon. What shall we do? I cannot go in that style. We shall be the laughing-stock of all our friends."

It was useless to appeal to Mary. Her laugh made the whole house echo.

"Oh, Mary, how can you laugh in that manner? I declare, I am half provoked with you for your foolishness. What will you tell George Blewett?"

"Tell him nothing; only step into the vehicle," was Mary's answer, as soon as she recovered her breath sufficiently to be able to speak. "It is too rich a joke for us to lose the half of it by refusing to go. Come, Kate; I cannot sympathize with your missish airs. The wagon is clean, comfortable; plenty of nice straw at the bottom."

Mary was reconnoitering the enemy through the parlor blinds. "Kate, he has a bean for you—Henry Raine."

"If I had refused to accompany you before, the presence of Mr. Raine would be sufficient to induce me to form one of your party," said Kate, as Mary, with an inquiring look, turned to her.

A ring at the door-bell testified the arrival of the charioteers. Even then, Kate drew back, as she said :

"I cannot ride through the city in this manner. Let them call for Annie Cross, as she is going; and they can wait for us back of the depot, and we will walk out there. Brother will accompany us."

The young men were not easily persuaded to leave without the company of the ladies. But they pleaded that they were not quite ready, and would soon overtake them. They were surely not ready, for both sank down, almost convulsed with laughter at their grand escape.

"Too bad! too bad!" was Kate's remark. "Annie Cross will have a delightful drive up and down the streets. I would give anything to see her!"

They arranged their toilet, which had become disordered by their laughter; then, accompanied by Kate Bryant's brother, started on foot for the place of meeting. They waited a few minutes until the wagon and Annie appeared, when there was much merry laughter at their informal mode of joining the other company. It was only a drive of a few miles. Pleasant woods shaded the road on each side. The little birds were carolling their morning songs; everything tended to exalt the poetical part of the spirits of the excursionists. They sang short snatches of songs; told good jokes "in fun" and "in earnest."

Kate and Mr. Raine occupied the back seat; Mary and Mr. Blewett were together; Annie had an extremely interesting partner, as appeared from the manner in which she listened to the tones of his low voice. It was, truly, a pleasure-seeking party. They had, for once, cast aside all appearance of pride and affectation. Simplicity, rustic simplicity, was the order of the day, and it ruled supreme.

Kate was watching the parties which sat before her; and, failing to hear some remark which her partner had made, as she turned to him, perceived a new expression in his handsome, dark eyes. It was an expression of esteem and admiration. For one moment, her pulse quickened, as she thought of the bare possibility of his having a feeling stronger than mere friendship for her.

"I was only saying, Miss Bryant," said Mr. Raine, "that I could not fail to respect every member of our party for their independent spirit. How many sentimental young ladies and conceited fops do you think could have been induced to form one of this party?"

Kate's face crimsoned, as she thought of her unwillingness to attend the picnic in so anti-poetical a style; and she said :

"Indeed, Mr. Raine, you should not judge so harshly. Pardon me," was the remark which immediately followed, as she so bluntly expressed her own opinion. "I did not wish," she continued, "to ride in the wagon; but I do not class myself among the sentimental fair. It is perfectly natural for woman, and a sensitive woman, to wish to avoid obtaining publicity by a too independent spirit. I would not make woman a cringing, fawning submissionist; but I would have her remember that, once having thrown aside the true delicacy of her nature and position, she never can assume it again. Women have made these laws for themselves, and they must be governed by them to a great extent. Do not misunderstand me; I said delicacy, not prudery."

"In what class do you place the conceited fops?" said Mr. Raine, as he half laughed at her ignoring that class of the male gender.

"I do not know any of them," was Kate's reply.

"I shall have the pleasure of making you acquainted with some of them in less than a half hour," said Mr. Raine. "So you disclaim your relationship to sentimental ladies, and yet you refused to attend this picnic, on the score of going in a wagon?"

"I am sentimental, if you call me that, because I fear ridicule," said Kate. "I cannot bear to be laughed at." And she pouted very prettily.

"You did not flinch when I laughed at you," said Mr. Raine. "Forgive me, Kate, but I admire—love, I should say—a woman who, unshrinkingly, will tell the truth, though she fears being laughed at. I saw in your manner this morning, that you did not wish to be seen in the wagon. I knew that the blush which overspread your face was caused only by the remembrance of your feelings of the morning. I longed to know whether you would tacitly receive an unmerited compliment. Kate, dear Kate," and he took her hand, "I love you. I have admired you so long. It was I who planned this, that I might test, what I esteem most important in any individual, truth—the reverence for truth. Not only truth as it is opposed to falsehood, but as it is revealed to us through God and Nature."

Kate's hand was not withdrawn.

Lest some of the readers, that love the good of a joke, may feel disappointed, unless they learn how the charioteers were received, we annex this conclusion:—

A party of twenty were assembled in the grove where the picnic was to be held; and the clapping of hands and waving of handkerchiefs, as our party jumped from the wagon, testified to the gaiety of all hearts. The day passed pleasantly away, and none failed to do justice to the contents of the well-stored baskets.

"Kate," said Mr. Raine, as the party started homeward, "we will get out of the wagon at the suburbs of the city, and walk home. I have a test for myself. Can you guess what it is?"

Kate looked very innocent, as she said, "I cannot read your thoughts so easily as you can read mine."

"I wish to try my courage by having a private conversation with your parents," was Mr. Raine's explanation.

We were not present at the interview between Mr. Raine and Kate's parents; but we can guess the result from the fact that, in three months, Kate sent us a card inscribed thereon, in old English letters—

LETTERS FROM AUNT BETSY BROOMCORN.

DEAR MR. GODEY: As I was a tellin' you about Miss Button's going off with that painter chap, you may be sure it made a rumpus. Parson Jones went over to see Bethuel, but somehow Bethuel ruther resented bein' talked to about it. Says he, "Elder, I aint a-goin' to whine about it. Tilda's gone, slick and clean, and with a wurthless feller, I'm afraid; but I'd give every cooter in my barnyard this minit if I only knew he wasn't a furriner. I yum, I do hate furriners above ground. Now I want all the neighbors to understand that I aint a-goin' to whine about it, and I don't want 'em to come foolin' around, pityin' the old woman, techin' every tender spot in her feelin's, jist to see her squirm. I can tough it out alone, but the old woman feels diferent; it's her natur, and I won't have her riled onnecessarily. So jist you advise Deacon Moody's wife, and the rest of 'em, to keep to hum, and look out for their gals, or they'll be a-runnin' off with some hansom feller that, like this one, is so everlastin' polite, I never could make out by his speech whether he was a furriner or not." Elder Jones told folks he didn't exactly know what to think about it; but he thought they had better hope for the best, and say nothin'. Well, now, that was aggrivatin' advice, you know, and didn't suit at all. So the folks in Pendle Holler talked and talked about it, till they nigh about wore the subject out. When they'd got pretty near through with it, the little red-haired, crooked-legged, pack peddler, that used to come round once a month with drygoods, ribbons, spring muslins, lawns, pocket-handkerchiefs, and gloves, come along. I was boardin' at Ma'am Jinks's then, and I remember I was settin' on the front door step hemmin' an apron, while Dolly Jinks was settin' the tea-table, and her mother, with a hull apronful of boneset and pennyroyal, was a sortin' and tyin' 'em in bundles, when the little fellow came along by the lilac bushes, and set his pack down on the door stone, and began to wipe his face. "Well now, Mr. Skimmer," says Ma'am Jinks, "who 'd a thought of seein' you so soon? It's enamost a hull week before your time. How do you stan' it travellin' this hot weather?" "Oh, tolabul, tolabul, mum," says he, fetchin' a long breath. "I reckon you'll stay with us to-night, won't you, Mr. Skimmer? Dolly's been a tewin' about that veil ever since you went away. I'll bet now you haint got it." "Well," says he, "'twouldn't be that bet that would set you on horseback, mum." "So you did get it, then? Now, Dolly will be on her high heel shoes." And Miss Jinks got up and shook the bundles out of her lap; and Dolly come in, and Mr. Skimmer opened his pack and showed the veil. It was a pretty black lace one, with flowers worked all over it. Dolly was wonderful pleased, and Mr. Skimmer hauled his pack into a corner, and sot down agin. Miss Jinks got her herbs out of the way, and come and took the rockin'-chair right before him. Says she, "Mr. Skimmer, you haint seen Tilda Button anywhere you've been, have you! You go all over, and know a'most everybody, and I've said to Dolly, more 'n once, jest wait till Mister Skimmer comes. He'll be sartin to know suthin' about her, where she is and what she's doin'. Its nigh three weeks sense she cleared out along with a painter, who'd ben hangin' round for a good spell, and down to this minit there haint nobody hearn a word from her."

Poor little Mr. Skimmer straightened up, and pushed out his legs. Says he:

"I had a mind to ask you, mum, if it wasn't so, for I have seen her."

Miss Jinks clapped her hands together, with an "oh!" and Dolly dropped into a chair with her hands all flour, and they looked at Mr. Skimmer as if he 'd been a prodigal.

"Yes, mum, I've seen her. I knew her in a minit, though I was as mum as mice all the time. For, you see, it was at a queer old place away among the Knickerbarkers, and there was a slim chap along with her, that looked as if he thought me anything but good company; and an old lady with an awful eye, and a cap on her head, as like a trooper's bearskin cap as might be, only hers was lace, wanted to buy some of my goods, and she took a round penny's worth too, mum. Miss Button was bold enough at home; but the vilots in the grass is bolder with their eyes, and them roses yonder can't be more blushin' than she looked all the time. Says I, she 's slipped her tether, and left the old folks, to come away with that youngster. I'd a spoken to her if I'd dared; but there wasn't a chance. And I come out of the great gates of the yard with such a wonderment upon me, that I e'en forgot my lightened pack and heavier pocket. I didn't spare my speed on the road, for I was possessed to know about it, and, as you say, I'm here nigh about a week before my time."

"Then you didn't find out anything more about it? My sakes! I'd up and asked her how she come there," says Dolly.

"Maybe you would, mum; but I don't believe they 'd done anything more than stare at you for it. That old lady was as lofty as—as a grand duke; and Miss Button looked as cowed as anybody."

"What did she have on?" says Dolly.

"O, a white frock, and some roses in her hair; and she sot in a great high-back chair by the old lady, with some kind of work in her lap, such as ladies do, to make believe. The old lady was a-showin' her when I went in."

"And she never said a word?" says Miss Jinks.

"Not a word; but kind of drooped her head, as if a sudden thought of home come over her, when she saw me."

Well, here was news, and when the men come in, Mr. Skimmer had to go over it again; and we come to the conclushun that Miss Button had married a fortin, and so did everybody else. And, as true as you live, I believe, if any girl around had been asked to run away with a stranger, in the next six months, they 'd have gone in a minit, and thought it a lucky chance. But that was the very last we heard of Miss Button. Mr. Skimmer never saw her again, nor heard of her, and things got back to the old way.

Dolly Jinks was a neat little soul, and I ruther enjoyed boarding there, in spite of this everlastin' smell of juniper, sassafras, sweet-fern, catnip, pennyroyal, and a host of roots, that seemed to have pickled the house through and through with smells. Miss Jinks said, herself, that she s'posed their house smelt like a horspittle.

"But massy on us," says she, "what can a body do, when they're sick, and ailin' all the time? Dr. Stirrup says himself that I should a died iver so long ago, if I hadn't been dispen-sin' hullsome medicines for myself all the time, ad limmytum."

Mr. Jinks was a peaked-faced man, with hair as white as wool, and a'most everybody called him "Gran'ther," though he hadn't but two grandchildren in the world. It used to worry me to see him a-settin' in the corner as still as a cat on a rug. For, somehow, he seemed to be sort of dreadin' the dose of balmony, or something or other, that Ma'am Jinks would always insist on his takin' before he went to bed. She seemed to make a pint of doin' somethin' for him every time he come into the house. He 'd got so used to it, that he never said a word when she got out his doses, but took 'em down, and put his feet in hot water, or cold water, or anything else she told him to do. But, somehow, when she said, as she always did, "I do wonder what would a become of you, father, if you hadn't a had somebody to nuss you up, and fix your medicine," somehow he looked as if he wondered more how he stood the medicine and nussin' than anything else.

One day, while I was there, it was Saturday, Elder Jones, for a wonder, come over there, and brought his wife and baby; and about five o'clock, Miss Jinks made Gran'ther Jinks go down and get Square Kinyon to come to tea. Says she: "I think it's a Christian duty to comfort them that 's afflicted; and there 's the Square sittin' down with that deaf, snappish, old Darkis Blinn, his housekeeper, and we a-takin' our tea sociable. It'll do the poor soul good to know he has neighbors as feels for him."

So it warn't long before we see Gran'ther a-comin' back with Square Kinyon. It's my private opinion that the Square was invited out more that summer than he ever was before in his life, and he presheated a good meal, and bein' took notis of for a well-to-do widower. I must say that, of all the stuck-up folks I ever met, a real, forehanded widow, or widower, is the worst. There's no bounds to such folks' notions.

Well, as I was a-sayin', the Square come, all rigged up in Sunday clothes. He'd got to wearin' 'em a good deal, lately; and either he snuffed a tea-party at Ma'am Jinks's, or he'd been away. Gran'ther must have found him dressed, for they wasn't gone long. When they come, Ma'am Jinks was a-tellin' the Elder about her oldest boy's having the measles, which was followed with the mumps, and the whoopin-cough, which led to croup, and the influenza, and the intreminty fever, which run off into infirmation of the pomona, and he had the pleurisy right down hard with it, and before he got over that, he had the brown oriters, "which," says she, "is a distemper prevailin' among ministers chiefly, and, I declare, Elder, I shouldn't wonder if you had it afore long, for, seems to me, you don't look as well as common. I've got some of the same medicine now that I used to give Dolfus. S'posin' you try it. It ain't everybody knows how to make it as well as me. There's mountain-ash, prickly ash, elecampane, cumfrey, bamby Giliard buds, yellerdock, sassafra, and gingshang, and, and—well, now, there's most every kind of good thing in it." And Ma'am Jinks trotted off down cellar, and pretty soon she brought the Elder some black-lookin' stuff in a tumbler.

"Oh," says he, smiling faintly, "Sister Jinks, I'm afraid I don't need so much medicine. Hadn't you better give Square Kinyon some? Seems to me he's ruther hoarse."

But the Square turned as red as fire, and said it wasn't anything at all—only hollerin' at his oxen. He'd been haulin' rails out of the swamp all the forenoon. And drivin' oxen was bad for the throat. Ma'am Jinks said, if he'd take a swaller or two, 'twould fire up his throat so he wouldn't mind the hollerin'. At last, she got the Elder and the Square both to take a swaller; and, for once, Gran'ther Jinks escaped his portion.

Dolly and I got the tea ready, and set the table. We had a nice big raspberry shortcake, with lots of cream. Such shortcakes you don't see now-a-days, I can tell you. Then we made some fritters, and had a good big sponge-cake, well sweetened with maple-sugar, and some cold biscuit. Dolly called her mother out to ask her, jist before tea, if it wouldn't be best to send for Deacon Moody's wife; but Ma'am Jinks can't bear Miss Moody, and she told Dolly to "tend to her bizness, and let Miss Moody alone!" So we had tea, and the Elder asked a blessin', and Square Kinyon talked, as most anybody will that imagines themselves a good deal more noticeable and interestin' than the company they are in. Dolly ruther encouraged him too, for, if anybody said a word about anything, she would look 'round to him and say, "What do you think about it, Square Kinyon?" Of course, Square Kinyon had an opinion on 'most every subject, and if his opinions did sometimes cross one another, they was his own, and he had a perfect right to use 'em jest as he had a mind to. Miss Jones and I did pretty much all the listenin', and ruther more than our share of the laughin', for Ma'am Jinks and the Elder disputed the Square about something, and he ruffled up, and come down on 'em like a banty rooster. Dolly never so much as griuned all the time; but when they was contradictin' each other, it was all the time. "Take another cup of tea, Square Kinyon? Do you like it sweet? Have another piece of shortcake, Square; jest another? Some more of the cream and sugar? Here's a crusty fritter for you, Square Kinyon. I knew you liked fritters. Try the cake. It's maple cake, Square."

At last the Elder said Dolly was a good girl, a shrewd girl. "She knows," says he, lookin' all over the table, and then right at Square Kinyon's plate, "that the way to a man's heart is through his stomach."

Dolly laughed right out; but the Square said, for his part, he didn't know anything about it. "Didn't know which comes first, heart or stomach."

Ma'am Jinks fired up at that. Says she:—

"A man of your parts ought to know, Square, that the very first thing at the end of the wind-pipe is the stomach; then the heart. If you ever have disease of the heart, as I have this twenty years, you'll know it. For, allers after eatin' a hearty meal, I feel my heart so pressed upon, that it palpitates twice as bad as common. Your lungs is higher up, and jines your shoulders, which is a special fortunate, as they are generally drefle tender, and the shoulder-blades is a'most a-purpus to purtect 'em from gettin' such sudden bumps as would knock the breath out of 'em—jest as you've seen a sudden jar put a candle out, without snuffin'. Then your liver is folded up to kiver your gall, and keep it warm. It's the gall as keeps your food digestin'. That's why bitter things is so good for the stomach, when the gall don't come in accordin' to natur'."

"I've hearn say," says the Square, "that you knew as much as any of the doctors, but I never knew it till now. Where on airth did you learn so much? You didn't ever see a 'natomy, did you now, Ma'am Jinks?"

Miss Jinks blushed and snickered.

"What a feller you be, Square, to ask me sich a question. I never did see a 'natomy, and I wouldn't for suthin' considerable; but I can imagine it all out as complete as a picter. If it hadn't been for my bein' a putty good hand at doctorin', I should have died ever so long ago, and so would Gran'ther."

Says Miss Jones: "Sister Jinks, I shall certainly learn too much about medicine, if you tell Mr. Jones all your receipts. It was only the other day, he was about sick with a cold, and he brought me a lot of herbs, and made me steep 'em all at once. He said you told him to do so."

"O," says Ma'am Jinks, "he forgot. I told him to put a bag of hops on his chist, split pepper-pods on his feet, a catnip poultis all 'round his neck, and drink a half pint of hot boneset tea every half hour, and I'd warrant it would cure his cold in three hours."

"Well," said Miss Jones, "I steeped it all up together; catnip, hops, pepper-pods, and boneset, and Mr. Jones drank all he could of it."

"It cured me, sure enough," said the Elder; "but I'm afraid I sha'n't have courage enough to come to you for medicine another time, Sister Jinks."

The Elder made such a comical face that we all bust out a laughin', and pushed back from the table, and putty soon they all went off home.

After that, every few days, Square Kinyon used to come over to see Gran'ther Jinks about somethin'; but if it was only to borrow a set of drag-teeth, or an ox yoke, or anything odd, he was sure to have on his invisible green, swaller-tail coat, with black buttons, and a brown velvet vest, and pepper and salt trowsers. And he allers contrived to stay all the evening long, and be drefle sociable and good-natured, especially with Dolly. Dolly used to be 'most allers spinnin' flax; and she looked wonderful handsome, sittin' at her wheel, with the firelight paintin' up her dress, and her face, and her bare arms, till it seemed as if there were a sort of glory 'round her. Then the low, kind of soft, sleepy hummin' of her wheel, and the wavin' motion of her hand up and down from the distaff, made somethin' pleasant to hear and to see. I don't wonder the Square used to look at her so much; but there was somebody else besides the Square liked to look at Dolly. I found that out a good while before; but Dolly never said a word herself, and you would s'pose, to see her, that she'd as soon have Square Kinyon come over to spend the evenin' there, as Reuben Wood. Maybe Reuben thought so himself, but Square Kinyon didn't, that was certain. He thought Dolly couldn't help bein' glad to see him, of course, and if he hesitated about anything, it was sort of doubtin' whether he wasn't throwin' himself away to marry Dolly, when there was so many others who would perhaps be more likely to suit him than she; but, right or wrong, I reckon he concluded to take Dolly.

Reuben Wood had been down at Gran'ther Jinks's all one afternoon. Dolly and he quarrelled every five minutes all the time, till between 'em, Ma'am Jinks's reel got broke; and after tea, Reuben took it on his shoulder, and carried it off home to mend it, he said. Dolly told him to be sure and fetch it home the next day. And Reuben went off laughin' to himself, with the reel on his shoulder, like a small-sized walkin' windmill. The minit Rube got out of sight, Dolly looked as sober as a deacon, and wouldn't so much as look up, when Square Kinyon come in, all in his meetin' clothes, and lookin' desperate resolute. I was tryin' to write a letter to Susan, and had my paper on Ma'am Jinks's table by the window. Ma'am Jinks sot in one corner of the hearth, and Gran'ther in t'other. He was smokin', and she knittin' a little, and every now and then stirrin' up a mess of roots in a basin before the fire, with one end of her knittin'-needle. Dolly was makin' a ruffled apron just like mine. By hitchin' along, a little at a time, the Square got his chair pretty near the little round, light stand where Dolly set. Pretty soon, I see him git hold of the end of the ruffles Dolly was at work on, and give it a sly twitch, so that she pricked her finger and jumped. The Square humped up his shoulders, and snickered. Dolly looked at him, as much as to say, "Oh, you fool! Do you call that courtin'?" Then she went on sowin', and pretended not to mind him.

Says he: "Miss Jinks, what be you a-makin' with so many strings to it?"

"It's a beau-catcher," says Dolly.

"Oh, you needn't do that," says he. "You have catched me ever so long ago."

Dolly took up the ruffles, and pulled 'em up into her lap as tender as if there was a fish on the end. Then hol'm' out the candle, looked at the Square all round.

"I guess not," says she, after a good look.

Somehow he didn't find it easy to start agin, and he hitched and hitched his chair till he got close up to Dolly. Putty soon, Dolly wanted some thread, and there wasn't any there. She pretended not to know that he had it in his pocket all the time, but got up to come over to the great housewife, hangin' up behind her, to get some. When she got the thread, she give my arm a sly pinch, and went back to her chair. Putty soon the Square spunked up, and asked her if she wanted her thread. She didn't want it very bad, but reckoned he 'd better give it up; and he said he would, if only she 'd sow up that little tare in the cuff to his coat. Dolly agreed to do it; and the Square held out his hand, while she stitched his shirt-sleeve fast to his coat. Then he give up the thread, and made another start on another track. He sithed, and looked at Dolly as if he had been eatin' somethin' that didn't agree with him. Ma'am Jinks heard him, and she laid down her work and unpinned her knittin' sheath. Says she:

"You ain't well, Square?"

"Oh yes I be; as well as common for me."

"But you ain't, Square, for your face is as red as fire. Why, you've got a fever. Lemme see your tongue. Deary me! You be sick, Square. Go right down cellar, Dolly, and fetch up that fever medicine."

Dolly went off in a hurry.

"I never did see a body took suddinter than you be, Square. How does your head feel? Ain't it all of a whirl? And don't you feel as if a painful of pollywogs was wrigglin' down your back?"

The Square's face did look red, and it grew redder, for just then Dolly come in with a teacupful of medicin' in one hand, and a glass of water in the other. Says she:

"I'll give the fire a stir, and the teakettle will bile in a few minits. And if this don't cool off the fever, we'll have some catnip tea made, and put his feet in hot water. Miss Broomcorn, s'posin' you jist pull off the Square's shoes."

"No, no!" says he, writhin' around. "I don't want 'em off. I—bub—bub—bob—bobble!"

Ma'am Jinks put the teacup into his mouth the minit he opened it, and held it there, in spite of his sputterin', till he 'd choked it all down. Dolly offered him the water, and he took it, for I'spect the dose in the teacup wasn't over sweet. When he 'd drank the water, he looked 'round kind of wild, and felt for his tobacco, took a rousin' mouthful, and rolled it round and round in his mouth a minit; then, ketchin' up his hat, he bolted for the door. Ma'am Jinks dropped into a chair in a terrible state of surprise.

"Well, I never!" says she. "What be you a-laughin' at, Gran'ther?"

Dolly laughed too till she fairly cried.

"She now, Dolly! Ain't you ashamed of yourself to laugh at the poor man because he 's sick?"

Dolly screamed out laughin' agin.

"Oh, mother!" says she, "he ain't so sick as he will be putty soon. I thought, by the way he behaved to-night, that his stomach was out of order, eatin' so many good dinners and suppers, and I give him a good dose of lumen tobaccoer. That will set him up all right before long."

Ma'am Jinks looked mad for a minit, then she begun to cry.

"Dolly," says she, "how could you make the Square sick? I shouldn't wonder if he thought you meant to pizen him. I shouldn't so, now."

"Well," says Dolly, "he won't plague me anymore. So, mother, don't worry. There's as good as Square Kinyon in the world; and them that are a sight more pleasin' in their manners."

"Why, Dolly," says Gran'ther, "I thought, the other day, that you was all took up with the Square!"

Dolly snickered a little, but said she wanted to see him fool himself a little longer. He didn't mind her, only to think she was most distracted in love with him. "So," says she, "I felt in duty bound to spite him some way, and I had to humor him to fetch it about."

The next day Reuben Wood brought home the reel; and I s'pose Dolly told him all about the Square, for, when I come home from school, he was there, and he looked mighty pleased, and Dolly ruther red and sheepish. Reuben staid to supper, and helped Dolly milk; and afterwards Gran'ther Jinks and he stood and talked over the fence till away into the evenin', when Reuben went off home. When Gran'ther come in, he sot and smoked a spell; and then, knockin' the ashes out of his pipe, looked up and said, "Well, Dolly." Dolly blushed, and smiled, and looked, for all the world, as if she 'd heard good news.

The next week I went to Mr. Stowers' to board. Their house was an old red brick house, with two dormal winders, and all the doors had heart-shaped glass winders in the upper panels. It was run down clear into the ground, and the great old apple-trees rubbed their branches agin the walls, and made the ground so shady that nothin' would grow there but burdocks and plantins. There was a little black path windin' through them, like a great flat snake, down under the apple-trees to the spring-house. It wasn't a cheerful place; the doorstep was green and mouldy, and all the garden they had was a square patch railed in out of a meadow a good piece from the house. Everything was so old, so queer, and solemn that I didn't wonder Nat was always on the lookout for ghosts. The clock was a big black thing, like a coffin set on end, and the face looked yellow and dead. The pendulum showed itself every time it swung, through a hole in the door, and its tick was low and dull. There was painted bricks around the chimneys, and outlandish dishes of real clear cheeny in the corner cupboard, but old Miss Stowers never showed 'em to anybody. She was deaf, and cross, and it was expected of folks that went there not to touch a single thing belongin' to the old lady. If they did, she would mutter to herself a queer kind of gibberish for ever so long, looking all the time like a wildcat lookin' at you out of a tree. I'd heard all about her before I went there, and was careful not to stir any more than I could help. There was only the old lady, her son John and his wife, and two little girls, besides Nat. The girls were pale, raw-boned little things with queer eyes, not so sharp as the old lady's, but of the same light, clear, gray color. The whole family crept about as still as if there was a corpse in the house, and so there was in one sense. The old lady was dead to everybody but jest herself. She wouldn't allow her other son's folks to come into the house. She said they come stompin' in with their straight backs, and red cheeks, jest to put her in mind of bein' old, and nigh her end. So when any of John's folks wanted to see any of their uncle's folks they went away from home to do it. Nat and I somehow got to be good friends, right away, for I didn't like to stay in the house, and Nat seemed to be always out doors, and so I see more of him than any of the rest of the family. I shall tell you next time I write to you some of the wonderful things Nat told me. He always had a budget full, and delighted to talk, and I liked to listen, for you know what a bewitchin' thing it is to hear stories that make your hair stan' up, and cold chills run over you. It don't matter whether you believe 'em or not, if they only scare you. Yours obedient,

BETSY BROOMCORN.

PRACTICAL LESSONS IN DRAWING.

FIRST LESSON.

The necessary materials for commencing pencil drawing will be a sharp penknife; three black lead-pencils, marked HB, F, and B; and some drawing-paper, or cartridge paper, or a drawing-paper book. We advise our readers to use cartridge paper to begin with, and to have it cut into sheets, which should be numbered at the upper right-hand corner, and when finished deposited in a box or strong portfolio.

To cut your pencil properly.—As you cannot draw until your pencils are cut, we must request you to cut them, not like b in Fig. 1, which is hacked; but cut to a point like a, Fig. 1. In cutting it properly, you must not remove too much of the wood, but only sufficient to expose a small part of the lead; if too much of the lead is exposed, it will break.

Position during drawing.—It is of great importance that the student should sit to draw in a proper position. Do not have a low table, which obliges you to poke your nose almost upon the paper, and press your chest against the edge of the drawing desk; but sit in an easy, upright position, with your feet straight before you, the left hand resting upon the edge of your paper so as to keep it steady; the copy before you and nearly upright, and the sheet of paper upon which you are to draw slightly elevated.

The proper position to hold your pencil should be that the ends of the fingers are about an inch and a half from the point; and the pencil should not be held too tight, the elbow being kept well in towards the side, but not too stiff; by this means you will have perfect freedom of the hand, and complete command of the pencil.

As you are now prepared to commence your drawing, please seat yourself properly at the table, and make an effort to form straight horizontal lines like a, Fig. 2, and observe that they are to be parallel, and at equal distances from one another. When you have succeeded in drawing a dozen of these lines the size of the copy, you should then try to form some twice the length, and then go on increasing the length of them, until you are able to draw lines a yard in length with a piece of chalk upon a black board.

To draw horizontal straight lines.—First make a dot upon the paper where you are to commence, and another where the line is to terminate (as c, Fig. 2); then draw a line between the two, from left to right, the same as between these two points.

Continue to do this until you are able to draw the lines straight and horizontal; then practise making perpendicular lines.

To draw perpendicular straight lines.—Proceed the same way as if drawing horizontal lines; that is, by making dots or points first, and commence with short lines, like the upper one of b, Fig. 2. Then increase the length, until they double and quadruple the original ones.

When you have succeeded in drawing either horizontal or perpendicular straight lines, repeat the exercises with the different pencils, so as to give greater breadth to some lines than to others; and sometimes draw the lines very close together, at other times very wide apart, and afterwards fill up the intervening spaces with lines. By this means you will acquire a correct eye and idea of the rudiments of form and proportion.

To draw oblique lines, you should place the dots upon the paper as usual, and practise forming lines from right to left (as d, Fig. 2), and afterwards from left to right (as f, Fig. 2). When you have acquired sufficient command of your pencil to form the various lines correctly, quickly, and freely, join two of them together, as to appear like e, Fig. 2.

Draw the lines, whether they be oblique or slanting, perpendicular or upright, and horizontal, or in a line with the floor, in every kind of manner, sometimes beginning at the right-hand side, and sometimes at the left; at one time at the top of the line, at another at the bottom of it. Do this, practise often, strive to overcome all obstacles, and depend upon it, you will accomplish wonders.

THE CASKET OF THE YEAR.

BY WILLIE E. FABOR.

Pearl the Third.—March.

Blow, breezes, blow! flow, streamlet, flow,
Beneath the sunbeam's quiver,
In farewell of the winter's snow,
And of the frozen river!
Beyond the magic of the spell
That wreathes his frosty beauty,
We sound a slow and solemn knell,
Glad of the call of duty.

The pictures on the frosted pane
Are gone, with all their glory,
And looking out across the plain
We read another story.
And though the winds blow sharp and keen,
They are but farewell voices,
And usher in a sunny scene
At which each heart rejoices.

The green grass of the new-born Spring
Their farewell takes not from us;
And bud on bush and bird on wing
Yield an abundant promise.
The hedges bud beside the brook,
The willows by the river,
And Paas flowers in some sunny nook
Tell the same story ever.

And if the MARCH has wintry days
In coming, yet in going
It passes through such pleasant ways,
We would not fall in showing
How tenderly it shapes the road,
And smoothes earth's ruffled bosom,
And makes it thus a fit abode
Where violets may blossom.

PEOPLE who suppose that a good prayer is preferred to a good act, doubtless imagine that God has more hearing than eyesight. The end, we fear, will show that they reasoned from false premises. The poor are oftener prayed for than helped. The reason is, we believe, that air is cheaper than bullion.

PATTERNS FROM MADAME DEMOREST'S
ESTABLISHMENT,

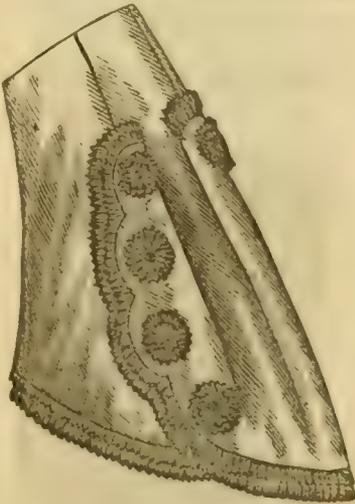

No. 473 Broadway, New York.

Tucked Waist.—This is one of the prettiest of the fashionable tucked waists. The tucks, which are very fine, are laid diagonally, and striped with bands of insertion, edged with lace, and with black velvet run through the centre. The sleeves are loose at the wrist, and drawn up with bands of velvet insertion and lace to correspond. For a Garibaldi this waist may be made in gray or crimson cashmere, gathered on the shoulders, instead of tucked and striped with bands of black velvet, embroidered in the centre with white.

Almena Sleeve.—A very pretty flowing sleeve, trimmed with quilling silk, lace, or any of the new styles of gimp, and medallions of the same. This sleeve cuts nicely from even the narrow silks, as the centre will take one width, and the side trimming prevents the appearance of being pieced.

Baby's Tucked Dress.—This pretty robe is elegant enough for a christening, and can be made at small expense by any mother who possesses a "tucker" to her sewing-machine. The tucked breadth should be gored, in order to iron well, and is surrounded by an open needle-work insertion, through which a narrow ribbon is run, edged on each side with Valenciennes, put on full. This trimming extends up the front of the skirt, and finishes also the waist, neck, and short puffed sleeves. The waist should be tucked between the insertions to match the skirt.

Infant's Robe.—Simply and neatly wrought in a fine pattern, around the bottom of the skirt only. The little waist is delicately tucked, and defined below the bust with a band of insertion. The sleeves are composed of a full puff, edged with needle-work. Wide sash, tied with bow on the side.

Child's Drawers.—Made of linen or fine shirt-ing, according to the season. The band is broad, and cut with a point in front, which fits better than the straight band. The bottoms are tucked in clusters, and edged with fine needle-work.

VARIOUS HERRING-BONE STITCHES AND MODES OF WORKING THEM.

Fig. 5 is worked in the same manner as Fig. 2, February number, with this difference—that the needle is placed diagonally in the material instead of straight.

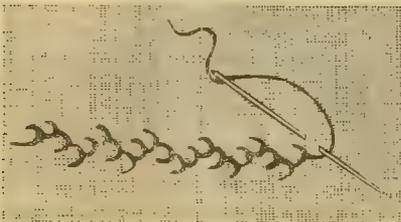

Fig. 5.

Fig. 6, consisting of little branches resembling coral, is one of the prettiest stitches when finished. It is worked in the same manner as Fig. 5, with a double branch instead of a single one; the needle is inserted in a diagonal direction, and, on referring to the illustration, two dots will be found, showing the precise manner in which the needle should be inserted for the next branch.

Figs. 7 and 8, consisting of the Interlaced Coral Stitch, is the same combination of stitches as in Figs. 3 and 4, February number. The needle is placed in a slanting direction, the double stitch forming a series of round holes connected by threads. Cotton No. 10 will be found a very suitable size for working all these stitches, unless the material to be ornamented is very fine, when, of course, a finer sized cotton must be selected.

Fig. 7.

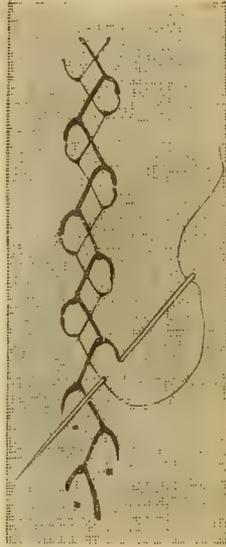

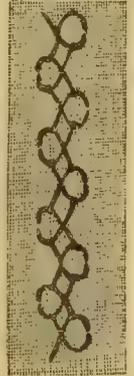

Fig. 8.

A TRIMMING FOR SLIPPERS.

RIBBON TRIMMING FOR DRESSES, ETC.

Materials.—Two shades of silk ribbon, half an inch wide; some fine black purse silk.

This ribbon trimming ornaments a dress very prettily, and is not at all difficult to arrange. It consists of two shades of ribbon, tacked on the material in the same manner as seen in the illustration, and secured by means of an open kind of herring-bone stitch in black purse silk, the edge of the ribbon being caught down by button-hole stitch in the same colored silk. The dots in the centre of the diamonds are also in black purse silk, worked in the same manner as the raised stitching in the embroidered collars. We have not given the colors of the ribbon, as these should be selected to accord with the dress the trimming is intended for. If a green dress is to be ornamented, two shades of green should be selected, one darker and the other lighter than the material to be trimmed. The width of the ribbon we have given answers nicely for children's frocks; for ladies' wear the ribbon should be selected somewhat wider.

BEAD BASKET.

THESE articles, which are expressly intended for bead-work, require that the foundation frame should be purchased ready for the ornamental part of the work, as it is necessary they should be firm and secure. When this is obtained, there is no other difficulty; and to commence, every part of the wire must be bound round with No. 6 knitting cotton, so as to give it a regular roundness. The interior of each pine is then filled in with white and steel beads, one steel bead being at the point of every diamond. This is a simple pattern, but one which has a very pretty effect. When all the pines are filled in, the outline must be entirely covered with strings of small beads, twisted round and round, so as completely to hide the white cotton. The bottom of the basket is worked on canvas with Berlin wool, a group of flowers being the most appropriate; this is stretched over a circle of card-board, which must be slightly wadded. A thick chenille or a quilling of ribbon must be laid round the edge after the bottom is stitched down to the wires, to hide the stitches. A handle can easily be added to this basket, which should be covered with beads. Two bead or silk tassels should be placed where it is set on, which improves the effect considerably.

LADY'S WAISTBAND BAG.

THE revolutions of fashion have once again brought this waist bag into use, and it certainly is not only an ornament to the dress, but possesses this advantage over the hand bag, that it cannot be dropped or forgotten, or left behind. It is desirable, therefore, both for the sake of the fashion and usefulness, that we should give a design for one of these articles.

The waist bag shown in our illustration is made of either kid or some other sort of leather. Russian leather or kid may be used. It is cut in two parts, the back having the flap added to it, overwrapping the bag in front. A silk lining having been laid in the inside, the edges are bound round with two strips of cloth pinked at their edges with a very small vandyke, the under one being white, or scarlet, or blue, the upper one a dark chocolate, brown, or black, having a line of herringbone in scarlet or blue purse silk carried all round. The pines are in whichever of the cloths may have been chosen for the outer edge of the border, and the flowers which surround them in white cloth, the first of these being cut in the same small vandyke, and the little sprays upon them being in the very smallest sort of steel beads now manufactured, which being done, the pine is to be laid upon its place with a touch of gum water, and its wavy line of the steel beads worked all round. The flowers being also cut out according to the shape given, and arranged in their places with a similar slight touch of gum, are to have short lines of the steel beads carried from the centre to the outer edge, with one larger in the centre of each, the spray work being also in the steel beads. The strings of the bag are formed of leather, having a strip of cloth cut exactly of the required width and vandyked at each edge, laid underneath it, the edges brought over and herringboned down.

EMBROIDERY.

NIGHT-DRESS.

BABY'S BOOT EMBROIDERED IN SILK.

Materials.—A few pieces of white cashmere or French merino; two skeins of bright blue coarse sewing silk; a small piece of cambric for lining.

ANY of our readers, if they happen to have in their possession a few cuttings or pieces of white cashmere or French merino, can make a pair of pretty little boots, which are nice presents for young ladies to give to their married sisters, and which form pretty and inexpensive contributions to fancy fairs. The boot is composed of three pieces—the sole, the toe, and the upper portion. The pattern of the toe is given; the sole measures four and a half inches long, and two inches at the widest part, and the upper portion measures eight inches from point to point, and two and a half inches from the bottom of the heel to the top. The manner in which the latter piece is cut will be easily understood by referring to the illustration. The toe of the boot is embroidered in silk in round and oval dots, edged with a double chain of coarse button-hole stitch, and the upper portion is embroidered to imitate a frill laid over. The boot is lined throughout with a piece of fine white cambric, the toe is stitched on to the upper portion, and the sole is run in, and back-stitched here and there. The tassel may be made of the sewing silk, and loops of plaited silk should be tastefully arranged to imitate a bow. These bows and tassels are only intended to make a pretty finish to the boot, it being fastened by means of a tiny hook and loop.

SOUPS.

Soups are easily made, provided the stock is always ready, and in good condition, that is, in a jelly. In every household, even where there is only one joint of meat in a week, a tureen of soup can always be made. In households where more joints are used, say three, or more, in a week, soup for three or more days ought to be made from the bones, without the addition of other meat.

The stock-pot must be an iron saucepan; must be used for no other purpose, and every day after using must be boiled out with soda and water.

For soups use always cold water.

TO MAKE STOCK FROM BONES.

Those which are sent from table on the plates must never be put with other bones; it is a dirty custom, and had better at all times be dispensed with. Take the large bone which has been left, say, from a leg of mutton, but from which the meat had not been quite scraped off (though no particle of fat must be taken), together with the shank and the gristle bone which is at the knuckle; crack the large bone (take out the marrow, as not being useful in soup), and put the whole of the bones into three quarts of cold water into an iron saucepan; let them boil very fast for four hours until the water is reduced to one quart, then throw the liquor and bones into a colander, but over a basin; set the liquor to cool, and let the bones drain. This boiling should always take place in the afternoon or evening, so that the strained liquor can be allowed to remain cooling all night. The next morning on the top of this will be found a cake of cold fat, which must be very carefully removed, as of no use for soup; underneath will be found the stock, which should be a jelly, and if it is not, it is because the boiling was not sufficiently attended to over night, and it must therefore be returned with the bones to the saucepan, and boiled again, and undergo the same process of straining, cooling, and removing all fat; so that it is the least trouble and fuss to attend well to the first boiling, to say nothing of the waste of additional fire for the second boiling. Having thus made stock from bones, the latter may be peppered, floured, and put away for boiling up with bones from a joint of the next, or even two days afterwards. Observe to add to the stock-pot all trimmings of fresh meat, such as bits from the trimming of veal cutlets, the lean pieces from the tops of chops, from a loin of mutton, and any small pieces, not of any other use, which are left on the dish in which the meat has been served. But observe not to use the smallest piece of fat for stock.

There will now be no difficulty in making stock from meat if it be so desired, as the process is exactly the same, precisely alike in the mode of straining, cooling, and taking off the fat; but if a clear soup be desired, the liquor must, while hot, be strained again either through the finest wire strainer, hair sieve, or with old muslin tied, but not too tight, over the top of the colander.

The best meat for soup purposes is shin of beef, the meat with the bones, and boiled for six or eight hours always till the liquor is reduced one-half. A pound of fresh meat should make a pint of good soup, but the meat should always be cut up small. Soup made from any other beef but that of the shin will not jelly, but will taste very like good beef-tea. After the shin comes knuckle of veal. Soup made from this is excellent. The lean end of a neck of mutton is also good; but in making soup from this latter a half pint of water should be put to the meat, be closely covered, and allowed to boil a quarter of an hour, then be poured off, and put away in a basin to cool; then put the necessary water to the meat, and convert it into stock. When the soup made from this is about to be sent to table, take the fat off the small portion that was put away; mix the liquor, not the fat, in with the soup, and it will give a delicious fresh flavor of mutton. Stock may be made from any meat, poultry, or game, but must always be put in cold water, and be without fat.

It must always be strained, perhaps, more than once, suffered to get entirely cool, the fat be then taken off, and put away before the stock can be converted into soup.

TO CLEAR STOCK.

Sometimes when soup is wanted to be very clear, the stock is not so, and, in order to clear it, to every pint of stock required for soup take the white of one egg, beat it up with two tablespoonfuls of cold water; take some stock, which is nearly boiling, mix it with the eggs and water, and beat all together thoroughly; mix this with the stock, which should be boiling on the fire, stirring it well; let the whole nearly boil; then let it stand away from the fire till the eggs separate in a curd from the soup; then strain the latter through fine muslin.

VERMICELLI, OR ITALIAN SOUP.—(Made from stock from boiled bones.) Take a quart of the stock (see directions), add a little salt, a little thickening made thus: take a teaspoonful of flour, roll it in a lump of butter the size of half a walnut, throw it into the cold stock; this will readily dissolve as it boils; then throw in an ounce of vermicelli, or Italian paste, which is cheaper, better, and prettier looking, being vermicelli cut into stars, cubes, and other similar shapes. When this has been boiled ten minutes, have ready a small tablespoonful of minced onion, throw this in, and let the soup boil five minutes; then pour some soup into a basin; burn a little brown sugar in an iron spoon, mix it with the soup in the basin, then strain it to the soup. The onion may be omitted if desired. This soup will not take more than twenty minutes from the time it is first put on the fire.

MACCARONI SOUP.—Break a quarter of a pound of macaroni into small pieces; take a quart of boiling stock and an ounce of butter; put in the macaroni with a very little salt, and boil it till tender, which will be in about twenty minutes; thicken with a teaspoonful of flour rubbed smoothly in some water; beat up the yolks and whites of two eggs with two tablespoonfuls of cold water; take a tablespoonful of the boiling soup, and beat up with the eggs; then add two more spoonfuls, and continue till there is a basin full; then throw the whole through a strainer into the boiling soup, and take it instantly away from the fire. Well mix it together, and the soup will be ready to serve.

SPRING SOUP.—Also from stock not made of meat (see directions). Mince into very small pieces, not too fine, some (one large or two small) ready-dressed carrots, six raw turnips, which must be cut in dice-shape, the heart of a stick of celery minced very fine, a handful of young spring onions, with the young green of six, also, and some chopped lettuce, if it can be had. Make the stock boil; add a little salt and a piece of butter size of a hazelnut; when it boils fast, throw in the vegetables; let them boil rapidly for a quarter of an hour; then thicken, if necessary, with a little flour rubbed smoothly in a little cold water and strained to the soup.

SOUP, JULIENNE.—Take the same kind of stock as before. Take a quarter of a pound of ready-dressed carrots; a half a pound of raw turnips, peeled and washed; a head of celery; and an old onion. Peel and cut the onion round like a lemon would be cut, only in thin rounds; then cut each piece in four; cut the celery across the heart, then each piece again, so as to form long bits; cut the turnips into rounds, the same way also as a lemon; then cut these also into thin strips, the carrot the same; each piece of vegetable must be about an inch long, and about as wide as one of the prongs of a carving fork; melt in a saucepan two ounces of butter, with a little salt, and a tablespoonful of mushroom ketchup, and a teaspoonful of brown sugar, well melted together; then put in the vegetables, and let them brown in the saucepan at the side of the fire, perhaps for an hour or less. Make one quart of stock boiling, throw in the vegetables, and let all boil together. Omit the thickening.

TURNIP SOUP, WHITE.—Wash, pare, and cut six large turnips, the same way as a lemon would be cut, that is, into round slices a quarter of an inch thick, or rather thicker, or with a turnip-scoop form them into the shape of marbles; on the latter mode more turnips must be used; cut these rounds of turnip into squares or triangular pieces. Make a quart of stock from bones boiling hot; throw into it an ounce of vermicelli, or thicken it with flour and water, rubbed smoothly; add a piece of butter the size of a walnut; throw in the turnips while the soup is rapidly boiling; make it boil up again very quickly. In a quarter of an hour after it boils the second time, the soup will be ready.

TURNIP SOUP, BROWN.—Is made precisely as in the foregoing directions; but the turnips are first browned with two ounces of butter, by letting them rapidly fry in a saucepan over a brisk fire; and leave out the vermicelli.

ARTICHOKE SOUP.—Is made exactly as the turnip soup, white, only leaving out the vermicelli, but adding two ounces of butter to the stock, and boiling the artichoke pieces twenty minutes or more.

CARROT SOUP.—A quart of stock made from bones; two carrots pared, but not cut. Put them on to cook in plenty of boiling water, with a little salt, and two ounces of dripping. Let them boil an hour and a half; then drain them, mash them rapidly through a colander, mix them with the soup when boiling, but which has first been thickened with flour, water, and a little butter added.

GREEN PEA SOUP.—Take two quarts of stock made from bones; when it boils, throw in half a teaspoonful of sugar, two ounces of butter, half a teaspoonful of salt, and a quart of ready-shelled peas. Let all boil rapidly for twenty minutes, then shred up the hearts of two lettuces, and add a teaspoonful of dried and powdered mint, or a good spray of green mint. Let the soup boil for ten minutes longer; take a teaspoonful of flour, and a little cold water, mix together, strain, and add to the soup, if not sufficiently thick. The spray of mint must be taken out before sending to table.

Green pea soup sent without vegetables to table must be made in the same way, only the peas be mashed, and the whole be strained before coming to table.

MISCELLANEOUS COOKING.

TO BOIL A LEG OF LAMB.—This is considered a delicate joint in the very first families. It should be put into a pot with cold water just enough to cover it, and very carefully skimmed so long as the least appearance of scum rises.

This joint should not be suffered to boil fast, for on its being gently boiled depends all its goodness, and the delicate white appearance it should have when served up. A leg of four or five pounds weight will take about one hour and a half, reckoning from the time it comes to a boil.

A boiled leg of lamb may be served up with either green peas, or cauliflower, or young French beans, asparagus, or spinach, and potatoes, which for lamb should always be of a small size.

Parsley and butter for the joint, and plain melted butter for the vegetables, are the proper sauces for boiled lamb.

TO ROAST LAMB.—The hind quarter of lamb usually weighs from seven to ten pounds; this size will take about two hours to roast it. Have a brisk fire. It must be very frequently basted while roasting, and sprinkled with a little salt, and dredged all over with flour, about half an hour before it is done.

TO BOIL PERCH.—First wipe or wash off the slime, then scrape off the scales, which adhere rather tenaciously to this fish; empty and clean the insides perfectly, take out the gills, cut off the fins, and lay the perch into equal parts of cold and of boiling water, salted as for mackerel; from eight to ten minutes will boil them unless they are very large. Dish them on a napkin, garnish them with curled parsley, and serve melted butter with them.

TO FRY PERCH OR TENCH.—Scale and clean them perfectly; dry them well, flour and fry them in boiling lard. Serve plenty of fried parsley round them.

SWEETBREAD CUTLETS.—Boil the sweetbreads for half an hour in water, or veal broth, and when they are perfectly cold, cut them into slices of equal thickness, brush them with yolks of egg, and dip them into very fine bread-crumbs, seasoned with salt, Cayenne, grated lemon-rind, and mace; fry them in butter of a fine light brown, arrange them in a dish, placing them high in the centre, and pour under them a gravy made in the pan, thickened with mushroom powder, and flavored with lemon-juice; or, in lieu of this, sauce them with some rich brown gravy, to which a glass of sherry or Madeira has been added.

TO BROIL A SWEETBREAD.—Parboil it, rub it with butter, and broil it over a slow fire, turn it frequently, and baste it now and then by putting it into a plate kept warm by the fire with butter in it.

TO DRESS SALT FISH.—Soak it in cold water, according to its saltiness; the only method of ascertaining when it is to taste one of the flakes of the fish. That fish which is hard and dry will require twenty-four hours soaking in two or three waters, to the last of which add a wine-glassful of vinegar. But less time will suffice for a barbelled cod, and still less for the split fish. Put the fish on in cold water, and let it simmer, but not actually boil, else it will be tough and thready. Garnish with hard-boiled eggs, the yolks cut in quarters, and serve with egg-sauce, parsnips, or beet-root.

Or: Lay the piece you mean to dress all night in water, with a glass of vinegar; boil it enough, then break it into flakes on the dish; warm it up with cream and a large piece of butter rubbed with a bit of flour, and serve it as above with egg-sauce.

ROLLED VEAL.—The breast is the best for this purpose. Bone a piece of the breast, and lay a forcemeat over it of herbs, bread, an anchovy, a spoonful or two of scraped ham, a very little mace, white pepper, and chopped chives; then roll, bind it up tight, and stew it in water or weak broth with the bones, some carrots, onions, turnips, and a bay-leaf. Let the color be preserved, and serve it in veal gravy, or fricassee sauce.

TO BROIL MACKEREL.—Clean and split them open; wipe dry; lay them on a clean gridiron, rubbed with suet, over a very clear slow fire; turn; season with pepper, salt, and a little butter; fine minced parsley is also used.

CHICKEN SALAD.—Boil a chicken that weighs not more than a pound and a half. When very tender, take it up, cut it in small strips; then take six or seven fine white heads of celery, scrape, and wash it; cut the white part small, in pieces of about three quarters of an inch long, mix it with the meat of the fowl, and just before the salad is sent in, pour a dressing made in the following way over it:—

Boil four eggs hard; rub their yolks to a smooth paste with two tablespoonfuls of olive oil; two teaspoonfuls of made mustard; one teaspoonful of salt, and one teacupful of strong vinegar.

Place the delicate leaves of the celery around the edges of the dish.

White-heart lettuce may be used instead of celery.

Any other salad dressing may be used, if preferred.

CAKES, PUDDINGS, ETC.

CUP CAKE.—Three eggs, one cup butter, one cup and a half sugar, half cup molasses, one cup milk, four cups flour, one teaspoonful saleratus; spice to taste.

DELICIOUS APPLE PUDDING.—Very convenient, as it may be made several hours before it is baked, or when a nice addition is wanted unexpectedly. Pare and chop fine half a dozen or more, according to their size, of the best cooking apples; grease a pudding-dish, cover the bottom and sides half an inch thick with grated bread, and very small lumps of butter; then put a layer of apples with sugar and nutmeg, and repeat the layer, which must be of bread and butter; pour over the whole a teacup of cold water. Put into the oven as soon as the dinner is served, and bake it twenty-five or thirty minutes. It may be baked the day before it is wanted; when it must be heated thoroughly, turned into a shallow dish, and sprinkled with powdered sugar. It requires no sauce.

LEMON PIE.—Take four lemons, grate the rind, squeeze the juice, chop the pulp very fine, four teacups of sugar, the yolks of six eggs, two teacups of milk, four tablespoonfuls of corn-starch; beat well together and bake; beat the white of the eggs with six tablespoonfuls of white sugar to a froth; when the pies are baked, put the froth over them, and set them in the oven for five minutes.

GERMAN RICE PUDDING.—Half a pound of rice boiled in a pint and a half of milk. When well boiled, mix with it three eggs, two ounces of butter, and two ounces sugar. Put it into a well buttered mould, and bake it one hour. When it is turned out of the mould put orange marmalade over it. This pudding is also very good cold.

OPEN GERMAN TART.—Half a pound of flour, quarter of a pound butter, quarter of a pound sugar, and one egg, to be rolled out and baked on a flat surface, having first covered the top with slices of apples or plums. A round shape looks best, with a little rim of the paste round the edge.

PLAIN CAKE.—Four cups flour, two of sugar, two of sour milk, one tablespoonful of butter, one tablespoonful of saleratus, nutmeg, and raisins.

LEMON DUMPLINGS.—Add the juice of one lemon to the rind, which must be chopped fine; mix half a pound of suet, also chopped, with half a pound of bread crumbs, one egg, enough milk (or water) to make a stiff paste; add the lemon, sweeten to taste, divide into five or six equal parts, and boil in separate cloths for three-quarters of an hour, and serve up with wine sauce.

JERSEY PUDDING.—Take four ounces of grated bread-crumbs, the same of grated apples, loaf sugar, fresh butter, and currants. Beat up well four eggs, add them to the above ingredients with a little salt and lemon-peel. Add a glass of brandy or white wine, butter your mould well, and boil one hour. N. B. Four macaroons can be substituted for the bread, and if preferred, it can be baked.

DILLINGHAM CAKE.—One cup butter, one of milk, three cups of sugar, five of flour, four eggs; spice to your taste. Bake in small or large tins.

DEVONSHIRE CAKE.—One pound of flour, one pound of currants, three-quarters of a pound sugar, half a pound butter, half the peel of a lemon, half a pound citron; whisk all together, with eight eggs; add a little brandy; bake in a slow oven, two hours and a half.

PLAIN CHEESECAKES.—One ounce of butter, one ounce of powdered sugar, one stale sponge-cake, and two drops of essence of lemon, all beaten together; this quantity makes nine cheesecakes; a few currants on the top of each if you like.

SIMPLE LIGHT PUDDINGS FOR INVALIDS.

TAPIoca BLANCMANGE.—Half a pound of tapioca soaked for one hour in a pint of new milk, and then boiled until quite tender; sweeten, according to taste, with loaf sugar, and, if preferred, flavor with either lemon, almond, or vanilla. Put the mixture into a mould, when cold turn it out, and serve it with custard or cream, and, if approved, some preserves.

SCALDED PUDDING.—Stir three spoonfuls of flour into the smallest quantity of cold milk possible to make it smooth; into this stir a pint of scalding milk, put it upon the fire, but do not let it boil, when cold add nutmeg, ginger, and lemon-peel, and three well beaten eggs; sweeten to taste. Butter a basin, fill it with the above, and let it boil for an hour. When cooked plunge it into a pail of cold water, turn it on a dish, and let it stand a few minutes covered with the same basin before you send it to table.

BAKED PUDDINGS.—One pint of milk, quarter of a pound of butter, quarter of a pound of flour, five eggs, leaving out two of the whites, two ounces of lump sugar. Mix all well together, and bake it in cups, which first must be rinsed in cold skim milk. Bake half an hour, and serve with butter or arrowroot sauce.

A QUAKING PUDDING.—Boil a pint of the best new milk with two blades of mace, a little grated nutmeg, and a little ginger; when nearly cold, add to it the yolks and whites of five eggs, well beaten, a few almonds, and sugar to taste; mix all together with two table-spoonfuls of flour. Boil it half an hour.

MARY'S PUDDING.—Put not quite half a pound of grated bread-crumbs, and two ounces of butter, into a basin, pour upon them (boiling) one pint of good milk, sweetened with about three ounces of sugar. Cover with a plate or saucer, and set to cool. Beat up three eggs well, and stir them into the crumbs when cool enough, adding any flavor that is liked; it is very good without. Pour into a buttered dish and bake half an hour; or pour into a buttered mould and boil one hour. The following sauce is very nice over the boiled pudding: Add one egg and the yolks of three to half a tumbler of sherry, sweetened. Put in a jug in a pan of hot water, taking care not to let it remain too long on the fire, five minutes will be long enough. Whip the whole by rolling the whisk well between the hands till the mixture becomes light and firm.

A DELICATE PUDDING.—The yolks of five eggs beat very well, half a pound of pounded sugar, half a pint of milk, a slice of butter warmed in the milk, and a table-spoonful of flour. The sauce should be made of one glass of sherry, a little loaf sugar, and melted butter. Bake the puddings in large teacups, turn them out, and pour the sauce over them.

MISCELLANEOUS.

TO CLEAN CLOTH GARMENTS.—Rub some soap upon the wristbands and collars, and dip them in boiling hot water or new made suds, and scrub them well with a brush. Then go over the dirty and greasy places in the same way. Get fresh suds and wet and brush the whole garment the right way of the cloth. Stretch the sleeves, pockets, pocket-holes, wristbands, and collars into shape, the same as if ironed and put to dry. They will look as well as new.

TO MAKE BUTTER COME.—After churning, if the particles of butter will not unite, as is often the case in very cold or very hot weather, drop into the churn a piece of butter the size of an egg, or larger, giving the whole a few dashes. The particles, true to the laws of attraction, will readily unite with the larger lump, and the work is done.

PEACH LEAF YEAST.—Peach leaves used in the same way as hops, make excellent yeast. They may be used fresh from the tree during the summer—but the winter supply should be picked before frost comes and dried.

SOFT SOAP.—To one cake of the concentrated lye, add three gallons of soft water. Set it on the fire, put in four pounds of soap fat, and let it boil till quite clear. Empty into a barrel and add twelve gallons of soft water. When cold, it will be as thick as jelly. The concentrated lye can be had at most any drug store.

A SIMPLE, SAFE, AND CLEANLY WAY TO DESTROY BLACK BEETLES, ETC.—Place two or three shallow vessels—the larger kind of flower-pot saucers will do—half filled with water, on the floors where they assemble, with strips of card-board running from the edge of the vessel to the floor, a gentle inclination; these the unwelcome guests will eagerly ascend, and so find a watery grave.

TO DYE SILK, ETC., CRIMSON.—Take about a spoonful of cudbear, put it into a small pan, pour boiling water upon it; stir and let it stand a few minutes, then put in the silk, and turn it over in a short time, and when the color is full enough, take it out: but if it should require more violet or crimson, add a spoonful or two of purple archil to some warm water; steep, and dry it within doors. To finish it, it must be mangled, and ought to be pressed.

TO CLEAN KID GLOVES.—Make a strong lather with curd soap and warm water, in which steep a small piece of new flannel. Place the glove on a flat, clean, and unyielding surface—such as the bottom of a dish, and having thoroughly soaped the flannel (when squeezed from the lather) rub the kid till all dirt be removed, cleaning and resoaping the flannel from time to time. Care must be taken to omit no part of the glove, by turning the fingers, etc. The gloves must be dried in the sun, or before a moderate fire, and will present the appearance of old parchment. When quite dry, they must be gradually "pulled out," and will look new.

TO REMOVE INK FROM PAPER.—Solution of muriate of tin, two drachms; water four drachms. To be applied with a camel's-hair brush. After the writing has disappeared, the paper should be passed through water, and dried.

An excellent cement for mending china articles, when broken, can be made by mixing flour with white of egg to the consistence of a paste. Hot water does not injure but rather hardens this simple cement.

METALLIC TREES.—The lead tree is produced as follows: Put into a glass bottle about half an ounce of sugar of lead, and fill up to the neck with distilled or rain water; then fasten to the cork or stopper a piece of zinc wire, so that it may hang in the centre: then place the bottle where it may remain undisturbed. The wire will soon be covered with crystals of lead, precipitated from the solution, and assuming a tree-like form very pleasing to the eye. For the tin-tree proceed as before, and put in three drachms of muriate of tin; and about ten drops of nitric acid. The tin-tree has a more lustrous appearance than the lead-tree. The silver-tree is prepared by a solution of four drachms of nitrate of silver in distilled or rain water as before, to which add out an ounce of quicksilver.

TO MAKE GOOD COFFEE.—Have a coffee-pot with a lip, pour into it as many cups of boiling water as you wish to make cups of coffee: let the water boil, then put in as many teaspoonfuls of coffee as there are cups of water, stir it in, let it simmer until the head falls. When the coffee is done, take it off the fire, pour in a cup of cold water, set the coffee on the hearth, and let it stand ten minutes, when it will be fine. For breakfast, put one cupful of this coffee to three or four cups of hot milk, sweeten to your taste, and you will find it a luxury at a small expense as great as wealth can procure. Coffee should never be made in what are called coffee-pots; if poured from near the bottom it is never clear.—Coffee should always be poured from the top of the vessel.

VARNISH FOR COARSE WOODWORK.—Grind any quantity of tar with as much Spanish brown as it will bear without becoming too thick to be used as a paint or varnish; then spread it on the wood with a large brush. It soon hardens by keeping. The work should be kept as free from dust and insects as possible, till the varnish is thoroughly dry. The color may be made a grayish instead of a glossy brown, by mixing a small proportion of white lead, or of whiting and ivory black, with the Spanish brown.

TO KEEP THE HANDS SOFT.—Mix honey, almond meal, and olive oil into a paste, use after washing with soap. Castile soap is best for use: it will cure a scratch, or a cut, and prevents any spot.

Editors' Table.

NOVELS—FRENCH AND ENGLISH.

Books should to one of these four ends conduce,
For wisdom, piety, delight, or use.—DENHAM.

It has been our constant aim to guide our youthful readers aright in their choice of literary amusement. That we do not condemn novel-reading as utterly useless, if not utterly bad, is true; but we as truly hold that this "delight" or amusement should be guided by wise principles of selection, and regulated by the sense of duty which, as accountable beings, should govern all our doings.

Young girls at school or under the care of teachers at home are restricted, more or less, in their desire for fictitious narratives. After this period, we regret to say, that many young ladies, considering their education finished (as if education ever were finished!), are allowed to go adrift on an ocean of tales, romances, novels, etc., without knowing what is the best course to pursue. What to avoid or what to anchor upon has never been marked on their home chart of literature.

To remedy this evil, in such measure as on our part is possible, we have made it a rule to discuss the subject of home reading in our Editors' Table whenever we had opportunity, speaking to our young friends as frankly as if they were present, requesting to be guided. Letters of grateful thanks have cheered us, ay, more than repaid our care and thought for our readers, making us feel their debtor for one of the sweetest rewards of a writer's life—the love of those we would serve. And now one of our young friends has begged us for a few words of counsel on novel-reading.

There can scarcely be a more pernicious occupation for the leisure hours of either sex than reading bad novels. The higher the abilities of the author, the more dangerous his books, where lax morality is decked out in meretricious ornaments resembling the pearls of virtue—as coarse paste resembles the pure diamond—which often deceive youthful readers, blinding his or her judgment, and corrupting the taste, till they come to love this demoralizing mental excitement.

We are now alluding to the sensation school of modern French novels. Many of these works are written by the pen of genius. Full of fancy, and rich with imagination, perfect in all the charms of graceful style, of exquisite language, they impose on the inexperienced, by describing states of feeling and causes of action as natural to the good under certain circumstances, which, if allowed in actual life, would destroy all goodness.

In these novels vice, instead of being "a monster of hateful mien," is led forward as an amiable unfortunate, more to be loved and more tenderly embraced than painstaking, simple virtue. The reader pities, thrills, wonders, loses sight of the boundary between right and wrong—is bewildered in the mist of a sort of praiseworthy atrocity and a sort of disagreeable honesty—till he no longer knows the landmarks of his own mind; he can hardly tell whether sin is sin; whether the homely, regular citizen, or the branded bandit felon is a respectable character. Everything in ethics becomes vague and shadowy; the generous enthusiasm for honor, virtue, and self-denial is diluted by a monstrous mixture of all we have ever been taught, in our Christian morality and religious reading, to avoid and detest. The step from this state of mind and feeling to wrong doing is not long nor difficult.

"Vice always leads,
However fair at first, to wilds of woe."

Never believe that the characters and incidents set forth by Sue, Hugo, and the writers of their schools are true portraits of the French people, generally. In France there is family purity, as elsewhere, or society could not be conserved. In France there are Christian souls who deplore these unwholesome volumes as truly as we do. Such sensation novels are but the assembling together of exceptional instances of vice and misery, setting these in a capricious light, and gilding them with the blaze of vivid fancy and morbidly excited feeling.

Nor have these books the merit of truly describing nature in any form. All is exaggerated and distorted; even virtue is warped into something we never beheld, or set upon a pinnacle which we can never hope to reach. In short, the false is persistently set before us as the true, and the mirage is made so dazzling by these clever writers that even sober thoughtfulness is in danger of being deluded by their sophistries. For these reasons we deeply regret that French novels are now sown broadcast through our land, to corrupt the imaginations of our young men and maidens, and worse than waste the time of more mature readers, who should remember that life has duties to be done, ay, duties, which will require the strength of truth and the light of wisdom.

Why should American readers, who have such large scope for innocent pleasure in the masterpieces of our own language, leave these pure sources of improving amusement, and defile their minds in the sloughs of French fiction, dealing chiefly with the most debasing vices and disgusting miseries? French morality rarely rises above the earth. With their writers Science is the Saviour of mankind, and human charity the great Purifier from sin. After wading through one of these evil works of passion, pollution, and false sentiment, it seems almost like walking into Paradise to take up a healthy English or American novel.

Without going back to Walter Scott, Miss Edgeworth, Miss Austen, and others of their time, who do not need to be commended, there are now many living novel writers in Great Britain, whose productions are worthy of admiration. We may particularize the later novels of Bulwer, who, in style and language, is unrivalled as a living writer; Dickens' works, that never fail in cheerful characters and kindly feelings; the impassioned and powerful tales of "the author of Adam Bede;" the life pictures of Miss Muloch, whose last work, "Mistress and Maid," deserves a place in every family library; the strangely fascinating stories of Wilkie Collins; the truthful and amusing sketches of English character in the books of Anthony Trollope; the novels of the two Kingsleys—with some exceptions to the philosophic notions of the elder brother—all these are the productions of real genius and high culture.

Such works of imagination, when governed by the desire to elevate humanity in accordance with God's laws, furnish innocent mental pleasures and often happy moral sustains in favor of goodness, which are needed, at times, by every young and every healthy intellect. Often, too, books of this sort are cheering resources in hours of weariness and pain,* when even the wise and pious soul requires some softened atmosphere of life, some new phase of thought that will lighten or remove the too near and heavy pressure of the day's actual burdens and sorrows.

But woe it would not disparage works of imagination, we would have readers carefully guarded against the false leads and temptations to evil, which selfish passions, sinful lusts, and false philosophies may introduce in this form. Therefore novel writers should be held to strict morality of tenet and delicacy of delineation. We beg our readers of all ages not to be led away by the name of a distinguished writer into giving their minds to pictures of scenes they would shrink from in real life. Poison is not the less poison because offered in a gilded cup, made by a distinguished artist. "Lead us not into temptation" is a divine aspiration, and we make that prayer in vain if we neglect to guard our own hearts and thoughts from contaminations.

HAPPY LOVE.

"Examples hasten deeds to good effects."

ARGUMENTS for the right are never so powerful in influencing the heart to love goodness, as examples of right conduct. True love is best comprehended by its effect in producing happiness; therefore happy love must be true love. In the preceding article we have commended Miss Muloch's last novel, "Mistress and Maid," to special favor. As proof that it deserves this praise, we will make a few extracts from the chapter of that important period true love-courtship, premising that the hero and heroine of the story had loved each other for fifteen years, and only within a few weeks had been engaged; that Miss Leaf was then thirty and Mr. Lyon about forty years of age.

"Let us linger a little over this chapter of happy love; so sweet, so rare a thing. Ah, most rare; though hundreds continually meet, love, or fancy they do, engage themselves and marry; and hundreds more go through the same proceeding, with the slight difference of the love-sword—Hamlet, with the part of Hamlet left out. But the real love, steady and true, tried in the balance, and not found wanting; tested by time, absence, separation; by good and ill fortune; by the natural and inevitable change which years make in every character—this is the rarest thing to be found on earth, and the most precious."

"I do not say that all love is worthless which is not exactly the sort of love. There have been people who have succeeded instantly and permanently to some mysterious attraction, higher than all reasoning; the same which made Hilary Leaf 'take an interest' in Robert Lyon's face at church, and made him, he afterward confessed, the very first time he gave Ascott a lesson in the parlor at Strawberry Bay to himself. 'If I did marry, I think I should like such a wife as that brown-eyed bit lassie.' And there have been other people, who, choosing their partners from accidental circumstances, or from more worldly motives, have found Providence kinder to them than they deserved, and settled down into happy, affectionate husbands and wives.

* Our correspondent wanted directions where to obtain cheap editions, paper covers of such late English novels as would innocently beguile some of the weary hours of a confirmed invalid sister, who could not use her hands. Besides the works we have already named, there are novels by "the authoress of Mary Powell"—the works of Mrs. Wood; and "Marrying for Money," by Mrs. Daniels; this last we think deserving of much praise. Published by T. B. Peterson & Brothers, 305 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

"But none of these loves can possibly have the sweetness, the completeness of such a love as that between Hilary Leaf and Robert Lyon.

"There were no lovers' quarrels. Robert Lyon had chosen that best blessing next to a good woman—a sweet-tempered woman; and there was no reason why they should quarrel more as lovers than they had done as friends. And, let it be said to the eternal honor of both, now, no more than in their friends-and-days, was there any of that hungry engrossment of each other's society, which is only another form of selfishness, and by which lovers so often make their own happy countenance a season of never-to-be-forgotten bitterness to everybody connected with them.

"Oh, the innumerable little jokes of those happy days! Oh, the long, quiet walks by the riverside, through the park, across Ham Common—anywhere, it did not matter, the whole world looked lovely, even on the dullest winter day! Oh, the endless talks! the renewed mingling of two lives, which, though divided, had never been really apart, for neither had anything to conceal; neither had ever loved any but the other.

"Robert Lyon was, as I have said, a good deal changed, outwardly and inwardly. He had mixed much in society, taken an excellent position therein, and this had given him not only a more polished manner, but an air of decision and command, as of one used to be obeyed. There could not be the slightest doubt, as Johanna once laughingly told him, that he would always be 'master in his own house.'

"But he was very gentle with his 'little woman,' as he called her. He would sit for hours at the 'ingle-neek'—how he did luxuriate in the English fires!—with Hilary on a footstool beside him, her arm resting on his knee, or her hand fast clasped in his. And sometimes, when Johanna went out of the room, he would stoop and gather her close to his heart. But I shall tell no tales; the world has no business with these sort of things."

Johanna, the half-sister of Hilary, had had the care of the latter from her infancy; Johanna was as a mother to the orphan both in years and love; no wonder Hilary hesitated to leave her elderly sister, who was in feeble health. Robert Lyon wanted to marry at once and take his bride to India, to be absent three years; the "little woman" felt she ought not to go, and this was the first cloud between the lovers. We can only give a glimpse of this deeply interesting scene; its lessons are of the highest wisdom in married life.

"If I tell what followed, will it forever lower Robert Lyon in the estimation of all readers? He said coldly, 'As you please, Hilary,' rose up, and never spoke another word till they reached home.

"It was the first dull tea-table they had ever known; the first time Hilary had ever looked at that dear face, and seen an expression there which made her look away again. He did not snik; he was too gentlemanly for that; he even exerted himself to make the meal pass pleasantly as usual. But he was evidently deeply wounded—nay, more, displeased. The strong, stern man's nature within him had rebelled; the sweetness had gone out of his face, and something had come into it which the very best of men have sometimes; alas for the woman who cannot understand and put up with it!

"I am not going to preach the doctrine of tyrants and slaves; but when two walk together they must disagree, or, if by any chance they are agreed, one must yield. It may not always be the weaker, or in weakness may lie the chiefest strength; but it must be clear the other of the two who has to be the first to give way; and, save, in very exceptional cases, it is, and it ought to be, the woman—God's law, and Nature's, which is also God's, ordains this; instinct teaches it; Christianity enforces it.

"Will it inflict a death-blow upon any admiration she may have excited, this brave little Hilary, if I confess that Robert Lyon, being angry with her, justly or unjustly, and she, looking upon him as her future husband, her lord and master, if you will, whom she would one day promise, and intended literally to 'show'—she thought it her duty, not only her pleasure but her duty, to be the first to make reconciliation between them? Ay, and at every sacrifice, except that of principle.

"And I am afraid, in spite of all that 'strong-minded' women may preach to the contrary, that all good women will have to do this to all men who stand in any close relation toward them, whether fathers, husbands, brothers, or lovers, if they wish to preserve peace, and love, and holy domestic influence; and that so it must be to the end of time."

And so gently and persuasively did Hilary urge her sweet peace-making, and her reasons for remaining with her sister the three years, that she gained her lover's conscience on her side, and such respect as well as love and confidence that he yielded and said—

"If my little woman thinks it right to act as she does, I also think it right to let her. And let this be the law of our married life, if we ever are married"—and he sighed—"that when we differ each should respect the other's conscience, and do right in the truest sense, by allowing the other to do the same."

"Oh, Robert, how good you are!" was Hilary's exclamation.

Yes, he was a good man. He had the true principle of greatness and goodness—duty before all things.

JOSEPHINE.—Fortune, or Providence rather, seems to justify the superstition which regarded Josephine as the star of Napoleon's destiny. No royalty is now to be found among the relatives of the great Emperor, except in the descendants of the discarded wife. The grandson of Josephine is Emperor of France. Another of her descendants was married to the Queen of Portugal. Of her granddaughters, one was Queen of Sweden; another still lives as Empress Dowager of Brazil. Her grandson, the Duke of Leuchtenberg, may be King of Greece.

ON!

On through valleys, over hills,
On to try the mountain passes,
On to drink from silver rills,
Fringed around with greenest grasses!
Never mind the cuts and scars,
Never stop for friends to love thee;
Climbing, strive to reach the stars,
And the heaven that smiles above thee!

As the curling smoke ascends,
Every earth-born beauty scorning,
Looking to the sky that bends
Low to clasp the tufts of morning;
So with resolute desire,
And a brave heart never tiring,
Fan to flame Hope's holy fire,
Onward, upward still aspiring!

Stormy clouds may crowd the sky,
Fogs grow thick and dark around thee,
Sorrows dim thine eagle eye,
Friends with false and harsh words wound thee;
Yet press on in Duty's path,
Let no coward thought delay thee;
God shall calm the tempest's wrath,
And in robes of light array thee!

Onward, ever onward, then:
Upward, upward still aspiring,
Be a man among true men,
In thy life-work never tiring!
On to wear a shining name,
Pure as those of sacred story!
On to win eternal fame
In the land of love and glory!

LILLIAN.

A CONSOLING REFLECTION.—Voltaire says that the reputation of Dante will continually be greater and greater, because there is nobody now that reads him. This sentiment must be a source of great consolation to many of our modern poets, who have already lived to see themselves arrive at this point of greatness.

WOMEN IN OFFICE.—Mrs. Lucy Baxter, widow of the late T. P. D. Baxter, has been appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury keeper of the Sandy Neck light-house, at the entrance of Barnstable harbor.

THE REPUBLICANS OF THE COUNTY OF SAGadahoc, Me., have nominated Jane R. Shaw for Register of Deeds. Miss Olive Rose, some years ago, held the same office in Lincoln county.

THE BEST NATIVE LINGUIST IN THE ARCTIC REGIONS.—Mr. Hall, the late Arctic Explorer, found a native woman of the Innuit Tribe of Esquimaux, who proved to him an able interpreter. Her name is Tux-e-letto. She is the best linguist in the Arctic regions, and has a wonderful faculty of acquiring the lingo of other tribes. She is mild in disposition.

MISS S. J. HALE'S BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES, 1826 Rittenhouse Square, Philadelphia, Penna.

This school has now entered on its seventh year. The success and present prosperity are very satisfactory to its friends.

The design of the Principal is to give a thorough and liberal English education, to furnish the best facilities for acquiring the French language, and the best instruction in music and the other accomplishments. The Assistants employed are of the first class and highest merit. French is taught by an experienced instructress, a lady lately from France who resides in the family; and thus the pupils have ample opportunities of acquiring the accomplishment of speaking the language.

Particular and continued attention is paid to the moral training, and also to the health and physical development of the young ladies.

BY JNO. STAINBACK WILSON, M. D.

How Girls Should be Clothed.—In a former number we made some suggestions on the prevailing fashion in dressing girls; having indicated our disapprobation of those fashions, it is our duty to tell what changes should be made.

It has been shown that infants have feeble heat-generating powers, and though these powers become stronger with the advance of life, yet they never attain their full development in children until they reach the adult age. The rules for dressing infants, then, are alike applicable to older children. These, like infants, should have the extremities—the arms, legs, and feet—well protected; because, like infants, their heat-generating powers are feeble when compared with those of older persons, while, as in the case of infants, they are strongly predisposed to inflammation and congestion of the vital organs from the active changes going on in them, and which are so likely to result in disease when the blood is driven in from the extremities by improper exposure.

Instead of low necks, then, girls should have high necks that will protect the breast perfectly; instead of short sleeves, or no sleeves, they should have thick, warm, long sleeves extending down to the hand; instead of having the legs bare, or covered (?) with lace and cobweb nothings, they should be protected by thick drawers extending down to the feet. Or, what is better, in cold weather, in addition to the stockings, the legs should be covered by yarn or cloth garters extending down above the knee over the feet, and fastened at the bottom by a strap passing beneath the foot. This fashion has, we believe, been recently introduced, and is worthy of all commendation. It is much to be hoped that it will be generally adopted, and that considerations of health and comfort will cause it to continue amid all the mutations of fashion.

These garters afford an admirable protection to the feet as well as the legs; and with thick stockings and leather shoes, leave us nothing to desire in the way of covering for the nether extremities. And with such protection as this, short skirts may still be worn without injury, while nothing is lost in the way of appearances; for nothing can look neater and nicer than a little foot peeping out from beneath one of these strapped garters.

Louseness has been insisted on as one of the indispensable in an infant's dress; equally important is it in the dress of older girls. No part of their bodies should be subjected to the least pressure; for, in early life, and indeed until the age of eighteen or twenty, the bones are soft and yielding, and all parts of the body are in a growing, undeveloped state. It will readily be seen, then, how likely deformity and disease are to ensue from compression by means of ligatures, corsets, tight dresses, small shoes, and everything of the kind. And not only should the muscles be free from all pressure—they should be strengthened and developed by proper exercise; hence shoulder-braces, and all artificial supports for the muscles, are objectionable. These may give temporary or apparent relief; but the inevitable consequences resulting from their use will be greater feebleness of the muscles, and arrest of their full development from inaction; and thus will the deformity be increased; thus, in all probability, will it become necessary to continue through life those ill-advised, inconvenient, and injurious substitutes for muscular action. The best shoulder-braces—and the only proper ones—are passive and active exercise. The best posts, or the best things to fill out the body, and to give every part its full, beautiful, and perfect development, are wholesome food, and a happy, contented state of mind.

NAKED ARMS.—A distinguished physician of Paris declared, just before his death, "I believe that during the twenty-six years I have practised my profession in this city, twenty thousand children have been borne to the cemeteries a sacrifice to the absurd custom of naked arms."

Dr. J. C. Warren said, "Boston sacrifices five hundred babies every year by not clothing their arms." Those little arms should have thick, knit, woollen, warm sleeves, extending from the shoulder to the hand.

(Selected from Hall's Journal of Health.)

HINTS ABOUT FOOD.—Hot drinks are best at meals; the less of any fluid the better. Anything cold arrests digestion on the instant.

It is hurtful and is a wicked waste of food to eat without an appetite.

All meats should be cut up as fine as a pea, most especially for children. The same amount of stomach-power expended on such a small amount of food as to bedigested perfectly without its being felt to be a labor, namely without any appreciable discomfort in any part of the body, gives more nutriment, strength, and vigor to the system, than upon a larger amount, which is felt to require an effort, giving nausea, fulness, acidity, wind, etc.

Milk, however fresh, pure, and rich, if drunk largely at each meal, say a glass or two, is generally hurtful to invalids and sedentary persons, as it tends to cause fever, constipation, or biliousness.

PRESERVES are sometimes deadly poisons, in consequence of the improper material of the vessels in which they are made or are contained. If made in copper or brass kettles, the utmost and closest attention should be given to see that every spot the size of a pin should fairly glisten by vigorous and thorough scouring. But even this will not avail if the preserves themselves are imperfectly sweetened, or are not thoroughly cooked. A defect in either case will result in corroding the cans or jars in which they are put for keeping. This corrosion makes chemical combinations which are fatal to life or lay the foundation for long, distressing, and obscure diseases. The only perfectly safe preserve-jar is that which is made of glass. All others ought to be discarded. Glass is cheap, more easily and more perfectly cleaned, and with reasonable care will last a lifetime.

Self-sealing air-tight glass jars, which are now so common are the best vessels for securing preserved fruits.

SWALLOWING POISON.—Stir in a glass of water a heaping teaspoonful each of salt and kitchen mustard, and drink it instantly; this will empty the stomach in a minute. To antagonize any poison that may be left, swallow the whites of two or three eggs; then drink a cup or two of very strong coffee, or as much sweet milk or cream, if impossible to get coffee.

Literary Notices.

OWING to the immense increase in the price of books, we will not receive further orders to send by mail. It never was a source of profit to us, but generally a loss, on account of the portage we had to pay.

From PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

JOHN MARCHMONT'S LEGACY: A Domestic Story. By Mrs. E. Braddon, author of "Aurora Floyd," "Lady Audley's Secret," etc. From "Temple Bar." To be completed in twelve numbers. No. 1.

SOMEBODY'S LUGGAGE: A Christmas and New Year's Story for 1863. By Charles Dickens. A number of pleasant stories, strung on a thread of humorous narrative, which, if not actually Dickens's, are at least fathered by him, present many of his quaint peculiarities of style, and inculcate those lessons of charity and humanity which he knows so well how to teach.

From SMITH, ENGLISH, & Co., Philadelphia:—

POEMS. By Richard Coe. The simplicity and delicate feeling of these unpretending little "poems" will secure them, we doubt not, a warm welcome in many hearts. Mr. Coe has written a great deal of poetry, which, if not always of a very highly imaginative order, is, nevertheless, pleasing and popular. In the neat and compact volume before us is embodied a careful selection from among the best of his numerous and varied efforts.

From J. C. GARRIGUES, Philadelphia:—

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHER AND DIARY ALMANAC. This is a very pretty diary, whereby Sunday School teachers may note their engagements for the different Sundays in the year. The almanac attached is also useful.

From J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

THE BOOK OF DAYS. A Miscellany of Popular Antiquities in Connection with the Calendar, including Anecdotes, Biography, History, Curiosities of Literature, and Oddities of Human Life and Character. Part 10.

CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPEDIA. A Dictionary of Universal Knowledge for the People. Part 58.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

THE INSTITUTES OF MEDICINE. By Martin Paine, A. M., M. D., LL. D., Professor of the Institutes of Medicine and Materia Medica in the University of the city of New York. Our thanks are due the publishers for a copy of this truly learned and elaborate work. Of its professional merits, we cannot presume to speak from any knowledge of our own; but that they are many and great is evidenced not only by the unanimous and intelligent eulogiums of the medical press, but also by the fact that no less than six editions of the "Institutes" have been called for within the past twelve years. The work has become a standard, and without it no student of medicine can consider his library of instruction complete. As a text-book, it presents, in addition to a vast and almost inexhaustible fund of erudition, bearing upon every point in the range of medical science, one excellence somewhat rare, though not undesirable, even in works of a similar elementary character—that of honestly and fully stating all the arguments urged against the doctrines advanced and advocated in its pages.

LINES LEFT OUT: or, Some of the Histories left out in "Line upon Line." By the author of "Line upon Line," etc. This is a little volume of Scriptural histories, adapted to the comprehension of children, and relating events in the times of the "patriarchs" and the "judges." It is profusely illustrated with well-executed engravings on wood.

SPRINGS OF ACTION. By Mrs. C. H. B. Richards, author of "Sedgemoor," "Pleasure and Profit," "Hester and I," "Aspiration," etc. Few of the publications recently coming under our notice have taken our fancy and judgment more completely than this little volume of essays. They display a depth of practical philosophy and closeness and originality of observation that would do honor to the best of our female essayists. Didactic and moral, without either dogmatism or cant, they interest by their novelty and freshness, and please by the clearness and precision of their expression. Having for her object the elevation of her sex "to its peculiar and best attitudes," Mrs. Richards addresses herself especially to the young women of our country, not one of whom, we venture to say, will be able to rise from the perusal of this volume without confessing to have received both profit and gratification.

MEMOIRS OF MRS. JOANNA BETHUNE. By her son, the Rev. George W. Bethune, D. D. With an appendix, containing extracts from the writings of Mrs. Bethune. This is the last work of its lamented author. None who have ever read the lines addressed to his mother by the Rev. Dr. Bethune can fail to form a vivid idea of the tender feeling he has displayed in his biography of that mother. To use the language of its editor, it is "a beautiful living tribute by a gifted, affectionate son to his sainted mother." In it other Christian mothers may find beautiful examples for themselves and their daughters.

From D. APPLETON & Co., New York, through W. P. HAZARD, Philadelphia:—

ESSAYS. By Henry Thomas Buckle, author of "A History of Civilization in England." Learned and industrious though he was, the lamented author of the history of English civilization left but few other literary remains. Among these brilliant few, are the two essays contained in the present volume: "Mill on Liberty," and "The Influence of Women on the Progress of Knowledge." The first of these is in the main directed against the tyranny of public opinion, and involves questions in regard to religious toleration about which there may be many shades of difference. The remaining essay is a masterly and ingenious eulogium of the deductive system in logic, reflecting brilliantly upon woman as the mistress of that system, and upon the influences her imaginative and emotional mind has exercised upon the colder and harder mind of man, reinforcing even logic by its poetry, and accelerating the progress of knowledge. Prefixed to the essays is an interesting biographical sketch of the author, of whom a photographic likeness faces the title-page.

From TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston, through T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

THE POEMS OF ADELAIDE A. PROCTOR. If not the most imaginative, Miss Proctor is certainly the sweetest of living English female poets. Her poems are welcomed everywhere, by the highest and the humblest, by rich and poor, by learned and unlearned. Enshrined in the blue and gold volume before us are the first and second series of her "Legends and Lyrics," and "A Chaplet of Verses," the latter being her most recent publication.

BROADCAST. By Nehemiah Adams, D. D., author of "Ages and the Little Key," "Bertha and her Baptism," etc. This is a volume of brief religious reflections, or apothegms, originally designed by their author to serve as hints in preaching. These seeds of religious truth and sentiment possess a richness and vitality which cannot fail to render them productive of good in the hearts of those by whom they may be received.

THE GRAVER THOUGHTS OF A COUNTRY PARSON. By the author of "The Recreations of a Country Parson," etc. We are never wearied of the Country Parson. His lighter essays were models in their way, and their personal gave unalloyed pleasure. The volume before us is a collection of his serious, which are quite as worthy of attention. They are characterized by the same chaste elegance of diction, and their subjects are most judiciously selected. They are such as will be likely to please all, even the most fastidious and sensitive on doctrinal points, who have a taste for serious reading; while, in their plainness and simplicity, they are not beyond the comprehension of any. Being practical sermons, they are, as such, calculated to do good far beyond that accomplished by those of a theoretical or doctrinal nature.

A PRESENT HEAVEN. Addressed to a Friend. By the author of "The Patience of Hope." Like its predecessor from the same pen—"The Patience of Hope"—the present work is one of an eminently spiritual character. It will be best and most feelingly appreciated by cultivated and deeply religious minds, partaking, in some slight degree, at least, of that "ecstatic" temper which is developed to its widest extent in the seraphic visions of a St. Theresa.

THE STORY OF THE GUARD: A Chronicle of the War. By Jessie Benton Fremont. This is a narrative, drawn up from personal observations and experiences, and from private and official letters, of the history of the famous body-guard of Major-General Fremont. Mrs. Fremont, we need scarcely say, has made her story as interesting to the mass of readers, as it will be specially valuable to the future historian. The proceeds of its sale are to be appropriated to the benefit of the families of the "Guard" who perished in its brief but brilliant and eventful career.

TITAN: A Romance. From the German of Jean Paul Friedrich Richter. Translated by Charles T. Brooks. In two volumes. Jean Paul Friedrich Richter is best known to American readers by the "sayings" and "aphorisms," with the name of "Jean Paul" as their author attached to them, which have been so long floating in the current of our literature. "Titan," which we now have for the first time complete in an English dress, is his longest, and, it is claimed, his greatest and best work. Whether it will become as popular with us as the "sayings" we have referred to, remains to be seen; though we are inclined to hazard the opinion that few of those who may purchase it simply as a romance will be able to struggle through the first volume. Nevertheless, "Titan" is a glorious prose poem, in which Richter has given his fancy and imagination full play, mingling together philosophy and metaphysics, sentiment and mysticism, humor and satire, wit and erudition to an extent that, to all but a few peculiarly constituted or cultivated tastes, will not be likely, on the whole, to prove agreeable. While we cannot but praise the conscientious faithfulness of Mr. Brooks' translation, we must express our regret that he should deem it necessary to be so literal. His Germanized English, though it may remind those acquainted with German of "Jean Paul the Only," does not always make pleasant reading.

From DICK & FITZGERALD, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

MRS. HALLIBURTON'S TROUBLES. By Mrs. Henry Wood, author of "East Lynne," etc. Mrs. Wood's novels are necessarily popular, because she possesses the gift of depicting human nature with rare truthfulness. The present volume lacks the dramatic interest that has pervaded most of her previous works; but this loss is fully supplied by the high moral lessons which the story inculcates. Mrs. Halliburton is a model woman, and the excellence of her training of course produces model children. The reader will become absorbed in the narrative of her struggles with poverty and misfortune, and her ultimate success in bringing up her sons to occupy positions of usefulness and distinction. As a foil to this bright exemplar, we have the family of the Dares, in which an illustration is presented to us of the evil money can exert when not rightly used.

From J. A. BRENTS, New York, through HENRY DEXTER, New York:—

THE PATRIOTS AND GUERRILLAS OF EAST TENNESSEE AND KENTUCKY. The sufferings of the patriots. Also the experience of the author as an officer in the Union Army. Including sketches of noted guerillas and distinguished patriots. By Major J. A. Brents.

From CARTER & BROTHERS, New York, through MARTIN & BROTHER, Philadelphia:—

PARISH PAPERS. By Norman Macleod, D. D., author of "Wee Davie," "The Gold Thread," etc. There is a remarkable power and earnestness in the writer of this book. He makes subjects, that have been familiar to all who read religious works, seem like new discoveries in the Gospel of salvation. He dedicates his book to his own "parishioners of London, Dalkeith, and the Baronry." We think he must have a loving people, as well as admiring hearers. The "Thoughts on Christianity" and "The Close of the Year" are discourses of remarkable interest.

THE LOST JEWEL: A Tale. By A. L. O. E. There are few writers who have sustained a high place in religious literature with such uniform success in every new contribution, as the writer of this book. "The Lost Jewel" seems one of her best. She should have the warmest thanks of parents for her invaluable aid in the religious enjoyments of home; for are not books that entertain the young, while instructing them in the best truths of this life and of the life to come, worth more than the mere money price?

THE BIBLE AS AN EDUCATING POWER AMONG THE NATIONS. By John S. Hart, LL. D., Editor of the "Sunday School Times," Principal of the Model Department of the New Jersey Normal School, and author of "Mistakes of Educated Men." We have not room here to notice this work as it deserves; in our "Table" next month we shall give it another place. In the mean time, we counsel all our friends to procure a copy of this small, but most valuable work.

From J. E. TILTON & Co., Boston:—
LEGENDS OF CHARLEMAGNE: or, Romance of the Middle Ages. By Thomas Bulfinch, author of "The Age of Fables," and "The Age of Chivalry," etc. The publishers of this interesting volume have made it beautiful in its perfection of paper, type, and pictorial illustrations. It looks what it is—a fitting repository for those gems of genius which have brightened the literature of the world, and been reset, either in the prose or poetry of every European language. Young persons of both sexes will find this book useful, as well as entertaining. True, its fictions are not the histories of those old times, but still this romance is probably the nearest approach we can make to the life and feeling, modes of thought, and manners which prevailed during the Middle Ages. The Introduction is exceedingly interesting.

MORNING, NOON, AND NIGHT, from the same publishers, is not a book, but a new picture, drawn by the celebrated artist, Darley, and photographed by Soule. It represents a little child in the arms of an old man (its grandfather, probably), while the mother, in her noon of love, which is the light of childhood, regards them as the perfection of her joy. The grouping is perfect, and the effect is true to the best feelings of our nature, because it calls forth tenderness for infancy, reverence for age, and blessings on maternal love—the true sunlight of home happiness.

From GOULD & LINCOLN, Boston, through SMITH & ENGLISH, Philadelphia:—

LYRA CELESTIA. Hymns on Heaven. Selected by A. C. Thompson, D. D., author of "The Better Land," "Morning Hours at Patmos," "Gathered Lilies," etc. This is a large and handsomely printed volume of nearly four hundred pages, filled with choice specimens of the best devotional and religious poetry in the English language. It is a treasury of piety in the form which reaches all hearts that love God—the expression of Faith, Hope, and Charity in songs and hymns. Poetry, more truly than prose, harmonizes with religious feeling, because poetry exalts the thoughts from common things, tenderly drawing the mind from the work-day world, as it were, and giving us glimpses of a higher and holier life. This book is well worthy its charming title. The compiler has shown good judgment in the selections, and a deep sympathy with these songs of the soul.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

GODEY FOR MARCH, 1863.—The first Spring month is considered as an event among the fashionables. It will be seen that we have not been unmindful of their wants, by the varied fashions that we publish in this number. See our Fashion-plate, colored, and others. Six figures in the colored Fashion-plate! In addition to this, we give a sweet steel engraving, "The Expected Letter," with an excellent illustrative story. "The New Sewing Machine" is also published in this number, a companion plate to the "Old Sewing-Machine" in January number. Our subscribers may make the comparison. The old sewing-machine we rather prefer in some respects, but the new one is cheap at the price.

OUR NATAL DAY.—The small fry of magazines ought to celebrate our birthday. Had we never been born, they would not; at least their magazines would not have been in existence. There is not one of their publishers who can honestly say that he has not copied every idea from our Book. We watch them closely, and the slightest alteration we make is sure to be repeated in some of them.

THAT MOUSE on page 699 of our December number. A lady friend has made us a present of her workmanship of this pretty article; and very pretty as a pen-wiper it is. As he appears, we would not like to trust cheese in his neighborhood. He looks, if not quite as pretty, as knowing as the fair donor of his mouseship.

TO CANADA AND UNITED STATES SUBSCRIBERS.—Remember that we have no person soliciting subscriptions for us; and no person has any authority to receive money for us, either for back or coming subscriptions.

THE "GERMANTOWN TELEGRAPH."—When we chronicle a new year, we know that our friend of the Telegraph is not far behind us; indeed, we believe that he is rather ahead of us—certainly the only two publications in this country that have been conducted by the same proprietors for so many years. Thirty-three at that; and yet Freas and ourself are but young men, although we have so long been publishing. The Major is rather our junior in years, although our senior by a few months as publisher. Time has dealt gently by this genial gentleman, the best publisher of an agricultural paper in the United States, the admirable host, the fast friend, and the accomplished gentleman.

The Telegraph is published in Germantown, Pa., at $2 a year, by P. R. Freas, and we recommend it for its excellent agricultural matter, and its admirable stories.

COPYING.—The "Tiger Slipper" in our December number has already been copied, and is for sale in the stores. It was original in Godey's Lady's Book.

THE EL DORADO AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY of California has sent for a large number of the Lady's Book, to be distributed as premiums. We believe that our work is the only one used as premiums by the different agricultural societies throughout the Union.

SOMETHING ABOUT ADVERTISING.—It is pretty well known that all persons who wish to convey to the world the fact that they have articles to dispose of, generally seek that publication having the greatest respectability and largest circulation. Hence it is that those who have fashionable articles to dispose of, or fashion matter that they wish the public to be made aware of, seek the Lady's Book, as it is the only magazine that the public look to as the real exponent of the fashions. Where you see the most advertisements, be assured that that publication has the largest circulation.

A Sharp Game.

NEW YORK STATE, Dec. 30, 1862.

Club of $10.

I had almost given up trying to get a club this year, for there are not many that will pay for a Book; they all think they can borrow. For my part I have got through lending. They practise a pretty sharp game here. They ask you to lend the Book, as they think they will subscribe. And when they have read it, and copied the patterns, they bring it home, and say they cannot afford it, when they never intended to take it. Such a set of people is our place composed of, nothing but a set of borrowers.

We like to see a little happy self-felicitating, and can do a little complacency or that sort ourselves, with much ease and satisfaction. Therefore we enjoyed a part of the mild rambling of a cotemporary Easy-Chair gossip the past month, only smiling a little at the happy ignorance it displays of the claims of others, as a senior is apt to do, when youth expatiates on its own peculiar and exclusive triumphs, forgetting that the world existed and rolled quietly on its way before the advent of so much talent, intellectual vigor, and sprightliness!

Our young "pea-green friend," just "twelve years and eight months old," by his own candid showing, cannot of course recollect, and is therefore excusable for overlooking the fact, that long before his magazine was thought of, the Lady's Mail Book, as he so happily styles his senior by twenty-one years, was not only "stimulating" the "American talent and business enterprise" which have called out his own existence, but paying liberally for the contributions of such writers as

Miss Leslie,	Mrs. C. Lee Hentz,
Miss Bacon,	W. Gilmore Simms,
N. P. Willis,	H. T. Tuckerman,
Hon. J. K. Paulding,	Mrs. Sigourney,
Marion Harland,	Mrs. A. B. Haven,
Metta V. Victor,	Mrs. A. M. E. Annan,
Hon. Robt. T. Conrad,	Richard Penn Smith,
Dr. Robt. M. Bird,	Joseph C. Neal,
John Neal,	Miss Townsend,
Rev. H. H. Weld,	Mrs. S. J. Hale,

T. S. Arthur, and "soon secured and has ever retained a circulation" not only "greater than any other periodical of its class," but than any other American periodical whatever.

Moreover, "we still live," though our cotemporary, "Graham," whose liberality and whose contributors in a literary point of view have never been surpassed, has left us only "the sweet remembrance of the just," a fragrance which we do not find clinging to the "pea-green" holiday bouquet of our chatty and agreeable young neighbor.

We may notice a little matter in connection with our vaunting friend. We published an article written by the Rev. H. H. Weld. It was copied into an English publication. The English publication, to localize it, changed dollars into pounds, and Chestnut Street into Regent Street, making it an English article. Our friend let it be copied in his magazine as an English article, and thus were the public regaled by an article supposed to be taken from an English magazine, which the American public had enjoyed from the Lady's Book some months previous.

Can our cotemporary show such a list of contributors? Ours are American; his are mostly English.

TAKE NOTICE—In future, letters will not be answered asking for more than our terms call for. The number of copies that the money sent for will pay will be forwarded.

GODEY'S FASHIONS are the only correct ones given in the United States. Others give colored figures, not caring whether they are the fashions or not. We appeal to every lady acquainted with the fashions, milliners and others, whether we are not correct in our assertion?

THE OPERA.—We may run counter to our musical editor in this our expressed opinion, but such as it is we give it. We hope the opera may never succeed in our city until the prices are reasonable. One dollar and fifty cents is too much to pay for an evening's entertainment. The price is usually $1; secured seats, $1.50. A party, who have not secured seats, will go into the house and will find every eligible seat marked "Taken." This is to induce the gentleman of the party to go back to secure seats. He does so, and pays fifty cents more, and he and his party are issued into some of the very seats that he had previously seen marked "Taken." If there is anything of a "run" expected, the manager takes great pains to sell all the best seats to speculators, and from them you must purchase at a most extravagant rate. We have ourselves been at the office on the morning of an opera night, and found no seats but on the fourth, fifth, or sixth bench, when no one could have been there, previous to ourself, who had taken seats. Why is this? Let us have a manager who will put secured seats at $1, and not allow a seat to be taken until the books are open in the morning. The excuse is that they cannot afford to play for $1, or they have to pay such high salaries to the singers. Is it not better to have 2,500 people in the house at $1 each, than 1,000 at $1.50? For this is the result. The late season was a failure, and very properly so. And why pay such high salaries? These opera singers get enough in one week to keep them for a year, and are therefore able to hold out against any reduction. But it is useless to waste argument on this subject. The opera is a failure with us, and very properly so.

The article above was written in reference to the Italian Opera. Since that time, the German Opera has performed here a very successful engagement at $1 a ticket, and nothing extra for reserved seats. So successful has it been that they advertise a second series.

Mo., Dec. 19, 1862.

It certainly is the most popular magazine in America, a reputation it has enjoyed for many years, and I hope it may continue to circulate for many years to come, to cheer the firesides of many family circles. I shall always endeavor to continue it in my family, both for the instruction of my children and the benefit of all.

Mrs. H.

Club of $10.

ILL., Dec. 23, 1862.

Cannot do without the Lady's Book. I hinted to my wife at the dinner-table that times were so hard we had better do without Godey next year. But she wouldn't hear to it. Said she would do without this, that, and the other, but Godey she must have. It is decidedly the best magazine published. Long may you live to cater to the wants of our lady friends! G.

MISSING NUMBERS.—Subscribers, take notice! When you miss a number, write at once for it. We are not bound to supply numbers when you renew your subscriptions—numbers that you have lost by losing or otherwise. You say to us that you did not receive them. Well, then, send for them at once, when you miss them, and we shall be better satisfied in supplying them.

RECEIPT WANTED—A lady writes us: "Will any of your numerous correspondents furnish me with a receipt to combine meats for soldiers' purposes?" We presume our correspondent means for soup.

OUR MUSICAL COLUMN.

THE pretty little song which we present to our friends in this number is the production of Mr. Work, whose Kingdom Coming, Grafted into the Army, etc., have become so widely famous. We give him cordial welcome to the Book, hoping to hear from him often. Some of his best songs, in sheet form, are named below.

New Church Music Book.—The Voice of Praise is a splendid new church singing book of near four hundred pages, just published by O. Ditson & Co., Boston. A careful examination of this work impels us to give it very high praise. Many of the tunes by the editor, Mr. Hamilton, are beautiful, while the old church melodies retained are selected with taste and judgment. The elements of music, at the beginning, are clearly explained, and interspersed with numerous secular pieces, adapting the work also for singing schools, musical conventions, and the social circle. We will undertake to purchase and mail single copies to any of our friends for examination on receipt of $1 00.

The Silver Chord—This is the title of a delightful collection of songs, ballads, duets, and quartets, with piano-forte accompaniment, also published by Messrs. Ditson & Co. Nearly two hundred favorite melodies, secular and sacred, are given in the volume. They include the best compositions of Donizetti, Verdi, Balfe, Glover, and others, embracing operatic, patriotic, humorous, and other selections. Many of these songs have never been published before excepting in sheet form.

Catholic Church Music.—Root & Cady, Chicago, publish six choice selections from Haydn, Mendelssohn, and Weber, adapted to Latin words by Prof. Girac, for Catholic choirs. They are, O Lux Baeta Trinitas, 15 cents; O Quam Suavis Est, 15; Panis Angelicus, 35; O Vos Omnes, 35; Tantum Ergo, ten pages, 50; Ave Maris Stella, 15. We can send them on receipt of price, either singly or in sets.

New Sheet Music.—Root & Cady also publish Kingdom Coming, the famous song by H. C. Work, author of our music in this number, 25 cents. Grafted in the Army, 35. We'll go down Ourselves, pictorial title, same author, 30. God Save the Nation, quartet, same, 15. The Battle Cry of Freedom, celebrated song by G. F. Root, 25. Warzel's Liberty Song, 25. Our Comrade has Fallen, 15. O, Ye Tears, by Franz Abt, 25. Sweet is the Hour, 25. Mother, Blame me not for Loving, 25. Sweet Wife, our Baby lies under the Snow, 25. All beautiful songs.

Also, the following pieces, etc.: Brilliant Variations on Kingdom Coming, by Grobe, 50. Shadow Waltz, introducing the famous air in Le Pardon, 30. Florence Polka Mazourka, 25. Springfield Polka, very pretty, by Rink, 25. Ma Belle Polka Redowa, 25. Winfield Schottische, 25. General Grant's March, 25. These are all fine pieces, and any of them will be purchased and promptly forwarded upon inclosing the amount to the musical editor, J. Starr Holloway, Philadelphia.

New Musical Periodical.—We shall commence the publication, early in the spring, of a new musical monthly periodical, to be devoted solely to the publication of piano music. Each number will contain from three to four 25 cent pieces of music, or their equivalent, the whole to be printed from regularly engraved plates, on sheet music paper, with a distinct and beautiful title-page to each, making a splendid, cheap, and valuable volume at the end of the year. Terms $3 00 per annum. This is the cheapest opportunity ever offered our friends to obtain the best music at a fourth of the usual price. Any information will be given by addressing the musical editor, at Philadelphia.

J. STARR HOLLOWAY.

ANNUAL FLOWERS.

THERE is nothing adds so much to the effect of a flower garden as a judicious selection of annuals from seed. The early flowering shrubs have done blooming; the hot weather has destroyed the beauty of your roses; it is then you can appreciate the fragrant stock, or stock gilly, the sweet Mignonette, the brilliant beds of Portulaca and Petunias, that gem of annuals the Phlox Drummondii the showy Zinnia, the exquisite colors of the German Balsam, and the lovely cerulean blue of the trailing Lobelia erinus speciosa, so beautiful too for vases and hanging baskets. These, with many others we could mention, contribute greatly to the attractiveness of the garden during the summer months. Then, again, how easy they are to cultivate, and how trifling the expense; for one dollar you can have a package of twenty choice varieties forwarded, postpaid, to any part of the loyal States or territories, with full directions how to cultivate.

To the seekers after novelties, and new and rare plants, roses, gladiolus, dahlias, we would refer to our new list for 1863, recently published, which will be mailed to all applicants.

We will also mail to all who inclose a three cent stamp Dreer's Garden Calendar for 1863, containing a select list of vegetable and flower seeds, plants, roses, trees, vines, etc., with a large amount of valuable information for their cultivation and management.

Address HENRY A. DREER, Seedsman and Florist,
327 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

WHEN a person sends us a subscription for the Lady's Book in connection with another magazine, we send our work off immediately and order the other. It may be some days before they receive the other work. That is not our fault. They must wait. Perhaps the other magazine may be out of numbers. But they will receive it, if they will only have a little patience.

AMERICAN LADIES MARRIED IN FRANCE.—What a farce! A respectable pork merchant makes a fortune here and takes his daughters to France. There is a regular intelligence office in Paris of American fortunes, supplied by an agent on this side of the ocean. Sprigs of nobility, with no fortune, apply at this office, and a title is bartered for the merchant's fortune. Can such marriages turn out well? The future will speak.

"HALF A LOAF IS BETTER THAN NO BREAD."—So a person wrote us, asking us to take $1 50 for a year's subscription to the Lady's Book, and promising to tell nobody that we had taken that price. Now as we did not want the bread, and she did, we do not consider the offer a fair one. We offered to send the half loaf six months for $1 50, but she declined.

CALIFORNIA, Dec. 10, 1862.

Club of $11 50.

The Lady's Book is our greatest treasure. It is indispensable. It is a luxury we cannot do without. I would advise every mother and daughter to take it, as one of the best companions for old and young.

JUVENILE DEPARTMENT.

CHARADES IN TABLEUX.

This delightful way of passing sociable evenings is becoming quite fashionable, and affords much amusement to the performers, as well as interest to the audience. The only apparatus is a curtain, or folding doors, and such costumes as are found in the trunks and closets of every family. They are very effective if the performers are children; though, of course, much patience is necessary in training them into graceful attitudes and good expression.

CHARADE I. SWEETHEART.

TABLEAU I.—SWEET—

The stage must be fitted up to represent a pantry, with jars of sweetmeats, and other nice things arranged on the shelves. Upon the floor, in the foreground, the smallest boy, who will sit still, is seated, with a large jar marked "Jam" between his knees. One hand is in the jar, while he embraces it with the other arm, and looks into it over the edge. To his right, is a table, upon which stand bowls of sugar, tumblers of preserves, and cake. Two little girls are standing by the table: one cutting a piece of cake, the other eating lump sugar. To the left, a little boy is pouring from a bottle, marked "Sweet Currant Wine," into a tumbler. Under the table a very little girl is seated, eating a large slice of pie; behind the boy with the wine is a chair, upon which stands a little girl, reaching up to a shelf for a jar marked "Sweet Pickle." In the background (centre), is an open door, within which stand the mamma, papa, aunt, and uncle, the two first raising their hands in horror, the others laughing heartily; the children, not seeing them, must all face the audience.

TABLEAU II.—HEART.

The scene is a parlor, and filled with children, all of whom hold either sealed envelopes or open letters. Two little girls, seated on a sofa, are looking at one letter; two more in a corner are defending a sealed envelope from two boys who try to snatch it. In the foreground, a group are collected around one little girl who holds an immense open sheet, with a crimson heart pierced by an arrow, filling the centre. The words "St. Valentine offers you a heart," are written underneath in large letters.

TABLEAU III.—SWEETHEART.

If possible, an outdoor scene is the prettiest for this tableau; but if that is difficult to arrange, a parlor scene will do. The lovers should be as young children as can be trained for their parts. The little girl is dressed in a fanciful peasant's costume; a short scarlet petticoat, clocked red and blue stockings, and black slippers, with scarlet bows. The dress of dark blue woollen is looped to show the petticoat, and laced in front over a white bodice. A white handkerchief is plumed over the hair to meet under the chin. She holds a bouquet in her right hand; in her left, she holds one flower, which she offers to the little boy.

He is dressed in sailor's costume. Full white pantaloons, black pumps, a blue woollen shirt, trimmed on the broad collar with white stars, a tarpanlin hat, and black necktie. His right arm is around his sweetheart's waist, and while his left hand takes the offered flower, he leans forward to kiss her cheek, while she coyly keeps just out of reach. Upon the ground, on one side, is a basket with sewing or knitting in it, and on the other side, a cane with a bundle tied in a handkerchief beside it.

After each scene, the audience must be called upon to guess the syllable, and at the end to give the whole word. It is well to have some one in the audience who knows the words, to call them after a sufficient time is given for the real guessing.

MISCELLANEOUS AMUSEMENTS.

Magic Breath.

Put some lime-water into a tumbler; breathe into it through a small glass tube. The fluid, which before was perfectly limpid, will gradually become white as milk. If allowed to remain at rest for a short time, real chalk will be deposited at the bottom of the tumbler.

Mysterious Mirror.

Write some words with a piece of French chalk upon a looking-glass. Next wipe it over with a handkerchief, upon which the words will disappear. But if you breathe upon the glass the letters become visible again. You may repeat this a great number of times.

Electric Spark from Brown Paper.

Procure a sheet of strong brown paper; thoroughly dry it before the fire; place it upon your thigh, holding its edge with your left hand; with the cuff of your right sleeve, rub it smartly backwards and forwards for a minute. Next place your knuckle near it, and a brilliant spark will be emitted, accompanied by a snapping sound. If, instead of your knuckle, you present a fork towards the paper, three sparks will be seen to come from the brown paper. This must be performed in a dark room.

The Dancing Egg.

Fill a quill with quick-silver, and seal up both ends securely with good wax. Boil an egg hard; detach a small piece of the shell from the small end, and insert the quill into the body of the egg. Place the egg on the table, when it will not cease to tumble about so long as any heat remains in it.

"As I have sent you a club, won't you send me an extra copy?" How tired we are of seeing and answering this modest request! It is unnecessary for us to multiply words upon this subject. Therefore, once for all, we cannot afford it, and won't do it. Will that suffice?

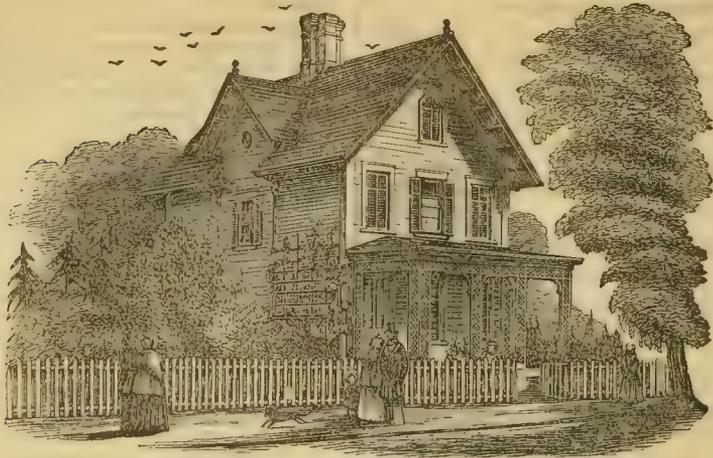

TO COLOR PHOTOGRAPHS.—A new preparation called Newton's Prepared Colors for Albumen pictures is for sale by J. E. Tilton & Co., Boston. Price, with a bottle of Reducing Liquid complete, with full directions for painting, so that any person, though not an artist, may paint in a most beautiful manner, and very rapidly, the cartes de visite, and photograph, etc. $3 25.

There has been offered for sale a worthless imitation that will injure the photograph. See that the box obtained has the name and seal of J. E. Tilton & Co., Boston, who are sole agents for the United States.

J. E. T. & Co. have also beautiful copies of flowers from nature (photographs) for coloring with these colors, or for copies for drawing and painting, which they will send by mail for 25 cents each. Also, cartes de visite of all distinguished persons.

POSTAGE ON THE LADY'S BOOK.—Postage for three months, if paid in advance at the office where it is received, four and a half cents.

COUNTRY RESIDENCE.

The above design is taken from a work published in New York by Messrs. Harper & Brothers, entitled "Villas and Cottages," and is the best work upon rural some cases it might, and in but few would they be lessened. The less publicity in regard to money matters, the better.

FROM "Holbrook's U. S. Mail and Post-Office Assistant":—

LOSSES BY MAIL.—By one of the regulations of the P. O. Department, Section 207, it is required that before an investigation is ordered, as to a reported loss by mail, satisfactory evidence shall be furnished, not only of the depositing of the letter in a post-office, but that the alleged contents were absolutely inclosed. Experience shows that attempts are frequently made to make the post-office a scapegoat for failures of this kind, when the guilt lies in quite another direction.

To those who have occasion to make remittances by mail our advice is to get drafts or checks whenever convenient. When cash must be sent, employ a reliable disinterested witness to see the money inclosed and the letter deposited. But avoid calling the attention of either the postmaster or any of his clerks to the fact. Not that this would increase the risk generally, but in

SEWING-MACHINE IMPROVEMENTS.—The additions that have recently been made to some of the sewing-machines are new to us, and doubtless will be to many of our distant subscribers. The Hemmer we are all well familiar with, but on a late visit to Wheeler & Wilson's Broadway establishment, we were shown various other labor-saving contrivances.

The Marking Gauge is used for marking the width of tucks and hems, instead of the slow process of pencilling or basting them.

The Binder, invaluable for manufactories or work-rooms, is used for folding the binding on the edges of ladies' dresses, cloaks, coats, hats, caps, gaiters, etc. No basting is necessary.

The Braider, in this present rage for that effective ornamentation of dresses and sacques, is extremely simple, and incalculably rapid in its execution.

The Corder any seamstress can understand would be a great help in dressmaking and underclothing.

"We are waiting patiently—having a nursery full of growing juveniles—for the 'stocking darning,' and 'knee and elbow patcher,'" says a clever young matron near us. But Mr. Wood, who presides so politely at the saloon of this favorite manufacturer, assures me that the gentlemen engaged night and day in "prospecting for a button-hole-worker" shall turn their attention to these domestic requirements at an early day. When these are achieved, their machine will have no more to accomplish, and the maternal emancipation from the bondage of the wardrobe will be complete.

A SEAMAN was asked by a lady how he felt when the waves dashed over him (having just returned from a voyage where he was nearly shipwrecked)?—"Wet, ma'am, very wet," was his reply.

OLD POSTAGE STAMPS.—We decline furnishing any one with old stamps from envelopes. We have no faith in their being wanted to manufacture papier mache.

JUST PUBLISHED. FOR HOLIDAY PRESENTS, THE BUTTERFLIES OF AMERICA, Parts 1 and 2, of 12 plates each, in a most elegant French case.

No former attempt was ever made to transfer on paper the American butterflies, in all the original colors which Nature lavished upon them, and we are confident that, as a work of art, they will favorably compare with any of the best French or English productions. Pleasing and instructive for young and old, they cannot fail to give the highest enjoyment wherever presented. These, together with our Autumn Leaves, are just the thing for the PARLOR, TABLE, PHOTOGRAPH ALBUM, AND THE CHRISTMAS TREE. Price for one set, 12 cards, 50 cents, or 8 cents each. Sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

Book, Picture, and News Dealers should send in their orders at once.

Local and Travelling Agents wanted everywhere.

We want every person, man, woman, or child, who may read this advertisement, to send for our Circular, containing the whole list of our many WAR PUBLICATIONS, etc. etc. Circulars will be sent free to any person who will send us their address.

It may not be amiss for me to add my word of praise to thousands of others. Your Book has been a regular guest in my house since 1849, and I can truly say we could not keep house without it. It comprises everything needful. With it the poorest are rich, the saddest happy. And that you may be spared many years to enjoy the blessings of life, and bless us with the monthly visits of your Book, is the fervent prayer of all the ladies.

SEASONABLE CONDREMS. —

What opera is like a crinoline?—Rose of Castile (rows of cast-steel).

Why is a lame dog like a boy at arithmetic?—Because he puts down three and carries one.

MESSRS. J. E. TITON & Co., Boston, have for sale all materials for the different styles of Painting and Drawing taught in their book, ART RECREATIONS. They will send a price list, if requested, and answer necessary questions, and will send, post paid, the book for $1 50. It teaches Pencil and Crayon Drawing, Oil Painting of every kind, Wax-work, Leather-work, Water Color Painting, and hundreds of fancy kinds of drawing, painting, etc. etc.

PHILADELPHIA AGENCY.

No order attended to unless the cash accompanies it.

All persons requiring answers by mail must send a post-office stamp; and for all articles that are to be sent by mail, stamps must be sent to pay return postage.

Be particular, when writing, to mention the town, county, and State you reside in. Nothing can be made out of post-marks.

Mrs. R.—You may be fat, fair, and forty, and good-looking. But we do not keep an intelligence office, and cannot therefore procure you a housekeeper's situation.

O. H. L.—Could not read your writing. Have not the remotest idea what you want.

Miss L. B.—Piercing the ears is not a painful operation. Any respectable female, or your family physician will do it.

Miss S. H.—We have not the time at this season of the year to look over back numbers for articles. Mention the number you want, and we will send it.

Mrs. V. H. B.—Hair powder, we are sorry to say, is becoming fashionable. At a late wedding in this city the brides wore gold powder in their hair, and the bridesmaids wore silver powder. What next?

Eileen.—Your question is ridiculous. How should we know anything about what are the first symptoms of love in a young lady? If you had said gentleman, we might have given you our early experience.

Miss H. A. V.—We cannot tell you what to do under the circumstances. Be guided by the advice of your mother, if you have one. Conceal nothing from her.

Miss W. H. B.—You have mistaken our meaning. We admire crinoline in moderation; but certainly not when it is so extensive that in a small room it knocks over all it comes in contact with.

Chemistry for the Young.

LESSON XXII.—(Concluded.)

547. All our experiments on potash and soda have set out with the principle of generating these alkalies from potassium and sodium. However, you will easily infer this cannot be the method employed in commerce. The alkaline metals do not and cannot occur in nature uncombined, their tendency to unite with oxygen is so great. The source of potash is the ashes of land plants. The source of soda, either the ashes of sea-weed or else common salt. We will now go through the exact process for making potash, and will describe the process for making potassium.

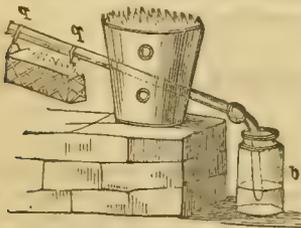

548. Put a small fragment of acetate or citrate, or any vegetable salt of potash, upon a slip of platinum foil; apply the heat of a spirit-lamp flame. The vegetable salt of potash, whatever it be, first grows somewhat liquid, and turns black; but finally, on the continued application of heat, it whitens—the white product being carbonate of potash, only differing from ordinary commercial carbonate of potash, termed pearl-ash, in the circumstance of its being absolutely pure. Now, it may easily be conceived that if this salt of potash, which we have burned on a strip of platinum foil, had been burned within the structural tissue of a vegetable—still carbonate of potash would have resulted. Hence, commercial carbonate of potash is made by steeping the ashes of land plants in water, filtering and evaporating the solution. Perform the experiment on some wood ashes; demonstrate in the filtered liquid the existence of an alkali, by yellow turmeric paper, or reddened litmus paper; or a fixed alkali, by the permanence of the discoloration effected on the test papers; evaporate the solution to a very small bulk, in order to obtain the alkali in a concentrated state. Prove, by means of lime-water (468, 2), the existence of a carbonated alkali. Evaporate another portion to dryness; add an acid—say acetic; mark the effervescence, without any odor of burning sulphur; again demonstrative of the presence of a carbonate (419).

549. The first step in the generation of potash, and consequently potassium, is the production of a carbonate from the ashes of land plants. The next step is involved in an operation we have already many times conducted. It is as follows:—

550. To a hot solution of carbonate of potash add lime-water. Carbonate of lime falls; therefore, potash, minus carbonic acid, and dissolved in water—in other words, liquor potassæ—must remain. By this process, substituting cream of lime (419) for lime-water, is liquor potassæ made.

551. Evaporate liquor potassæ to dryness, and fuse the result, in a silver spoon, over a spirit-lamp flame; pure potash should be the result, but it will be always mixed with a little carbonate of potash, generated by the atmospheric carbonic acid. From this it may be separated by pure alcohol, which readily dissolves potash, but not its carbonate. Evaporate the alcoholic solution, and potash will remain.

552. From potash, which is a compound of potassium and oxygen, potassium may be separated by intensely heating potash, in contact with iron turnings, placed in an iron tube, as illustrated in the following diagram:—

The potash, in fragments, is put next the closed end of the tube, in the part pp: the iron turnings are put into that part of the tube which lies within the furnace. As soon as the turnings have become intensely heated, a wire support, containing ignited charcoal, is hung on beneath the portion of the tube marked pp, thus causing the potassium to melt, and to leak through the ignited iron, which latter immediately robs the potash of its oxygen, and liberates potassium into the bottle of naphtha, b. Sodium is prepared in a manner precisely similar, from soda.

553. We will not conclude this part of our subject without going through the experiment of generating that which we believe to be the amalgam of ammonium. Put a globule of sodium into a large test tube of German glass; add an equal volume of mercury, and apply heat. Flame is developed, and the metals unite into an amalgam. Wait until the amalgam has grown cold, then add a concentrated solution of sal ammoniac in water, and agitate. The amalgam increases enormously in bulk, as though it had combined with a metal which it is presumed to have done, i. e. the metal ammonium. We cannot, however, obtain this metal, for, on separating the amalgam from its liquid, and exposing it to the air, ammonia is evolved and mercury alone remains.

554. Step by step we have now concluded that portion of our outline lessons which have reference to chemistry in the abstract. We shall next describe the use of the blowpipe, and an outline of the process of smelting, particularly in relation to silver and gold.

Fashions.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

HAVING had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editress of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Spring and autumn bonnets, materials for dresses, jewelry, envelops, hair-work, worsteds, children's wardrobes, mantillas, and mantelets, will be chosen with a view to economy, as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godry, Esq.

No order will be attended to unless the money is first received. Neither the Editor nor Publisher will be accountable for losses that may occur in remitting.

The Publisher of the Lady's Book has no interest in this department, and knows nothing of the transactions; and whether the person sending the order is or is not a subscriber to the Lady's Book, the Fashion editor does not know.

Instructions to be as minute as is possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice. Dress goods from Evans & Co.'s; mourning goods from Besson & Son; cloaks, mantillas, or talmas, from Brodie's, 51 Canal Street, New York; bonnets from the most celebrated establishments; jewelry from Wriggens & Warden, or Caldwell's, Philadelphia.

When goods are ordered, the fashions that prevail here govern the purchase; therefore, no articles will be taken back. When the goods are sent, the transaction must be considered final.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION-PLATE FOR MARCH.

Fig. 1.—Spring suit of gray alpaca. The skirt has a fluting of alpaca sewed in between the dress and facing,

The braiding can be done with black braid, or in braid two shades darker than the dress. Corsage plain, with a fluting down the front; belt, with fancy buckle. The tulle is of the same material as the dress, and trimmed to match. White silk drawn bonnet, with soft crown, trimmed with plum-colored ribbons.

Fig. 2.—Green silk mornings-robe, trimmed down the front with a white ribbon sewed on in a Grecian pattern, and covered with a black lace insertion. Corsage made with revers of white silk, edged with black lace. Sleeves trimmed to suit the corsage. Standing linen collar, with green neck-tie and plain chemisette. Fancy muslin cap, trimmed with green and white ribbons. The hair is dressed in one of the new styles. It is crimped, and the right side is rolled carelessly back, caught with fancy side combs, and falls quite low on the neck. The left side of the hair is dressed in a quantity of small frized curls.

Fig. 3.—Dress of gray summer poplin, with a band of blue silk quarter of a yard deep on the edge of the skirt. The band is richly braided with black braid. Corsage made in the Figaro style, with bands of blue silk braided, which finish at the back with two long ends, also braided. Fluted muslin ruff and blue neck-tie. The hair is rolled off the face, and dressed at the back in a bow, very low on the neck.

Fig. 4.—Dress of rich black silk, with a tablier front of purple moiré, bordered on each side with a quilting of black ribbon and a black lace edge. The sleeves are made with an elbow, and trimmed with satin ribbon and lace. The coiffure is of black lace. The hair is rolled off the face on both sides, and is dressed in a bow at the back. On the left side only, a ringlet falls on the shoulder.

Fig. 5.—Child's dress of white poplin, trimmed with Magenta silk. Rice straw hat, trimmed with Magenta velvet.

Fig. 6.—Home-dress of dark cuir-colored alpaca, trimmed with braiding and black ribbon. A silk quilting is on the edge of the skirt, and is carried up the seam of each breadth for the distance of about half a yard. Black silk point, in front only, five inches deep, which finishes in a sash at the back. Zouave jacket, very short in front, and finishing in a jockey at the back. Fluted ruff and plaited shirt. White muslin cap, with a hanging crown, and trimmed with black lace. A coronet of white lace and flowers, also ribbon streamers at the back. The hair is rolled and dressed with steel side combs.

FASHIONABLE DRESSES.

(See engravings, pages 228, 229.)

Fig. 1.—Mude-colored poplin, with a mude silk founce fourteen inches wide. Corsage pointed behind and before. Sleeves open from the elbow. Black velvet bows down the front of the dress.

Fig. 2.—La Vallée brown poplin dress, trimmed with a black pinked founce, headed by a chicoré ruche. This founce extends up the front in zigzags. The sleeves are trimmed to match the skirt.

Fig. 3.—Dress of dahlia-colored silk. The skirt is trimmed with eight or nine double chicoré ruches, made of black silk, extending to within a quarter of a yard of the bottom of the dress. These ruches are surrounded by two very narrow founces like the dress. Low corsage, with Marie Antoinette fichu of the same material as the dress.

Fig. 4.—Dress of mude-colored reps, with revers on the skirt, trimmed round with quilled ribbon. The openings between the revers are filled in with narrow ruffles either of mude or black silk. A plaiting of reps is on the bottom of the skirt. The plastron of the body and the cauntlet on the sleeves are trimmed with a quilled ribbon.

CHITCHAT UPON NEW YORK AND PHILADELPHIA FASHIONS FOR MARCH.

The weather continues so cold that Spring Fashions are not yet thought of, and we must defer saying much about them until next month, when we hope to have reliable information respecting them.

Crinoline reigns triumphant, and, consequently, skirts are still worn very full. The back breadths are faced with a patent lining, a stiff material to be had of all colors, and which causes the dress to spread very gracefully. The newest hoops which we have seen are from Mme. Demorest's. They are gored, very wide at the bottom, tapering to the waist, so small, indeed, that the hoops fit closely to the figure. Many of the hoops are covered with a white or colored case, on which is buttoned a deep founce, which may be changed to a white or colored one, as the weather may permit. By adopting this method, a lady may be always well-jorponie.

Among the latest toilettes from Mme. Demorest's, whose styles are always marked by grace and originality, was a cuir-colored taffetas. The skirt of the robe was trimmed with a superb passementerie of lace and jet, sewed on in braids, and edged with a rich tassel-like fringe. The body was plain, finished with two points in front like a vest, and open nearly to the waist, showing the soft lace madonna, simply finished at the throat by a ruching of Valenciennes. A border of the passementerie, without the fringe, was laid flat around the back of the dress, and the same trimming extended down the back of the sleeve, which was shaped to the arm, but left slightly flowing so that an undersleeve was required.

Another dress less pretensions, but perhaps more elegant, was a very rich black silk. The skirt was trimmed with a narrow fluting, which was carried round the bottom and up the sides, in the tunic form, to the waist. In the space left between the trimmings were placed rosettes, edged with lace, and with steel centres. An edge of black guipure formed the heading to the fluted border. The body was trimmed with a fluting to imitate a jacket, which it did perfectly.

A novelty for morning costume consists of a black silk skirt, over which is worn a robe of plain colored taffetas, open in front, and shorter by six inches than the black skirt. A very fine box-plaited border surrounds the upper skirt, and by a series of shells, unites the two sides of the front.

At the same establishment, we learn that the spring trimmings will consist altogether of narrow borders round the bottom of the skirt, sometimes carried up the sides or front. They will be of flat gimps, braiding, guipure, quillings, or stamped velvets. Most of the waists will be made with a plaited or plain jockey at the back. For dinner or evening dress, silks will be made with peasant's waists, with guipures of puffed muslin or illusion fitting closely up to the throat, and with long puffed sleeves close at the wrist. Skirts will be set on with a large box-plait directly in front and with large gathers at the back, box-plait being used at the sides.

The large gathers have the effect of making the skirt fall more gracefully at the back.

Toilets, such as we have described, are very beautiful to look at; but unless worn over a well-made corset, lose much of their effect. The most elegant, and, at the same time, most comfortable corsets, are those made by Mme. Demorest. Quite a novelty in this line appeared in the London Exhibition. It was a corset thoroughly ventilated by innumerable eyelets, and we should think this an excellent invention; for, though absolutely an indispensable accessory to the toilet, they are exceedingly warm. We should think that stout persons would hail this novelty with delight.

The fashionable coiffures are now so elaborate that it is almost impossible for a lady to be à la mode, and not wear false hair. The repugnance which was formerly felt at wearing false hair no longer exists; and bows of hair, curls, and braids are purchased as a headdress. To those who have but little hair, or are not skilful in the art of hair-dressing, or have but little time to devote to the toilet, we recommend the bows and chignons now in use, as they can be very readily pinned on without any trouble.

On page 593 of the June number, are three styles for dressing the hair, which are now the rage, and will be found both graceful and pretty. Some of the styles, however, are greatly exaggerated, and suited to but few persons. Full crêpe bandeaux, rolls of all descriptions and sizes, frizzed curls, etc. are much worn. We frequently see two or three rolls in front, the upper one very high on the head, and the back hair also arranged in three rolls, very low on the neck. Again we see puffs on top of the head, with bunches of flowers or ribbons directly behind them, also hair brushed over a cushion, and tufts of curls on top of the head, between the bandeaux or rolls. Pearl, gold, silver, and steel powders are exceedingly fashionable, and well suited to these elaborate styles. To some, powder is very becoming, though we do not particularly admire it, and think it will be but a transient fashion. The ordinary gold powder has a very poor effect; but when gold leaf is taken and cut exceedingly fine, and the head powdered with it, the effect is charming.

The coiffure Maintenon is one of the new styles. It is arranged with a touffet of short frizzed curls over the top of the head, double bandeaux on each side, sometimes a long ringlet behind the ear, and the back hair arranged in a bow or puffs.

Headdresses are worn higher than ever in front. Bunches of ribbon or velvet, the size of two hands clasped together, are placed directly in front, and the larger they are, the handsomer they are considered. Others have a bunch of feathers or flowers over the forehead, and a scarf carried straight over the side of the head and from thence falls on the neck. Small wreaths are also worn on the side of the head.

For home wear, lace barbes are arranged with a loop, and end over the plait or roll at the side of the head, and carried over or below the back hair to the opposite side of the head, where they are pinned in a larger bow, and end just behind the ear. Black lace bows with stiff linings are also worn in front between the bandeaux, and when lined with white, are very effective.

We pass now to cloaks, which, at Brodie's, are mostly of the talma shape, of medium length, richly trimmed with braiding, passementerie, or lace. Some are confined on the shoulders by two wide folds retained by buttons. It is, however, too early for a great variety of styles, except in opera cloaks, which are really beautiful. Besides the numerous white cloaks made in every variety of style, was one of a black and gold striped velvety material. It was of the sack shape, with a seam down the back, and the stripes meeting in points. The cloak was finished all round with a rich black and gold cord. The hood was lined with a gold-colored silk, and trimmed with handsome cord and tassels. The sleeves were large and turned up with gold-colored silk. Another distingué mantle was of white plush, striped with black. It was also of the sack shape, and trimmed with a bias band of scarlet plush, a quarter of a yard wide, bordered on each edge with a quilled scarlet ribbon. The collar was of scarlet; so also were the revers of the sleeves.

For theatre, concert, or opera, bournous, or sacks, with alternate stripes of white, and a bright color, either blue, scarlet, or Magenta, although not new, are quite fashionable. Some are trimmed with ruches of the two colors, sewed on in a pattern; others are bound or bordered with silk, velvet, or plush.

For a very elegant wrap, nothing can be more stylish than a lace shawl. Some have white centres, and are trimmed with three rows of lace, the centre one white, and the others black. A black lace shawl, lined with white silk, and trimmed with a deep white silk or chenille fringe, is very distingué.

Black lace sashes are very fashionable; the full set, that is, belt, bow, and long ends, can be bought for $26. Bretelles sometimes come with the sets, and are very elegant.

Muslin scarfs and bows continue to be worn, also scarfs made of silk a quarter of a yard wide, with the ends ravelled to form a fringe. These scarfs are tied in one bow, and two ends reaching almost from shoulder to shoulder.

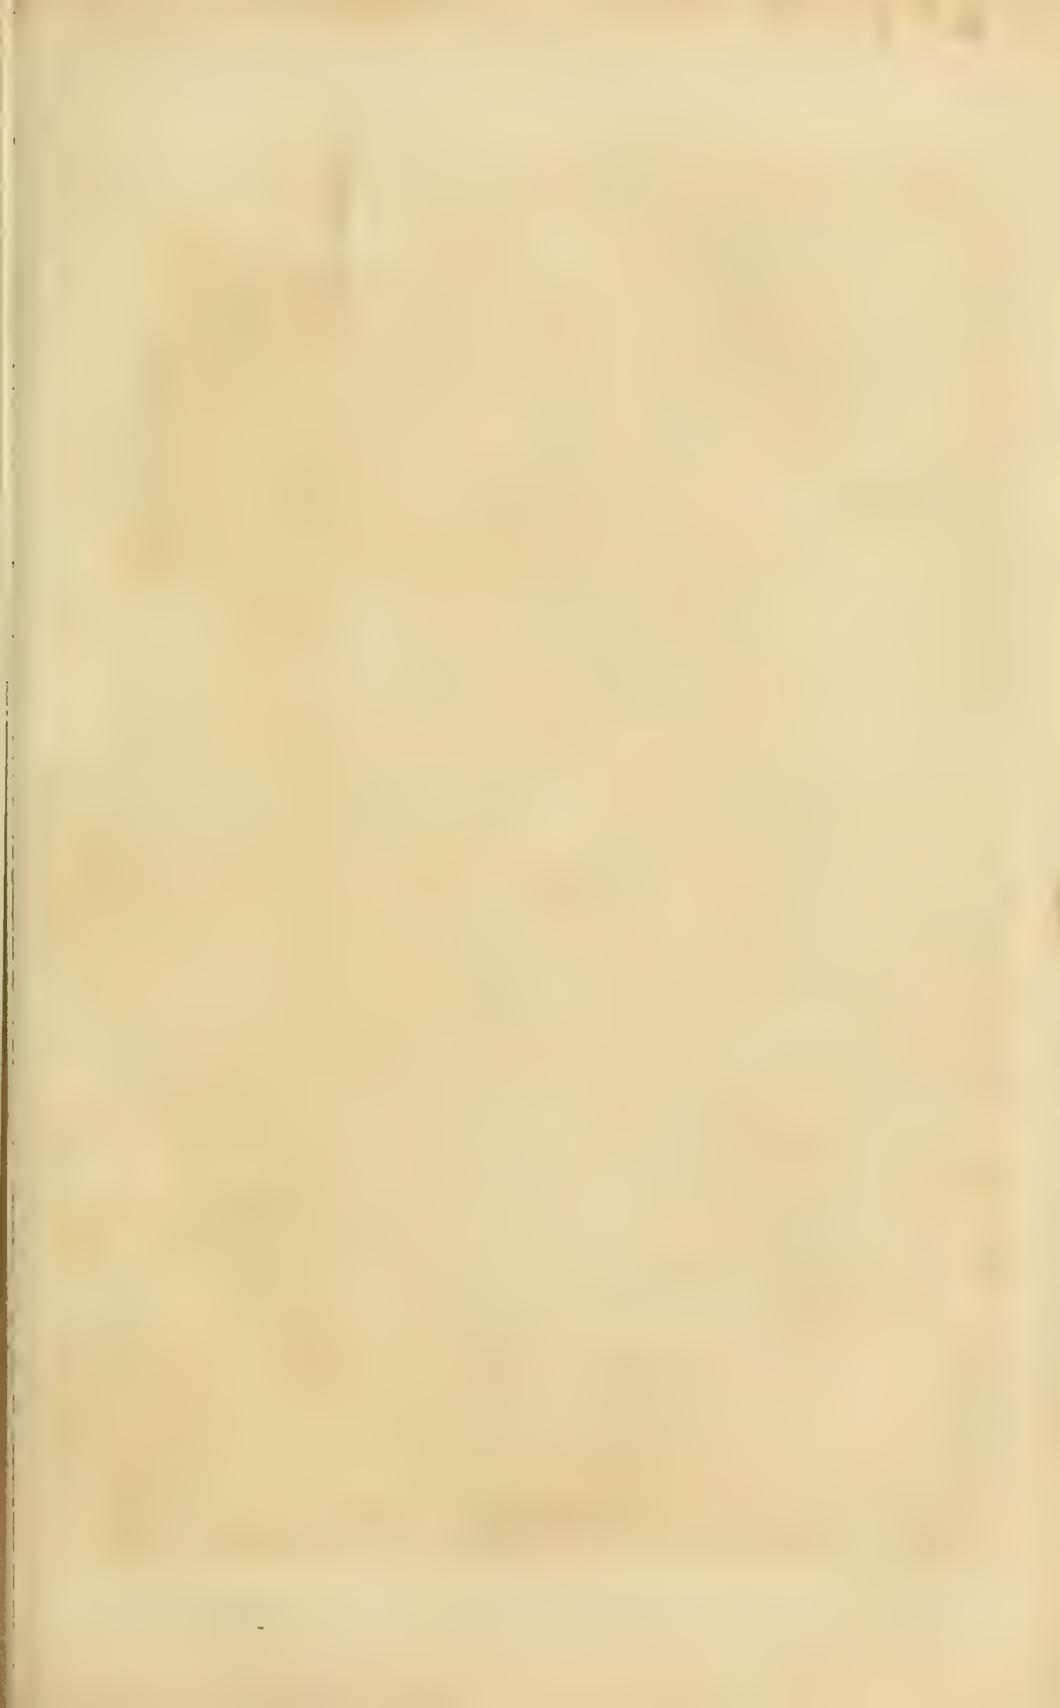

Children's dresses, instead of having a distinctive character as formerly, are now only their mammas in miniature. The skirts of their dresses are braided or trimmed with ruches and bands. The waists are zouaves or Garibaldi's, or else low and cut square with tucked or embroidered muslin chemisettes to the throat.

Alpaca will be one of the fashionable spring materials, and a very pretty dress is of gray, mode, or steel-colored alpaca. The skirt is trimmed round the bottom with a very narrow ruffle of Magenta silk. The bodice is a zouave, trimmed with bands of the silk and chenille fringe. The sleeves are open to the elbow, and trimmed to correspond. A chemisette of white cashmere, embroidered or braided with Magenta, should be worn with the zouave on cold days, and can be replaced by one of white muslin, when the weather is warmer. This is a very pretty street costume, with the addition of a white muslin scarf, tied in a bow under the chin. The hat can be of gray straw, with a feather to match the trimming of the dress. Points and sashes are invariably worn by children.

The most fashionable wrap for little girls, after leaving off the thick winter sack, will be the Red Riding Hood. This is a talma of red cloth, flannel, or merino, pinked, bound, or trimmed with a quilting. It has a round, drawn-up hood which can be pulled over the head. It is a very convenient wrap for a watering-place, where something of the kind is always needed towards evening. It is also very suitable for infants, and easily made.

Nothing new has yet appeared for children's hats; but, by next month, we think the styles will be determined.

SPRING DRESS.

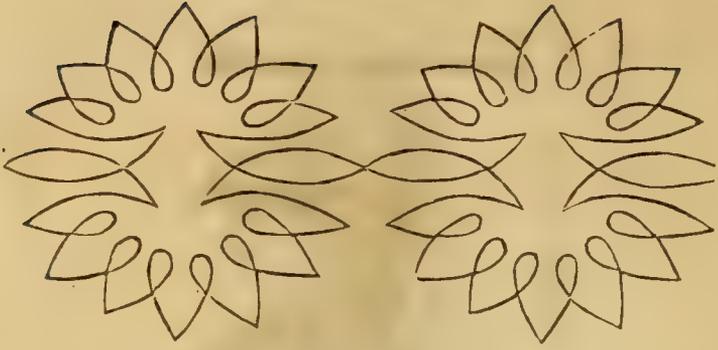

Lavender silk dress, trimmed with narrow black silk ruffles.

SPRING DRESS, BRAIDED.

Dress of steel-colored alpaca, braided with heavy mohair braid. We can furnish the full size patterns for this dress.

BRAIDING PATTERN.

SPRING DRESS FOR A YOUNG LADY.

The dress is of nankeen-colored alpaca, trimmed with quillings of purple ribbon and bands of black velvet, with frog buttons down the front. The style is quite new, the skirt being gored to form a point or corsage. The jacket is cut away very much in front, and forms a jockey at the back. Shirt and sleeves of French muslin, trimmed with crimped ruffles.

THE DARRO.

[From the establishment of G. BRODIE, 51 Canal Street, New York. Drawn by L. T. VOIGT, from actual articles of costume.]

A glance at our illustration explains the style of its construction. The material is a black silk, of the thickest and richest Lyons manufacture. A heavy cord marks each division of the gored seams up the back. The cuffs are bordered with a ruypure edging, and the brandebourgs up the front, etc., are of the most superb pattern. Altogether its effect is admirable, and most ladylike.

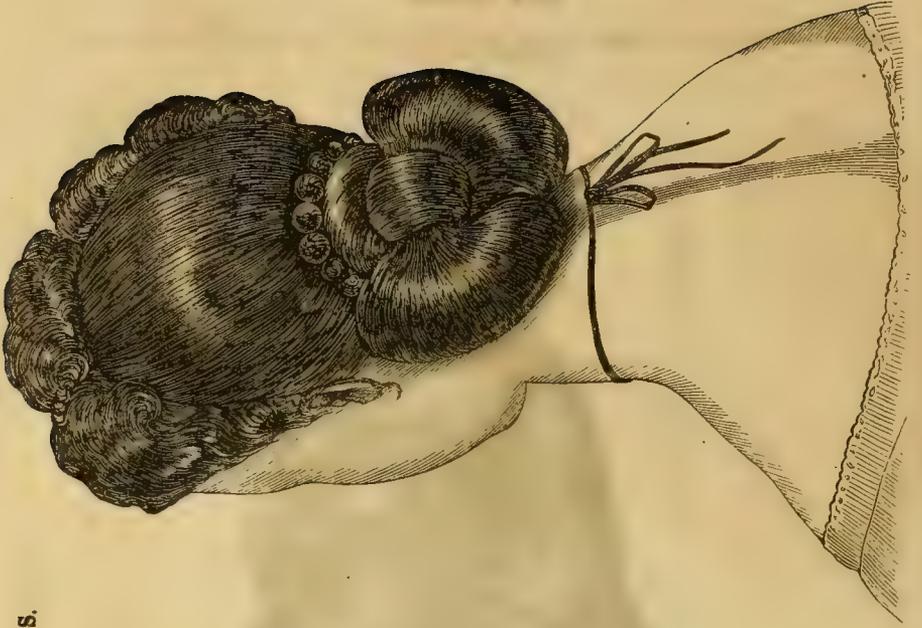

Fig. 1.—This figure has the hair crimped and rolled off the face over a cushion. The bow at the back can be arranged with the natural hair, or it can be made of a false braid. In the latter case, it is pinned on underneath the back hair, which should be tied and combed over the bow, twisted round and fastened with a fancy comb.

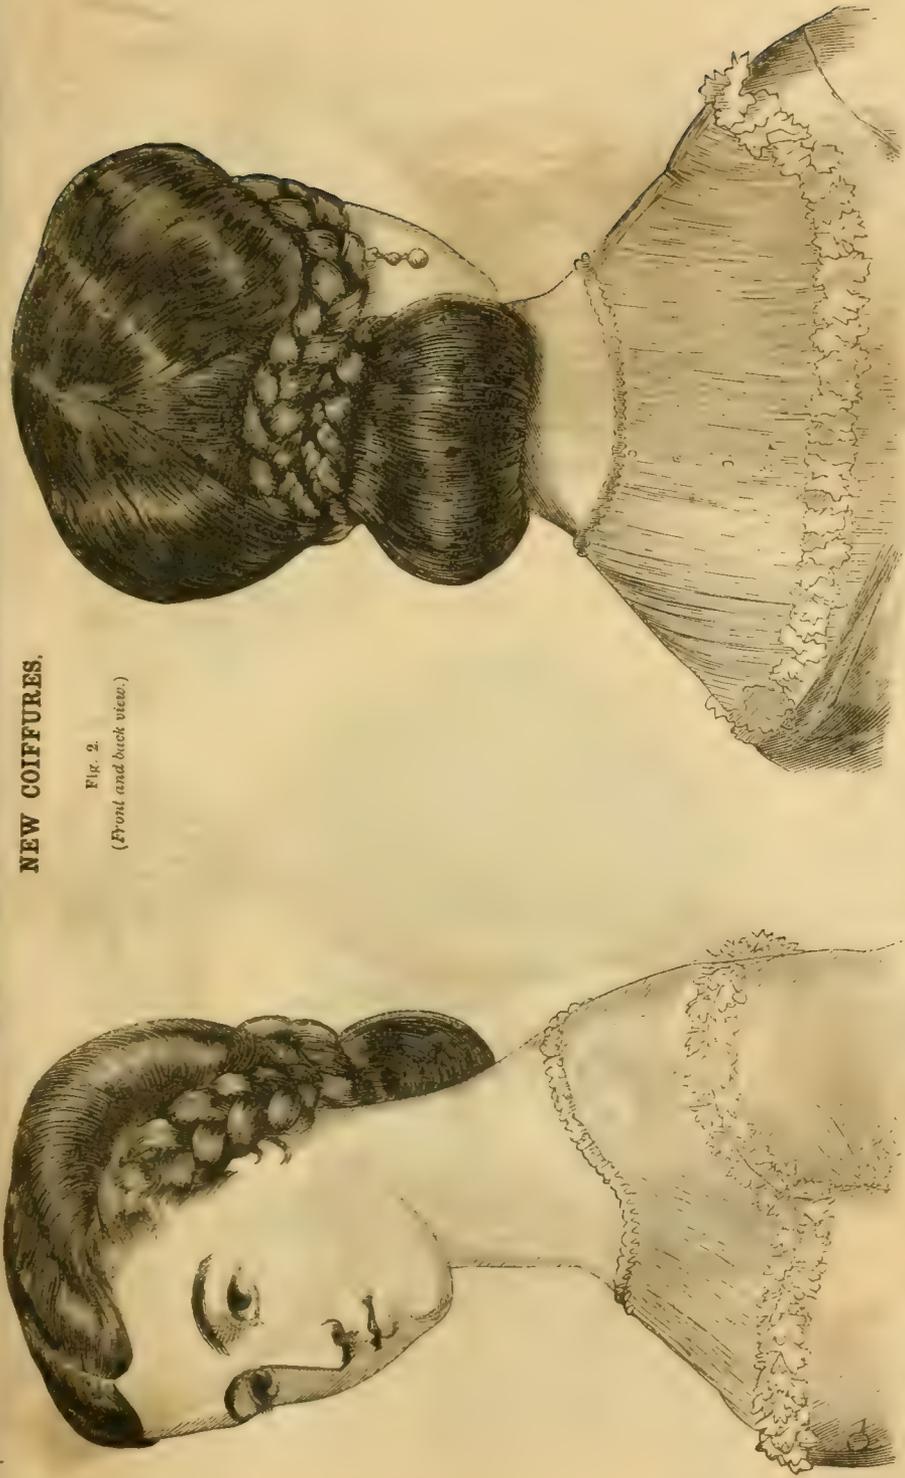

Fig. 2.—The front coiffure consists of a full roll and a plait of three strands. The fall at the back can be of false hair, pinned on, and the front plaits twisted round it, which gives it a perfectly natural appearance. When false hair is used for these styles of coiffure, they are arranged with but little trouble.

A LADY'S GLANCE AT THE LONDON INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

LACES, AND HOW THEY ARE MADE.

HAVING in our last notice reviewed in detail the brilliant display of jewellery in the International Exhibition, some account of the best specimens of foreign art might have been expected to follow in natural succession. Our attention is invited by a class of fabrics which, as regards minute critical examination, is almost virgin soil; and to enthusiasts in lace we especially address ourselves on the present occasion.

Of Brussels lace there are two distinct kinds—the valuable pointe-à-l'aiguille, to which class belong the majority of articles now exhibited, and another, technically called Brussels plait, resembling our Honiton appliqué, in which the flowers are made separately on the pillow and afterwards attached to a foundation. There are also two descriptions of the net used for groundwork. The veritable réseau, the crowning distinction of first-class articles, is made with bobbins on the pillow, and is superior to the best machine imitation only in its unapproachable fineness and the slight inequalities which reveal its value as the production of human, opposed to mechanical, industry. Although some cotton is employed at Brussels, the material chiefly used is the finest thread, made from flax grown at Hal and Rebecque. Some years ago the greater proportion was handspun; and when we consider the extreme delicacy of the operation, it does seem impossible that the dexterity of human fingers should be successfully emulated by artificial means. The finest quality of the thread is said to be made in damp underground rooms, for the tenuity is so great that contact with the dry air above would be injurious. The life of a Belgian thread-spinner being unhealthy, and her work requiring great vigilance, the price of her labor is proportionably high. She examines closely every inch of thread drawn from the distaff, and where the slightest inequality occurs stops her wheel to repair the mischief. Every artificial assistance to the eyesight is adopted. A background of dark paper is placed to throw out the slender thread, and the scene of labor is sometimes arranged to admit only one single beam of light falling directly on the work. So much for material; we now turn to construction. The different processes involved in this vary so much that each is intrusted solely to women peculiarly versed in its details. For instance, one class known by the name of platteuses are continually occupied in making flowers for the pattern on the pillow; others, again, are educated to work them in point with the needle; these when attached to net constitute a lace properly described as Brussels appliqué. Another division of the labor consists in making the real net-groundwork already alluded to, and two examples in the Belgian cases gives a clear idea of the modes in which the drocheuses execute their task. The strigueuses are perpetually employed in attaching the flowers to the net; whilst the designation of attacheuses is given to persons whose sole occupation consists in uniting the different portions of a pattern, so that it should appear to be made entire. Last, but not least in importance, come the faiseuses de pointe-à-l'aiguille, of whose skill we will now seek for evidence in the Belgian department.

It may be remembered that a certain M<sup>me</sup>. Hubert, of Paris, distinguished herself in 1851 by the exhibition of some lace flowers in every respect but color good imitations of nature.

This idea may have suggested the execution of floral patterns in relief as ornaments of a flat surface; but, at any rate, the introduction of this novelty, no less beautiful than marvellous, entitles M. Hoorickx, in our opinion, to the post of honor among his fellow-exhibitors; it remains to be seen how far professional authority will support this verdict. The invention is displayed to the greatest advantage, perhaps, in a handkerchief which presents every variety of point stitch, as well as several styles of design. At the extreme edge of the lace border is a wreath of convolvulus leaves and flowers, very fine, but simply executed; within that is a kind of arabesque pattern enriched with plumetis or satin-stitch, which is quite a new feature of the Belgian laces; and then comes the triumph of art in a border of exquisite little bouquets. The miniature flowers are all in relief, the rose showing its circling petals, and other blossoms their natural forms. The small centre of cambric is inclosed within a mechanical design of heavier substances, and the effect, no less than the details, is worthy of admiration. The price, if we mistake not, is about £200—certainly no undue return for the outlay of unusually skilled labor which must have been expended upon it, nor more than this is constantly absorbed in the purchase of luxuries which we should call utterly useless, but for the thought of the humble producers to whom they have for many a day supplied the necessaries of life. A section of flounce, half a yard wide, with flowers in the same style of relief, is also displayed. The value of the set of two would be £800; that of a tunic with berthe and handkerchief, made to order, about the same. These statistics are offered, as it is well known that the question of price is interesting to ladies, even in cases where they have no intention or desire to become purchaser; and this lace being new, even an experienced judge might be puzzled to determine its worth. Although this is scarcely more costly than the other styles of fine Brussels point, the difficulty of cleaning will most likely render it always an exceptional style of work. There is a curious silk shawl in the same compartment—white ground with colored flowers, every part of it constructed by hand, like lace; but the result is so unattractive that one feels that great ingenuity has been wasted upon it.

The collection of articles exhibited by Julia Everaert and Sisters next claims our attention on the ground of excellence, for nowhere has the ordinary Brussels point been brought to greater perfection than in the deep white flounce to be found in their case. The ground, real of course and necessarily made in sections, is finished off with a regularity equal to that of machine net, over which its fine texture gives it a great advantage; the pattern is a mélange of lilac, pansies, and convolvulus sprays, intersected by a ribbon, and giving the natural effects of light and shade. This noticeable improvement in design is of recent date; it may be remarked in each of the three chief collections of lace, but most prominently in the French patterns. The appearance of shadow is given by transparency of texture; a solid substance representing full lights. Another example of tasteful design is contributed by the same house, in the shape of a dress and shawl of black pillow lace of exquisite quality, bearing the semblance of large tropical leaves. Nor should genuine lovers of lace omit to examine one of trimming width embroidered in plumetis, and so fine that a needle would scarcely pass through its meshes. Some good specimens of white pointe-à-l'aiguille will also be found exhibited by Mme. Clippéle. A white fan, with delicate wreaths of black introduced into the pattern, is intended for mourning, and fulfils its intention very tastefully. As much may be said for the flounces and canezou which surround it. Some recent additions by Van Rossum, consisting of point sets, handkerchief, lappet, collar and sleeves, are of excellent quality, as may be inferred from the fact that each set is worth £240, and occupied four years in its construction. In short, a multitude of beautiful specimens might be enumerated, and a goodly fortune quickly assume a very portable form, in this tempting department. Before taking leave of it, we must do justice to the magnificent black lace contributed by the Maison Lepage-Kina, which carries off the palm from all rivals in this branch of manufacture. A tunic flounce and shawl of uniform scroll pattern, with drooping bell-shaped flowers, is of curiously fine and varied workmanship. This style is that recognized here as French lace; but it is certainly quite equal to anything of the kind we shall meet with in turning our attention to the contributions of France.

The character of the lace worn in Paris has undergone a great change within the last few years; and manufacturers accordingly devote much of their attention to the production and improvement of the kind called by them "guipure," by ourselves "Maltese." They have brought it to great perfection, and we must admit that it is peculiarly adapted for any service in which substance is desirable, and to which large, bold designs are appropriate. For instance, an African bournous sent by the Compagnie des Indes is very handsome; and, in such a case, we are content to accept effect in lieu of quality. The ground is thin, resembling netting, the central ornaments are horizontal bars of mechanical pattern, and the border a combination of medallions and shells, with a Greek scroll. In the same style is a half shawl, the property of M. Faure, very striking in design. A broad ribbon is represented curling round and round a wreath of large leaves and flowers, and the contrasts of light and shade presented by the varied texture add much to its beauty. Near at hand we find specimens of this same black guipure with colors intermixed in the Spanish style: there are two parasols, one ornamented with flowers of various gay hues, and another for half mourning, with the pattern white; but in neither case is the result very attractive, as in this pillow-lace the black threads of the ground mingle with the bright tints and completely deaden them. The other specimens of this manufacture are a founce in black, white, and red; some gigantic butterflies, exhibited as curiosities of course; and a variety of so-called guipure ribbons, in other words, black lace of different widths, with colored patterns, and finished off ornamentally at each edge. These may possibly be taken into favor for a time as applicable to trimming purposes; in this country they are undoubted novelties.

Having glanced at the best examples of the recent fashion in French lace, we must mention those which represent its staple production—the beautifully soft and fine thread lace called now Chantilly, but chiefly made at Caen and Bayeux. Among the various shawls and founces of this description we think the most elegant are those of M. Seguin. No one could pass unnoticed the half shawl, valued at £140, completely covered with drooping willow-boughs, amidst which we perceive baskets suspended, fountains with birds drinking thereat—in fact, a perfect Chinese garden; and this pattern is carried out in other articles of the parure. The lace of M. Loisean is also very fine, though less distinguished in ornamentation.

It is well known that, although its chief trade is in black lace, France can, by its point d'Alençon, compete with the most valuable description of Brussels; and of course, on so important an occasion, has put forth all its resources. Geoffries, Delisle & Co., otherwise the Compagnie des Indes, show in their case a wonderful fan, representing cupids swinging in a bowery garden, and likewise trimming laces of exquisite quality. There is also a founce priced at £1000; but, we venture to think, by no means worth the money as compared in effect with other laces. Point d'Alençon is, however, so seldom to be met with in articles of large size, that its value on these rare occasions becomes arbitrary; nor must we forget that its construction is most laborious.

The design, first engraved on copper, is afterwards printed off in divisions on small pieces of parchment. These are numbered according to their order, and holes are pricked along the outlines of the flowers; a piece of coarse linen is then laid on, and a tracing thread is sewn with fine stitches, which unite thread, parchment, and linen together. Two flat threads, held beneath the thumb of the left hand, are then guided along the edges of the pattern and fixed by minute stitches passing through the holes in the parchment. The skeleton of the lace thus completed, the centres of the flowers must be filled up. The worker supplies herself with a long needle and very fine thread, and with these she works a knotted stitch from left to right, successive rows of which at length fill up the interstices. The plain ground connecting different portions of the pattern is commenced by one thread being thrown across as a sort of pioneer, and others, intersecting it and each other, form the delicate meshes. Then there are spaces reserved for fancy stitches, termed modes; and finally, the design is enriched with an embroidery in relief, known as the brodé. When the work is so far happily accomplished, the various sections are united so skilfully that the joins escape detection, and the result is the point d'Alençon, now sometimes described as the point de Venise, the most costly of modern laces. In addition to this spécialité, France exhibits much white lace resembling Brussels plait. A large semicircular bridal veil, with small projection to fall over the face, is really perfect in design. It is a mixture of Brussels and point, and, from its style, we should conclude of Belgian origin, as far as execution goes; but the wreaths of flowers which radiate from the outer edge towards the centre are so perfectly natural in their imitation of the very accidents of nature, that we are sure half its attractions are due to France, which still unmistakably occupies the vantage-ground in ornamentation.

The reputation of Great Britain as a lace-making country formerly depended entirely on the industry of Buckinghamshire, the two adjacent counties, and the region about Honiton. But within the last fifteen years it has been further supported by the development of the manufacture in Ireland. The introduction of crochet-work by various ladies as an occupation for women during the repeated periods of scarcity and distress, was the origin of this very successful branch of our trade. Those who are acquainted only with the imitation of heavy point will be surprised on visiting the case of Messrs. Forrest to see the delicate effect which can be produced with crochet and embroidery needles. Two flounces, described respectively as "lacet point" and guipure, afford that variety and elegance in which Irish lace may have been considered for some purposes deficient. The lacet point consists of a fine groundwork of crochet, into which are introduced flowers, leaves, etc., filled in with various lace stitches. The guipure has a still more filmy foundation, in which some indication of the pattern is shadowed forth, but further defined by embroideries in buttonhole and satin stitch. This novel mode of finishing light laces, which we remarked in the Belgian department, certainly gives great richness to the material. We could scarcely point out any trimming lace superior in effect to that which is festooned around the case of Messrs. Forrest; it shows the best results of this mixed style. Mrs. Allen and Messrs. Copestake are also exhibitors of crochet lace; but the grand feature in the collection of the last-named firm is a tunic of Honiton guipure, made, as our readers probably know, on the pillow in sections, and afterwards united. This dress of ambitious, but good design is nearly covered with rich wreaths and scrolls, connected at intervals by large prince's feathers. A flounce displayed by Messrs. Uring affords great variety in the style of work, and is on all grounds worthy of admiration. Nor can we say less for the tunics of Messrs. Biddle, and Howell, and James.

The finest description of pillow-lace has always issued from the neighborhood of Buckingham; Bedfordshire producing a rather inferior article. Accordingly, we find Mr. Godfrey the chief exhibitor in the case shared by manufacturers of the midland district. In addition to the splendid black flounces of Maltese and ordinary pillow-lace which appear under his own name, he can claim credit as the producer of the admirable half shawl and dress exhibited by Northcote & Co., and the tunic which is a feature of Messrs. Biddle's assortment. We notice also a wonderful improvement in white Maltese lace, the style chiefly adopted in small articles.

It is no longer heavy and monotonous in pattern, but rather resembles a cloudy kind of Honiton. Lester & Sons (of Bedford), Mr. R. Vicars (of Padbury), and Mr. Sergeant (of Sandy), exhibit exquisitely fine specimens, very well designed, in the shape of collars, sleeves, lappets, and a bolder style in flounces. It must be regarded as a very acceptable substitute for the more expensive class of foreign laces, and we commend it to general patronage.

While lauding the enterprise of real lace manufacturers, it would be unfair to pass unmentioned the wonderful imitations of the fabric which Nottingham supplies in various styles. The Spanish shawls and mantillas, which fall little short of the original models, have deservedly obtained universal favor; it is needless to dwell on their excellence. The imitations of black Chantilly are also remarkable, the patterns and texture having been so much improved that at a little distance they would deceive an experienced eye. The same can scarcely be said of the tambour-work, supposed to represent Brussels, but it is very pretty in the form of shawls, dresses, etc., and affords employment to many poor women in London and other places.

The lovers of the gay and fanciful in lace will be attracted by a case of Spanish blondes containing articles richly embroidered in colors and gold thread. The real gem of the collection, however, is a white mantilla; the pattern, wreaths of flowers supported by flying cupids, is of solid texture, whilst the ground is light guipure. Saxony is remarkable rather for the low price than the quality of its laces; but Berlin has lately added to the attractions of the exhibition a very creditable suite of Brussels point on real ground; and the Zollverein may therefore be expected, on a future occasion, to deserve more particular mention in our general survey of lace.

ADVICE.—Be and continue poor, young man, while others around you grow rich by fraud and dishonesty; bear the pain of defeated hopes, while others gain the accomplishment of theirs by flattery; forego the gracious pressure of the hand for which others cringe and crawl; wrap yourself in your own virtue, and seek a friend and your daily bread. If you have, in such a course, grown gray with unblemished honor, bless God and die.

THE VALUE OF TIME.—One of the hours each day wasted on trifles or indolence, saved, and daily devoted to improvement, is enough to make an ignorant man wise in ten years.

THE ORIGIN OF THE FAMOUS P. H. B. SOCIETY.

DEAR LADY READERS, did you ever, on some frosty October morning, when the bright autumnal sun had just power enough to drive all chilliness from the air, and impart a cheerful glow to the whole system, making any exertion seem an absolute pleasure, watch with envy the retiring form of departing husband, or brother, or other male member of your family, as with fishing-rod over his shoulder, and basket in hand, he walked briskly down the sunny side of the street, looking back every now and then with a half triumphant nod at poor, despondent you, forced to go back into the dull house, and busy yourself with everyday concerns, instead of following that cheerful male member in his day's employment? And then, in the evening, when he came back with country appetite for the closing meal of the day, and long stories of the pleasant sail, the bright-colored forest trees, the sparkling water, the verdant countryman who was his companion, the "mighty big" fish he lost—larger than any to be found in Washington Market, and the "heaps" of small fry returned to their native element, because they were not worth the trouble of bringing home, with all the numerous et ceteras of a day's fishing, did your heart ever palpitate with renewed jealousy, and were you not ready to cry out against a cruel fate which made you feminine and denied you fishing?

At any rate, such have been my sensations, and loudly and openly were they expressed. That was some time ago, though. Now I am older and wiser. Now I could watch with perfect equanimity any number of the lords of creation depart on piscatorial excursions, could listen in the same tranquil state of mind to any quantity of fish stories, however descriptive they were of "splendid luck," or "mammoth bass." Nay, I think, instead of feeling the slightest pangs of envy, I would be conscious of a sort of contemptuous superiority over the "deluded souls that make their empty boast." Were it my brother Ned, whose tales were reaching an almost fabulous degree of gorgeousness, I could immediately bring him down again to the regions of common sense, by merely pointing to a small badge worn by us in common with six other individuals, of whom more anon.

I will tell you how all this happened; how I came to possess on this subject an enviable degree of composure not to be disturbed; how I can remain calm and contented when the rest of the female world are crying out, "Didn't you feel excited when you felt the first nibble?" "How I wish I had been there!" "I don't know what I should have done; I never could have pulled him in of course, and yet I would not have lost him as you did"—and giving vent to various exclamations, as, "oh!" "ah!" "forty pounds!" and otherwise testifying their extreme interest in the narration. I never do more than, when the story is finished, say to those nearest me, "He'd be a worthy member of the P. H. B. Society." I never tell whether the observation is a compliment, or what the mysterious letters mean.

About two years ago, my brother Ned came home one evening, and told me that a day's fishing excursion had been planned by four gentlemen of our acquaintance (of whom he was one), and that among them it was agreed that four ladies should be asked to grace the expedition by their presence. This measure was proposed by Mr. Arthur Loring, who was known to have made his selection of a fair companion for his future years, and was by no means favorably received, at first, by the three remaining gentlemen; but when the proposition was so far modified that the choice of ladies was to be confined to those more strong-minded of their sex who would consent to wait on themselves and receive no more attention than their manly companions, it was warmly seconded by all but the planner of the expedition, Mr. George Sanford, a bachelor of about thirty-five years of age, with a confirmed aversion to ladies' society, and devoted attachment to his meerschau and pocket-pincushion. However, on being warmly pressed, he gave in his adhesion to the proposition, and not only promised to bring, according to agreement, a damsel who would consent to bait her own hook and remove her own fishes from it when caught, but one who could likewise remain silent, if need were, and not frighten all the fish away.

"Oh, Ned!" I exclaimed, "will you be so kind as to ask me?"

"Ask you!" he replied, contemptuously. "I have already engaged my lady, Miss Jennie Angus. I would not have you go upon any consideration," continued the heartless monster. "You'd be so afraid of hurting the fish, or the clams, or something else, that you would not give one a moment's peace." Then, seeing I looked a little melancholy and cast down, he added: "You're too tender-hearted for such sport, sis. You wouldn't enjoy it. You had much better stay home and take care of poor Dossia here"—stroking the old white cat that lay on a cushion by my side.

This was all very well, I suppose; but it didn't comfort me a bit to tell me I was tender-hearted. I was, indeed, if it means one is ready to cry if one can't do what one wants to. The patronizing superiority of his style of speaking, too, galled me, and I was going to feel a great deal worse and show it, when a gentleman was announced, and Mr. Lawrence Blakely entered the room. He was one of the excursionists, and greatly delighted me and surprised Ned, by saying he had called to ask me to be his demoiselle for Thursday's trip. Of course I yielded a willing consent, and Mr. Lawrence Blakely upheld my courage and strength of nerve by powerful arguments against all Ned's innuendoes to the contrary. I was very glad now that Ned had invited Jennie Angus, for she and I were called intimate; and so I was only too happy to have her one of the party. I was then told all the arrangements, which I will now proceed to relate, with such other additions as we ourselves made impromptu.

First I will present you with the names of those who formed the party. The list is to be read horizontally, showing thereby the companionship in which each one went.

MR. GEORGE SANFORD.	MISS ELLEN FRANCIS.
MR. ARTHUR LORING.	MISS LOUISE MARSHALL.
MR. EDWARD HAMILTON.	MISS JENNIE ANGUS.
MR. LAWRENCE BLAKELY.	MISS SOPHIA HAMILTON.

Our destination was a country-place, owned by Mr. Sanford, situated on Long Island Sound, about twenty miles from New York. The farm consisted of thirty acres, more or less, and on it was an old-fashioned house, which had been unoccupied for many years. The village, where the steamboat landing was, was situated on a small bay, two miles by water, not much more than half that distance by land, from Mr. Sanford's place. Here we were to procure a row boat, and transport ourselves to our destination, provided we could find one large enough to contain both people and provisions.

Clams were the bait to be used, which the gentlemen thought of digging for themselves, being assured they were very plentiful all along the shore. Perhaps my readers know they can only be found when the tide is out, and so we were to leave the city in the 6 A. M. boat, by which means we would reach "the farm" before the water was high enough to incommode our muddily inclined companions in their anticipated occupation. We were to return the afternoon of the same day.

Finally, a list of the resolutions was drawn up, which we were all to sign, whereby all the ladies were prohibited from receiving, and all the gentlemen from rendering, any more assistance, relative to the baiting of hooks and taking off of fish, than was imperatively necessary, and of such imperative necessity the uninterested spectators were to be the judges.

The violation of this law was to be punished by the dismissal of the offending party or parties from the fishing-grounds for a certain specified time, varying in length according to the degree of enormity of the offence. It was also enacted that any one who possessed so large an amount of personal vanity as to refuse to clothe him or herself in habiliments suited to the occasion, their name should be stricken from the rolls of the society—by the by, I never heard of them before or since—and themselves prevented from accompanying the remaining persons on their expedition.

Each one was to remain in the place assigned him by Mr. George Sanford; "because," as he very wisely remarked, "if people were always changing their seats, no fish could be caught." Any person discontented with the place assigned him was to signify his discontent by ceasing to fish; and if this action remained unnoticed, he was then allowed to express his disgust in any manner, and as loudly as he pleased.

In addition to all these rules, there were several minor regulations concerning the employment of pantomime, unless by universal consent conversation was allowed; also to each individual's cutting his own bait, etc.

Before we returned home the fish were to be collected in one vast heap, and such being discarded as were deemed too small for use, the remainder—provided it did not exceed thirty pounds in weight—(this saving clause was suggested by Mr. Blakely, "for," said he, "we might be induced to attempt bringing home all the large ones, and thereby cause, not only the swamping of the row boat, but if the danger were miraculously escaped then, it would await us again in our passage to the city in the small steamer,") was to be taken to New York, where a boy, hired by general contribution, was to be intrusted with the responsibility of leaving it at Mr. Sanford's bachelor establishment, and the next day all the members of the society.

and such other friends as they might ask, were to repair thither, and partake of a grand piscatory dinner.

The greater part of these laws were suggested by Mr. Sanford for the control of the lady part of the expedition. Had there been only gentlemen, he said, none would have been needed.

We were also forbidden to scream, or exhibit any alarm at any unexpected little accident, such as the rocking of the boat, the falling in the water of any one of the members, the catching of eels, etc.

Thursday morning came, and with it the promise of a bright sun and a cool breeze from the N. N. W. Jennie and Mr. Blakely came over to our house and took breakfast at five, and then we all proceeded on our way down to the dock, where the "Sea-bird" landed, on board of which we were to meet the others. The first bell was ringing as we stepped upon deck, and looked around to see if we were the first at our destination. No; there, leaning over the railing, gazing down into the rippling waves, stood Mr. George Sanford and Miss Ellen Francis; the latter looking very sleepy, and certainly justifying her companion's boast relative to her silence.

The sun had not yet risen, and the early, scarce awakened look of everything made it all seem strangely unreal to me. The minutes passed quickly, and still the others did not come. The second bell commenced ringing. "They will be left," said Ned. But no. Dodging lamp-posts, boxes, barrels, and other intervening objects, arm in arm, appeared Mr. Loring and his fair Louise, advancing at much too rapid a pace for comfort or grace. They step on the plank just as it is about to be removed; a minute more, and, out of breath, but successful, they are standing on the deck by our side.

Slowly we passed our companion boats, still rocking lazily and aimlessly on the swelling tide; then more rapidly, as we reached clear water, we left behind us the sleeping city, long rows of apparently deserted houses; streets usually seen crowded with vehicles, now made noisy only by the occasional passing of an omnibus or early cart.

We were all very silent at first, and stood facing the east to see the day king come forth from his chamber rejoicing. A strange sight to city eyes, this glorious birth of the morning, heralded so silently, yet so magnificently.

"O Lord, my God, thou art become exceeding glorious, thou art clothed with majesty and honor. Thou deckest thyself with light, as it were with a garment, and spreadest out the heavens like a curtain. Who layeth the beams of his chambers in the waters, and maketh the clouds his chariot, and walketh upon the wings of the wind," "whispered Mr. Blakely, as we all simultaneously shaded our eyes from the sudden brightness.

"I never shall be able to keep awake all day, Sophie," said Jennie, "I know, for my eyelids feel now as though a pound weight were attached to each. I never arose so early in my life before. When Margaret knocked at my door and told me your brother was down stairs waiting for me, I wouldn't believe her, and absolutely refused to wake up for some minutes."

"And I had to bear the punishment for your delay," said Ned, ruefully. "I burned my tongue and scalded the entire length of my œsophagus, and feel as though the coffee were boiling yet somewhere."

"I should think it would be pleasant to feel warm anywhere," I observed, "even at the expense of a scalded interior."

"What a splendid morning!" exclaimed Mr. Blakely. "Look at that delicious cloud of gray mist resting on the quiet city, and the sparkling frost on these gaudy-leaved maples near the shore. It does one good to see sometimes how much beauty there is in the world, that ordinarily we know nothing of."

"I'm too chilly to be artistic," I answered, frostily as the morning, drawing my shawl around me.

Mr. Blakely looked snubbed.

"Everything is white and cold; and I don't see what in the world the boat starts so early for. I never knew what an absurdly uncomfortable hour six o'clock on an October morning was, or I shouldn't have thought of going to-day."

"Oh, Sophie!" said Ned. "Giving out already? I thought you'd only be tender-hearted to spoil your enjoyment. I did not think you'd be both cross and lazy. As for the time the boat starts, I'm very glad it does go so early, for now Sanford and I can have the pleasure of wading in any depth of mud we please, and finding the nice white clams hidden away deep down in the sand. O it will be splendid!"

"If you're going to wade in mud, how will you find clams in the sand, and such delightfully clean ones, too?"

"O, goosie! It's mud on the top and sand under; and the clams are full of water, and always wash themselves off before you pick them up. I say, George, has your place a pretty shore?"

"I have only been there once," replied Mr. Sanford, "and then it looked charming. The lawn stretches to the water, where there are huge rocks, and beautiful flowers growing in the crevices, and—and—"

"But is there any beach?"

"O yes! The man I took it from—foreclosed a mortgage, you know—said there was a very good beach on one side."

"And, Mr. Sanford," exclaimed I, delightfully, "of course there are shells, and seaweed, and strange little skeletons of sea wonders?"

"I can't say," he replied, rather doubtfully.

"Perhaps there may be. I didn't ask."

"But you're sure there's good fishing?" said Ned, anxiously. "Any little fragment of a dead crab, or piece of oyster-shell will serve as a curiosity for Sophie."

"O, there must be good fishing, for the man told me some of the poor people lived almost entirely on what they caught in the water."

"If that's the case," said Mr. Loring, "I don't see why we need take anything more than some bread and butter with us, for we can make a fire and broil our fish—and then a clam-bake would not be a bad idea. 'A clam-bake.' Doesn't that sound like the seashore?"

"What a delightful time we will have! I wish the boat would go faster," exclaimed Jeannie.

"There are some sandwiches in here," said Ned, pointing to a basket beside him. "I think it better not to depend too entirely on the products of our fishing."

"Don't you think we shall catch anything?" questioned the silent Miss Francis, anxiously.

"Probably, yes," he replied. "But there is such a thing as bad luck, and I like to be prepared under all emergencies. I would be more hopeful were the wind a little more from the west."

"Silence that despondent male member with the basket," said Mr. Loring. "Learn, sir"—turning to the offending party—"that prophecies of evil are not tolerated by this society. Those who don't feel hopeful must pretend they do; those who are chilly must not shiver"—with a half glance at me; "if any one's head aches, please preserve secrecy on the subject"—observing that Miss Francis's head rested on her hand; "in all things if you can't be, at least seem to be, and it will answer all practical purposes."

"Act well your part, there all the honor lies, be our motto," said Ned.

Thus laughing and jesting, with occasional veins of serious talk, we reached the landing. Through a narrow channel of discolored seawater, the little steamer ploughed its way, on either side a vast extent of mud flats, where the bay ought to be. Some row boats high and dry on the shore far in the distance; a small sail boat half overturned on some tangled sea grass nearer, and three or four very muddy individuals, each with a basket and rusty hoe, digging down into the by no means fragrant, oozing, slushy ground in which they were standing—such was the rural view presented to us when we arrived at B—. One of the muddy humanities, a colored gentleman, looked up as we stepped on the shore.

"What are you about, darkie?" shouted Ned.

"Diggin' clams, massa," he replied, touching his brimless head gear, and holding towards us as he spoke the basket half filled with what looked like a quantity of the black mud around him interspersed with some stones of various sizes.

"Sanford," said Ned, laughing, "he's diggin' clams; hadn't we better buy ours? What say you? I don't think I should enjoy the amusement after all, though if you still think it presents attractions—"

"Say no more, Ned. I am always willing to oblige a friend."

So the clams were purchased, the boat hired, and we all stepped in, Ned entering last, for besides stopping to parley with his colored acquaintance, he had to see after the sandwiches and another and a larger basket, containing the crockery and other utensils and necessaries for the day's meal.

"What were you saying to him of the ebon skin?" inquired Jennie, when we were a little distance from the shore.

"Merely asking whether they ever used silver hooks around here."

"Do they?"

"Sometimes. Indeed, it is quite a frequent practice with visitors, I believe."

"Are they better than the ordinary hooks?"

"You can generally catch larger fish by their means."

"I suppose they are quite expensive, the reason the common people don't use them."

"Probably that is the reason. I was also suggesting it wouldn't be a bad idea for 'Sambo' to be around when we returned this afternoon; merely that he might see what famous fish we will take home with us, of course." Ned ended his speech with a very serious drawl to the last words.

"Hamilton, you're a traitor, and ought to be thrown overboard at once, to know how it feels to have cold water dashed over one all the time," said Mr. Blakely. "You at least don't deserve to catch any fish, and I don't believe you will."

"I don't, either," said my imperturbable brother, pointing to the little waves rising and falling around us.

They were really of quite a respectable size, and, judging from myself, many sensations of fear troubled the female hearts in that little boat as it rocked first on one side and then on the other. But nobly did we adhere to the principles we had adopted, and not an exclamation arose from any one among the number, excepting once when a smothered "Oh!" from Jennie drew all our attentions towards her, and we saw that one wave more venturous than the rest had leaped into her lap; but she looked so ashamed of the womanish expression of fear that we none of us noticed it, all pretending they hadn't heard her.

At length, we reached the rock, which Mr. Sanford had told us was a natural dock, where we could easily land; but owing to the lowness of the tide, though there was still water enough for the boat to float in, the rock itself was among the regions of the unattainable, being at least six feet from the floor of the boat.

"Row to the beach, and land there, Sanford," said Ned.

On we went—mud flats everywhere. Mud flats finally prevented our further progress.

"I am sure the beach was here," said Mr. Sanford, looking mournfully around on the surrounding slushiness.

"Something the matter with our eyes—we can't see it—that's all," remarked Ned, encouragingly.

"Where were you, Sanford, when the man told you there was a beach?" inquired Mr. Loring.

"Standing on the 'dock' looking down the river; and I'm sure he pointed up here."

"Oh! that did not mean anything. That was only equivalent to saying 'over the left.'"

"If the ladies are not afraid of wetting their shoes, I think we might as well step out here as anywhere. It's salt water, and won't give them cold. Or if they don't fancy the idea, I've no doubt the gentlemen will willingly volunteer to carry them over," proposed Mr. Blakely.

Of course, with such an alternative, the ladies didn't mind wetting their shoes, and over we all stepped into a mass, to give a faint idea of which surpasses my descriptive powers, and savors of the impossible. "Wetting their shoes!" If that was what was meant by wetting one's shoes, the ladies certainly did mind it very much indeed. Not their shoes only, but stockings, skirts, everything. If they had been only wet, the misfortune would have been light in comparison. But to be daubed all over with this horrid, dark, obnoxious smelling mass was too much for human composure. Once in, there was no help for it; expressions of disgust did no good; there was nothing for it but to wade a distance of at least a hundred yards, with a fool of a man following one, making all sorts of absurd apologies for his vile proposition of landing there; knowing all the time one was looking as ridiculous as one well could, with dress raised to a height never dreamed of in Broadway, and displaying the by no means beautiful sight of a pair of what Ned calls "female nature's slim supporters," covered with black nastiness, inserting themselves each step with as emphatic expressions of disgust as such things can.

Once on dry land—never more appreciated by us than at that moment—we all turned, and with "melancholy steps and slow," made our way to the house. It was one of the old time habitations, with sloping roof, and the siding of scalloped shingles. To the dirty femininities it looked a very paradise of refuge. No sooner were we within the door than, without waiting for permission from the owner, we rushed up the crooked, rickety stairway, and shutting the door of the first bedroom we could find, seated ourselves on the floor, and bewailed our sad plight, condoling each other to the best of our abilities.

Here we remained concealed for the next two hours, waiting the drying of our clothes, while from the windows we could see the gentlemen enjoying a walk over the really pretty grounds around the house. Mr. Blakely was making a collection of the autumn leaves which were scattered on the grass; and when he turned rather unexpectedly and saw me watching him, he waved them towards me, and then holding them so that the sunlight might best display their bright colors, called out:

"Will they answer for a peace offering?"

I made no reply then; but afterwards, when they were given to me, I don't think he found me very obdurate.

At length a call from Ned certified us it was time to commence the day's sport; and so, donning such of our garments as would make us presentable, from which we had vainly striven to remove all evidences of our morning's mishap, we joined the gentlemen, and proceeded to the rock, where Mr. Sanford assured us the best fishing was.

Jennie and I wore our balmoral skirts and red flannel Garibaldi waists, that we had prepared for the occasion. A coarse straw flat, ornamented by a wreath of the leaves Mr. Blakely had given me, was supposed to protect me from the sun; but a glance at its dimensions might well have led any one to doubt its efficiency.

Miss Francis, Mr. Blakely, and I were stationed on the rock itself. Mr. Loring and Louise, though near us, were a little further to the left; while Ned and Jennie were placed, at their own request, on a small, sloping reef, where a towering pine had found earth enough to give life to its spreading branches; its whitened roots, despoiled of the covering they had once found by the encroaching waters, had twisted themselves like pleading arms around the insensate stones, and in some places, where even these had been washed away, they were twining around each other unsupported, save by their own tenacity of life. On these Ned spread a few branches, and here Jennie and he placed their fishing necessaries. Mr. Sanford seated himself on a lonely little rock which jutted out into the river, nearly covered by seaweed, and affording just room enough for him and his basket.

Contrary to all rules and regulations, Mr. Blakely had prepared my bait for me, and I felt truly grateful for his disobedience; for, notwithstanding my wish to go fishing, and my ready promise to fulfil all the obligations necessary to entitle me to become a member of the society, I no sooner saw the process of wholesale clam murder entered into to properly arrange them for fishing purposes, than I inwardly acknowledge that, rather than be compelled to perform such cruel work, I would forego all chance of a single nibble, even though aggravated by seeing my companions catch as large fish as ever decked a festive board. The convulsive efforts, utterly useless, of the poor clam to resist the murderous knife, the actual squeak he seemed to give as it pierced his heart, "made me shudder, start, and grow faint at soul;" though, mind you, I had no objections to using said bait, thus prepared; so that it could have been no moral aversion to the employment, only a mere womanish dislike to seeing the pain actually inflicted, or still more, to inflicting it myself. Owing to this assistance, I was the first, with an exclamation of delight, to throw my line in the water, and there to hold it, after Mr. Blakely had given me several lessons relative to this seemingly simple process. It took me some minutes to learn how to throw the line gracefully and lightly out as far as was practicable, and then let it fall gently in the water, without the splash and splutter sure to accompany a beginner's efforts; and when this feat had been successfully accomplished, to know when the line touched the bottom, and how far to raise it. But finally these preliminaries were all overcome, and then I was free to sit and wait for a bite. And good use was made of the freedom. I sat and waited, and waited and sat, and so on ad infinitum. One after another, the others threw in their lines, and did likewise.

"Why don't they commence biting, Mr. Sanford?" at length I ventured to inquire.

"The tide is scarcely high enough yet, I think."

"Oh!"

That surely was a very satisfactory reason why the fishes delayed their coming. The tide rose higher and higher. Still there were no bites—not even a single nibble.

"Why don't they bite now, Mr. Sanford?" after waiting some time longer.

"I'm afraid the wind blows too hard. Perhaps it will go down in a little while."

Here was a ray of hope. Perhaps the wind would go down. But it didn't.

"What's the definition of the verb to fish, Miss Sophie?" said Mr. Blakely, after a long silence.

"To catch fish," I replied, promptly.

"I think you must be mistaken, else are we not engaged in that sport. I think Webster says, 'to attempt to catch fish;' and I accept Webster's definition as the true one. I am of the opinion that is only 'attempting' to catch them."

Another long silence. The wind whistled and blew, and tossed the waves one over the other, and they were forced to bring out their little "white caps" and put them on, and then the sun smiled down at them, and they laughed back at the sun, and died away in gurgling ripples along the shore. At length I did catch something; but it was only Mr. Blakely's line. Then ensued a long and merry discussion as to the causes of said act while we were untangling the lines.

Then came a joyous exclamation from Louise, and word was passed rapidly around that "Louise thought she had felt something pull her hook!"

"If there were less talking, I think there would be more fish caught," said the grumpy Mr. Sanford.

Feeling sadly rebuked, Mr. Blakely and I resumed our fishing silently. A few minutes more, and I suddenly became conscious of a peculiar trembling sensation, communicating itself to my pole. I gave Mr. Blakely an expressive look, and directed his attention to it. The end of the rod was vibrating very perceptibly; a gleam of surprise and joy lighted his countenance.

"Pull up your line," he said in a great state of excitement. "I think there is a fish on it."

With eager, trembling hands I raised my line. All eyes were turned towards it. I felt as though a mammoth creature, of several pounds' weight, were dancing on the hook. Slowly it came nearer and nearer—we could see its white sides gleaming through the water.

"Draw it up faster, or the fish will get off!" exclaimed Mr. Blakely. Then, as with triumphant excitement I tossed it on the rocks, he added with exultation: "There! Miss Sophie has caught the first fish."

But the exultation all passed away when, on close inspection, he saw what a miserable little thing it was, scarcely larger than the hook it had managed to get in its gaping mouth. My sorrow and disappointment were extreme. It seemed so much more cruel to catch such a little thing, to say nothing of the ridicule it exposed me to. And now it behooved me to get my fish off. 'Mid the laughter of my companions, I drew the flapping thing towards me. I could not bear to touch it; so I took hold of the line a little distance from it, and examined where the hook had entered. At length I mastered courage to touch it; but no sooner had I done so, than I precipitately let it drop again. The shudder that quivered through it communicated itself to my whole frame.

"Oh, Mr. Blakely!" I exclaimed, covering my eyes with my hands, "I can never take it off. The hook goes right through its eye. Perhaps the next one won't be caught so disagreeably."

Scarcely were the words uttered, ere the little fish was liberated, and lay panting on the rock by me. I did not mind touching it so much now; though, I must confess, I first enveloped it carefully in my handkerchief, and then I walked deliberately to the extreme verge of the rock, and tossed the little mite into its native element again.

They all looked at me disapprovingly, and Ned called out:—

"Blakely ought to be cashiered; but we'll overlook his offence this time."

"I should like to repeat it, were it to insure that punishment. I think a stroll in that grove yonder would be quite as pleasant as our present occupation," said Lawrence Blakely in a low tone.

Another exclamation from Louise drew our attention again in that direction.

"I have such a large one I can't get it out of the water," she said, eagerly.

It did indeed seem to be tremendous; her pole bent, but gave no sign of yielding to her efforts to land the fish. Mr. Loring arose to assist her.

"You have caught your hook in some of the crevices of the rock," he said, when he discovered the unyielding nature of the resistance.

Up and down, first this way, then that, jerking now here, now there, one minute pulling with all the strength he dare use, the next trying to loosen its hold by seeming to yield, Mr. Loring vainly endeavored to unfasten the obdurate hook. At length—snap—it came up; the line only—minus both hook and sinker. The evil remedied, at it we all went again. And now the regular fishing seemed about to commence. Ned caught a long, smooth, soft, gold-colored fish, that he called a frost fish. Then Mr. Blakely drew up a little, lively, bluish-colored creature that nobody seemed to think worth much. After that every one's bait was eaten off as soon as it was put on for the space of ten minutes. Then Mr. Sanford triumphantly basketed a bouncing blackfish.

"They always go in pairs," said he. "Its mate must be around here, too."

Scarcely were the words spoken than, giving a scientific jerk to his line, he again commenced raising it. A dark, heavy mass appeared on the water—a stone covered with seaweed and bits of oyster-shells. With an exclamation of disgust, he tossed it away. Then came another interval of baiting hooks. My hands were covered with clam-juice, which gave them a most peculiar and disagreeable sensation. I advise all my lady friends, if they ever are so foolish as to go fishing, to be sure to wear gloves. I had not thought of taking any. Tiny pieces of clam, mingled with sand, introduced themselves beneath my finger-nails, and the fragrance was by no means pleasant. I was ready to give up in despair, when my flagging interest was again aroused by feeling something tugging at my line. This time it was a large eel. He tied the line and himself together in tight knots, and flapped his ugly tail, and squirmed, and twisted, and looked as horrid as he possibly could. I would as soon have thought of touching a rattlesnake as this obnoxious beast. Again Mr. Blakely came to my assistance. Then everybody caught a very few of the small, gray, insignificant fishes. Mr. Sanford was the only one whom any luck visited. He secured the mate to his first black-fish, and several decent sized other ones.

We all felt curious. He was cool and indifferent, and said our ill luck resulted from our ignorance of the art. We suggested, perhaps, his seat was a better one than ours. He offered to change with anybody; but no one accepted the offer. His luck increased, ours decreased, if possible. Looking around, I saw Jennie and Ned had given up trying to catch anything, and were having a nice time with some crackers, and a book that Ned had produced, provided, as he had said, in all emergencies. Mr. Sanford pulled up a large eel.

"I am positively devoured by jealousy," whispered Mr. Blakely. "And to make matters even, don't intend to let him know how soon he will be driven from his seat," pointing to the water which, gradually rising, had just reached Mr. Sanford's depending coat-tails. A pantomimic explanation secured the others' silence.

"Ned," called out Mr. Loring, "is your ceasing to fish evidence according to Rule No. 4, 5, or 6—I forget which—that you wish to change your position and try your luck somewhere else?"

"No. It's only evidence that if at length I don't succeed, I try no more. I like my position uncommonly well. Nothing could be nicer than this tree, this book, these crackers, and this companionship. But if you want my opinion regarding this expedition, solely as a fishing excursion, I'll tell you privately I think it's a failure so far. Indeed, I am inclined to believe we are not where we intended going. I have my doubts whether this is Mr. Sanford's place at all, at least the one to which he was to take us. There is certainly more evidence for than against such a proposition. Our ideal destination had an excellent sandy beach on one side; on the other, rocks covered with beautiful flowers, and fishing everywhere, and of the finest description. Where we have actually arrived, the ladies will certainly bear testimony as to the absence of any beach; and as for the rock, here certainly is one, but not, I am inclined to believe, the one. The flowers are of the same mythical character as the beach—not discernible by mortal eyes. And of the fish, with the exception of those caught by Mr. Sanford, the less said the better. Sitting here in calm contentment, watching with sublime unenvying indifference said gentleman, as with tranquil composure and in solemn silence he draws fish after fish from the water, I am suddenly struck with the simple and beautiful example he presents of a certain great philosophical principle, my friends—one which has always presented more or less of mystery to me. I allude to the attraction of gravity. No doubt you are all familiar"—

Ned's lecture was here interrupted by a sudden exclamation from the subject of it, who, with indignant disgust depicted on his countenance, was standing upright on his isolated bit of rock, wringing the water from his dripping coat appendages. Of course all immediately rushed to his assistance, with many expressions of regret for his misfortune. One offered to take his pole, another his basket, while Mr. Blakely extended his hand to assist him in springing over the little inlet that separated him from those on shore. But he declined all aid from those who, he more than half suspected, were not so ignorant of the condition he was in as they had pretended. He first threw his pole to us, then, taking his basket in his hand, attempted to vault lightly over; but unfortunately his attempt was frustrated by his feet slipping in the damp seaweed that covered the rock he was standing on, and tumble—bundle—splash! in he went. The fall, so far as he himself was concerned, was of but little moment; there was scarcely any depth to the water, and the grass prevented him from hurting himself seriously, but it was death, or rather life, to the fishes. The basket having no cover, the instant it was overturned, they found a speedy way of exit into their native element. Vain was the brisk picking up, both of himself and the basket, which Mr. Sanford, by superhuman exertions, accomplished in an instant; vain the frantic dash after their retreating forms; his prisoners had escaped, and there was no hope of their recapture. One little fellow had the impudence, after making good his escape, to return, and taking a contemplative look at his despondent and defeated captor, wriggled his little tail with exasperating defiance, then turned a complete somersault in the air and disappeared in the watery deep.

The ridiculous figure Mr. Sanford presented standing gazing despondingly on the waters that had engulfed his morning's sport, little streams of moisture creeping slowly down his coat-sleeves and inexpressibles, and dropping into the pool of water collecting and enlarging at his feet, great drops on the glossy locks and still glossier moustache, "but not of the dew," and the woe-begone, almost desperate expression of his countenance it is impossible to do justice to by mere verbal description. I choked down my laughter then, but there is no need for me to do so now. Often has the remembrance of him at that moment saved me an attack of dyspepsia. Would that I had the skill of an artist! he should be the first effort of my genius.

With a sigh, he looked into his basket; one miserable little stiff, stark, shining thing, that had caught its fin in the side, alone remained; with a deeper sigh he let the basket fall. He looked at it, then at himself, then at the surrounding company; he stooped, with high tragedy in every motion, picked up the small fish and hurled it with all his force into the water. Then fastening up his line, and disjoining his fishing-rod, turned to us and said, as he took his departure to the house: "I tell you all plainly, I am of the opinion that fishing is a confounded humbug."

With what emphasis he dwelt on the italicized word! I think, had there been no ladies near, another and stronger one would have been substituted.

All that remained of our morning's efforts were four of the smallest of the funny tribe, and Ned's frost fish. My eel had taken his departure for parts unknown.

"Loring, I am sorry we brought anything but bread and butter with us," said Ned, as we partook of our sandwiches and pie, sitting on the benches on the old piazza. "It would have been so much more rural and like the seashore to have had some of the fish boiled, and then ended up with a clam-bake."

"Ugh!" said Mr. Loring. "Never speak of a clam-bake to me as a tempting affair. I feel as though they were the most obnoxious things ever formed. I am saturated with clam."

"Don't look so downcast, Sanford," said Mr. Blakely. "Your fate is better than some of ours at any rate, for, as the poet hath it—

'Tis better to have caught and lost,
Than never to have caught at all."

Ned added some general remarks relative to his loss being a beautiful exemplification of the "admirable system of compensation in nature."

Thus ended our day's fishing excursion—the first, and does any one feel surprised when I add—the last I have ever enjoyed (?). Surely the success was not such as to excite on our part a desire to renew the attempt. Yet, strange to say, the piscatory dinner was held at Mr. Sanford's, as had been intended. To it were invited numerous friends, who all congratulated us on our good success, and Mr. Sanford on the excellent fishing there was to be had on his place. Truly, silver hooks are an admirable invention, and Ned's darkie very thoughtful to remember his injunction to be on hand when we took our departure in the steamboat. On the festive board were bass boiled, broiled, and baked; black fish fried to a tempting brownness; and eels looking much more inviting, as I should hope they would, than when they are drawn out of their native element. All this I tell from hearsay evidence alone. I did not attend, from motives of personal vanity. The new skin had not yet made its appearance on my nose, and the old was not becoming—I never could wear red. I believe none of the ladies of our party were there; indeed, being in much the same predicament.

Never was more melancholy journey made than ours from B—— to New York. Ned aroused a temporary excitement by a proposal, carried by a majority of seven. Who the dissentient individual was I think you can easily guess. By the adoption of this proposal we were organized into a regular society. Every one bound himself in all times and all places to uphold Izaak Walton and his art in all its varieties; never to disclose the day's disappointment; and the members to show themselves such by wearing, the gentlemen on their waistcoats, the ladies as a chatellaine pin, a small badge of gold, on which was stamped a small fish caught on a silver hook, and beneath it in old English letters of blue enamel the mystic cipher, P. H. B.

When Mr. Sanford knew its meaning, he readily promised to wear the badge, and volunteered to give an anniversary entertainment every year at his house to all the members who should remain unmarried. It was at the second of these festive occasions that it was consented I should make this public confession. But I would ask as a personal favor that, if any one recognizes on these pages any of the members of the great "Piscatorial Hum-Bug Society," he do keep such knowledge confined to the secrecy of his own bosom, and never wound our sensitive natures by laughing at our misfortunes.

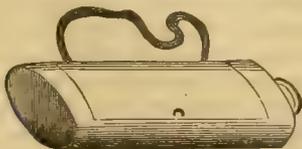

Never have I felt so wretchedly miserable, dirty, and tired as I did that evening two years ago, when Mr. Blakely conducted me home. I was too tired to be happy even, when the said gentleman made some remarks, on our way thither, which to me did not sound exactly commonplace; at the time they only excited in my mind a wild wonder at the strength of a devotion that could exist after a day's fishing, and be expressed to so clammy a me. But since—well, never mind what has happened since—only I don't believe I'll be invited to any more piscatorial dinner parties.

THE COLLECTION AND PRESERVATION OF PLANTS.

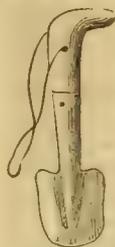

So numerous are the suggestions that have been made, and diverse the processes recommended to be pursued in the preservation of plants by different botanists, that it will be quite impossible for us, with the small space that we have at our disposal, to do more than give a brief outline of such a mode of procedure as we think to be the most simple and generally successful. It is not possible to lay down any process adapted for the treatment of all plants; the colors of some are so fugitive that it is impossible to preserve them by the ordinary mode of procedure, and practice alone will render the collector familiar with the best methods to adopt in such cases. The following materials and instruments will be found necessary to any one contemplating the collection of an herbarium: A vasculum; trowel or digger; field-book, drying paper, mounting paper, some wooden boards the same size as the drying paper, a lancet-pointed knife, a forceps, and a lens, or small microscope; the latter of which we have found to be the most convenient. It consists of a lens, to which is attached a brass ledge; along which, by means of a screw, a movable button traverses: through this button the forceps holding the object is inserted. It possesses the advantage of keeping the object stationary whilst under examination, and admits of the employment of a better light.

The Vasculum is a japanned tin box, which should be of such a length as to receive a plant the full size of the herbarium paper: it ought to be convex on both sides; its capacity may vary according to the fancy of the collector, but one about 20 inches long, by 8 or 9 inches wide, and 5 deep, will not be found too large:

it should be furnished with a handle at one end, and a couple of rings, through which a leathern strap can pass to attach it to the shoulders; the lid should be large, and fasten with a little catch.

The Trowel, or Digger, should be about 7 or 8 inches long; the spud  $2\frac{1}{2}$  inches long,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  inches wide at the top, narrowing gradually to 2 inches at the bottom. It should be provided with a leathern sheath, fastened to the waist by a strap, and the trowel also attached by a long string.

The Field-book is intended to press such specimens as will not carry home without undergoing injury. Its outer cover may be formed of two very thin boards, and secured by straps so as to give pressure. It should be inclosed in an oil-skin case, to protect from wet; and may be carried in the pocket, or attached to the neck by a string.

Drying Paper.—A sufficient stock should be provided so as to have one set of papers drying whilst the rest are in use. A convenient size for general purposes is about 18 or 20 inches long, and 11 or 12 broad. It is as well, however, to be provided with more than one size.

The Wooden Boards should be the exact size of the paper; twelve should be three-eighths of an inch thick, and two, which are to be employed on the outside, three-fourths of an inch. Some prefer sheets of tin to the use of boards on the inside, and they are certainly lighter and more convenient for carrying when on an excursion.

THE COLLECTION should always be performed during fine dry weather, as plants never keep well when collected wet with either rain or dew. When practicable, the entire plant should be collected, and the roots be carefully washed, to remove any dirt that may adhere to them, and then dried. In cases where the entire plant is too large for collection, such portions as best illustrate its generic and specific characters should be gathered. In most cases it is necessary to have specimens of both flowers and fruit, particularly in the orders Leguminosæ, Umbelliferæ, Compositæ, and others. In cases where the flowers appear before the leaves, it will be necessary to preserve the young twigs bearing the fully developed leaves as well as the flowers; and when the sexes exist as separate flowers, both male and female flowers should be collected. When bulbs or tubers abound in mucilaginous matter, it will be found advantageous to inclose them in a little paper, so as to keep the drying paper free from dirt. In the collection of Ferns two fronds should be selected—one to exhibit the under surface with the reproductive organs, and the other to show the upper surface; a portion of the rhizome should also be preserved. Grasses and sedges are generally easy of preservation; the entire plant should be collected, and when it exceeds the length of the paper it may be bent and re-bent without injury. If, on returning from an excursion, circumstances do not admit of immediate pressing, avoid putting the plants in water; they will keep much better in the vasculum; and, should the weather be dry and sultry, they may be sprinkled with a small quantity of water. When portions of shrubs, or plants of woody texture, are required to be preserved, the bark should be slit up, and the woody portion removed.

THE PRESSING.—In reference to the best means of effecting this branch of the process the greatest difference of opinion exists. Balfour says the pressure ought not to be less than 100 pounds, and recommends the use of heavy weights to effect it. He also suggests the use of a rope, tightened by a rack-pin instead of leathern straps, attached to the boards used as a press when on an excursion, as in case of an accident the straps may be difficult of replacement. Withering considers the pressure should be gradual, and this accords with our own experience. Some make use of a press, and obtain the requisite degree of pressure by the employment of screws or wedges; others adopt the more simple contrivance of a flat board and some books, which we have found to answer very well. We have even heard of a gentleman acting the part of a press himself, by reposing at night on the plants he had collected during the day. In our opinion, one of the simplest and best methods consists in the use of a box exactly the same size as the paper and board employed; the requisite degree of pressure being obtained by the gradual addition of pebbles or sand, and of these we have found the former to be the most convenient.

ARRANGING AND DRYING.—First place a parcel of four sheets of the drying paper upon one of the two thicker boards; then take a sheet of the drying paper and lay it evenly upon it; and having selected a plant for preservation, place it on the inside of the right-hand sheet, and arrange the different parts of the plant so as to illustrate its principal generic and specific characters, imitating as much as possible the natural appearance of the plant; as each part is arranged, retain it in its assigned position by means of small pieces of paper about four inches square, upon which a small weight may be placed. Having completed the arrangement of the plant, remove the weights one by one, and allow the fly-sheet to cover it; upon this place another parcel of four sheets, and proceed as before to lay out another plant. When as many as a dozen plants have been arranged in this manner, place one of the thin pieces of wood or tin upon them, and proceed as before, until a sufficient number have been prepared for pressure; now place upon this one of the thick outer boards and the box containing the pebbles, which should be added to from time to time, that the pressure may be gradual. After twelve hours' pressure, remove each plant with the forceps to dry paper, and proceed in exactly the same manner as before described, taking care to open out all the crumples and rectify previous mistakes, arranging the plant as much as practicable in imitation of nature. After intervals of twelve hours the same process should be repeated, gradually increasing the pressure until the plants be dry, which will generally be the case in a week or ten days, but varies with different plants. Some will dry with only one or two changings, whilst others occupy a long time; and some, as Orchids, Sedum, and Sempervivum, are exceedingly difficult to dry at all. To accomplish the drying of these heat is generally employed; and they are submitted to a process of ironing with much success. Some speak very highly of this mode of proceeding in general, being of opinion that it preserves the colors of the flowers better than the ordinary process. From experience it seems highly probable that different flowers require particular temperatures to succeed well in preserving their colors; and the method of treatment peculiar to each case is only to be acquired by practical experience. Some succeed in preserving the colors very well by the use of heated sand.

PRESERVATION.—When the specimens have been sufficiently dried, they should be carefully transferred with the forceps to a sheet of good thick white paper, in which they may either be preserved loose, or fastened to the right-hand sheet of the paper by means of thread, glue, or gum. Of these we prefer the former, as the two latter are apt to attract insects, which will in a very short time completely destroy an herbarium; to guard against their attacks, it is as well to brush the plants over with a spirituous solution of bichloride of mercury, consisting of two drachms to the pint. Some prefer keeping the plant loose in the paper; they are certainly easy of examination under these circumstances. The botanical name, natural order, habitat, and date of collection, together with any other note of interest, should be written on the right-hand corner of the inner side of the sheet. The natural orders that generally suffer most from the attacks of insects are Cruciferae, Euphorbiaceae, Gentianaceae, Umbelliferae, Salicaceae, and Liliaceae.

A MEMORY.

BY HARRIET E. BENEDICT.

WHEN February, cold and gray,
Shook the light snow-flakes from his wing,
She smiled to greet the dreary day,
And said, "Twill soon be Spring."

Ah! daily did our prayers arise,
That unto her the passing hours
Might bring soft winds and sunny skies,
And the sweet breath of flowers.

The May-time, that she loved the best;
The days of light, and song, and bloom,
Ere death should bring the unbroken rest,
The silence of the tomb.

But late in this, our northern clime,
The hours such gifts of beauty bring,
And wearily the passing time
Moved onward to the Spring.

The March winds round our dwelling-place
Pealed their wild chorus through the sky,
And as we watched her pallid face,
We knew that she must die.

Yet life's dim taper flickered still,
And with new brightness seemed to burn,
When the storm ceased, and vale and hill
Smiled back the smile of morn.

Wandering beside the unchained brook
That day, a group of children spied
A violet, peeping from its nook,
And brought it to her side—

In all its delicate loveliness;
As if a gentle minister,
Her dying eyes to cheer and bless,
The Spring had sent to her.

At eve we wept—a mourning band;
And the sweet flower she kissed and blest,
We placed within her icy hand
To wither on her breast.

Ah, how sad memories come to me!
Without, the sunshine and the rain
Tell of the April days, which she
So longed to win in vain.

For the glad spring-time now is here,
With its rich gifts of bud and bloom;
The gifts which in the vanished year
We laid upon her tomb.

But she, whose clear immortal eyes
Are shadowed by no vain regrets,
Views not with us its changing skies,
And fading violets.

And to the heavenly heights afar
We lift our eyes, and pray that thus,
As spring eternal came to her,
It yet may come to us.

THE STORY OF AN ATOM.—The atom of charcoal which floated in the corrupt atmosphere of the old volcanic ages was absorbed into the leaf of a fern when the valleys became green and luxuriant; and there, in its proper place, it received the sunlight and the dew, aiding to fling back to heaven a reflection of heaven's gold, and, at the same time, to build the tough fibre of the plant. The atom was consigned to the tomb, when the waters submerged the jungled valley. It had lain there thousands of years, and a month since was brought into the light again imbedded in a block of coal. It shall be consumed to warm our dwellings, cook our food, and make more ruddy and cheerful the hearth whereon our children play; it shall combine with a portion of the invisible atmosphere, ascend upward as a curling wreath to revel in a mazy dance high up in the blue ether; shall reach the earth again, and be entrapped into the embrace of a flower; shall live in velvet beauty on the cheek of the apricot; shall pass into the human body, giving enjoyment to the palate, and health to the blood; shall circulate in the delicate tissues of the brain; and aid, by entering into some new combination, in educing the thoughts which are now being recorded by the pen. It is but an atom of charcoal; it may dwell one moment in a stagnant ditch, and the next be flashing on the lip of beauty; may now be a component of a limestone rock, and the next an ingredient in a field of potatoes; it may slumber for a thousand years without undergoing a single change, and the next hour pass through a thousand mutations; and, after all, it is only an atom of charcoal, and occupies its own place, wherever it may be.

CHAPTER VII.

MR. HUNT was able to resume his place in the bank several days before his wife returned. Uncle Nathan had brought Jeannie home as soon as her father could leave his room, and the boys had likewise been written for; so that the family reunion was apparently near at hand.

Weak as he was, Mr. Hunt met his spouse and daughter at the depot, and the noise of their entrance in the lower hall first apprised Sarah of their arrival. To the bound of pleasurable excitement her heart gave at the certainty that they had come, succeeded a sigh at the termination of the free, yet busy life she had led of late—the probability that she would be compelled to resume her old habits of feeling and action. Driving back the selfish regret, she ran down to welcome the travellers.

"How well you're looking, Sarah!" said Mrs. Hunt, after kissing her. "I declare, if you was to arrange your hair different, and study dress a bit, you would come near being right down handsome."

"Handsome is as handsome does!" quoted Mr. Hunt, stoutly. "According to that rule, she is a beauty!"

"Thank you, sir!" said Sarah, bowing low. And she tried to forget, in her sister's affectionate greeting, the chill and heart-sickness produced by her mother's businesslike manner and compliment.

"Having disposed of one daughter, she means to work the other into merchantable shape!" was her cynical deduction from the dubious praise bestowed upon herself.

Mrs. Hunt pursued her way up the steps, examining and remarking upon everything she saw.

"Them stair-roads aint 'so clean as they had ought to be, Sarah. I'm afraid your girls are careless, or shirks. When did you uncover the carpet?"

"Some time ago, mother, while father was sick. There were gentlemen calling constantly, and the cover looked shabby, I thought."

"It couldn't be helped, I s'pose; but the carpet is more worn than I expected to see it. With the heavy expenses that will be crowding on us this fall and winter, we can't afford to get any new things for the house."

Lucy, who preceded her sister, glanced back and laughed meaningly. And Sarah was very glad that her father had not overheard the observation, which confirmed her belief that the beauty's hand was disposed of, without the form of consultation with her natural and legal guardian.

Dinner was announced by the time the travelling habiliments and dust were removed. Sarah had spared no pains to provide a bountiful and tasteful repast, at the risk of incurring her mother's reproof for her extravagant proclivities. But the dame was in high good humor, and the youthful purveyor received but a single sentence of deprecation.

"I hope you have not been living as high as this all the time, Sarah!"

"No, madam. Father's wants and mine were very few. I foresaw that you would need substantial refreshment after your journey."

"You was very thoughtful. We both have good appetites, I guess. I know that I have."

"Mine will speak for itself," said Lucy.

"You have no idea how that girl has enjoyed everything since she has been away," observed Mrs. Hunt to her husband. "There was Vic. West, who took it into her head that she ought to look die-away and peaking, and refuse food, when her beau was by; but Lu., she just went right along and behaved natural, and I'm sure that somebody thought more of her for it."

Mr. Hunt's face darkened for a moment; but he could not find fault with his eldest child on her first evening at home.

"So you have been quite a belle, Lucy?" he said, pleasantly.

"Better than that, Mr. H.!" Mrs. Hunt checked her triumphant announcement as the butler re-entered the room. "I shouldn't wonder," she resumed, mysteriously, "if Lucy was disposed to settle down into a steady, sedate matron after her holiday."

"Don't you deceive yourself with that hope!" laughed Lucy.

She was evidently pleased by these not over delicate allusions to her love-affairs, and, like her mother, extremely complacent over the result of her recent campaign. Sarah felt that, were she in her place, she would shrink from this open jesting upon a sacred subject; still she had not expected that her sister would behave differently. Lucy's nature was gentle without being fine; affectionate, but shallow. She would have had no difficulty in attaching herself to any man whom her friends recommended as "a good match," provided he were pleasing in exterior, and her most devoted servitor.

The sisters had no opportunity of private converse until they adjourned to the parlor for the evening. Lucy was very beautiful in a blue silk, whose low corsage and short sleeves revealed her superb shoulders and rounded arms. Her complexion was a rich carmine, deepening or softening with every motion—one would have said, with every breath. Her blue eyes fairly danced in a sort of subdued glee, very charming and very becoming, but altogether unlike the tender, dewy light of "Love's first young dream!"

"How lovely you have grown, sister!" said Sarah, earnestly. "Oh, Lucy, I don't believe you rightly value the gift of beauty—as I would do, if it were mine!"

"Nonsense!" The dimples, that made her smile so bewitching, broke her blushes into rosy waves, as the conscious fair one turned her face towards the mirror. "I am pleased to hear that I am passable to-night. We may have visitors. A friend of ours has expressed a great desire to see me in my home—in the bosom of my family.' Ahem!" She smoothed out an imaginary wrinkle in her bodice, an excuse for tarrying longer before the glass.

"He came to town with you, then?" ventured Sarah.

Lucy nodded.

"And promised to call this evening?"

"Right again, my dear!"

She was graver now, for she had conceived the happy notion of appropriating to her own use a cluster of white roses and buds she discovered in the vase on the marble slab under the mirror. If anything could have enhanced the elegance of her figure and toilet, it was the coiffure she immediately set about arranging. The flowers were a present to Sarah from Lewis

Hammond; but she thought little of him or of them as Lucy laid them first on one, then the other side of her head, to try the effect.

"And you really care for him, sister?" came forth in such a timid, anxious tone, that Lucy burst into a fit of laughter.

"You dear, little, modest piece of romantic simplicity! One would suppose that you were popping the question yourself, from your behavior. Care for him? Why shouldn't I? I need not say 'yes,' unless I do, need I?"

"But you take it so coolly! A betrothal is, to me, such a solemn thing."

"And to most other girls, perhaps. (There! if I only had a hair-pin. Don't rob yourself! thank you! Isn't that an improvement?) As I was saying, why should I pretend to be pensive and doleful, when I am as merry as a lark? or lovesick, when I have never lost a meal or an hour's sleep from the commencement of the courtship until now? That is not my style, Sarah. I am very practical in my views and feelings. Not that I don't play talking sentiment in our genuine love scenes, and I really like unbounded devotion on the other side. It is decidedly pleasant to be adored. I was surprised to find how I enjoyed it!"

"Oh, sister! sister!" Sarah leaned her forehead on the mantel, repelled and well-nigh disgusted by this heartless trifling—this avowed counterfeit—so abhorrent to her feelings. But Lucy was as much in earnest as she could be in the treatment of such a theme. She went on, unheeding her sister's ejaculation.

"You must understand, of course, that we are not positively engaged. I gave him—Goldfinch—a good scolding for violating the rules of etiquette by addressing me while I was away from home; but it was just like him. He is as impulsive as he can live. To punish him, I refused to answer him until after our return to New York, and his interview with father. He would have written to him on the spot, had I not forbidden him. He behaved so beautifully, that I consented to his taking charge of us to the city, and I suppose the rest must follow in good time. How melancholy your face is! Are you very much afflicted at the thought of losing me? Why, Sarah! my dear child, are those tears in your eyes? If she isn't crying in good earnest!"

And Lucy's musical laugh rolled through the rooms in her enjoyment of the joke. What else could it be to her, elate with her success in achieving the chief end of woman—the capture of a rich and handsome, in every respect unexceptionable lover?

"Hist!" she said, raising her finger. "He has come! Your eyes are red! Run, and make yourself presentable!"

The door, opening from the hall into the front parlor, swung on its hinges as Sarah gained the comparative obscurity of the third and rear room. A strong impulse of interest or curiosity there arrested her flight to get a glimpse of her destined brother-in-law. Lucy had not mentioned his proper name, since her earliest letter from Newport had eulogized a certain George Finch, a Bostonian, wealthy and attentive to herself. Sarah's backward glance fell upon the visitor as he met his queenly bride elect directly under the blazing chandelier.

It was Philip Benson!

Chained to the spot by weakness or horror, the looker-on stood motionless, while the suitor raised the lily fingers he held to his lips, and then led Lucy to a seat. His voice broke the spell. As the familiar cadences smote her ear, the sharp pain that ran through every fibre of her frame awakened Sarah from her stupor.

How she gained her room she never knew; but she had sense enough left to direct her flight to this refuge—and when within, to lock the door. Then she threw up her arms with a piteous, wailing cry, and fell across the bed, dead for the time to further woe.

Alone and painfully she struggled back to consciousness. Sitting upright, she stared wonderingly around her, unable to recollect what had stricken her down. The chamber was imperfectly lighted by the rays of the street lamp opposite, and with the recognition of objects within its narrow limits there crept back to her all that had preceded her retreat thither. For the next hour she sat still—her head bowed upon her knees, amid the wrecks of her dream world.

Dreary and loveless as had been most of her previous life, she had never endured anything like this, unless one miserable hour upon the Deal Beach, when Philip broke the tidings of his intended departure, were a slight foretaste of the agony, the utter despair, that claimed her now for its victim. Since then, she had been hopeful. His promise of a visit, the tokens of remembrance he had transmitted to her every week, had kept alive memory and expectation. And this was his coming! this the occasion she had pictured so fondly, painted with the brightest hues Love could borrow from imagination! She had heard again the voice that had haunted her dreams from their parting until now—heard it in deeper, softer tones than it had ever taken in speech with her; heart-music which told that his seekings and yearnings for the one and only beloved were over. And was not her quest of years ended likewise? Truly, there are two senses in which every search, every combat may be said to be closed; one when the victor grasps his prize, or waves aloft his sword in the moment of triumph; the other, when bleeding, maimed, or dying, the vanquished sinks to the earth without power to rise!

A tap at her door started Sarah. She did not stir until it was repeated, and her father called her name. A stream of light from the hall fell upon her face as she admitted him.

"Daughter, what ails you?" was his exclamation.

"I am not very well, father."

"I should think not, indeed! Come in here and lie down!" He led her to the bed, and lighting the gas in the chamber, came back to her, and felt her pulse.

She knew what was the direction of his fears; but to correct his misapprehension was to subject herself to further questioning. Passively she received the pressure of his hand upon her head, the gentle stroking of the disordered hair; but, when he stooped to kiss her, he felt that she trembled.

"Dear child! I shall never forgive myself if you have taken the fever from me!"

"I do not fear that, father. My head aches, and I am very tired. I have been so busy all day, you know."

"Yes, and for many other days. You are, without doubt, overworked. I hope this may prove to be all the matter with you. A night's rest may quite cure you."

"Yes, sir," she answered, chokingly. "You will excuse me to ——— down stairs?"

"Certainly. Would you like to have your mother come up to you?"

"O no, sir! Please tell her there is no need of it. I shall be better to-morrow."

"Your sister"—and he looked more serious, instead of smiling—"has a visitor. Her friend is an acquaintance of yours, also, it appears—the Mr. Benson whom you met at your aunt's in July."

"Yes, sir. I know it."

"I understood you to say that Lucy had never said, positively, who her lover was; but this was not the name you told me of, as the person whom you imagined him to be."

"I was misled for a time myself, sir," replied the poor girl, pressing her temples between her palms.

"I see that I am tiring you. Forgive me! but it is so natural to consult you in everything. I must trouble you with some questions, which it is important should be answered to-night, before this gentleman and myself have any conversation. Is Mr. Benson a man whom you consider worthy of trust? Your mother represents him to be enormously wealthy—a reputation I had concluded he possessed from Lucy's pet name for him. It is well that your sister has a prospect of marrying advantageously in this respect, for she would never be happy in an humble sphere; but antiquated people like myself regard other things as of greater consequence in concluding a bargain for a lifetime. Is your opinion of Mr. Benson favorable as to disposition, principles, and conduct?"

Sarah's head rested on the foot-board of her couch, in weariness or pain, as she rejoined: "I saw and heard nothing of him, during our intercourse in the country, that was not creditable. His uncle and aunt are very partial to him, and speak of his character in high terms. Their testimony ought to have weight with you, for they have known him from his boyhood up."

"It ought and does! I am relieved to hear all this! very much pleased!" said Mr. Hunt, emphatically. "I have all confidence in Nathan Benson's judgment and integrity. I hope his nephew is as sterling a man. Thus far," he continued, playfully, "I have learned but one thing to his discredit, and that is that having seen this one of my daughters, he could afterwards fall in love with the other."

"I am not beautiful and good like Lucy, father."

"Very dear and lovely in my eyes, my child! Again, forgive me for having worried your poor head with my inquiries. I was unwilling to decide a matter where Lucy's happiness was involved, without obtaining your evidence in the case. A last good-night! and God bless you, my dearest, best daughter!"

Sarah held up her face for his kiss without attempting to speak. This burning ordeal, the harder to endure because unexpected, was over. She was as weak as a child with conflicting passions when she arose and endeavored to undress. After stopping several times to regain breath and strength, she was at last ready to creep into bed, there to lie until morning broke, sleepless and suffering.

Her sharpened senses could discern her father's and mother's voices in the sitting-room, in confidential talk—broken in upon, by and by, by Lucy's pure, mellow tones, apparently convaying some message to the former. Its import was easily surmised, for his step was then heard in the hall, and on the stairs, until he reached the parlor where Philip awaited him. Their conference did not occupy more than twenty minutes, which time Lucy spent with her mother—how gayly Sarah could judge by the laugh that, again and again, reached her room. Mr. Hunt returned, spoke a few sentences in his calm, grave way, and the closing door was followed by a flutter of silk and fall of gliding footsteps, as Lucy went down to her now formally and fully betrothed husband.

"Husband!" Yes! it was even so! Henceforth the lives of the pair were to be as one in interest, in aims, in affection. Ere long, they would have no separate outward existence in the eyes of the world. Was his chosen love, then, in a truer and higher sense, his other self—the being sought so long and carefully? The pretty fiancée would have stretched her cerulean orbs in amazed wonder at the ridiculous doubt, and asked, in her matter-of-fact way, how the thing could have happened, if it had not been intended? Philip's indignant affirmative would have gained fervor from his exultant consciousness of possession—so novel and sweet. But one, above stairs, taught sagacity by the depths of her grief, looked further into the future than did they, and read there a different reply.

She heard the clang of the front door as it shut after the young lover, and in the still midnight, the echoes, faint and fainter, of his retreating footsteps—the same free, light tread she used to hearken for in porch and hall of that river-side farm-house; and as the remembrance came over her she turned her face to the wall, murmuring passionately, "Oh! if I could never, never see him again!"

This feeling, whether born of cowardice or desperation, was the ruling one, when her mother looked in upon her before breakfast, and expressed her concern at finding her still in bed.

"I am not well enough to get up, mother!" Sarah said sincerely, and Mrs. Hunt, reading in the parched lips and blood-shot eyes proof of the justice of the fears her husband had expressed to her the preceding evening, resolved that the doctor should see her "before she was two hours older."

In vain Sarah entreated that this should not be done, and prophesied her recovery without his assistance. For once both parents were a unit in sentiment and action, and the physician was summoned to his second patient.

"All febrile symptoms were to some extent contagious, he affirmed; and while Mr. Hunt's malady was not generally classed with such, it was very possible that his daughter had contracted an analogous affection, in her constant attendance upon him."

This decision Sarah dared not overthrow, much as she wished to do so, when she saw how it afflicted her father.

Undaunted by any fears of infection, Lucy repaired to her sister's chamber when she had dispatched her breakfast.

"Isn't it too provoking that you should be sick just at this time?" she began, perching herself, school-girl fashion, on the foot of the bed. "I really admired your staying up-stairs last night; but I did not dream that you really were not well. I promise you that I made capital of your absence. I told Philip (how odd it sounds—doesn't it?) that you ran away, when he rang the bell, because you had made a fright of yourself, by crying over the prospect of my leaving you, and that I had no doubt you had grieved yourself into a headache. He wanted to know forthwith if you objected to my marrying him; but I said 'No;' that you were charmed with the match, and preferred him to any other admirer I had ever had; but that we—you and I—were so devoted to one another, that it was acute agony to us to think of parting. About ten o'clock he asked to see father, and they soon settled affairs. When I went down again, he tried a little ring on my finger, that he always wears, and it fitted nicely. So I knew what it meant when he put it back upon his own hand, and that with that for a measure he could not go wrong in getting the engagement-ring. I do hope it will be a diamond. Vic. West declares that she would not accept anything else. I considered for a while whether I couldn't give him a delicate hint on the subject, but I did not see how I could manage it. And don't you think, while I was studying about this, he fancied I was sober over 'the irrevocable step I had taken,' and became miserable and eloquent at the suspicion! I wish I could remember all he said! It was more in your line than mine! But he is a good, sensible fellow, with all his romantic notions. He has a handsome fortune, independent of his father, left him by his grandfather, and we are to live in Georgia part of the year only, and travel every summer. Mother says his account of his prospects and so forth to father was very satisfactory, but she has not got at all the particulars yet. Father is so worried about your sickness, that he cannot spare a thought for anything or anybody else. The light from that window hurts your eyes—doesn't it? I will let down the shade."

But Sarah still lay with her hand protecting her eyes, when her sister resumed her position and narration.

"We are to be married in December. He begged hard for an earlier day, but I was sure that I could not be ready before then. As it is, we shall have to hurry when it comes to the dresses, for, in order to get the latest fashions, we must wait until the eleventh hour. Won't I 'astonish the natives' down South? I couldn't state this to Philip, you know; so I referred him to mother, who is to say, when he asks her, that her preference would be to keep me just as long as she possibly can. Entre nous, my dear, our good mamma has said truer things than this bit of sentiment—but n'importe! These embellishments are necessary to such transactions."

Miss West's friendship or curiosity could not endure longer suspense, and the intelligence that she was below checked the monologue.

"I will run up again whenever I can," promised Lucy, by way of compensation for her abrupt departure, "and keep up your spirits by telling you all that I can about our concerns. But Philip is to take me to ride this afternoon. I forbade him to come here before then, but I don't much think he can stay away. Don't be vexed if you don't see me again in some hours. Vic. and I are to settle about our trousseaux. If you believe me, we have never been able yet to decide upon the wedding-dresses!"

And she vanished, warbling delicious roudades from a duet she had engaged to sing that evening with her betrothed. She showed herself up stairs again, when she was ready for her ride and the carriage at the door—very fair, very bright, and very happy. She was exquisitely dressed, and called on her sister to admire her toilet and envy her her escort.

Sarah listened to the cheerful exchange of cautions and promises between her mother and Philip, at the door beneath her open window, and to the rolling wheels that bore them away.

Mrs. Hunt received none of her friends that day, being busy "getting things to rights;" and for a like reason she absented herself from her child's sick-room, content with sending up Jeannie, now and then, to inquire how she was getting on. In the abject loneliness that oppressed her, when the first violence of passions had spent itself, Sarah would have been relieved in some measure by the society of this pet sister, the sole object upon earth, besides her father, that had ever repaid her love with anything like equal attachment. But the child shrank, like most others of her age, from the quiet, dark chamber of illness, and longed to follow her mother through the house, in her tour of observation and renovation. Sarah detected her restlessness and ill-concealed dislike of the confinement imposed upon her by compliance with her humble petition.

"Please, Jeannie, stay a little while with your poor sister!" And her sensitive spirit turned upon itself, as a final stroke of torture, the conviction that here, also, love and care had been wasted.

"Go, then!" she said, rather roughly, as Jeannie wavered. "And you need not come up again to-day. I know it is not pleasant for you to be here. Tell mother I want nothing but quiet."

"I have had a splendid drive!" said Lucy, rustling her many frouces into the door at dusk.

The figure upon the bed made no response by motion or word.

"I do believe she is asleep!" added the intruder, lowering her voice. "I suppose she is tired and needs to rest." And she went out on tiptoe.

Sarah was awake, a minute later, when her father came in to see her. She smiled at him, as she "hoped she was better," and asked whether she might not get up on the morrow. Mr. Hunt thought not. The doctor's opinion was that perfect repose might ward off the worse features of the disease. She had better keep her bed for a couple of days yet, even should she feel well enough to be about. He sent up her dinner to her room with his own hands; and when she learned this, she strove to do some feeble justice to the viands, but without success.

Philip dined with the family that day by special appointment; and, shortly after his arrival, Lucy again presented herself in that small third-story bedroom.

"Choose! which hand will you take?" she cried, hiding both behind her.

Sarah would make no selection; and, after a little more trifling, the elder sister brought into sight two elegant bouquets, and laid them beside the invalid.

"This is Philip's present—'a fraternal remembrance,' he told me to say. Here is his card. Doesn't he write a lovely hand? The other is from your admirer, Mr. Hammond. What a sly puss you were to make such a catch as he is, without dropping us a hint! He is rather too sober for my notions; but he is getting rich fast, they say. He left those flowers at the door himself, and insisted upon seeing father for a moment, to know exactly how you were. Cannot you hurry up somewhat, and let us have a double wedding? I showed the bouquet to Philip, and told him of your conquest, and he was as much pleased at your prospects as I was. Did you ever see such magnificent roses? He paid five dollars, at the lowest computation, for these flowers. I congratulate you upon these signs of liberality!"

Sarah had heard only a portion of this speech. Her eyes were fixed upon the card her sister had put into her hand: "Will Miss Sarah accept this trifling token of regard from one who is her staunch friend, and hopes, in time, to have a nearer claim upon her esteem?"

"Very neatly turned, is it not?" said Lucy, satisfiedly. She had read it on her way up stairs. "What shall I say to him from you?"

"Thank him, and explain that I am not able to write a reply."

This meagre return of compliments assumed a tone both grateful and sisterly as Lucy rehearsed it to the donor of the fragrant offering. The barest phrase of civility came gracefully and meaningly from her tongue. Serene in mind and countenance, she seated herself at the piano, and, as Philip took his stand at her side, he wondered if the world held another couple more entirely adapted each to the peculiar soul-needs of the other, more perfectly happy in the knowledge of mutual affection. Like the generality of theorists, your student of human nature is prone to grievous error when he reduces his flawless system to practice.

In one respect, the two certainly harmonized well. Both loved music; both sang finely, and their voices accorded without a jarring note.

Mr. Hunt read the evening papers in Sarah's room; turning and folding them with great circumspection, lest their rattling might annoy her, and detract from her enjoyment of the music. How could he guess the infatuation that caused her to listen greedily to sounds, under whose potent spell feeling was writhing and brain reeling? In every pause between the songs there arose in her memory two lines of a poem read long ago, when or where she knew not:—

"Seek not to soothe that proud, forsaken heart
With strains, whose sweetness maddens as they fall!"

The performers had just completed a duet, in which each voice supported and developed, while blending with the other, when Lucy took up the prelude to a simpler lay; repeating it twice over with skilful variations, as if she were, meantime, carrying on a colloquy with her companion, that delayed the vocal part. This was ended by Philip's raising alone the burden of the plaintive German air Sarah remembered so truly—"The long, long, weary day."

As his voice, full and strong, with its indescribable and irresistible undercurrent of pathos—flowing out here into passionate melancholy—swelled and floated through the quiet house, Sarah sat upright.

"Father! father!" she whispered, huskily, "I cannot bear that! Shut the doors!—all of them! or I shall go mad!"

She was obeyed; Mr. Hunt hurrying down to the parlors to silence the lovers with the representation that Sarah was too nervous to endure the excitement of music. For the remainder of the evening, a profound stillness pervaded the upper part of the mansion—a silence that, to Sarah, throbbed with the melody she had tried to hush; and, look where she might, she gazed into that rainy, ghastly night—the pale, comfortless watcher, the shadowy type of her deeper, more blighting sorrow.

CHAPTER VIII.

For three days, Philip Benson lingered near his beautiful enslaver; on the fourth, he carried a sad, yet trustful heart upon his Southern journey. Sarah had not seen him once since the evening of his coming. Through Lucy, she received his adieux and wishes for her speedy recovery. On the next day but one she left her room, and appeared again in the family circle—now complete in all its parts.

In that short season of bodily prostration, the work of years had been wrought upon her inner life. Outwardly, there was little alteration save that effected by physical weakness; but in her views of existence and character, of affections and motives, the doubter had become the skeptic; the dreamer the misanthrope. To the gentler and more womanly aspirations that had for a season supplanted the somewhat masculine tendencies of her mind and tastes had succeeded a stoicism, like the frozen calm of a winter's day, uniform as relentless. This was the surface that locked and concealed the lower depths she had sworn should be forever covered. Others could and did live without hearts. She could thrive as well upon the husks and Sodom apples of this world's goods as did they; holding, as Life's chief good, complete and final subjugation of all genuine emotion, which, at the best, was but the rough ore—fit for nothing until purged, refined, and polished in its glitter. She found no other creed that suited her present desperate mood so well as the most heartless code of the thorough worldling—the devotee to show, and fashion, and wealth.

Such was her mother, whose domestic virtues were extolled by all who knew her; such, behind her mask of tender grace and amiability, the sister who had won, by these factitious attractions, the heart for which Sarah would have perilled life, sacrificed ease and inclination, bowed her proud spirit to the estate of bond-servant to his every caprice, become the willing slave to his tyrannical behest. Yet Philip Benson was a professed judge of character; a man of sense, education, and experience, and, knowing both girls as he did, he had made his choice; set the stamp of his approval upon the shining, rather than the solid metal. The world—as its young, would-be disciple believed she had at length learned—was made up of two classes: those who floated, and those who sank. To the latter she determined that she would not belong.

These and kindred thoughts were rife in her mind and stirring up many a spring of gall within her bosom one morning as she lay back in an arm-chair in the sitting-room, listening with secret scorn to the prattle of the pair of betrothed maidens—Lucy and her friend. Lucy's engagement-ring was a diamond, or, rather, a modest cluster of these precious stones, whose extreme beauty did not strike the casual eye with the startling effect of Victoria's more showy gaze d'amour. This apparent difference in the value of the two was the source of many discussions, and considerable heart-burning, disguised, of course, and threatened in time to produce a decided coolness between the attached wearers of the articles under debate.

On this particular day, Victoria, after some adroit skirmishing, brought out as a "poser" the fact that, to lay the question to rest without more ado, she had, since their last interview, been to Tiffany's, and had her ring valued. Lucy's face was all a-glow as her soul-sister named the price of her treasure. She clapped her hands joyously.

"Isn't that the joke of the season, mother?"—as that personage entered. "Don't you think that Vic. was as cunning as we were? She carried her ring to Tiffany's yesterday, too. Wouldn't it have been too funny if we had met there? Mine came from there, they said, and it cost a cool fifty dollars more than yours did, dear!"

Victoria flushed hotly; but further controversy being useless and dangerous to her, she acquiesced with assumed carelessness in Lucy's proposal, that, since both were suited, the rival brilliants should not be again referred to as a disputed matter. They accordingly turned to the safer and endless conferences upon the trousseaux, whose purchase must be commenced immediately.

Their incomplete lists were produced, compared, and lengthened—Mrs. Hunt suggesting and amending; Sarah surveying the busy group with the same intense disdain she had experienced throughout the conversation.

"Oh, I forgot to tell you! Margaret Hanton called on me yesterday!" exclaimed Victoria. "Did she come here, too?"

"Yes; but we were out. What did she say?" queried Lucy, breathlessly.

"Why, the stupid creature never alluded to my engagement; and when I mentioned yours, pretended not to have heard of it before. I took care she should not go away as ignorant on the subject as she had come, and—I know it was wicked in me, but she deserved it—all the time I was praising your Goldfinch, and telling how handsome and liberal he was, I sat looking down at my new ring, slipping it up and down my finger, as if I were not thinking of it, but of the giver. She could not help seeing it, and, to save her life, she could not keep from changing countenance."

"Good!" said Lucy. "Do tell me how she is looking now?"

"Common enough! She had on that everlasting lilac silk, with the embroidered flounces, although the style is as old as the hills—and that black lace mantle, which, happening to be real, she never leaves off until near Christmas. But her hat! black and corn-color! Think of it! corn-color against her saffron skin! When I pretend to lead society, I hope to dress decently! But I had my revenge for her supercilious airs. Mr. Bond—George—called in the afternoon to take me to ride. I told you of the handsome span of fast horses he has been buying. Well! we concluded to try the Bloomingdale road, and just as we were sailing along, like the wind, whom should we overtake but my Lady Hanton, lounging in her lazy way (she thinks it aristocratic!) on the back seat of her father's heavy, clumsy barouche—not a soul in it but her mother and herself! Didn't I bow graciously to her as we flew by! and again, as we met them creeping along, when we were coming back? I wouldn't have missed the chance of mortifying her for a thousand dollars."

Lucy laughed, with no sign of disapprobation at the coarse, vindictive spirit displayed in this petty triumph of a small soul.

"How many evening-dresses have you put down on your paper, Vic.?"

"Half-a-dozen only. I will get others as I need them. The styles in these change so often that I do not care to have too many at a time."

"There you will have the advantage of me," said Lucy, ingenuously. "It will not be so easy a matter to replenish my stock of wearable dresses. I wish I had asked Philip about the Savannah stores. I wonder if he knows anything about them?"

"He ought to—being such a connoisseur in ladies' dress. I declare I have been absolutely afraid of him since I heard him say that he considered a lady's apparel a criterion of her character."

"He has exquisite taste!" said Lucy, with pardonable pride in her lover. "It is a positive pleasure to dress for him. He sees and appreciates everything that I could wish to have him notice. He has often described to me what I wore, and how I looked and acted, the evening he fell in love. How little we can guess what is before us! I did not care to go to the hop that night, for Mr. Finch was to wait on me, and he was so stupid, you know, after we discovered that it was a mistake about his being rich. I think I see him now, with his red face and short neck! O dear! the fun we had over that poor man! I told you—didn't I, Sarah—that we named him Bullfinch, because he looked so much like one? When Phil. came we called him Goldfinch, and the two went by these names among us girls. The Bullfinch heard of it, and he was ridiculously angry! So I put on a white tarletane, that one with the double jupe, you know, Vic., festooned with white moss rose-buds, and I had nothing but a tea-rose in my hair. I danced once with the Bullfinch—one of those solemn quadrilles that are only fit for grandmothers, and vowed to myself that I would not stand up again, except for a Polka or the Lancers. While I was sitting down by the window, saying 'Yes' and 'No,' when Bullfinch spoke, Mr. Newman introduced 'Mr. Benson' to 'Miss Hunt,' and the work was done!"

"No more waltzing, then!" was Victoria's slyly malicious sequel.

"I did not care so much for that as I thought

I should!" replied easy-tempered Lucy. "You cannot find a man who has not some drawback. Before I had a chance for another round, mother there managed to telegraph me that my fresh acquaintance was worth catching. She had gotten his whole story out of Mrs. Newman. He let me know, pretty soon, that he had some queer scruples about fancy dances, and I thought it best to humor him for one evening—or until I should ascertain whether he was really 'taken' or not. I have never repented my self-denial, although I grant that it cost me a struggle to give up 'the German.'"

"George lets me waltz to my heart's content," said Victoria. "He is the very soul of indulgence. As to laces—I have not a thing fit to wear. I must get everything new. I am glad of it! I enjoy shopping for them. If I have a passion, it is for laces!"

A sneer curled Sarah's lip, and Victoria, happening to glance that way, could not mistake its application, whatever she might surmise as to its origin.

"I suppose you despise us as a couple of love-sick girls, Sarah?" she said, with a simper designed to be sentimental, whereas it was spiteful instead.

"I think love the least dangerous of your complaints," was the rejoinder.

"What do you mean?"

"Just what I said!"

"She means that people do not die of love in these days," exclaimed Lucy, whose pleasure-loving nature always shuddered at the idea of altercation in her presence; her sensations, during the occasional sparrings of her sister and her friend, bearing a strong resemblance to those of an innocent white rabbit into whose burrow a couple of belligerent hedgehogs have forced their way.

"You will understand us better one day—when your turn comes," said Victoria, with magnanimous condescension. "I shall remind you then of your good opinion of us."

"You may."

"I would give anything to have you engaged—just to see how you would behave. Would not you, Lucy?"

"Yes; if she were likely to do as well as we are doing. Philip says that you have many fine qualities, Sarah. He quite admires you."

The complacent betrothed had none but the most amiable intentions in making this patronizing speech; therefore, the angry blood that surged over her sister's face at hearing it would have been to her but the blush of gratified vanity, had not the sparkle of her eye and the contemptuous contortion of her mouth undeceived her.

"Indeed he did say so!" she hastened to repeat. "And he was in earnest! He said something else which I don't mind telling, now that he belongs to me fast and sure. He said that he sat up until twelve o'clock one night after you had been out sailing, deliberating whether he should be smitten with you or not. There!"

The color retreated as quickly as it had come. But for the consciousness of Victoria's malicious scrutiny, Sarah could not have summoned strength to utter a word.

"An equivocal compliment, I must say!" she retorted, sarcastically. "Your gallant Georgian's confessions must have been ample and minute, indeed, if they comprised such distant approaches to love affairs as the one you honor me by mentioning. I do not think that I have ever heard of another case where a gentleman considered it necessary to enumerate to his fiancée, not merely the ladies he had loved, but those whom he had not!" She arose and left the room.

Poor Lucy, rebuffed and overwhelmed, caught her astonished breath with a sigh. "Can anybody tell me what I have done now to fret Sarah? She is so cross since she was sick!"

"And before, too!" mutely added Victoria's shrug and lifted eyebrows.

"We must bear with her, my dear!" said the prudent mother. "Her nerves are affected, the doctor says."

Victoria made random pencillings upon the important list—her thoughts in fast pursuit of a notion that had just struck her. She was neither witty nor intelligent; but she possessed some natural shrewdness and a great deal more acquired cunning. She detested Sarah Hunt, and the prospect of obtaining an engine that should humble her arrogant spirit was scarcely less tempting than her own chance of effecting an advantageous matrimonial settlement.

While engaged in defining her suspicion to herself, and concerting measures for gathering information with regard to it, Mrs. Hunt went out upon some household errand, and Lucy was obliged to descend to the parlor to see callers.

"Don't go until I come back, Vic. It is the Dunhams, and they never stay long," she said at quitting her associate.

"Oh, I always make myself at home here, you know, my dear!" was the reply.

Jeannie was sitting on a cushion near the chair Sarah had occupied, dressing her doll.

"It won't fit!" she cried, fretfully, snatching off a velvet basque she had been endeavoring to adjust to the lay-figure.

"Bring it to me! I can fix it!" offered Victoria, winningly. "It is too tight just here, you see. I will rip open the seam and alter it. Who makes your dolly's clothes?"

She was well aware that but one member of the family ever had leisure to bestow upon such follies: but it suited her plan for Jeannie to introduce her name.

"Sister Sarah."

"This is a pretty basque. When did she make it?"

"Yesterday."

"O, I thought perhaps she did it while you were in the country, and that the doll had fattened as much as you did there."

Jeannie laughed heartily.

"You had a nice time there, I suppose?" pursued Victoria.

"I guess we did!" Her eyes danced at the recollection. "A splendid time! I wish we lived at Aunt Sarah's! There isn't room for me to move in this narrow house."

"Mr. Benson was there a day or two, was he not?"

"Yes, ma'am—a great many days! He took us all around the country in Uncle Nathan's carriage. I love him very dearly!"

"Did you ever go sailing with him?"

"Every evening, when it was clear, in a pretty row-boat. He used to take his guitar along, and sing for us. He sings beautifully! Did you ever hear him?"

"O yes! Did your sister always go boating with you?"

The spy, with all her hardihood, lowered her voice, and felt her face warm as she put this leading question.

"Yes, ma'am—always. Mr. Benson would not have gone without her, I guess."

"Why do you guess so?"

The little girl smiled knowingly. "Because—you won't tell, will you?"

"Why, no! Of course I will not."

"Charley said it was a secret, and that I mustn't say anything to sister or Mr. Benson about it, for they would be angry."

"Who is Charley?"

"Don't you know? He is Aunt Sarah's son. He is deaf and dumb; but he showed me how to spell on my fingers. He is a nice boy—"

"Yes; but what was the secret?"

"He said that Mr. Benson—Cousin Phil I call him when I am talking to him—was sister's beau; and he would take me off with him when we went to drive or walk, because, you know, they might not like to have me hear what they were talking about. They used to talk, and talk, and talk! and sister had a great deal more to say, and looked prettier than she does at home. I will tell you something else, if you won't ever let anybody know it. I never told Aunt Sarah even, only Charley. Sister cried ever so long the night after Cousin Phil went away. She woke me up sobbing; but I made believe that I was asleep; and in the morning her pillow was right wet. Charley said that all ladies that he had read about in his books did so when their beaux left them."

"See here, my little lady!" said the dissembler, with a startling change of tone. "You are altogether mistaken—you and Charley both! Mr. Benson is going to marry your sister Lucy, and never was a beau of Sarah's. Be very careful not to talk about Charley's wicked story to your father, or mother, or sisters, for they would be very much displeased, and maybe punish you for repeating such fibs. Little girls ought never to hear or know anything about courting or beaux—it's naughty! I won't tell on you, if you will promise never to do so again. I am shocked at you! Now, take your dolly and go!"

The frightened child encountered Lucy at the door. Miss West had calculated her time to a minute. Her eyes swimming in tears, her features convulsed with the effort to keep back sob and outcry, Jeannie started up to her attic play-room. Sarah's door was ajar, and engaged as she was with thoughts of her own troubles and insults, she could not but remark the expression of her darling's face, in the momentary glimpse she had as it passed.

"Jeannie! come back!" she called.

The child hesitated, half way up the next flight. Sarah repeated the summons, and seeing that it was not obeyed, went up and took the rebel by the hand.

"What is the matter with you?"

A reddening and distortion of visage, and no reply. Her sister led her back to her chamber, shut the door, and put her arms around her.

"Tell me what ails you, dear!"

Jeannie fell upon her comforter's neck—the repressed torrent breaking through all restraint. "Oh, sister, I can't help crying! Miss Vic. West has been scolding me!"

"Scolding you! She! I will go down and speak to her this instant! How dared she?"

"No, no! please don't! She told me not to say anything to you about it!"

"The contemptible coward!" said Sarah, between her teeth. "How came you to have anything to do with her?"

"Mother and sister Lucy went down stairs, and she said she would alter my doll's basque, and—and—and"—a fresh burst of lamentation.

"There, that will do, pet! I see that she only made it worse!" soothed Sarah, believing that, in the unfinished state of dolly's wardrobe, she had discovered the root of the trouble. "Never mind, dear! I will set all that to rights, directly. Now wipe your eyes, and let me tell you something. This afternoon, father is to take me to ride, and you shall go, too. As for Miss Victoria, we will let her pass, and keep out of her way hereafter."

Secretly, she was very angry—far more so than she was willing to have the child suspect. As the patient fingers repaired the effects of the original bad fit and Miss West's meddling, Jeannie stood by, thankful and interested, yet ashamed to look her wronged sister in the eyes. Not that she had the remotest conception of the mischief that might grow out of her imprudent disclosures; but she had broken faith with Charley, been accused of tattling and indelicacy, and warned too stringently against repeating the offence to suffer her to relieve her conscience by a full confession to the being she most loved and honored.

At four o'clock Sarah and her charge were ready, according to Mr. Hunt's appointment. The carriage was likewise punctual; but from it stepped, not the parent of the expectant girls, but a younger and taller man—in short, Mr. Hunt's particular favorite—Lewis Hammond. Jeannie, who had stationed herself at an upper window to watch for her father's appearance, was still exclaiming over this disappointment, and wondering why "Mr. Hammond must call just now to keep sister at home," when the footman brought up a note to Sarah.

It was from Mr. Hunt, explaining the cause of his unlooked-for detention at the Bank, and stating that Mr. Hammond, whom he had met earlier in the day and acquainted with his design of giving his daughter this ride, happened to drop in, and seeing him engaged with business, had asked leave to officiate as his substitute in the proposed airing. He urged Sarah to take Jeannie along, and not hesitate to accept Mr. Hammond's polite attendance, adding in phrase brief, but sincere, how lightly he should esteem his hour of extra labor, if he knew that she was not a sufferer by it.

Sarah passed the note to her mother, and drew her shawl about her shoulders.

"Of course you'll go!" said Mrs. Hunt, radiant with gratification. "It is perfectly proper, and Mr. Hammond is very kind, I am sure."

She was hurrying towards the door to convey in person her thanks for his gallantry, when Sarah spoke firmly and very coolly:

"I will say whatever is necessary to Mr. Hammond, if you please, mother. I shall go because father wishes it, and for no other reason. Come, Jeannie!"

"Won't she be in your way?" asked Mrs. Hunt, awed, but not extinguished.

"No, madam."

Sarah suffered Mr. Hammond to place her in the carriage and himself opposite to her; and keeping before her mind carefully the fact that he was her father's friend—perhaps the saviour of his life—she unbent, as much as she could, from her distant, ungracious bearing, to sustain her part of the conversation. She must have been purblind not to see through her mother's wishes, and manœuvres for their accomplishment; but to these views she was persuaded that Mr. Hammond was no party. She saw in him a sedate, rather reserved gentleman of thirty-two or three, who had passed the heyday of youthful loves and joys; sensible and cultivated to an uncommon degree for a man of business—for such he emphatically was.

A poor boy in the beginning, he had fortunately attracted the regard of a thriving New York merchant, and retained that favor through the years that had elevated him from the lowest clerkship to a partnership in the now opulent firm. For probity and punctuality no man in the city had a higher reputation; but his virtues were of that quiet nature which, while they inevitably retain regard once won, are slow to gain admiration. To matrimonial speculators, as in financial circles, he was known as a "safe chance," and many a prudent mamma on his list of acquaintances would have rejoiced had he selected her daughter as mistress of his heart and fortune. Whether he was aware of this or not could not have been determined by his modest, but dignified deportment. He did not avoid company; went whither he was invited, and when there, comported himself like a conscientious member of society, talking, dancing, or listening, with as due regard to law and order as he manifested in his daily business life. Fast girls called him "awfully matter-of-fact," and "terribly sensible;" fast youths of the other sex put him down among the "old fogies," and wondered what he did with his money. "Could it be possible that he saved it!" He was intimate nowhere except in the household of his whilom employer and present partner, whose daughters were all married and settled in houses of their own. If he had ever cared to look twice at the same lady, the watchful world had not yet laid hold of this marvellous departure from his fixed habits.

His intercourse with Mr. Hunt's family was, as we know, purely accidental in its commencement, and in its earlier stages might have been induced by humanity or friendship for the sick father. In Sarah's brain there had never arisen a suspicion of any ulterior motive in the pointed attentions directed of late to herself. Before Lucy's return, the care of her invalid parent and her day-dreams had engrossed heart and thought to an extent that precluded much inquiry into other themes. Since that memorable night, inward torture had abstracted her mind still more from outward impressions.

This afternoon she talked calmly and indifferently to Mr. Hammond, without an idea that he made any greater effort to please her. To Jeannie she was tender beyond her usual showing, in remembrance of the wrong done the sensitive child in the forenoon. Mr. Hammond emulated her in kindness to the third member of their party; and in the course of their ride, raised himself unwittingly to the rank of rivalry with "Cousin Philip," her model gentleman.

Mr. Hunt came out to assist his daughter to alight, upon their return. There was a heartiness in his acknowledgment of his deputy's politeness, and invitation to enter the house and pass the evening with them, which Sarah had seldom heard him employ towards any visitor. Mr. Hammond may have remarked it likewise, for his declinature was evidently against his inclination, and coupled with a promise to call at an early day. His visits were not altogether so agreeable as formerly, for he was received in the spacious parlors on a footing with other callers, and in the presence of several members of the family; still he came repeatedly, with pretext and without, until his sentiments and design were a secret to no one except their object.

Wrapped in the sad thoughts that isolated her from the rest of the world, even while she made a part of its show, Sarah omitted to mark many things that should have been significant signs of under-currents, and tokens of important issues to her and those about her. Lucy had ceased to harp perpetually upon her lover's perfections and idolatrous flattery to herself, and while the wedding arrangements went vigorously forward, the disengaged sister was really annoyed by references to her taste and demands for her sympathy. There had never existed much congeniality between the two, and their common ground was now exceedingly narrow. Lucy was gentle and pleasant, peacefully egotistic as ever, and Sarah understood her too well to expect active affection or disinterestedness. The only part of her behavior to herself to which she took mental exception was a certain pitying forbearance, a compassionate leniency with respect to her faults and foibles, that had grown upon her of late. Once or twice the younger sister had become so restive under this gratuitous charity as to reply sharply to the whey-like speeches of the mild elder, and, without any appearance of wounded feeling, yet with not a word of apology or reason for so doing, Lucy had left the apartment, and never hinted at the circumstance afterwards.

Lucy was certainly the soul, the very cream of amiability. It was unaccountable to her admirers—and they included most of her associates—that Lewis Hammond, with his peculiar habits and tastes, should prefer that severe-looking, strong-minded Sarah. But be it remembered that he had learned this love under far different influences; in circumstances wholly unlike those in which he now beheld its object. His respect for unobtrusive intent and feeling; his longing for a home which should be the abode of sacred domestic virtues; and the sweet peace that had fled from the habitations frequented only by the frivolous, heartless, and vain—these found in the sick-room of the father, and the affectionate fidelity of the daughter, something so like the embodiment of his fancy of earthly happiness, that he accepted as a benignant fate the accident which had admitted him to the arcana of their private life. Sarah's temporary illness had taught him the meaning of his dreams, by seeming to point the chances of their fulfilment, and from that hour he strove patiently and sedulously, as it was his habit to seek all great ends, for the acquisition of the heart whose depth he, perhaps, of all who knew her, best understood.

The most impatient person of those directly or indirectly concerned in the progress of this wooing was Mrs. Hunt. Her husband, with unwonted firmness, had forbidden that any one of the household should speak a word in railery or otherwise to Sarah touching Mr. Hammond's intentions. "However earnestly I may desire his success"—he said to his wife—"and there is no man living whom I would rather call 'son'—I would not influence her by the weight of a single syllable. Hers is the happiness or the misery of a life with her husband—whomsoever she may choose, and hers shall be the entire choice. If she can love and marry Lewis Hammond, I shall be gratified; if not, she shall never guess at my disappointment."

"La, Mr. H. ! you are as foolish and sentimental as the girl herself ! For my part, I aint such a saint, and I do say that if Sarah Hunt allows such a catch as this to slip through her fingers, she shall hear a piece of my mind !"

"I insist," said Mr. Hunt, with immovable resolution, "that Sarah shall be allowed to follow the guidance of her own will in this matter. It is not often that I interfere with your plans; but in this one instance I must be obeyed!" With which astounding declaration of equal rights, if not of sovereignty, he left his consort to her reflections.

Ignorant of the delicate watchfulness maintained over her by this best of friends, Sarah walked on her beclouded way—without hope, without one anticipation of any future dissimilar to her present, until awakened with a shock by a formal declaration of love from Lewis Hammond.

THE SIMPLE SECRET.—Twenty clerks in a store; twenty hands in a printing office; twenty apprentices in a ship-yard; twenty young men in a village—all want to get on in the world, and expect to do so. One of the clerks will become a partner, and make a fortune; one of the compositors will own a newspaper and become an influential citizen; one of the apprentices will become a master builder: one of the young villagers will get a handsome farm, and live like a patriarch—but which one is the lucky individual? Lucky! there is no luck about it. The thing is almost as certain as the rule of three. The young fellow who will distance his competitors is he who masters his business, who preserves his integrity, who lives cleanly and purely, who devotes his leisure to the acquisition of knowledge, who never gets into debt, who gains friends by deserving them, and who saves his spare money. There are some ways to fortune shorter than this old dusty highway, but the staunch men of the community, the men who achieve something really worth having, good fortune, good name, and serene old age, all go in this road.

THE CASKET OF THE YEAR.

BY WILLIE E. PARBOR.

Pearl the Fourth.—April

The month of violets has come!
Its wealth of smiles and tears;
It showers over every home,
And over those whose foot-steps roam
In far or foreign spheres

The coy wind, yet so bleak and chill,
From Winter's hidden cave,
Comes whistling o'er the rippling rill
To woo the lilacs on the hill,
The lilies by the wave.

Its white arms on the amber air
Are bared toward the south;
The daffodils and daisies share
Their glories in her flaxen hair,
And roses tint her mouth!

O month of sunshine and of showers,
Of pleasant thoughts and themes,
Of honeysuckle wreathed bowers,
Of trailing vines, of blooming flowers,
Of tinted blossomings!

I mind an April when my heart
Thau now, was lighter far,
Before Death's sorrow-venomed dart
Touched one whose years of time were part,
Whose love was my life's star!

But now ' alas, for April days,
A lengthened shadow lies
For me, across its pleasant ways;
And ever, where my footstep strays,
It meets my saddened eyes.

TIME.

BY E.—

A WONDERFUL stream is the river Time,
As it runs through the realm of years,
With a faultless rhyme and a musical chime,
And a broader sweep and a surgesublime,
And blends with the ocean of tears.

There's a musical isle in the river Time,
Where the softest airs are play'ning,
There's a cloudless sky and a tropical clime,
And a song as sweet as a vesper chime,
And the loves with the roses are straying.

There are fragments of songs that nobody sings,
And a part of an infant prayer;

There's a lute unswept and a harp without strings,
There are broken vows and pieces of rings,
And the garments Love used to wear.

There are hands that are waved on the fairy shore,
When the mirage is lifted in air:
And we sometimes hear through the turbulent roar
Sweet voices we heard in days gone before,
When the wind down the river is fair.

Oh, remembered for aye be the blessed isle,
All the days of life till night:

When the evening comes with its beautiful smile,
And our eyes are closing to slumber awhile,
May the island of souls be in sight.

PETRAE VON BOCK.

BY MARIAN DOUGLAS.

"Tis very hard, and so it is,
To live in such a row,
And witness this, that every miss,
But me, has got a beau.
For Love goes calling up and down,
But here he seems to shun ;
He hardly seems to know there is A place like number one.—THOMAS HOOD.

KIND READER, are you crooked? Do you have round shoulders? Did your mother ever tell you that you looked like a rainbow minus its brilliancy? or did you ever hear your aunts discussing the propriety of your adopting braces? Were your Sabbath cogitations ever interrupted by seeing some friend motioning for you to "sit up?" or by catching the whispered query of some incautious stranger in the pew behind you, "Who is that girl bent up over her prayer-book?" Did some mischievous cousin, or brother, or nephew ever draw comparisons between you and your enfeebled grandmother in the chimney corner, or some deformed beggar in the streets? If not—if you have never suffered all these things—cast aside this paper; you can never sympathize with me, the miserable authoress, the unfortunate Petrae Von Bock! For I, alas! am not only crooked, but I am also near-sighted; so near-sighted, indeed, that, like the "heathen in my blindness," I go bowing down to wood and stone; not mistaking these substances for deities, but acquaintances. During the last few years, so much has this defect in my sight increased, that at little distance I am now unable to distinguish my most intimate friends from inanimate objects; and the mistakes which I am constantly making are as ludicrous to others as they are mortifying to myself. When I inform you that, in addition to these personal disadvantages, I have no fortune; that my invalid father is obliged to exercise the strictest economy to make "the ends" of his slender income meet, you will naturally suppose that I possess but few attractions, and that I rank among the wall-flowers, and not the belles of society.

My father, who I just said was an invalid, is, in my opinion, although perhaps a little inferior to the apostles and martyrs, at least the best man now extant; so excellent, indeed, that I never think of comparing him with his contemporaries, but only with good, old Bible characters like Abraham, who stood in the door of his tent and talked with the angels.

As for my other parent, of whom her unworthy child quite disproves the assertion, "Like mother like daughter," "She openeth her mouth with wisdom, and on her tongue is the law of kindness;" "She looketh well to the ways of her household, and eateth not the bread of idleness;" "She stretcheth out her hands to the poor, yea, she reacheth forth her hands to the needy;" in fact, the incarnation of all the moral and Christian virtues; goes regularly to church in the black bombazine dress and gray shawl which constitute her Sabbath-day costume. All the principles of domestic thrift, and yet generous hospitality, are untiringly exemplified in her week-day conduct.

Out of the circle of our own family, we have few acquaintances, fewer callers. There are, it is true, my father's friends: the gray-haired minister and the white-haired deacon. There are the friends of my mother, also: the village spinster, Aunt Palmida, who calls weekly, with a "great burden on her mind," to know what can be done for the village blacksmith with the broken leg, or the shoemaker's baby with the whooping-cough. There is the little Mrs. Smith, who always blushes when you speak to her, and the notable housewife, Mrs. Johnstone, who invariably comes either to obtain or to give receipts. I also have two friends—the rich, smart, red-haired daughter of the village merchant; the pretty, sentimental, portionless, orphan niece of the village physician, in the white cottage, with green blinds.

From the sterner sex I have never received any other than the most trivial attention. From this I would not have you infer that I am wholly indifferent to their neglect. Indeed, of old, I felt it keenly. How could I but do so? I, who had sat amid the shadows on the attic stairs reading a paper-covered edition of Scott, should not I wish (alas! I forgot my shoulders, which would grow out, and my near-sighted eyes) to be crowned by some knightly Ivanhoe as his queen of Love and Beauty? I, who had read with interest the "thrilling tales" in the "Ladies' Wreath," a magazine which my mother took in her earlier years; I, who had "devoured" all the latter-day novels that I had been able to procure; I who had sighed over that lachrymose story, "Quashy," and wept with its weeping heroine, should not I wish for some Carleton to lead me also to a bower of roses? I who had seen, and I assure you it was a sight more affecting than all, the rich, smart, red-haired daughter of the village merchant riding out with the handsomest clerk in her father's store; I who had witnessed the lawyer's student pulling, weekly, the door-bell of the little cottage with green blinds, where the sentimental niece of the doctor resided; how could I, with a temperament unusually active, with sensibilities unusually keen, consent to be alone unsought for, alone neglected?

Some winters ago—no matter how many nor how few, but in my sixteenth year—I determined to win myself, at any cost, an admirer; and having heard incidentally that a student from a neighboring college was to open a private school in the neighborhood, I selected him as the unfortunate individual who should fill the position of devotee to myself.

"A young gentleman is coming to instruct a private school during the winter," said I to my mother.

"A young gentleman?" repeated my mother, indifferently.

"A student from college," I continued.

"Some Freshman who can find no better situation, I presume," added she.

"Some Freshman," thought I; "some Freshman; and, if a Freshman, probably young—and if young, sentimental—and if sentimental, fond of poetry—and if fond of poetry, he will of course repeat it—and, if he repeats it, where are there ten verses that have not something about love in them? and if we talk about love, who knows but that he may feel the tender passion, and become my admirer?" And here I thought of my shoulders, which would grow out, and of my near-sighted eyes. "And yet," I reasoned, "did not the ancients represent the God of Love as blind? and is it not worse to be blind than to be near-sighted?"

But how should I form his acquaintance? This was a question, which, with girlish anxiety, I deliberated for a number of days; during which time I was gratified to learn that the subject of my thoughts had arrived, and his school commenced. Never before had I given a thought to the village pedagogues. Never before had I evinced so much zeal in the cause of education. Twice had I seen him pass; but once he was obscured by the shadows of evening; and once my eye-glass was unfortunately missing. In vain I made an errand to his boarding place; in vain I attended the singing-school, and haunted the weekly lyceum. The object of my persevering regard left my curiosity ungratified, and my eye unsatisfied with seeing.

For once, however, Fortune favored me. For it happened that my father, who, though an invalid, was wont, occasionally, to stroll out to visit his more intimate friends, met the young student at the house of the gray-haired Deacon in whose family he boarded, made his acquaintance, and invited him to call.

"And invited him to call!" Well begun is half done; and of course I was highly delighted. An enchanting vision of friendship, love, and matrimony rose before my dazzled though near-sighted eyes. "Pink, and pink it shall be, my bridal bonnet!" thought I. "And when I shall wear it, the merchant's daughter and the doctor's niece will behold my triumph, and bite their fingers with envy and vexation."

Three successive evenings (for, knowing that school sessions confined him during the day, I supposed that he would call only in the evening) I arranged and rearranged the simple furniture in the parlor, and brought in my full blooming monthly rose (the only one of my house-plants which had deigned to favor me with a blossom) to decorate the light stand in the corner. On the fourth night, I might have yielded to despair, had not my mother kindly suggested that it was a more probable time for the visit than any of the previous ones. So, again, I went through the same preparations as before, and, as a finishing touch, brought from the chamber where it was usually kept, a small ornamental chair of remarkably elaborate and beautiful workmanship, the gift of a friend to my mother; a chair, indeed, of so unique a pattern as to be quite worthy the attention of a virtuoso. But the weight of the tall, gothic back scarcely corresponded with the light seat and slender framework which supported it, and rendered it so liable to be overturned by any sudden movement of the occupant, that my mother had prudently caused it to be placed where it might stand for ornament alone.

"You had better not bring that chair into the parlor, Petrae," said my mother.

"But," said I, for, being an only child, I considered it my privilege to argue with my parents in relation to any subject, "it is so pretty, and it gives the room such 'an air.'"

"And suppose your visitor should sit in it, and be overturned?"

"Oh, I will prevent any such misfortune," said I, "for he will take the large chair, and I will sit in this myself, and I shall be too quiet and observant to suffer any such accident."

And so the chair was allowed to remain, and

I arrayed myself in my new brown merino. My new brown merino, with its snug fitting basque trimmed with black velvet, and I added to my toilet my best collar, which, as the needlework was fine, and the lace around it delicate, my mother had forbidden my wearing except upon special occasions.

"Does not my dress fit prettily?" said I to my mother.

"Yes," she replied, "but it is very trying to the figure." And then she sighed; and I sighed too, for I knew she was thinking of my shoulders, which would grow out; and I might have sighed again, and continued to sigh, had I not through my eye-glass seen, just then, the gate at the extreme of the long front yard open, and a figure enter, tall and manly, with a face which physiognomists would call sensible, a very different person from the sentimental youth that I had pictured to myself.

"And yet," thought I, "is it not better? Is he not more likely to become my admirer if he be sensible, than if he were sentimental? Would not a sensible person look more at my soul than at my shoulders, which will grow out, and at my near-sighted eyes? Would not a sensible person instantly perceive that I have more general information than the rich, smart, red-haired daughter of the village merchant? more practical good judgment than the doctor's sentimental niece?"

"It is well that he is sensible," thought I, as I heard the clear ring of the front door bell. "It is well that he is sensible," thought I, as, after being introduced by my father (and his name was Mr. Adams), I took my seat in the little ornamental tipping-over chair, and remarked, with a smile (and my mouth is considered my redeeming feature), "You will find this a very quiet little village, Mr. Adams."

"I judge so," said he; "but my impressions are quite favorable, although they are perhaps derived less from the village than my boarding place."

"You will find much to admire in Deacon Johnstone," said my father, ever ready to speak a good word for his gray-haired friend. He is entertaining, as well as kind and judicious; his memory is remarkable, and his fund of anecdote is almost inexhaustible."

"He is no less noticeable physically than mentally," responded Mr. Adams; "his sight seems unimpaired; he reads the newspaper without glasses, and, indeed, seems free from all the infirmities of age; his figure is erect as that of an Indian."

"As that of an Indian." He could not have made a more painful remark. Even then I felt my cherished hopes perceptibly waning; but I was enabled still to wear the same beaming smile as before, while I made a quiet though resolute effort to force back my shoulders into the position which physiologists call healthful.

"Your walk from your boarding place to the school-room is very pleasant," said my mother, my dear kind mother, to change the subject.

"And it is doubly so in summer, when the shade trees are in foliage," said I, glad to have an opportunity of speaking; "there are some majestic elms overhanging the street."

"And those specimens of poplar are quite uncommon," he replied; "a stunted Lombardy poplar is inelegant enough, but those trees are like six giant sentinels; so tall and self-reliant that I quite admire them."

And here, alas, too soon! my feelings received their second shock, for I had always possessed a deep-seated aversion to those trees; although I must confess to you, sub rosa, that it was owing to my mother's having so often and vainly wished that I might be "as straight as a Lombardy poplar."

But the subject of trees, however disagreeably introduced, is always a fertile one; and trees suggested plants, and plants suggested flowers, and flowers suggested poetry; and I talked with the ardor, if not with the wisdom of Solomon, from the "cedar of Lebanon to the hyssop on the wall;" and I proved, at least I thought I proved, that I possessed a great deal of general information, for I quoted many verses: some from Longfellow and Tennyson, and others from the old "Ladies' Wreath" magazines. But alas! while we spoke of the willow, the graceful, bending willow, and while we grew classical and talked of dryads and hamadryads, I forgot myself, and allowed my figure to assume its naturally crooked position; and while I forgot myself, my father, who occasionally asked questions abruptly, and who thought I was "only sixteen," inquired of our new acquaintance "if his school had opened pleasantly, and if he enjoyed his new duties as teacher?"

"It is all very pleasant," said Mr. Adams, "that is to say, my pupils are agreeable; and the schoolroom offers but one objection of which I venture to complain, because it can be so easily obviated."

"Indeed?" said my mother, inquiringly.

"The desks are too low to correspond with the seats, and the scholars naturally incline over their books in unhealthy as well as un-graceful positions. I continually remind them of the fault, it is true, and yet it seems wrong to reprove what they can hardly avoid."

"You are quite right," said my mother; "the habit should be checked, not fostered; it holds ground so resolutely when once it has gained it. I know of many persons so confirmed in it that it is next to impossible for them to keep an upright position, if indeed they can attain it at all; and if one naturally inclines to stoop, it can scarcely be expected of them to conquer both obstacles." And here she glanced at me, with that kind, excusatory look with which mothers are wont to regard their daughters' failings.

How could I be quiet? How could I sit passively, even in the tipping-over chair? How could I remember its fragility? I determined to be straight. I made a desperate resolution to sit erect; I threw back my shoulders with a convulsive effort, when suddenly I felt that chair, that delicate chair, going—going—I caught hold of the light stand that stood next me, and then—and then—to quote from the village Mrs. Partington, "The first thing I knew, I knew nothing at all."

"Have not I proved that it is impossible for some persons to keep erect?" said I, when, on recovering my senses, I opened my eyes, expecting to astonish my visitor with my quickness of thought, my presence of mind.

But alas! the young student had vanished. There, alone, was my good mother holding my throbbing head, and my kind father standing over me with the bottle of camphor, and the little servant-girl (whom we had taken out of pity from her intemperate parents) looking on, and exclaiming in mingled accents of fear and sympathy, "Miss Petrae, is your skull broke? Miss Petrae, is your skull broke?" and then I learned for the first time that nearly half an hour had elapsed since my great misfortune; for, as I had fallen, I had caught hold of the light-stand in the corner, bringing down the monthly rose with its china pot upon my head, and inflicting a wound in my forehead (a wound which, the consoling little servant girl kindly informed me, "would leave a scar as long as I lived"), and that, as the physician had entered, the young student had bowed an adieu, and promised to call again when, if ever, stunned and insensible as I was, I should be recovered. And then I cried, for I pictured myself to myself as I should be when a few years older; when my shoulders should have grown out a little more, and my eyes should have become more near-sighted, and when that great scar would give the aspect of a frown to my whole countenance. And I cried; and my mother thought that my head ached, and bathed again my forehead with camphor, and called me "her own poor Petrae," and then I cried anew, for I had expected that evening to be so very happy in winning to myself an admirer.

An admirer that I have never won; for the young student never remembered his promise to call; and when I returned from my visit—for, soon after this event, I went to spend a time with a widowed aunt, who resided in the sleepest little house, in the sleepest little street, in the sleepest little town in New England—I came to meet the report that he had formed an engagement with the doctor's sentimental niece. The doctor's sentimental niece—who, for his sake, had trifled with and cast aside the heart of the lawyer's student, who used to call so regularly at the little white cottage with green blinds.

An admirer that I have never won; for, since that time, I have given up all hopes of ever finding one, and have devoted myself to the society of my good parents, and of my parents' good friends—the white-haired minister and the gray-haired deacon, and the village spinster, Aunt Palmeda, who has taken me under her especial protection, and kindly informs me that she thinks I am yet destined to become a prominent member of society; although my shoulders are yet growing out, and my eyes are becoming more and more near sighted; the village spinster, who persistently dwells upon the immense benefit she has derived from the use of blue glasses, and assures me "I shall never regret it, if I put on spectacles." So I have learned to be more contented; to patiently copy receipts for the notable cook Mrs. Johnstone, and instruct the younger children of the village merchant in the rudiments of mathematics. I have learned to be more contented; but when, occasionally yielding to a childish impulse, I sit down amid the shadows on the garret stairs, and take out the paper covered edition of Waverley, the same dissatisfied feeling arises as of old, and I sigh (forgetting my shoulders, which will grow out, and my near-sighted eyes) to be the heroine of some practical romance. Sometimes a strange desire for sympathy comes over me, and I am conscious of the same wicked feeling expressed in the verse—

"I think I should be happier,
Feel calmer, if I knew
Some other heart were suffering
The same afflictions too."

And so my dear, crooked reader—for I am sure it is only my crooked reader who has followed me to the close of my story—I turn to you, trusting, that while you feel a kindred sympathy for one whose shoulders will grow out, you will gently pass by the foibles of the unfortunate authoress, Petrae Von Bock.

LITTLE MISS STODDARD.

BY MARY W. JANVREIN.

“SATURDAY, the day before Christmas,” I wrote, “I shall be with you, dear Hattie, ‘Providence permitting,’ as little Miss Stoddard would say. I did hope for the escort of one of our Woodboro’ merchants going on to Boston that day; but I have just learned that he is not to go; so I have coaxed mamma into permitting me to take the journey alone, by assuring her that I hav’n’t the least fear of travelling as ‘an unprotected woman;’ that I shall change cars at the Palmerton Station for the Boston train before twilight sets in, and that your dear, good husband will meet me at the depot on my arrival. So, Hattie, I hope to sit at your own fireside at the end of another Saturday night, and enjoy one of our good, old-time chats we used to have in the days before you were so naughty as to go get married without consulting or asking permission of “Your old and affectionate friend,

“JOSEPHINE.”

I was going on a visit to Hattie Ellsworth, my dearest school-girl friend, who had settled in our pleasant New England metropolis—and whose letters since the event of her happy wifehood, somewhat less than a year previous, had so abounded with urgent solicitations to redeem my given promises of said visit “after she was at housekeeping,” that—partly to make good my word, but mostly for the pleasure which I was sure I should enjoy—I gladly accepted her latest note of invitation and wrote the date of my visit, busy, meantime, with numerous preparations.

To this letter, by the next Wednesday evening’s mail, I received reply:—

“DEAR JOSEY: What do you think? ‘Providence permitting,’ you are not to come on alone to Boston next Saturday; but are to have a travelling companion in the shape of little Miss Stoddard herself, the good old soul! The same mail that brought your last also brought me the plainest, neatest little letter, just like good old Stoddard, stating ‘that, if agreeable, she’d like to come and pass a few days with me, as she promised when she made my wedding clothes; and, as she had heard that Miss Josephine Bowen was coming on, maybe she (Josephine) wouldn’t object to her for a travelling companion;’ so I told Harry, and he is delighted, for he took the greatest fancy to little Miss Stoddard, and has actually been picking out a husband for her in his good old Uncle Fielding (as if little Stoddard would ever marry!); and the same mail that takes you this will also carry a letter to the little woman, assuring her how happy her visit will make us. I am very sure it will make her happy, for she promised it to me so earnestly, that I see now how the thought of it pleased her, and I shall do everything I can to make her enjoy herself. So, dear Josey, sacrifice your horror of ‘great box, little box, bandbox, and bundle,’ and make up your mind to take along little Stoddard as a compagnon du voyage. I am dying to see you; I talk about your visit half the time to Harry, not to mention some one else, whom I occasionally tell that ‘you are to visit me some time this winter.’ Won’t he be surprised, and delighted, too, when he knows of your arrival, for I sha’n’t divulge the secret of its when till you meet here? But I have only a moment before the mail closes; so good-by till I see you Saturday next.

“HATTIE.”

“P. S. Wonder if little Stoddard will wear that chinchilla tippet and that de bête? Do coax her into getting something neat and genteel! Gray it’ll be, of course; for I should as soon expect to see a mouse change the color of its skin, as to see the little woman wear anything but her favorite quiet colors. But as it happens to be la mode just now, for once she will be in style.

HATTIE.”

I refolded Hattie’s letter, and set at least five minutes in thought, and that was quite a long period for me, Josey Bowen. So I was to go to Boston, and with a travelling companion, Miss Charity Stoddard, spinster, nervous, and given to bundles and a chinchilla tippet.

The prospects were not at first quite pleasing. Not that I had anything against little Miss Stoddard; on the contrary, in common with everybody in Woodboro’, I liked, and had taken into a little corner of my heart this lonely, quiet spinster waif, who belonged to nobody's family, and who had a claim on nobody save what her own unobtrusive worth and simple, cheerful piety warranted. For little Stoddard (everybody called her "little Miss Stoddard," or "little Stoddard," and we did not mean it as a mark of disrespect) was an orphan, and had been since her childhood; I never thought how far back that lay, for, to me, she never seemed "old," as most people do who get crows-feet in the corners of their eyes and silver threads in their hair; and she was without a relative in the wide world whom she knew of save a distant connection on her mother's side, a wealthy man living at the South, from whom came a little annuity of a hundred dollars, with which yearly sum, and what she earned at sewing and crocheting, and the little gifts of the people of Woodboro', she got along nicely.

Little Miss Stoddard had a place she called "home," a little room she hired at Mrs. Wilcox's, a widow of genteel but reduced family; and a pleasant, cheerful room it was, too, and with an air of refinement in its modest carpet, chintz-covered furniture, stand of thriving plants, and table of books, that you might vainly seek in many a richly upholstered dwelling. But she had a nook also by more than one fireside in Woodboro', and, whether busy with her needle assisting in the wardrobe of some young bride expectant, crocheting some dainty "set" of sleeves, or helping in any of her quiet, useful ways, with an ever-ready, pleasant smile and word, all had learned to value "little Stoddard."

Hattie Anderson had been an especial favorite of the little spinster; and, being something of a dressmaker, Miss Stoddard had helped in the bridal trousseau, excepting that portion fashioned under a city modiste. There never were daintier ruffles than Stoddard's little pale fingers hemmed and gathered, never neater plain sewing, nor nicer prepared table or bed linen than she made for the future wife's menage under the superintendence of Hattie's bustling mother. And little Stoddard had been at the wedding, in the neatest of silver gray silks and the snowiest of collars, though both dress and embroideries were slightly old fashioned; and had cried quietly when everybody else, Hattie's school girl friends in particular, had given way to more open demonstrations when the young bride left us; and her last words to Hattie were a promise to visit her "next winter" in her city home.

Yes, Stoddard was "good"—a "good old soul," as Hattie had written, and as I sat and thought; but then she wore the quietest gowns, always cut after one pattern, and her crinoline was of the modestest dimensions, and her little chinchilla tippet was of the type of our grandmothers'. Altogether, though I like little Miss Stoddard, and was another of her favorites, she was not just the compagnon du voyage a young and fashion-loving young lady would have selected for a winter's visit to a fashionable friend in the gay metropolis.

But the pleasure imprinted on the little woman's countenance, when, that evening, she entered my mother's parlor to inform us that she had received a letter from Mrs. Ellsworth, and that she had concluded to visit her when I did, and asked in what train I intended to leave, so reconciled me that I was uncommonly gracious in my replies. "It is such a pleasure to poor little Stoddard!" I said, by way of excusing my unwonted urbanity, after she had gone. "But, mamma, I do hope she won't wear that old-fashioned debêge travelling-dress! I've a great mind to go out in the morning and make her a present of something pretty to ride in, gray, of course, it must be, though."

"As you please, my dear," replied mamma; "but you must remember that in a fashionable suit, our little friend would no longer be herself."

But for all mamma's speech, I went out and bought a nice all wool delaine, of little Miss Stoddard's favorite mouse-color; and she was delighted with the present, and on Saturday morning met us at the Woodboro' depot, looking "quite stylish for little Stoddard"—so said mamma, and several of my young friends who had come down to see me off. What with the new travelling-dress, and her plain gray shawl, and the neat bonnet she had made of black and white checker silk, my companion was a well-clad little figure. The chinchilla tippet worried me somewhat, in contrast with my own set of fashionable furs, and I was foolish enough to mention it to mamma; but she silenced me with saying that the tippet had been part and parcel of little Miss Stoddard for so many winters, that she should surely think something was going to befall her if anything hindered her from wearing it.

So I smiled at mamma's answer, and kissed her and the girls, and then entered the car, and was soon seated beside my companion, and being borne by the snorting iron steed Bostonward. I shall not here record the pleasant thoughts that flew on before, faster than the steam that bore us—avant courriers—to the city where dwelt my dear friends; for probably Hattie's letter, or one sentence of it, may have already enlightened you regarding them, and given you to understand that a dearer friend than my school-girl one would be there to welcome me. Such a confession would be very foolish of me, some would say; at any rate, little Miss Stoddard was none the wiser for it.

A faint exclamation from my travelling companion aroused me from the pages of the magazine I held. I looked up to behold the small mountain composed of the "great box, little box, handbox, and bundle" whereof Hattie had written, and overtopping the car seat I had turned facing us, sliding down to the floor. Poor little Stoddard! the journey to Boston was an event in her untravelled life; and, like Martha of old, she was troubled about many things."

"There, Miss Stoddard, we'll hang up this big carpet bag," I exclaimed, "and the small one and the bundle, they won't slide down again; but ain't you warm, Miss Stoddard? I'd take off my tippet, we're so near the stove; there! now you're settled again nicely!" and while, at my suggestion, she had disposed the offending eyesore on the seat opposite, I settled to my magazine again.

The day passed. I read till my eyes ached; I matronized little Stoddard and her baggage; we dined nicely from the well-filled hand bag mamma had put up for us, with the addition of a cup of hot tea we procured at a way station; and at twilight of the short December's day the train drew up at Palmerton, where "passengers for Boston" were requested, in a stentorian voice, by the conductor to "change cars."

Adding one of little Miss Stoddards' satchels to my own, and folding my shawl over my arm, we stepped from the car platform to the waiting train which, in about three hours more was to bring us to the terminus of our journey. Scarcely had we got well on our way, when little Miss Stoddard grasped my arm and whispered in quiet distress: Oh, Josephine, my tippet!"

"It was left in the car!" said I, inly blaming myself for the loss, for at my suggestion it had been removed. "It is too bad!"

"No, dear, I took it over my arm when we got out; but I suppose I dropped it on the ground!" she answered. "I shall be sorry never to see it again, for it used to be my mother's!" and the little woman's quiet voice took a more subdued tone at that reference to kith and kin, the first I had ever heard her make.

I could not say much by way of comfort, but I inly determined to purchase her a nice new fur, as soon as I got to Boston, out of the ample allowance mamma had granted me; and from that moment I felt an increased respect for little Miss Stoddard. It was not her loss she bewailed; but the little old-fashioned tippet I had often so thoughtlessly ridiculed perhaps was the only souvenir of that quiet lonely little woman's dead and gone mother.

It was nearly eight o'clock when we arrived in Boston. Hattie's husband was at the car door in search of us; and when we were set down at his house Hattie herself was there to receive us with the warmest of welcomes, and both myself and "dear, good Miss Stoddard" were half smothered in caresses. The home to which Henry Ellsworth had taken his young wife was what I had expected to find it, elegant, tasteful, and luxurious in every appliance; and it was really refreshing to witness the quiet delight of my travelling companion at her kind reception. We knew it by the sparkle of her blue eyes, and the flush of her usually pale cheeks; but she was quiet as ever, and only said in her low voice:

"I told you, Harriet, that when you got nicely settled at housekeeping, I meant to come and visit you, Providence permitting; and now I am here."

"And we are very glad to see you, dear Miss Stoddard—my husband and myself, and I want you to enjoy every minute of your stay," answered Hattie. It was easy to see that the newly added dignities of her position had not taken away the young wife's girlish naturalness and kindness of heart.

After tea was over, Miss Stoddard asked to be shown to her room, for the long day's ride had wearied her. I lingered with her a few minutes after Mrs. Ellsworth had gone down, to assist her in unpacking such articles as she would need on the morrow, for I knew the pious little woman never encroached on the Sabbath. Miss Stoddard was a spinster, as I have said, and she possessed such "little ways" as are usually attributed to that sisterhood. So I sat a few minutes, and watched her lay out a variety of little brushes on the toilet, besides numerous tiny boxes of medicines and vials of "drops," which she arrayed side by side with mathematical precision. Then she took out one or two pairs of little slippers, the same number of black silk aprons and handkerchiefs, and shook out a neat gray morning wrapper which she laid evenly over a chair by the head of the bed; and, last of all, she drew forth a little red-covered Bible, which she laid on the table. I had seen the little Bible before, nights when she had slept at my mother's; but I looked on it with increased reverence then, for I thought that, too, perhaps, had belonged to the lonely little woman's dead mother, she laid it on the table so reverently.

"There, dear, I thank you for helping me," she said, as she shut the lid of her trunk, and laid her white night-dress and little night-cap with its prim border of lace down on a chair. "You want to go down to Harriet now. Providence has been very good to her"—looking around the warm and sumptuously furnished chamber. "She seemed glad to see me, and I am glad I came," she added, quietly. "Good-night, dear."

I had a long talk with Hattie before the drawing-room grate afterward; Mr. Ellsworth being good enough to go into his library to read for an hour. After discussing various subjects—"Harry's" praises; how delighted "some one" would be when he learned I was there; "we might meet at church to-morrow, if his patients would permit him to go," Hattie said, and items of news from "home"—we came upon the little woman sleeping quietly upstairs.

"Little Stoddard looks just the same as ever, and yet there's something I missed about her the moment she stepped in the door. What can it be, Josey?" and she mused a moment.

"Why, it's the chinchilla tippet!" I broke forth, laughingly. "She lost it on the way, when we changed cars at Palmerton. But I'm real sorry, though, for the poor little woman said it had belonged to her mother."

"So it is—the chinchilla!" exclaimed Hattie, catching hold of my hand and laughing, too. "Little Stoddard, without her tippet, is like an—an—angel without its wings." And she laughed merrily at the grotesqueness of her comparison.

"It's my fault. I caused her to take it off, 'because the car was warm,' I urged; but in reality, Hattie, because I was tired to death of the sight of it. But I did wrong, though, and must replace it with a new one."

"I have an idea!" said Hattie, clapping her hands. "We will join purses, and purchase her a nice set of furs for a New Year's gift—that's a week from to-day. A capital idea! don't you think so, Josey?"

"What is such a capital idea, Harriet?" said Mr. Ellsworth in the doorway, smiling upon us.

"Oh, we're talking about the good little woman up-stairs! Since you've taken upon you the responsibility of providing her a husband in good old Uncle Fielding, Josey and I are taking the liberty of adding to her wardrobe!" she mischievously answered. "You see, Josey," she added, "this is one of Harry's obstinate whims—that Uncle John Fielding, who has lived all his days a bachelor, and for whom manœvering mammas have manœvered in vain, is going to commit the irretrievable act at this late hour. He's out of the city now; but on his return we shall invite him here to 'come, and see, and conquer little Stoddard.'"

"When 'the conquering hero comes,' with John Gilpin poet, 'may I be there to see!'" I laughingly replied, as I rose to retire.

Next day was Sabbath and Christmas; and we attended morning service with Hattie and her husband in the Episcopal Church, for little Miss Stoddard never missed her church-going; and though, I fear, less of the spiritual mingled with the motives that sent the remaining trio thither, yet, on that morning above all others, we felt that it was "good to be there."

The church was trimmed with holly and evergreens; the reading desks were wreathed with the freshness of the twining ivy; around the galleries and over the chancel were passages from the Sacred Word, descriptive of the advent, in lettering of green; and the great organ pealed forth such a glorious tide of symphony when the choristers rendered the grand jubilate of the birth of the Prince of Peace that my soul was quite uplifted and outborne from the presence of the place. I forgot the elegant cadences of the minister's voice; I minded no more the greenery transplanted from the heart of the country pine forest; the sheen of rustling silks in that fashionable congregation; little Miss Stoddard's gray bonnet and shawl in contrast with Hattie's velvet cloak and sables, or the fact that a pair of dark eyes somewhere in that crowded church might be bent upon me; but my soul was borne away, away, on those waves of sound, till I stood on the plains of Judea with that grand choral harmony penetrating all space, "Peace on earth, good-will to men!"

When the service closed, and the rustling of silken garments in the aisles recalled me, I walked downward with the thronging crowd; but I was not thoroughly aroused till I felt the strong pressure of a hand clasping my own, and heard in a low, eager, tone, "This is a pleasant surprise, Miss Bowen!" And then Hattie said archly: "Oh, we meant to surprise you, Doctor Robertson! But you are to come home and dine with us, unless you have left some patients to be dispatched immediately!" And with a new feeling of happiness at my heart we passed out together. Once on the pavé, I had no thought but for my companion; and little Miss Stoddard walked with Mr. and Mrs. Ellsworth. I have a faint remembrance that her eyes had a bright sparkle and her cheeks a faint flush as we had stepped into the aisle together; for such grand organ tones as had carried me out of myself had never been heard by the little quiet woman in the plain meeting-house in Woodboro', where she had sat every Sunday for many, many years.

"Stoddard enjoyed her church service," said Hattie, as she sat in the drawing-room, after the little woman had sought her chamber.

"Not a very dignified manner of styling your guest, my dear," said her husband.

"Oh, Harry, I'm sure nobody ever means disrespect in calling her so. But 'Miss Charity Stoddard,' 'Mrs. John Fielding' that is to be, if that title sounds preferable!" was the laughing rejoinder.

"'Charity!' not an unfitting name for the sober, pleasant-faced, little lady," said Doctor Robertson; "for, with her spy step, quiet voice, and soothing air, she reminds me of those best of all nurses—the Sisters of Charity—I sometimes encounter in my professional rounds among the poor. But what is this I hear? 'Mrs. John Fielding' that is to be?" Surely, Ellsworth, this little woman isn't going to be your aunt; for that, I take it, will be her perquisite if she adopts the name of that pleasant bachelor uncle of yours, whom I meet here occasionally."

Hattie laughed in glee as her husband replied soberly: "If my first effort at match-making does not fail, it will so come to pass, Doctor. This good uncle of mine, who has wasted his life in single blessedness, is to be exposed to the full battery of her quiet forces on his return; and, as a good listener is said to be the chief of a pair of conversationists, I don't doubt but my most sanguine hopes will be fulfilled!" And, smoothing his countenance as the door opened quietly, and, with gentle step, little Miss Stoddard added herself to our number, he led the way down to the dining-room.

Dinner over, Miss Stoddard went up to her room again. Harry Ellsworth smiled, and said something about "orthodoxy;" but I knew she was busy with the contents of the little red-covered Bible; and so I told them about her lonely life. It touched Mr. Ellsworth's heart. "Poor little woman!" he said. "All alone in the world! No kith or kin! Nobody to care for her! that's hard—to grow old without somebody to love us?" and his arm was around Hattie's waist, and the beloved young wife nestled closer to her husband. For myself, I was so happy, sitting there in the shade of the flowing crimson curtains by the window, while the twilight fell about us—sitting there, with my hand clasped in his, who, I knew, wished to guide me safely through Life's journey, and plant the sweet blooming hedgerows of love along my way—I could well afford to drop a few crumbs of thought to the lonely little being sitting above stairs in the solitude that had grown a habit of her life.

Solitude, did I say? Nay; while I was drinking in the earthly love, was not little Miss Stoddard, whom I so pitied for her lonely state, quaffing from the well, hidden within the lids of her little Bible, a purer draught of Love, even the Heavenly and Divine?

Three weeks went by; weeks rich in enjoyment to me. With the avidity of a taste which had always craved, yet from a secluded life had been denied, the many intellectual enjoyments a great city affords, I had already seized much, and so deeply imprinted it on the tablets of memory that no future event could erase it. I had gratified the eye with the paintings and sculptures in the noble Athenæum Gallery; the ear, with the grand oratorios of the Creation and the Messiah, and the cultivated warblings of the artistic prima donna; the intellect with the drama and the eloquent lecture; while the heart was taking its own nutriment, for Doctor Robertson was now my declared lover, and, in the intervals of his professional duties, constantly at my side. From his great friendship with Hattie's husband, he came to be regarded by both in the light of a brother. Hattie began to talk, as we sat together, of the time when we should again live neighbors; Mr. Ellsworth never missed an opportunity to tease me; and little Miss Stoddard, when informed of my engagement, to which Doctor Robertson had obtained my mother's consent by letter, said quietly: "Providence permitting, Josephine, I will help you considerable with your sewing, as I did Harriet with hers."

And little Miss Stoddard enjoyed these weeks of her visit, too, for Hattie had persuaded her from time to time to lengthen it. She enjoyed everything—the walks on the Common, sparkling with its white carpet of crystallized snows, and out over the long Milldam, the slender clasp that links the peninsular Tri-mountain city with the mainland; through the beautiful flower-crowded greenhouses of the Public Garden; the shifting kaleidoscope of gay attire on the fashionable promenade of Washington Street; the bright, beautiful displays in the shop windows; the warm and handsome set of furs which had been Hattie's and my joint gift on New Year's; the church services to which she was a devout listener; her Sabbath hours of quiet thought in her comfortable chamber, and the pleasant evening reunions in the drawing-room below, where, amid the merry hum of young voices, the music of the piano, and the dancing feet of Hattie's guests, little Miss Stoddard would often gaze and enjoy from her corner, then, quietly as she had entered, would glide away.

All this time Uncle Fielding had not returned to Boston, being detained in a distant city where he had been called on business on the first days of our visit. But one day Mr. Ellsworth came home with a smile on his handsome face. "Uncle John has returned at last, Hattie," he said, "and is coming up to dinner. I didn't mention that we had company—and, pray, no need to enlighten the little woman concerning his coming. My plan is this: as the Doctor has already secured tickets for four to hear Booth in Hamlet this evening at the Boston, I shall accept for you and I, little wife; and ask good Uncle John to play host to little Miss Stoddard, or little Miss Stoddard to play hostess toward him, till our return. What do you think of my talents for a match-maker, eh, Miss Josey?" addressing me. "Our own made, we can well afford to be generous to poor luckless outsiders, can't we?" and I felt my cheeks tingling under his mischievous glances.

"Oh, I hope your first attempt will be a successful one!" was all I could answer for my confusion, though I rallied and added: "It was always a woman's accredited trade, match-making, Mr. Ellsworth!"

"Well, I suppose it is, or should be; but then, you see Hattie succeeded so admirably with the first she undertook, to wit: when she got me to bring a certain physician down to Woodboro' with me during my engagement days, that she's learned me the preliminary chapter, and now I am going off bravely alone into the intricacies of the volume!" And with another glance that again brought the blood into my cheeks he left us.

"Harry's too provoking, to be always teaz-ing you so!" exclaimed Hattie. "But I shall be delighted when I call little Stoddard Aunt Fielding. She'll have to shed her coat of everlasting gray then!"

At three o'clock Mrs. Ellsworth and I sat in the drawing-room waiting for the appearance of the gentlemen. Little Miss Stoddard had been told that a guest was to dine with us, and had not yet come down. Presently Mr. Ellsworth appeared, with his uncle, whom at the first glance I saw to be a plain, florid-faced man of about fifty, with hair well streaked with gray and kindly gray eyes. There was neither the stiff reserve nor the voluble loquacity about Uncle John Fielding one meets in old bachelors of the extreme classes; and upon presentation, I looked upon him as a good fatherly sort of person whose chief mistake in life had been that he had drawn no pleasant home ties about him, he seemed so well adapted to their enjoyment. His dress was a suit of plain gray, and I hailed this token of his tastes with delight, and caught an opportunity to whisper slyly to Hattie—"How nicely they will be matched—a pair of gray old lovers together! What a pity they hadn't met younger!"

While I sat busy with my embroidery, and Hattie went down to order dinner, and Mr. Ellsworth and Uncle John Fielding conversed together, I heard a little subdued rustling of silk against the drawing-room door, and knew that the quiet little woman for whose feet a matrimonial trap had been set was coming. And while she was gently crossing the carpet for her favorite seat in the corner, Mr. Ellsworth rose and presented her:

"Miss Stoddard, Mr. Fielding!"

I was furtively noting the quiet manner in which the little spinster extended her small pale fingers to acknowledge the introduction, and the host stood by with a grave air of courtesy; but I think neither Mr. Ellsworth nor myself could have been more surprised had both parties been transfigured and been caught from our presence than by what followed. The florid face of Uncle John Fielding became painfully red and white and red again by turns, and a look of doubt, surprise, and recognition overspread his whole face; while little Miss Stoddard's pale fingers shook, her faded blue eyes filled with light, and her pale cheek grew pink as a young girl's. Each stood regarding the other with doubt, surprise, and at last mutual recognition on every feature; and then Mr. Fielding grasped the pale, quivering little fingers, and drew the whole hand within his broad honest palm, and bending down, right in the face of us two looking on, kissed her on the thin pink cheek, and said in a voice that trembled and grew husky with emotion :

"Oh, Charity, is it you? And after so many years! Do you know me, Charity?"

"Yes, John!"

It was all little Miss Stoddard said, for she would have fallen, had not old Uncle John Fielding drawn up a chair and gently seated her in it, where she sat with her face buried in her hands; but it told enough to us lookers-on, to show us that those two reunited ones—for such they must be—were happier without us; and so both Harry Ellsworth and myself softly left the apartment.

"The strangest proceeding going on up stairs, Hattie!" said her husband as we met her in the lower hall. "Old Uncle John and little Miss Stoddard have begun their courtship already. You know the old saying, 'a third party' and so forth! Josey and I found we were de trop, and so left them to their wooing!"

"Explain yourself—do, please!" said Mrs. Ellsworth a little impatiently, in mystery at her husband's strange words and affected gravity of manner. "Josey, what has happened?" and she turned to me.

"Nothing, only your good Uncle and little Miss Stoddard seem to have been former friends, and rather intimate ones, too, I should judge by the circumstances of their meeting," I answered. "It is true, what your husband says. We were mere lookers-on in Vienna," and thought best to leave. Don't go up, Hattie! little Stoddard never'll dare look up again. Uncle Fielding actually kissed her!"

"Well, kisses or no kisses, dinner musn't be spoiled with waiting!" she said, with an amusing air of housewifely importance, hastening up stairs, and from the drawing-room we heard her exclaim: "How delighted I am, dear Uncle Fielding, to hear that you and Miss Stoddard are old friends! you must tell us all about it at dinner!"

"Yes, we are indeed old friends, and I hope shall continue the strougest of new ones," said Uncle Fielding, coming down with little Miss Stoddard on his arm; while Mr. Ellsworth led the way with me, saying in a low voice and with a rognish glance: "We only need one more present, and then we could all pair off in the manner the Fates intended, 'Providence permitting,' I should add!" And he looked slyly over his shoulder at the little figure in gray that glided quietly into the dining-room.

Conversation was brisk at table between the two gentlemen; though I noticed that old Uncle Fielding answered "Yes, Charity!" once to some question of his nephew's, and Harry and Hattie bit their lips; but little Miss Stoddard looked so young with that pink flush not yet faded from her cheek, and so happy at the assiduous attentions of him who sat beside her, that I really neglected my dinner in wondering what little romance could have been hidden away under the plain exterior of these two quiet old people, for surely such had been betrayed by the sudden and tender episode which had occurred at their meeting.

Mr. Ellsworth's remark, "You are ill, Josey! You have lost your appetite. I shall call in a physician!" brought me back from my speculations.

On returning to the drawing-room, as Uncle John Fielding manifested no inclination to give us the desired information respecting his and Miss Stoddard's former acquaintance, we were all duly forced to check our impatience till such time as it should voluntarily come; and when evening brought Doctor Robertson for the proposed visit to the Boston, we felt no compunctions in leaving the two friends together. At first—from sheer force of habit, I doubt not, at the thought that he was to be left to entertain a lady—Uncle John Fielding half rose to go; then, suddenly recollecting himself, settled back in his chair; and little Miss Stoddard—though her pale fingers trembled over her gray knitting-work, and the pink flushed brighter into her cheeks—quietly observed that "she feared she'd be but poor company for Mr. Fielding." But Mr. Fielding replied with an honest, straight-forward glance which seemed to say he wanted no better company; so we left them.

In the beginning of Hamlet's "Soliloquy," rendered as Booth can render it, that evening, Henry Ellsworth leaned past Hattie, and whispered to us both:

"It has just flashed over me—the explanation of that little romance at home this afternoon. I remember to have overheard my mother tell a friend once, when I was a boy, that Uncle John met with 'a disappointment' when young, and that was the reason he never married. I shall leave it to the feminine tactics of you two to ascertain the grounds on which quiet little Miss Stoddard found courage to 'disappoint' any man!" and then he leaned back in his seat, and Booth resumed, "Ay, there's the rub!" Hattie glanced toward me and smiled. The text was so apropos.

Later, that night, as I sat in the little woman's room before retiring to my own, I heard from her lips a few outlines of the well kept secret of her life—a few outlines only; but enough on which to build up the framework of a romance that had been enacted when little Charity Stoddard had been twenty years younger, and fairer, and had loved with all the quiet strength of a heart that never loves but once, and had not swerved from that faith in the great gulf of time that had lain between.

"To think that Providence should have permitted us to meet again, Josephine!" she said, with deepest feeling in her quiet voice, as she looked up from the little red-covered Bible which I found her reading, and on whose leaves I felt sure a few quiet tears had fallen. "And now, when I am getting old, and reconciled to my lonely life, and never expected to be anybody but the lonely little woman you have always known. I can't tell you all about it to-night, dear child; but if it should come to pass to you—as most likely it never can or will—that you should be a poor orphan, and should find one friend in the great, rich family where you lived to teach the younger children, and that friend was one who told you that he loved you, and wanted to take you away from your life of toil among them, and make you his wife; and then his mother and father should interfere, and say you weren't good enough for their oldest son—most likely you'd do as I did, and steal away, miles and hundreds of miles away from them all, and never let them hear of you again. I was proud, if I was poor, and I hated them all, and wanted him to forget me. But he never has—John says the day has never been when he has loved another woman, though they wanted him to marry, and he didn't know where I'd gone, nor but I'd been married years ago, before we met to-day. And now, to think we have come together again after these twenty long years! and it all comes out so strange: that John is Hattie's husband's uncle, and Harry Ellsworth's mother is one of the little girls I used to teach! It seems like a dream, Josephine!" And the little pale fingers fluttered like birds among the leaves of the red-covered Bible.

"And now, at last, you're going to have somebody to love you, and a nice home of your own. I'm so glad! and Hattie'll be rejoiced—and everybody in Woodboro', too! Mamma said she should feel sure something would happen to you, if you didn't wear the chinchilla tippet: and it's happened, and I'm real glad you lost it, indeed I am, dear, good Miss Stoddard!" and in the ridiculousness of my delight

I actually hugged and kissed the little woman till she opened her quiet eyes in a broad stare. "Yes, I'm glad it's all happened; and you helped at Hattie's wedding, and must at mine, and we'll both dance at yours, Miss Stoddard!"

But "Miss Stoddard" was not at my wedding; although Mrs. John Fielding was, for she was married before me. She wore a silver gray silk, for the old favorite colors are still maintained; but the richness of the fabric, and the daintiness of her exquisite embroideries, never "set off" any bride to better advantage, old or young.

It is a handsome, but plain gray stone front on T—— street, in the old Trimountain city, whose silver door plate bears the name of "John Fielding." The full window draperies are of a quiet neutral tint; the same hue prevails among the figures of the rich carpets that yield under the tread like wood mosses in the forests of dear old Woodboro'; and a little woman in dresses of soft and subdued colors glides quietly forward to receive you. Hattie and I spend a day with her occasionally, at which visits she knits a good deal from a large ball of gray worsted.

"Old fashioned, I dare say you think me, my dears!" she says in the quietest of voices, and with a little smile. "But I can't forget all the old ways I had at Woodboro'. Providence permitting, I mean to knit all John's socks this winter! I've lived a busy life too long to begin to live an idle one now."

"Providence" has "permitted" my little friend to busy her small, pale fingers with many quiet offices of kindness for not only "John" but those about her. In the great world there may be noisier philanthropists; but there are none who do more for their Master's service among the poor, and destitute, and lonely, than this little woman, in her quiet way. In the great world there may be many who surround themselves with more of the gauds and tinsels of fashionable life; but there are none who walk their path, more quietly and serenely happy, than does she who kept, for twenty years, amid her loneliness, the one love of her youth, till she met her reward when that love was restored to her. For Mrs. Fielding is far happier than was lonely little Miss Stoddard.

LETTERS FROM AUNT BETSY BROOMCORN.

LETTER IV.

DEAR MR. GODEY: It seems no longer ago than yesterday that I used to go up across the smooth mowed ground to the garden where Nat would be at work. The garden was on a hill-side, slopin' down toward the holler. You could see the brook crookin' 'round among the trees and medders, and where it couldn't be seen, the great elms, buttonwoods, and birches along the bank showed where it was. The rollin' hills that sloped up the other side of the holler was all speckled with orchards, medders, and patches of trees; and away off, ever so far away, was mountains so faint and purplish, that it was easy to take 'em for clouds.

I used to let down the bars and go into the garden, and look at all the posies first. There was a bunch of pineys and medder-lilies; but the blows was all gone. They was in a square bed, with a row of sives all round the edge. Next to the piney was a big bunch of marygolds and batchelder-buttons; and in a bed by themselves was saffron and balm, sweet basil and smellage. I never knew what there was about these old-fashioned things that I liked so well; but the sight of a balm-blossom, or a sprig of basil now always carries me right back to that lonesome old garden on the side hill, in the meadow, with the gray chimneys of the house standin' like head and foot-stones on the green mound of apple trees down below us.

Generally Nat used to be diggin' among the cabbages, and wouldn't say anything till I come round where he stood; but sometimes he would come over to the posy beds, and begin to ask me questions.

One day, it was after a number of hot days, and the air was so heavy and close that the cattle stood pantin' under the trees, and the sky, yellow and brassy-lookin', seemed drawin' near to the earth, I went out to the garden. The house was like a cellar, and all the corners looked as if they was full of fog; I couldn't stay there; so I went out. I heard the ring of Nat's hoe before I saw him, and I knew that he was likely to have a story to tell, for it was too warm for work, besides the sun was going down soon, and he had to go away to the hills after the cows, and he liked to stir up his mind with a good ghost story before he started. Sure enough, while I was lookin' into the marygold Nat come and stood on t'other side of the bed.

His tow trowsers was rolled up 'most to his knees, and one of his galluses was hangin' over his hip. He wiped his face on his shirt-sleeve, and fanned himself with his hat. "Schoolma'am," says he, "I hope there 'll be an offie thunder shower to-night—one that 'll crack the rafters to the skies. Then you 'll see how Granny 'll fly 'round. Oh, she's wide awake when it litens. I hope it 'll thunder, too. Don't you like to hear thunder?" "No," says I, "I'm afraid of thunder." Nat looked at me and grinned. "Look yonder!" says he, "d'you see that big pile of yellor stun away off on that back road? Well, schoolma'am, that was piled up, stun by stun, 'ever so long ago. A man shot his brother there, jest as ef he 'd been a dog. Everybody goin' that way used to put a stun on the pile. You shall go there some time, 'n' see the board with blood on it. Well, one day it was hot, jest like to-day, 'n' in the night ef it didn't thunder?"—and Nat rubbed his head, and looked at me for a minit, as if he couldn't think what to say. "That night Granny was up all night. She put on her silk frock, that's in the chist, 'n' a black hat with an orstridge feather in it, 'n' her shoes with heels like red tops, 'n' she cut round, 'n' talked high Dutch, 'n' bowed, 'n' curcheyed, 'n' acted as ef she 'd gone ravin' mad. Father 'n' mother sot 'n' watched her; but 'las! she didn't see 'em at all. The next mornin' them stun was hove 'round all over the ground, 'n' the dirt was tore up like as ef a passle of mad bulls had been pawin' 'n' scorin' the ground with their horns. I 'member how the litenin' darted 'n' darted down out on the clouds all night long, and one streak, like a big red sword, seemed to come right down afore me. The thunder come with it 'n' the rain. The noise it made was jest as ef the mountains was bein' ground into powder. Long towards mornin' the thunder 'n' litenin' sort of died away, as ef they 'd wore out their strength, 'n' Granny slid off to sleep. I wish you could a-seen her, with her black silk frock covered all over with red roses, 'n' her little mite of a hat, with feathers hangin' down over her ears, 'n' her peaked-toed shoes with buckles 'n' red heels, a settin' fast asleep in a chair. She looked as ef she was dead, 'n' wuss 'n any ghost that ever showed itself. When I went to drive out the cows I seen the stuns layin' round, 'n' I knew rite off that that big crinkly flash must a-lit rite on that stun pile. At first sight I scatted for home, but second thought I went 'n' looked at the place. There wasn't one stun left on the spot where they say the blood run down 'n' wet the grass. There was a great hole 'n' a pile of fresh dirt. I tell you, schoolma'am, my skin crep' under my clothing. It looked so much as ef the litenin' had come down there a-purpus. A good many folks went there to see, 'n' after a good spell, I jest hove the stun all back agin in a pile. I used to get a smart scoldin' from Granny every time I went there to work; but I 'm used to Granny's talks. I wouldn't mind it now ef she was to tell me that the litenin' was a live creeter, 'n' could lite jest where it had a mind ter do, 'n' lick up anything or anybody, 'n' crack their bones, 'n' sizzle their skin with its red-hot mouth. She use ter say it was awake when it begun to liten, 'n' it was her friend, 'n' she loved its red wavy hair streamin' over the clouds better 'n she loved anything on airth. She said the thunder was a great bass voice singin' to her out of the sky, 'n' she 'd sing back agin with a screech that made my hair stan' up. I could hear her say: "Nearer, nearer, my red lipped giant. Why du ye stan' in the clouds 'n' wave your hand to me." 'N' so she goes on till I begin to think Granny's crazy. What do you think, schoolma'am?" "I should think," says I, "she certainly was out of her head." "Well," says Nat, "I 'spect father 'n' mother thinks so too, but they don't talk about it. Ever 'n' ever so long ago when Granny was a gal, she lived with her father 'way down in the middle counties. He was rich, 'n' had ever so many niggers 'n' a passle of farms that use to be hired for corn, 'n' wheat, 'n' horses. Granny's got a picter of herself somewhere. I seen it once; it was awful hansom. She had a fire-red cloak over her shoulders 'n' a blue frock on under it. It was such a blue as the blue on father's razor, 'n' her hat had black fethers with blue tips to 'em. Her eyes was maybe a trifle pleasanter than they be now, but they looked right at my thoughts. It was a little picter with a gold rim 'round it, 'n' a purple morroccer cover 'round it like a watch-case. She never shows it; but I got a look at it once when she was asleep. Folks do say Granny had a great deal of disappointment in her younger days; maybe that's why she's so queer. You see she was a rich, hansom gal, 'n' lots of fellers was likely to want her for a wife. Her father was jest as stiff 'n' proud as she was, 'n' when he found out she meant to marry a captain, captin of a war ship, he swore he 'd see her dead 'fore he 'd 'low it. There was a time they say then, for she wasn't likely to give up her notions to anybody. Her father took her off to ever so many grand places, 'n' tried to make her take a notion to somebody that suited him; but she wouldn't look at anybody but her captin. Well, jest when her father was a-goin' to give up, 'n' let her have her way, news come that the captin's ship was struck by litenin' 'n' he was killed, 'n' they throwed him into the water, all sewed up in a sail. When they told her she screamed out that something was burnin' her head, 'n' went off wild 'n' screechin'. After she got over it, she wasn't nateral at all; but sharp and wicked to 'most everybody." Finally, she married gran'ther and lived here. She wouldn't go nowheres nor be clever to nobody, 'n' I reckon she 's, jest as you say, out of her head."

"Well, Nat," says I, "don't you feel sorry for her? Maybe she never was happy herself, and didn't know how to make anybody else happy."

"Happy," says he; "d'ye s'pose anybody is happy to our house? Ef you do, you're mistaken. 'Tain't me, nor Idy, nor little Clary. They're the glummiest little owls ever you see. Why the sun don't shine down there as it does up here, or anywhere else out doors. I know what I'll do, jest as soon as ever I 'm a man, I'll get married; maybe you 'll have me?"

"Oh, Nat, I shall be so old then, you would not think of such a thing," says I.

"Well, I'll have somebody, 'n' then I'll have a house, 'n' the girls shall live with me, 'n' we'll laugh all the time. We won't look sober for anything. Jest you come 'n' see us, 'n' see how nice it'll be to have everybody chirk 'n' good-natured."

"But," says I, "'s'posin' your father wanted you to live with him."

"Not in that house," says Nat. "I 'd jest as soon live under gran'ther's big stun table over in the buryin' ground. I would, now; 'twouldn't be so lonesome with the grass growin' 'round it. Grass won't grow round that house. I've tried it ever so many times. It won't grow there. Schoolma'am, I reckon we'd better go home; sundown 's come."

So Nat and I went down to the house. Nat put his hoe on the fence, and went after the cows, and I went in. The little girls were sittin' on stools by the fire, as still as mice, and their father and mother in the corners of the fireplace. But the old lady set in a big chair by the winder, lookin' at the sky. Away off over the purple mountains there was every fer minits a sudden flash. She was watchin' it as if it was somethin' wonderful rare to look at. I thought of what Nat told me, and when the little girls brought a candle for me to go up stairs, I'm ashamed to say I was afraid to go alone; but I did, for I couldn't bear to have them know how I felt. I put the candle on the table, and went and looked out of the winder. There was a black bank of clouds risin' up out of the south, and stretchin' toward the west. Nat was comin' out of the yard with his milk-pails, and the cows rattled their bells as if they was uneasy. There didn't seem to be a bit of wind, but the leaves to the apple-trees rustled, and stirred, and once in a while a whip-poor-will gave his lonesome whoop over on the hills. I b'l'ev'e 'most every body feels a little queerish when it thunders, especially among the hills. There 's so many crashes that foller one another away off, and rumble and rattle, that you git to feelin' sort of wild before you know it. Now I knew well enough there was a big shower comin', and with what Nat told me, and what I'd seen, I was rather timersome. So I put down the winder, though I was like to smother with the heat, and pulled the curtain close so the listenin' shouldn't show itself. I wouldn't go to bed, and so I jest peeked into a grasshopper bureau that stood in one corner to look for a book. There was two doors over the two drawers, and sure enough there was two shelves full of books. They was mostly bound in dark old leather covers, and looked dingy and worm eaten. I took out some. There was "Ramblers," and "Spectators," and "Guardians" bound, and ever so many that I couldn't read a word of. I found one bound in morocco, with a clasp somethin' like the Prayer Book Brewstir give me last Christmas; but the leaves was thick smooth paper, and it was every bit writ with a pen, and all the capitals was flourished off at a great rate. There was poetry, and somethin' like letters scattered along. It didn't seem to be an albion, but a book that somebody had used to write a little in every day or so. Some of the verses was queer; I couldn't get the sense of 'em very well. I remember one piece, for it was so peculiar that I read it more 'n once, and after that I couldn't help thinkin' of it a good deal. I wish I could make you jest one of them shaded whirls that begun the capital letters, but I can't. So, here they are in my own stiff ork-word writin':—

"Lo, thou art mine; in life, in death,
My soul will cling to thee,
For the brief space of mortal time,
For all eternity.

"Not the red lightning's fiery clasp
Could tear me quite away
From the green earth and purple skies
With waves of night and day.

"But, robed in flame, I'll seek thee still,
Wherever thou mayest be,
Under green arching forest aisles,
Or on the troubled sea.

"I'll call thee with the thunder's voice
From out the cloudy sky,
Till all the echoes of the earth
Shall hear me and reply.

"I'll write thy name in lightning flame
Upon the midnight gloom,
And thou alone shalt read aright
For lo, I am thy doom."

Somehow readin' this didn't settle my nerves a bit, and the thunder was beginnin' to roll, low and distant, but so quick that it seemed as if they was connected together and playin' some great solemn tune on the bass pipes of an organ that was somethin' bright and glorious, like sunshine. Bymby there was a holler, moanin', rushin' sound that grew closer every minute. I knew it was the wind and the rain, and the thunder was beginnin' to run up along the scale, till the house rocked and trembled with the sharp claps as if the millions of great white spirits that flew abroad on the winds had all clapped their wings at once. Then the rain come, and the wind struck the old house a blow that made the rafters screech and groan, and the walls crack as if they was a-goin' to yield. I could hear the apple-trees complainin' while they rubbed and thrashed agin the brick walls, and flung their leaves out straight into the air as if they was helpless and shiverin' with fright. I shivered where I sot with my feet curled up, and my head on my arms, and I tried not to think of anything I'd heard about the old lady down below. I tried to think of Susan, and Archy, and the boys, and imagined I was goin' with Susan down to the shore medder after strawberries, and tried to think jest how the bobolinks sung on the willers along the shore, and the smell of the grass and posies, and the strawberries so bright and fresh; but jest then I thought of that dear old lonesome place across the lake, and I couldn't help thinkin' how the rain would beat down on that green mound in the corner of the garden, and through the chimney into the cold fireplaces, and through holes in the roofs, down to the very corner where John lay when he died. I forgot all about the storm and the thunder, terrible as it was. I had to go back over some of the dark days of my life. That day when they told me he was dyin', when I went across the lake to see him. The silver skimmer of the lake as our boat cut across the ripples, the sky so blue and high, and the clouds white as angels, that lay sleeping there so still. I heard the divers' lonesome cries, and the kingfisher's scream. I could see, and hear, and feel everything, so sharp and tender all my feelin's was grown with this terrible pain. John was dyin'. They told me so. In a little while, hardly an hour, even when I held him fast by the hand, and looked into his eyes, and called him by name, he went away, he died. He didn't look at me nor answer me, nor clasp my hand that shook so, while it nestled into his cold, limp palm. Oh, he was dead! dead!

Somebody knocked at the door, knocked hard and fast. I was awoke out of my dream-in' in a minit, and sprung to open it. It was Nat, with a candle, and his face was as white as cloth. He looked at me with the strangest look. "Schoolma'am," he whispered, "won't you come down? Granny's dead, 'n' we're nigh about scart to deth." My hair riz up on my head. I couldn't have been hired to stay there a minit longer alone. I took up my candle and went down stairs with Nat. He took me straight into the old lady's room. It was a gloomy old place, with a fireplace like the mouth of a cave, and curtains to the winders and bed of some dark stiff stuff. The curtains to the winders was pulled back, and, jest as I got in, a blindin' flash blazed into the room, and seemed to play over the pinched face of the poor dead old lady, like that blue light we used to call fox fire. She was settin' upstraight, in a great high back chair, with a black and crimson silk frock on, with long lace ruffles to the sleeves, and lace around the neck. A little hat with feathers hangin' down to her shoulders was on her head; but oh, such a face! Her eyes was wide open, and starin' straight up; her jaw dropped down, and every wrinkle looked as if it had been cut with a chisel.

The two little girls set cowerin' in a corner, and sobbin' as if their hearts would break, while their father and mother sat in another corner without speakin'. Nat set down the candle. I stood considerin' a minit. The fact is I was jest as scart as anybody, but I kNEW some of us must do somethin'. We couldn't set all night and look at that awful face; so I went and took off the hat, though my fingers felt as if they was froze, and cold chills run over me all the time. I motioned to her son, and he helped me carry her to the bed and lay her down there. I closed the eyes that looked so glassy, tied a cloth round her head and chin, covered the face, pulled down the curtains, and sat down with the rest. The thunder had seemed to grow worse all the time, and now the house shook with it. It was twelve o'clock, five hours to daylight, and we must stay there all that time by the dead woman, alone. I was glad I had courage enough to move her. After awhile the little girls cried themselves to sleep, and their mother got pillers and put under their heads, just where they lay on the floor. Nat set in a great bow-back chair, and breathed so hard that I thought he was asleep, till I saw him lookin' at me very earnest. He looked at me ever so many times, and finally he said, "Schoolma'am, sposin' you jest read us suthin'. There's some books." I looked round, there was a glass door to a little cupboard on the chimney. I went and got a book without lookin' at it. It was "Harvey's Meditations among the Tombs." I didn't call it pleasant readin', but it passed away the time till daylight. The thunder and the rain all went off before that, and seems to me the silence was worse than the noise of the wind and the thunder.

When the light begun to show through the apple-tree boughs over the windows, we opened the door and went into the kitchen. A candle had burned itself out on the table. None of us had left the old lady's room all night. Nat went after one of the neighbors, and Mr. Stowers after his brother. When they come I crept up stairs and to bed.

I have wondered a great many times if a funeral is half as solemn anywhere else as in the country among the trees, green and fresh, the grass that loves so well to spread its soft, cool mantle over a grave mound, and under the sky that is a grander roof than all the domes in the world. I know how hard men try to make arches and pillars look like trees and their branches, but what "clustered stone pillars," says Mr. Butterside says, ever come up to nature, that don't seem to try at all.

The funeral was the next day but one after the poor old lady died. I believe 'most everybody was there that lived within six or seven miles. Elder Jones preached the sermon. The text was, "Be ye also ready, for in a day and an hour that ye know not of, the Son of Man cometh." Every room in the house was full; and from the open windows the sound of many voices singin' "China" seemed to float down through the shady orchard, and out over the medder, like a breth of wind full of the smell of roses and southern-wood. Somehow the singin' seemed to lift up Nat. I hadn't seen the poor fellow look so wonderful bright in all the time I'd known him. He looked as if he'd seen somethin' pleasant away off, and meant to reach it and have it for his own. After the sermon and another hymn, the coffin was opened, and folks invited to look at the dead lady. I felt curis to see her face agin, I knew it must be changed. The awful mystery of death seems to glorify 'most every human bein' that it falls upon. This poor old lady's face, once so sharp and worried-lookin', so grim with trouble, and scared with pain, that was printed over with all the woes of a lifetime, was now as calm as a baby's. The lips was almost curled into a smile, and her forehead was as smooth as if an angel had laid his hand there when she was dyin'. Nat come and stood by me, and looked, and then whispered to me:

"Schoolma'am, granny must a-come back to her senses when she died, or she wouldn't a-had such a face in her coffin. I'm glad on 't, for I shall jest remember how she looks now, 'n' forgit how queer she was."

I was glad too for Nat's sake. Pretty soon Deacon Pendle come and screwed down the coffin-lid, and it was lifted into a wagon, and the mourners rode in another wagon behind it. There was a good many wagons full of folks; but most all the young folks walked a-foot two and two. Dolly Jinks walked with me, and she wanted me to look at Bethuel Button and his wife, to see how kind of sorrowful the old lady looked, and if it was a funeral, she couldn't help tellin' me that Square Kinyon went and drove his black horses to carry the young folks belongin' to Sam Stowers's family.

"Of course," says she, "it's on account of the girls. They're 'most too smart for the Square; though he'll have to take Deacon Moody's darter yet, 'less you have him, Miss Broomcorn. He hasn't asked you yet, has he?"

I couldn't keep Dolly from talkin' till we got to the graveyard. It was in an open lot on a hill, and you could look all up and down the holler from there. There was a board fence 'round it of a lead-gray color, and in the corners was clumps of laylocks and roses. The Stowerses had the handsomest stones of anybody buried in that yard. Gran'ther Stowers had a great table tomb with all the signs of the masons on 'it, and right by side of it was the open grave. They had got the coffin down into the grave before we got near enough to see, and the men was standin' with hats off while Elder Jones prayed. Then the grave was filled up in a few minits; Deacon Pendle thanked the folks in the name of the family for helpin' "to bury their dead out of their sight." Then they began to scatter 'round over the buryin'-ground in little clumps. Most of 'em went to look at the place where some of their friends lay. Here was a mother standin' by the grave of a little child, and there a number of children with tears in their eyes, pickin' the dead leaves off the rosebushes on little Tommy's grave. I was standin' still, lookin' at the people, and the long slantin' yellow rays that the sun sent down from the hills where he was half hid by the trees, when Dolly Jinks come up to me agin. Says she:

"Look at Square Kinyon a-standin' there by his wife's grave. He's admirin' himself for gittin' such a tall headstone, with such a weepin' willer a-hangin' itself over an urn. I reckon he's thinkin' folks will say he done jest as respectable by his wife as anybody in Pendle Holler. Jest see him smoothin' the marble with his finger to see if there's any nicks in it. Says he to himself: 'That's my property, and I'll see it took care of. It shows purty well for my feelins'.' Oh, Jerushal look, he's wipin' his eyes and blowin' his nose. Oh, murder! that'll do, Square; jest you tackle up your black hosses and go over to Sam Stowers's to-morrer night, and ask Liddy to have you. If she says no, up and ask Keziah. Don't give up, Square; a man that goes sniffin' 'round his wife's grave stun right before folks will move heaven and earth to be married agin right off. You want a wife bad, Square Kinyon—jest to keep you from makin' a fool of yourself."

"Do stop, Dolly," says I; "somebody will sartinly hear you."

"Don't nobody hear me now," says Dolly, "or ain't you nobody. There's Miss Moody a-comin' 'round to look after the Square and Polly Mariar, with a pink gingham frock on. Pink's dresse becomin' to dark folks, ain't it, Miss Broomcorn. There! the Square's wipin' his eyes agin. If only we had Tilda Button back here to help us laugh at it, she'd make us some verses about him better 'n the ones she made about his wife's dyin'."

"Dolly, Dolly," says I, "won't you stop now. I'm ashamed of you."

"No, I won't stop," says Dolly, "and you ain't ashamed of me a bit, for you're laughin' as hard as you can."

"Then, Dolly," says I, "Reuben is a-goin' to speak to Polly Mariar. Hadn't you better run and stop him?"

"O no," says she; "let him, it will be grand to have him make the Square jealous. I know he will be. Come, you 're goin' home with me. You 've had enough of that old house for one spell."

"I hadn't ought to go with you," says I; "you behave so bad, and then Nat will miss me, it is so lonesome there."

"I can't help it," says she; "it's likely some of Sam's girls will go there to stay, so Nat won't suffer much without you."

"So I went home with Dolly. Ma'am Jenks was home before us. She wanted me to set right down and tell her all about Miss Stowers's dyin'. I told her she died sudden. Dr. Stirrup said it was disease of the heart.

"Jest as like as not," says she; "I've heard tell of sich things. You see the big ligament of the heart gits out of place a little, and there 's an awful strain on it. Then a sudden start like jumpin', for a flash of littenin' (I've had 'em make me enamoost jump out of my skin) breaks it as easy as snappin' a young cucumber in tew. It's a terrible thing, disease of the heart, I know by sperience."

Dolly called me up-stairs, and I didn't hear her experience. I mustn't write any more now, for this is such a long letter now, Brewstir will laugh in my face when he takes it to the post-office. Your obedient,

BETSY BROOMCOB.

PATTERNS FROM MADAME DEMOREST'S ESTABLISHMENT,

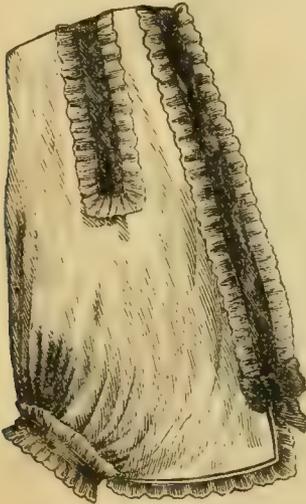

No. 473 Broadway, New York.

The Demizette.—This is a very stylish variation from the old-fashioned leg-of-mutton sleeve; five leaves forming the upper part, and terminating in flat bows below the elbow. The lower part of the sleeve is plain, and simply trimmed with five rows of narrow velvet, which extend to the wrist. When the material is silk or poplin, the decoration of the sleeve should be black guipure lace, one inch in width, headed with narrow jet trimming.

The Medallion Sleeve.—This pretty and novel sleeve is plain at the top and gathered into a band at the wrist. Its name is taken from the trimming, which consists of medallions of material, edged on both sides with black lace. One of these is placed on the front, and the other down the centre of the sleeve, terminating in a flat bow of silk or velvet.

The Venetienne.—This style is something after the model of the old pagoda. The lower part is gathered on to a plain band at the top, and over this are placed two deep caps, or volants. Each section of the sleeve is laid over in a fold upon the front, the trimming consisting of a silk quilling, ornamented with bows of the same shade, placed on the upper edge.

Misses' Cloak.—The back of this design is a circle, but the front, as will be seen in the engraving, is cut narrow, so as not to meet at the neck, and rounds off towards the back, so as to leave room for a sort of sack front; the arm-hole is under the circle, and is much warmer than the ordinary circle.

NAME FOR MARKING.

NECK-TIE,

OF SCARLET SILK, TRIMMED WITH BLACK VELVET, GOLD BEADS, AND BLACK LACE.

SCARLET SILK NECK-TIE, MADE TO MATCH THE NECK-TIE.

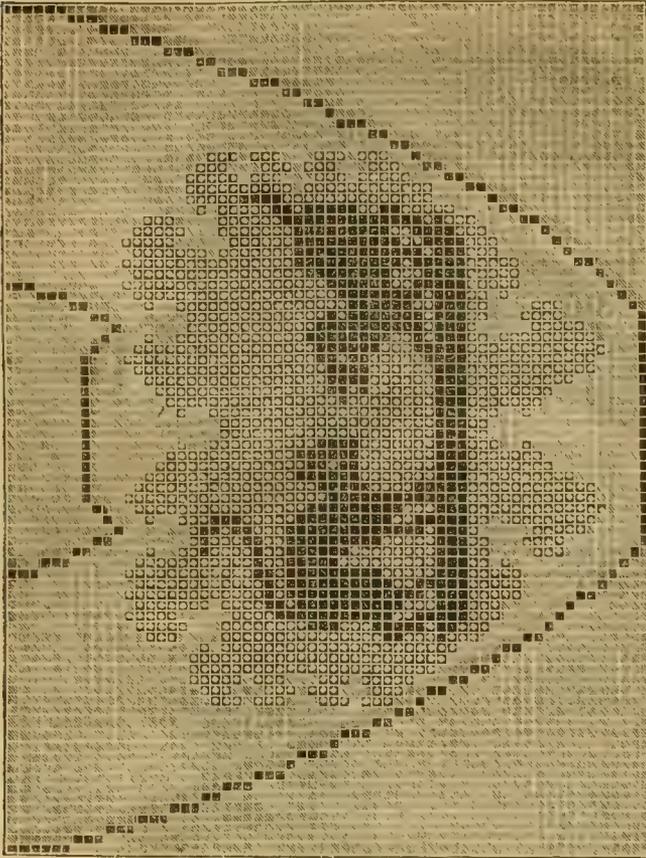

ONE OF THE LATEST COIFFURES.

The hair is arranged in two puffs on one side, and the other in short frizzed curls.

THE SPITFIRE SLIPPER.

This slipper can be worked on cloth or canvas; if the latter, it should be quite fine. The figures must be worked with black zephyr, with either bead or yellow silk eyes. The ground should be a brilliant scarlet, and the filling up a sea-green. This will be found a most effective pattern.

 BEAD TOILET CUSHION.

BEAD TOILET CUSHION.

Materials—A quarter of a yard of very bright Solferino silk velvet; a quarter of a pound of alabaster beads; two ounces of chalk beads; two ounces of crystal ditto; four yards of good white silk Russia braid; a few needlefuls of fine black purse silk.

THE mixture of beads and velvet has a very good effect, and is a style of work that is very quickly and easily executed. The centre of the cushion consists of narrow white silk Russia braid arranged in squares, each square being secured and kept in its place by a cross stitch of black purse silk. After the braid is arranged, a ring of card-board should be tacked on the velvet to cover the ends of the braid, and over this card-board the beads should be threaded in a slanting direction, taking just sufficient beads at one time to make a row. These beads consist entirely of chalk. The arrangement of the leaves and tendrils must, to a certain extent, be left to individual taste; but we can tell our readers how the model before us is arranged, and that, perhaps, will guide them a little in the working. The leaves are done half in alabaster and half in chalk; half the flowers are in crystal and alabaster, and the tendrils are entirely in chalk, whilst the border and fringe are both of alabaster. The last row of loops forming the principal portion of the fringe should not be worked until the cushion is stuffed and made up. We may here mention that pieces of card-board should be laid under both the leaves and flowers, to give the beads a whiter appearance.

BABY'S BIB.

Materials.—A quarter of a yard of white Marcella; cotton, No. 10; braid, No. 1. Crochet hook, No. 17.

THE centre of the bib is composed of Mar-31*

cella, and as our engraving is of a reduced size it must be enlarged to the following dimensions:

From B to E 5 inches, E to F 5 inches, F to C

4½ inches, B to C 2½ inches, A to C 5 inches, D to F 8½ inches. The Marcella must be lined with a piece of calico, and a double piece of flannel placed between; turn down the edges, and sew it neatly all round.

Take the braid and commence at the left corner of the neck, on the wrong side, and sew it round to the other corner of the neck, but do not cut off the braid, then turn the work on the right side, and commence the crochet.

Join the cotton on the 13th wave of the braid, from the neck, 3 chain, unite into the 3d wave, this gives a turn to the braid, 3 chain, unite to the next wave of braid, which is to the left hand, 3 chain, unite to the next wave on the right; repeat this down to the first corner, then miss one wave of the braid to the right, 3 chain, unite into next wave, 3 chain, unite into the same wave at the corner, to the left, 3 chain, miss one wave on the right, unite to the next, then proceed the same as before, to the centre; 3 chain, unite into the same wave on the left, 3 chain, unite into the next wave on the right, 3 chain, unite to the next wave on the left; 3 chain, unite to the next wave on the right; 3 chain, unite to the same wave on the left; now proceed as before, and work the next corner as the first. Join the braid at the neck, leaving it the same length as the opposite side.

FOR THE EDGE. 1st row.—Commence on the wave next to the centre one, at the top of the braid, on the outer edge, 3 chain, 1 single, into each wave all round.

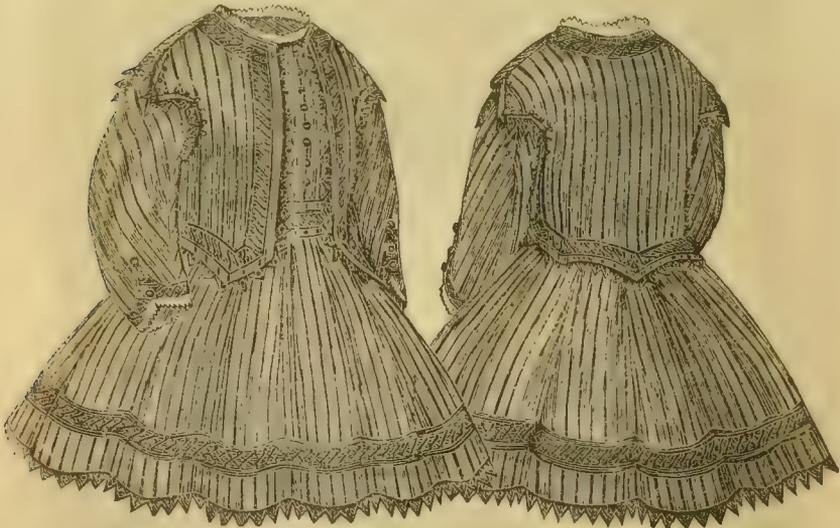

2d.—Commence in the centre stitch of the first, 3 chain, 7 chain, * 1 single, in same stitch, 7 chain, miss one chain of 3, 1 single, into next 3, 7 chain, repeat from *.

3d.—Commence in the centre stitch of the first 7 chain, 7 chain, * miss one chain of 7, 1 single, into centre of next 7, 7 chain, repeat from *.

4th.—Commence on the first stitch in last row, 5 chain, * 1 double, under the centre of the two chains of 7, thus looping them together, 5 chain, 1 double, on the single stitch over the 7 chain, 5 chain, repeat from *.

Sew on two buttons, and loops, to fasten it round the neck.

COSTUME FOR A BOY THREE OR FOUR YEARS OLD.

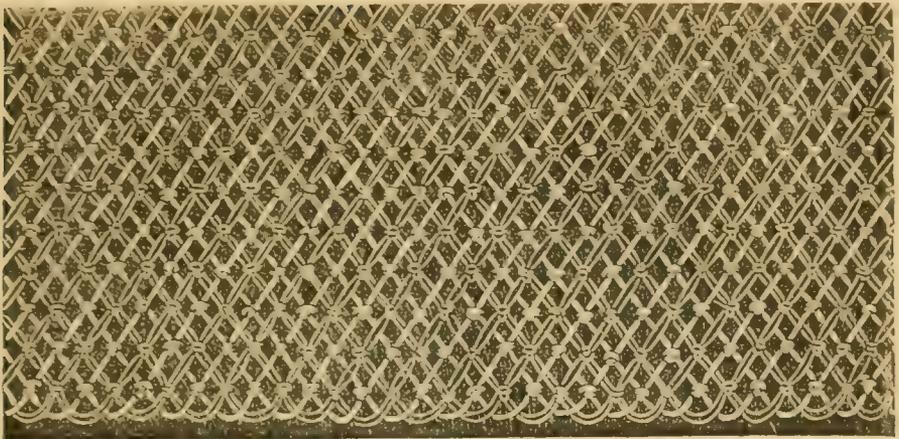

The dress is of azurline blue poplin, striped with black. The jacket is bordered with a band of black silk, braided with white, which also forms the belt and trimming for the skirt. A pointed black velvet edges the skirt and jacket.

DOUBLE NETTING IN TWO COLORS.

Materials.—No. 2 cotton, and Magenta or any other colored Andalusian wool (this color is recommended for all washing purposes); two steel netting needles of good length.

ADAPTED for gentlemen's and ladies' neckties, purses, or with very large mesh and coarse fleecy for sofa pillow covers.

Net a foundation, and fasten on both colors at once.

Net a stitch with white, and throw the needle over the left hand on to the table; take up the colored needle; net a stitch, then throw the colored needle on to the left-hand side of the place where the white needle was thrown. Upon this last arrangement of the needles the pattern entirely depends; otherwise the netting will be divided into two distinct nets, one white, the other colored, and the effect desired be lost.

2d row.—Net a white stitch into a white, and a colored into a colored, throwing the needles in the same manner.

GRECIAN NETTING.

Materials for Tullies.—No 2 cotton, a flat mesh five-eighths of an inch wide, and one smaller, something less than half an inch. If for a purse, use rather finer silk and meshes, Nos. 14 and 8.

Large Mesh.—A row with an even number of stitches.

Small Mesh.—Put the cotton round the fingers as in plain netting: pass the needle through the finger loop into the first stitch; with the point of the needle draw the second stitch through the first; withdraw the needle, and again draw the first stitch through the second; now finish the stitch. The next stitch to be netted is a small loop that appears to go across the twisted stitches; repeat.

Large Mesh.—Plain row.

Small Mesh.—Same as before, only netting the first and last stitch plain. This stitch requires some practice, otherwise it is difficult to manage, but then becomes easy enough.

MISCELLANEOUS COOKING.

THE FILLET OF VEAL ROASTED is a good and serviceable joint. One weighing from twelve to fourteen pounds is the best. Have a largish Kanuckle sawn off, and the middle bone taken out; this will make a good place in which to put some stuffing. The flap and the udder must then be folded round, and fastened with skewers. If the hole in the centre does not hold quite so much stuffing as you wish, a little more can be placed between the flap and the fillet. Before putting it down to roast, tie some well-buttered writing-paper over the top and bottom. Place the joint rather near to the fire for a few minutes, and when it is warm rub it well over with butter. Then place it at such distance from the fire that it may roast slowly, and yet get a nice yellow-brown color. A fillet of the weight we have named will require nearly three hours' roasting. A few minutes before serving up take off the string and paper, and baste well with then melted butter, with, if approved, two tablespoonfuls of mushroom ketchup. Lay it on the dish with the side uppermost most convenient for cutting, and pour over plenty of then melted butter. It is usual to have a ham, a piece of bacon, or an ox-tongue, at the opposite end of the table, as an accompaniment.

THE LOIN OF VEAL is best with the chump taken off. It should be selected with plenty of fat and a full kidney. Skewer the flap well over, and cover with buttered paper. A loin weighing about twelve pounds will require about two hours and a half roasting. Attend to the directions given about roasting the fillet, and serve up with melted butter poured over.

CANAPES.—Cut up an equal quantity of cold roast veal and of sardines in long thin slices, add a fifth of the weight of capers, flavor plentifully with oil, vinegar, and chopped herbs. Serve on pieces of bread about two inches square and half an inch thick, which had been previously fried in butter. Serve cold.

POTATO BALLS.—Take four potatoes, boiled the day before, grate (not rub) them. Add two tablespoonfuls of flour and two eggs, salt, and a very little nutmeg. Make into round balls, put them into boiling water, and boil twenty minutes. Oil some butter and brown some chopped onions in it. When the balls are finished, throw over them raspings of bread, and then pour on the hot oil and onions. N. B. The great point is to serve very hot.

TO STEW MUSHROOMS.—Peel and take out the insides of some large mushrooms, and broil them on a gridiron. When the outside is brown, put them into a saucepan with as much water as will cover them. Let them stand ten minutes, then add to them a spoonful of white wine, and the same of brownings, and a few drops of vinegar. Thicken with flour and butter, beat up a little, lay sippets round a hot dish, and serve them up.

HAM TOAST.—Melt a small piece of butter in a stewpan until it is slightly browned; beat up one egg and add it to it; put in as much finely-minced ham as would cover a round of buttered toast, adding as much gravy as will make it moist when quite hot. When all the ingredients are in, stir them quickly with a fork; pour on to the buttered toast, which cut in pieces afterwards any shape you please. Serve hot.

A CHEAP GREEN PEA-SOUP.—Two quarts of green peas, a piece of lean ham, some bones from roast meat, two onions sliced, two lettuces cut fine, a few sprigs of parsley, a bunch of sweet herbs, put them to stew in two quarts of cold water, and let it simmer gently. When quite tender, strain it, and pulp the peas and other vegetable through a sieve. Put it on the fire again, with pepper and salt, and about a pint of milk. Serve with fried bread cut into small dice.

A SAVORY CHICKEN PIE.—Choose three spring chickens, taking care that they are tender, and not too large; draw them, and season them with pounded mace, pepper, and salt, and put a large lump of fresh butter into each of them. Lay them in a pie-dish with the breasts upwards, and lay at the top of each two thin slices of bacon: these will give them a pleasant flavor. Boil four eggs hard, cut them into pieces, which lay about and among the chickens; add a few mushrooms. Pour a pint of good gravy into the dish, cover it with a rich puff paste, and bake in a moderate oven.

TO COOK CODFISH WITH A PIQUANT SAUCE.—Cut the best part of a codfish in slices, and fry them in butter a light brown color. Take them up out of the pan, and lay them upon a warm dish before the fire. Boil some onions, cut them into slices, and put them into the same pan with the butter, adding a little vinegar, water, and flour, and some finely-chopped rosemary and parsley. Fry the onions and all the ingredients together, and afterwards pour the whole over the fried fish. This dish will be excellent for three days, as it can be warmed easily when wanted.

A SINEE KABAUB.—Take a pound weight of a rump of beef, and cut the same into dice-formed pieces, removing all the fat. Have at hand half a dozen roots of green ginger, a few cloves of fresh garlic, some green shalots, and a small portion of green lemon-peel. Take a long, thin iron skewer, cut the ginger into small separate thin pieces, serving the shalots, the garlic, and the lemon-peel after a similar manner. Then strew a small quantity of fine curry-powder over the meat, and reeve the skewer through one piece at a time, intermediately skewering the ginger, shalots, onions, garlic, and lemon-peel after the mode following: Meat, shalot, garlic; meat, ginger, lemon-peel; meat, shalot, garlic; meat, ginger, lemon-peel, and so on till the skewers are fully occupied. Expose the same before a clear, fierce, charcoal fire, basting the whole with a bunch of fowls' feathers, introduced into fresh ghee till done brown. Serve the same up with boiled rice.

GRAVIES AND SAUCES.

MELTED BUTTER.—Keep a pint stewpan for this purpose only. Cut two ounces of butter into little bits, that it may melt more easily, and mix more readily put it into the stewpan with a large teaspoonful of flour, and two tablespoonfuls of milk. When thoroughly mixed, add six tablespoonfuls of water; hold it over the fire, and shake it round every minute (all the while the same way) till it just begins to simmer, then let it stand quietly and boil up. It should be of the thickness of good cream.

CELERY SAUCE, WHITE.—Pick and wash two heads of nice white celery; cut it into pieces about an inch long; stew it in a pint of water, and a teaspoonful of salt, till the celery is tender; roll an ounce of butter with a tablespoonful of flour; add this to half a pint of cream, and give it a boil up.

THICKENING.—Clarified butter is best for this purpose; but if you have none ready, put some fresh butter into a stewpan over a slow, clear fire; when it is melted, add fine flour sufficient to make it the thickness of paste; stir it well together with a wooden spoon for fifteen or twenty minutes, till it is quite smooth: this must be done very gradually and patiently; if you put it over too fierce a fire to hurry it, it will become bitter and empyreumatic: pour it into an earthen pan, and keep it for use. It will keep good a fortnight in summer, and longer in winter.

A large spoonful will generally be enough to thicken a quart of gravy.

Egg SAUCE.—This agreeable accompaniment to roasted poultry, or salted fish, is made by putting three eggs into boiling water, and boiling them for about twelve minutes, when they will be hard; put them into cold water till you want them. This will make the yolks firmer, and prevent their surface turning black, and you can cut them much neater: use only two of the whites; cut the whites into small dice, the yolks into bits about a quarter of an inch square; put them into a sauce-boat; pour to them half a pint of melted butter, and stir them together.

LEMON SAUCE.—Pare a lemon, and cut it into slices; divide these into dice, and put them into a quarter of a pint of melted butter. Some cooks mince a bit of the lemon-peel (pared very thin) very fine, and add it to the above.

MOCK CAPEER SAUCE.—Cut some pickled green peas, French beans, gherkins, or nasturtiums, into bits the size of capers; put them into half a pint of melted butter, with two teaspoonfuls of lemon-juice, or nice vinegar.

YOUNG ONION SAUCE.—Peel a pint of button onions, and put them in water till you want to put them on to boil; put them into a stewpan, with a quart of cold water; let them boil till tender; they will take (according to their size and age) from half an hour to an hour.

POTATOES.

HOW TO CHOOSE POTATOES, AND KEEP THEM FROM BEING WASTED.

That excellent authority, M. Soyer, says: "Observe, in a general rule, that the smaller the eye, the better the potato, as when they are too full in the eye, they are either of an inferior quality, or are running to seed. To ascertain if they are sound, nip a piece from the thickest end with your finger-nail; if good, the inside will either be of a white, yellow, or reddish hue, according to the sort and quality; if, on the contrary, they are spotted, they are bad, or getting so; but though this part may be slightly touched, by cutting a little off the outside they may prove fit for boiling; though they ought to be bought, when in this state, at a cheap rate. Potatoes always get bad in the spring of the year, as then the old ones are going out, and the new ones for some time continue to possess but little flavor, and are watery when boiled. The old ones ought to be peeled, and steamed, and mashed, or baked in an oven under a joint, or fried in fat; for when done whole in their skins at this time of year, the slightest spot spoils their flavor. The new ones are tasteless and watery, and are much better cooked when put in very hot water, but not boiling, than when put in cold."

There are few articles in families more subject to waste, both in paring, boiling, and being actually thrown away, than potatoes; and there are but few cooks but what boil twice as many potatoes every day as are wanted, and fewer still that do not throw the residue away, as totally unfit in any shape for the next day's meal; yet if they would take the trouble to heat up the despised cold potatoes with an equal quantity of flour, they will find them produce a much lighter dumpling or pudding than they can make with flour alone; and by the aid of a few spoonfuls of good gravy, they would produce an agreeable dish for the dinner-table.

CAKES, PUDDINGS, ETC.

BREAKFAST SPONGE CAKE.—Beat six eggs two minutes, add three cups sugar, beat five minutes; two cups flour with two very small teaspoonfuls cream tartar, beat one minute; one cup of cold water with a small teaspoonful soda; beat one minute; half the rind and juice of a lemon, two cups flour, a bit of salt. Bake twenty minutes.

BREAKFAST CAKE.—One pint milk, two or three eggs, two teaspoonfuls cream tartar, one of soda, flour sufficient to roll out. Roll quite thin, and cut into round, square, or diamond shape, according to fancy. Fry in hot lard like doughnuts. To be eaten with butter.

MIXTURE FOR THE CREAM CAKES.—Two cups sugar, one cup flour, four eggs; the eggs, sugar, and flour to be well beaten together; one quart of milk boiled, and while boiling stir in the eggs, sugar and flour. Let it cool, and flavor; open at the side and put the cream in.

CREAM TARTAR CAKE.—Half cup butter, two cups sugar, three and a half cups flour, three eggs, two teaspoonfuls cream tartar, one teaspoonful soda, dissolved in one teacup of milk, one tablespoonful flavoring; stir together quickly, and bake in a quick oven.

PERPETUAL LEMON CHEESECAKE.—One pound of loaf-sugar, six eggs, leaving out the whites of two, the juice of three fine lemons, and the grated rind of two of them, one quarter pound of fresh butter. Put these ingredients into a pan, boil them gently over a slow fire, until they assume the consistency of honey; pour into small jars, and tie brandied papers over them. A dessertspoonful is sufficient for each cake. This should be made when eggs and lemons are plentiful, as it will keep two years.

VELVET CREAM.—Dissolve nearly half an ounce of isinglass in a teacupful of white wine, one pint of cream, the juice of a large lemon. Sweeten the cream to your taste, and when the isinglass is dissolved, put in the juice to the cream, then pour the wine to that. Stir it frequently until it begins to thicken; pour it into a mould.

VERMICELLI PUDDING.—Boil four ounces of vermicelli in one pint of new milk with a stick of cinnamon until it is soft. Then add one half pint of thick cream, one quarter pound of butter, one quarter pound of sugar and the yolks of four eggs. Bake in an earthenware dish without paste.

A COUNTRY PUDDING.—Mix the yolks of three eggs smoothly with three heaped tablespoonfuls of flour; thin the batter with new milk till it is of the consistency of cream; whisk the whites of the eggs separately, stir them into the batter, and boil the pudding in a floured cloth or basin for an hour. Before it is served, cut the top quickly in cross bars, pour over it a small pot of raspberry or strawberry jelly or jam, and send quickly to table.

DEVONSHIRE JUSSET—Put some new milk into a china basin, or else warm some cold milk to the same heat as new, add to it a little calf's rennet, and some brandy or rum, stir it with a spoon so as to mix the whole perfectly. Place it near the fire or on a warm stove till turned, but it must not be kept too hot, or it will not turn properly. When turned, put sugar, grated nutmeg and ground cinnamon on the top, and clotted cream without breaking the curd, and serve.

ARROWROOT BLANC MANGE—Mix three tablespoonfuls of arrowroot in milk, in the same manner as though you were preparing starch. Add afterwards a quart of cold milk, sugar to your taste, a few chopped almonds and some grated lemon-peel. Put it on the fire, and stir it until it thickens. Pour into a mould and turn it out when cold.

FOAM SAUCE FOR THE PUDDING—One teacup sugar, two-thirds cup butter, one tablespoonful flour, beaten together until smooth. Then place over the fire, and stir in rapidly three gills boiling water; season with outmeg; soda about the size of a pea.

MISCELLANEOUS.

TO CLEAN SILK STOCKINGS—Wash your stockings first in white soap liquor, lukewarm, then rinse them in four waters, and work them well in a fresh soap liquor; then make a third soap liquor, pretty strong, into which put a little stone blue, wrapped in a flannel bag, till your liquor is blue enough. Wash your stockings well therein, and take them out and wring them; let them be dried so that they remain a little moist, then stove them with brimstone, after which put upon the wood leg two stockings, one upon the other, observing that the two fronts or outsides are face to face; then polish them with a glass. N. B.—The two first soap liquors must be only lukewarm, the third soap liquor as hot as you can bear your hand in it.

TO CLEAN PLATE—Avoid the use of what are called "plate powders;" most of these contain quicksilver, which is very injurious. Boil one ounce of prepared hartshorn powder in a quart of water; while on the fire put into it as much plate as the vessel will hold; let it boil a short time, then take it out, drain it over the vessel and dry it before the fire. When you have served all your plate thus, put into the water as much clean linen rag as will soak up all the liquid. When dry, they will be of great use for cleaning the plate as well as brass locks and the finger plates of doors. When the plate is quite dry, it must be rubbed bright with leather. The use of gritty substances, however fine, should be avoided.

TO CLEAN TINS AND PEWTER—Wash thoroughly clean with warm water, into which a handful of bran and a few slices of soap have been thrown while hot. Dry, and then with some of the best whiting powdered, and a little sweet oil, rub well and wipe clean; then dust them over with some dry powdered whiting in a muslin bag, and rub dry with soft leather. When tin covers come from the table, they must be wiped very dry before they are hung up, or the steam will rust the inside.

TO PREVENT HAIR FROM FALLING OFF—Coconut oil melted with a little olive oil, and scented as preferred. Sage tea is good for a wash; or warm water. A very good pomade is also made of white wax one-half ounce, spermaceti one-half ounce, olive oil six ounces. Different sorts of hair require different treatment; for what agrees with one makes the other harsh and dry. Cold cream is often used: it is made with one-quarter ounce of spermaceti, and one-quarter ounce of white wax; dissolve by putting the basin in which you are going to mix it in hot water; then add one ounce each of oil of almonds, and rose water.

TO PRESERVE MILK—Provide bottles, which must be perfectly clean, sweet and dry; draw the milk from the cow into the bottles, and, as they are filled, immediately cork them well up, and fasten the corks with packthread or wire. Then spread a little straw in the bottom of a boiler, on which place bottles with straw between them, until the boiler contains a sufficient quantity. Fill it up with cold water; heat the water, and as soon as it begins to boil, draw the fire, and let the whole gradually cool. When quite cold, take out the bottles, and pack them in sawdust, in hampers, and stow them in the coolest part of the house. Milk preserved in this manner, and allowed to remain even eighteen months in the bottles, will be as sweet as when first milked from the cow.

BLUE INK—Two drachms oxalic acid, two drachms Prussian blue, to be mixed in half a pint of water, make as good blue ink as we have seen, and is very simple.

HOW TO MAKE VINEGAR—Vinegar is made from sweetened water. That tells the secret. The saccharine principle turns to acid, and we have vinegar. Sweet cider needs but to be put in a warm place—in the sun in summer—with a thin cloth over the bung-hole, to make it the best of vinegar. The mother will soon form a scum on the top, which must be left in. Sour cider needs sweetening when set away for fermentation. That starts it on its way. It is difficult to get vinegar from sour cider alone. In the West, where cider is scarce, sweetened water (it matters not how much or how little sweetened) is the thing. The water must be soft. Rain water is used. A barrel half filled will sour quicker than when full, so said: we have never tested it. Take out the bung. Stretch over the bung-hole a fine sieve or cloth to keep out the flies. When vinegar is formed, cork it up tight, for exposure to the air hurts it.

TO CLEAN SILKS—A quarter of a pound of soft soap, two ounces of honey, and a gill of gin: mix these three things well together, and if too thick add a little more gin. Lay the silk on a board, and with a stiff hat-brush brush it well with the mixture, occasionally dipping the brush in a little cold water to make it froth. Rinse it well in cold water, and hang it to drain (without wringing) for a few minutes; then roll in a towel, each piece singly, and iron it wet.

CEMENT FOR BROKEN CHINA, GLASS, ALABASTER, OR IVORY ORNAMENTS—A quarter of an ounce of the best fine isinglass—not gelatine—half an ounce of spirits of wine; put the isinglass into any very small jug with a lip; pour on it a few drops of fast boiling water (this will dissolve the isinglass), then put in the spirits of wine—let it stand ten minutes by the fire, or until the whole is well mixed—pour it into a bottle with a tiny neck; when cold it will be a solid white mass. The articles to be repaired must be dry and warm; melt the cement by standing the bottle in hot water, and apply it with a camel's hair brush. After using, observe that the bottle is well corked, or the cement loses its strength by evaporation. This is the cheapest, best, and readiest cement to use for repairing articles not intended to contain hot water, as this would cause the mended fracture to come to pieces.

Editors' Table.

WOMAN!

HER NAME AND ITS SIGNIFICANCE.

1. She shall be called woman.—Gen. ii. 23.
2. I will put enmity between thee and the woman.—Gen. iii. 15.
3. A woman that feareth the Lord, she shall be praised.—Prov. xxxi. 30.
4. Blessed art thou among women.—St. Luke i. 28.
5. God sent forth his son, made of a woman.—Gal. iv. 4.
6. The woman is the glory of the man.—I. Cor. xi. 7.
7. A woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and on her head a crown of twelve stars.—Rev. xii. 1.

The BIBLE is woman's Magna Charta. In this blessed Book her destiny is predicted; her duties are defined; and her privileges made sure by the unalterable promises of God. One privilege is that of bearing her Eden name—woman, significant of her true relation to man, of her peculiar nature; and also of the duties to God and humanity which would be required of the sex till time should end.

In the passages we have selected from Holy Writ are shadowed forth the history of woman as the Bible discloses it. We are intending to take up one subject for elucidation in each monthly Table, till the seven selections are discussed.

The first thing to establish is woman's right to the name given her by divine inspiration. "She shall be called woman, because she was taken out of man." It was from the "dust of the ground" that the Lord God made man, breathing into him the breath of life, the "living soul;" but man was not then perfected. Looking on all the previous work of Creation, when accomplished, "God saw that it was good." Of the human being made from dust, the Lord God said: "It is not good that man should be alone; I will make him an help meet for him." Therefore the feminine nature was the perfecting of the man, and the crowning work of creation.

Bear in mind that every step from matter to man, had been in the ascending scale. Was the last step backward? It must have been, unless the woman was endowed with some gifts of excellence superior to the similar gifts held by man; as in some gifts held by him she was certainly his inferior. Woman has not the perfection of physical strength, nor the mechanical ingenuity, nor the large capacity of understanding, to grasp all subjects relating to this world, its material interests and government which distinguishes man. She could not help him in subduing the world. But moral sense is superior to mental power; intuition is above reason; and if she were wanted to help him, she must have possessed a nature more refined, pure, and spiritual than his, a quicker insight into heavenly things, a nearer assimilation with the angelic, a link in uniting the divine with the human, more holy and elevated than man held or ever could have attained without her help.

These qualities of her nature were signified in her Eden name, woman. It was also prophetic of the manner in which her moral endowments would be, in her sex, developed and directed, as we shall see in the course of these papers.

Woman, then, was the generic name of feminine humanity as distinct from the masculine. In Eden the two natures were one personality. "God created man in his own image: male and female created he them." The two in union formed the perfect man, the mortal immortal, the sovereign of earth, the wonder and mystery of the Heavenly host.

After the Fall another name, designating the specific characteristics of the feminine, in the altered destiny of the race, was given her: "Adam called his wife's name Eve; because she was the mother of all living;" that is, of all mortal immortals.

Thus was human motherhood placed immeasurably above animal females—brute, bird, insect, "which bring forth animal young"—but all are soulless. With such female creatures to bear young is their highest perfection. Not so with the human feminine: to help her husband in his moral nature, and mould her children for God are the perfections of her womanhood.

We see, therefore, why woman cannot be rightly distinguished by the term female, when used as a noun or name, and why this term is never applied to her, except as an adjective, by inspired writers. The passages at the head of this paper give her true name, and how the language would be corrupted and the sex degraded by the use of female in the place of woman may easily be tested by substituting the former in the first clause, "She shall be called female;" and so in all the selections that follow. Would such readings be proper?

The Word of God never degrades woman by permitting her distinction of sex to signify her personality. Search the Scriptures; you will find her always called by the names or titles designating her humanity; never with any reference to sex, except in contradistinction to man as male: "God made them male and female." This adjective term of female, applied to woman, occurs but twelve times in the Bible; while her names and titles, woman, mother, maiden, lady, damsel, bride, wife, daughter, sister, widow, mistress, midwife, prophetess, princess, queen, these and other appellations, none of which are ever applied to animals, are used over thirteen hundred times!

The Bible has for us another important bearing on this question of woman's rightful name and style of address. The English version of the Holy Scriptures is the Palladium of our mother tongue; in it is centred and preserved the purity, truth and strength of the Anglo-Saxon language. This, the noblest of all living languages, which expresses the meaning of the Hebrew text more clearly and forcibly than any other Gentile language can do; this our mother tongue is violated, degraded, polluted by the vulgarity and impropriety which have become prevalent, both in speech and literature throughout our land, using as we do the animal adjective female as the noun for woman, or the substitute for lady. No other language has thus degraded the sex. Correlative terms are used for the appellations of mankind and womankind by all nations, save the Anglo-Saxon. No French writer would say: "A gentleman walking with a female;" "The females outnumbered the men!"

We meet with this corruption of our tongue in every newspaper we take up; in every journal we read, whether literary or scientific. Our swarming works of fiction, many written by women, are vulgarized by this low style. Legislators and jurists have adopted the false term, and use it almost exclusively. In a New York statute for "protecting the rights of married women," the word woman does not occur at all; while femina is used five times, as a correlative for husband.

Even our learned clergy, whose text book is the Bible, have yielded to this tide of corrupt language, this violation of the Divine Word. Do not the greater portion of clergymen speak and write as though the Church was composed of men and females? Christ did not speak thus. The Apostles did not so teach. Why and how has this false and bad mode of language become popular?

DOMESTIC EMPLOYMENTS.

(From a Letter to the Edressa.)

[The following excellent thoughts—"apples of gold in pictures of silver"—are very encouraging as evidence of the changes in public sentiment concerning "woman's sphere." She will find her best place is in the household sanctuary.]

DEAR MRS. HALE: I am no "Woman's Rights woman," as you may friend. Know, meaning by that a discontent with the province of woman as at present arranged, or a desire that she should interfere in politics or government. But I would that women should fill their own situations properly and gracefully; domestic service and activity being one of the most important. We maintain a hundred thousand of the Celtic race to perform duties which would be more properly and respectfully performed by native Americans.

When women, American women, are employed in a house or a factory, there will be no need of the perpetual outcry that they are not allowed fair scope for their energies. They will not seek to be college professors or to go to Congress. There will be enough employment for all when there is a disposition to avail themselves of open opportunities. Of course, I do not expect everybody to be in everybody's kitchen. Nor do I wish to limit any woman's field of action further than the natural propensities of her sex limit her. But I think the perpetual outcry about women's rights and sufferings proceeds much oftener from a partial than a general survey of the case. Those things settle themselves as much as any other portion of political economy.

If an immense number, comprising a class of laborers, withdraw from all competition in that field of labor, their places are, of course, occupied by others, and the field they themselves enter on is crowded. They are ill-paid, of course. Now everybody knows that the withdrawal of this large class of American laboring women is not more the result than the cause of competition in that special field. It arose at first from weakness and false pride, and is continued partly from a feeling that the advantages of the condition from which they have withdrawn are fewer than they formerly were; and partly from a lingering impression that they lower themselves by such employment. Of course, to such persons, argument is of no avail. The effect of sympathy and example is as powerful to restore them as to withdraw them. There is room and to spare for all in the field of which I speak. American women, from their superior tact, ability, and thrift, would always be welcome in a household, and without displacing others whose other qualities would be valuable.

Irish girls are strong and cheerful; American girls have more judgment and skill. There is room for all, and a reasonable support for all. There will not be the opening for immigrants, of course, that there has been. But there will not be the call for foreign laborers when good, and efficient, and sensible women are willing to labor in a household. The whole tone of thought in relation to domestic service would be raised if the class of women to whom I refer were to enter it.

Is this not better than to starve in the streets from a false and wicked pride? It seems so to me. But then, I am an old-fashioned woman, and loved dearly the old friends who labored diligently and faithfully in the old kitchen in the old times. It was altogether a different affair from the present state of things.

If the war, with its introversions, its upsets, and its involutions, shakes to the centre our social fabric, out of the evil of idleness and self-indulgence, educing consideration for others, and a generous helpfulness, if it bring the proud woman in the parlor to a thoughtful humbleness, and the not less proud one in the attic to a ready activity and usefulness, it will shake some important atoms into place. And, as philosophers tell us the smallest feather does not fall without making in proportion remote spheres, let us hope that a right understanding on this subject may have its weight in determining the whole welfare and destiny of Woman.

BOOKS FOR HOME CULTURE.

"SPRINGS OF ACTION" is the title of a choice volume for young ladies, and it will greatly aid mothers in their plans of home instruction. The authoress, Mrs. Richards (see Literary Notices, page 308), is sister of Mrs. Alice B. Haven, and to her this pearl of a book is dedicated. All our readers love Mrs. Haven, whose stories and heart histories have been so long treasured in our Lady's Book. We are sure these readers will want no other commendation of this new work, which Mrs. Richards has sent out, than the testimony of her devotion to her amiable sister. We will quote one sentence from the dedication: "You have been the best example to me of the lessons I strive to teach, and you have shown me how certainly, by the grace of God, the victory is given to such a struggle in humble patience, and in self-abnegation, with the infirmities of our nature."

There are eighteen subjects discussed: all are important in forming "a perfect woman." "Health" is the first subject, and so ably and thoroughly examined, that, were there nothing more, the book would be worth its price in gold. We shall make selections, as soon as we have room, from some of the beauties of this true woman's book.

"THE BIBLE AS AN EDUCATING POWER AMONG THE NATIONS." By Professor John S. Hart. This is a great work in small compass. We intended to make selections from the rich wisdom of its thoughts, but have not now room. The whole should be studied. It is a wonderful work, because the writer seems to have read the Bible till he caught the fire of its inspiration by which he sees its true meaning. May a household will bless him for his labor, finding it turn their attention to the Bible as a new Book. As a help in home culture, the work of Professor Hart can hardly be over-estimated.

MARRIAGES BETWEEN COUSINS.—The question whether such unions should be permitted has, of late, excited much interest. As women are deeply concerned in whatever clouds the prospects of domestic happiness and injures the well-being of children, the following report on this subject, from the New York Observer, is highly important to our readers:—

"Dr Millingen, of Dublin, ascertained the situation of 154 families, the heads of which were related in the degrees of first, second, and third cousins, and in which there were 160 children who were deaf and dumb. In 34 families, there were two in each; in 14 families, three in each; in 3 families, four in each; in 1 family, six; and in 1 family of thirteen children, seven of them were deaf and dumb. He says nothing of other defects.

"Dr Duxton, of Liverpool, states that he found 170 cases where the parents were related as above. In 109 of them, there were in each family one child deaf and dumb; in 38, two children; in 17, three children; in 3, four children; in 1, six; in 1, seven; and in another, eight. He omits to state the whole number of children in those 100 families, or whether any other defects existed, but here are 289 who are deaf and dumb.

"The first number of the Social Science Review contains a paper on the statistics of the birth of deaf and dumb children. According to M. Boudin, the result is a very considerable percentage of deaf mutes. M. Boudin finds that consanguineous marriages take place in France in the ratio of two per cent. of the population; and that of the issue of such marriages the proportion of deaf and dumb children is 28 per cent. in Paris, 25 at Lyons, and 30 at Bordeaux. At Berlin, he has discovered that the number of deaf and dumb children born of Christian parents is 6 per cent., while that of the children of Jewish parents is 27 per cent.; a result which he attributes to the fact that Jews intermarry with blood relations—more frequently than Christians.

"In New England, a distinguished gentleman ascertained that in 17 families where the parents were blood relations, there were 95 children, 44 of whom were idiotic, 12 scrofulous and puny and 1 deaf. In one of these families of 8 children, 5 were idiotic.

"Dr. Bemis of Kentucky reports, as the results of careful researches by reliable gentlemen throughout the United States, in the relationship above named, 763 families, in which were 3,588 children, and 2,331 of them were defective; among 1,4 children where the parents were double cousins, 133 of them were defective."

MISS S. J. HALE'S BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES, 1826 RITTENHOUSE SQUARE, PHILADELPHIA, PENNA.

This school has now entered on its seventh year. The success and present prosperity are very satisfactory to its friends.

The design of the Principal is to give a thorough and liberal English education, to furnish the best facilities for acquiring the French language, and the best instruction in music and the other accomplishments. The Assistants employed are of the first class and highest merit. French is taught by an experienced instructress, a lady lately from France who resides in the family; and thus the pupils have ample opportunities of acquiring the accomplishment of speaking the language.

Particular and continued attention is paid to the moral training, and also to the health and physical development of the young ladies.

Circulars will be sent wherever required.

TO OUR CORRESPONDENTS—We shall use the following articles as soon as we can make room: "Aunt Esther's Warming-pan"—"May Murray"—"Engelburg"—"The Story of Fair Mabell"—"Sonnet"—"Smoke from my Chimney corner" (see Godey's Arm-Chair)—"The Emigrant's Lament."

These articles, we are sorry to say, we cannot use: "When I am Dead"—"Robinhood" and other poems (we have no room)—"The Stream of Time" (very good poetry, but we are burdened with our stores)—"The Day of the Dead"—"Good-night"—"An Old Maid's Thoughts," etc.—"Three Cheers"—"Shakespeare—an Acrostic"—"Squeaky Boots" (good article for a newspaper)—"The Spring Violet"—"In Memory of the Poetess," etc. (good poetry)—"The Little Shoe" (if we had room, this would be accepted)—"A Woman's History"—"Chaos"—"The Angel's Welcome"—"The Philosophy of Laughter"—"Ready for either Fortune"—"My Sword"—"Society in the Country"—and "Second best."

We have many manuscripts on hand to examine.

The authoress of "Lily Carleton" is requested to send us her address.

Health Department.

BY JNO. STAINBACK WILSON, M. D.

[In reply to letters, commending this department, and asking "if Dr. Wilson's articles about children have been published in book form"—we reply, not yet. These papers are original, written purposely for our work; but Dr. Wilson intended to reissue them, when concluded, in book form, as "A Health Manual for the Nurse and Mother," etc. We think it will be one of the best works of its kind ever published.—EDITORS OF THE LADY'S BOOK.]

CHILDREN SHOULD NOT EAT BETWEEN MEALS.—The same mistaken idea that has given rise to the practice of feeding children on meat, has been largely influential in originating and sustaining the ruinous custom of allowing food at all hours between meals. True, the digestive process is active in children, and they require a good deal of nourishment to sustain their growing bodies; but there is neither philosophy nor common sense in keeping their stomachs always filled: while six meals in twenty-four hours are enough for an infant, three are all-sufficient for a child after weaning. Children should be trained then to take their meals at regular intervals, and never allowed to eat between meals. Mothers frequently fall into the habit of allowing their children "something to eat" between meals in order to keep them quiet, and to save trouble. But they could not possibly fall on a better plan to cause trouble. Children thus indulged will, nine times in ten, be crying and kicking half their time with all kinds of aches and pains; and when they are not crying from sickness they will be crying for "something to eat:" from morning to night it will be—"Ma, I want some cake; Ma, I want some meat; Ma, I want some bread," and so on, until the poor mother is completely worn out. And then when night comes, when she would fain find repose from the endless annoyances of the day, her troubles are only increased; for Johnnie has the toothache, and Mary has the headache, and Jimmy has the colic, and the baby is restless, and so on to the end of the chapter.

Such are some of the evils of feeding between meals, to say nothing of dirty floors and clothes, greasy furniture, and many other things but too well known to mothers.

Now all this can and should be avoided. It is just as easy, as we know from our own experience, to teach children to eat only at regular meals, as it is to get them into the habit of eating at all hours. A little firmness at first is all that is necessary, and if this is used for a while, children will soon get so that they will never even think of eating between meals. It will be very hard to convince some mothers of this, but to such we say, try it, and you will then be so well satisfied that you will continue the experiment the remainder of your life.

VACCINATION OF INFANTS, within a few days after birth, has been attended with accidents more or less serious, and sometimes fatal; and as smallpox is very rare in children under six months of age, it is best, in the case of private families, to defer the operation until the third month; children in hospitals or very exposed situations must be earlier attended to. Special efforts should be used to secure proper vaccine matter.—Hall's Journal of Health.*

The monthly from which we have selected the above, is a small pamphlet, but of great merit, entirely devoted to the promotion of health and happiness among the people. Dr. Hall upholds the true principles of all human improvement, moral goodness. In his February number there is an article—"Farmers' Wives over-taxed,"—if all the Agricultural Societies in our land would unite and offer a premium of ten thousand dollars for the best essay, "On Improving the Condition of the Farmer's Life"—this plan proposed by Dr. Hall would surely take the prize. Pray buy and read this number.

Literary Notices.

Owing to the immense increase in the price of books, we will not receive further orders to send by mail. It never was a source of profit to us, but generally a loss, on account of the postage we had to pay.

From PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

VERNER'S PRIDE: A Tale of Domestic Life. By Mrs. Henry Wood, author of "East Lynne," "Mrs. Halburton's Troubles," etc. etc. In two volumes. The author of "East Lynne" bids fair to make another sensation with "Verner's Pride," her latest work. It is the best of her productions since the issue of the former named romance. Its plot is more intricate, and its characters more strongly marked than those of its immediate predecessors. We do not profess to be among those who admire Mrs. Wood unqualifiedly. She has many faults, among which is superficiality in her comprehension of human nature, and, consequently, in her conceptions of character. Yet she has the faculty, developed in a high degree, of writing to please the multitude; though her fame is bound to be ephemeral as that of writers of her class always is. She has strong imaginative powers, which aid her in the invention and development of her intricate plots. The plot of "Verner's Pride" is the most complicated, and yet the best managed of any. The reader, who, early in the first volume, imagines he already guesses the denouement, is, in the middle of the second volume, bewildered in a maze of mystery and doubt. As bad characters are quite as essential as good ones in novels, we have to thank Mrs. Wood for a rare embodiment of disagreeable traits, in Mrs. Verner, the vain, heartless beauty.

AURORA FLOYD. From "Temple Bar." By Miss M. E. Braddon, author of "John Marchmont's Legacy," "Lady Lisle," etc. There is a certain furor just now about an authoress who has lately made her debut in the literary world, and has since produced a number of works in rapid succession. Three of these are before us now for examination, "Aurora Floyd," "Lady Audley's Secret," and "The Lady Lisle." Though the two latter are from the publishing house of Messrs. Dick & Fitzgerald, we find it more convenient to speak of the three together. Miss M. E. Braddon is, we are told, a young lady, who, after various unsuccessful endeavors to make her way in the world, has finally turned her attention to romance writing, and, as the saying is, "made a hit." Her stories have received the sanction of "Temple Bar," and she is on the high road to fame and fortune. Her writings prove her to be a woman of superior intellect, well versed in the ways of the world, and familiar with matters literary, artistic and dramatic. Notwithstanding, we are not prepared to give her works the unlimited approbation which their publishers seem to expect, and which certain critics more obliging than wise have readily accorded them. She is deficient in variety, both in her plots and in her conceptions of character. She has, in truth, but one plot, which is repeated in each of the three volumes, with some alterations. The framework of each of these stories is based upon the circumstance of an individual marrying who has already been previously married, and whose first husband or wife is sure to turn up either in person or by representative, giving a great deal of trouble, the whole resulting in crime. This may be a very clever plot, once used; but when the changes are rung upon it three separate times, it becomes rather tedious. It would please us to enter more critically into the merits and demerits of these novels, but limited space forbids. Therefore it must suffice to say that Miss Braddon's works possess sufficiently the elements of popularity to make them the sources of entertainment to the public, and profit to the publishers; though we doubt whether they will obtain a lasting place in English literature.

From J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA. Parts 57 and 58
THE BOOK OF DAYS. Part 12.

The Encyclopædia is the most useful ever published; and the Book of Days is not only valuable as a book of reference, but very interesting to read. Both works are amply illustrated. Only twenty cents each number for these valuable publications.

From GEO. W. CHILDS, Philadelphia:—

THE NATIONAL ALMANAC AND ANNUAL RECORD for 1863. We welcome this much needed volume to our Table, with many thanks to the eminent publisher. The information it contains is invaluable to every family; it will aid in the education of the young while helping the elders to much useful knowledge which would require many other volumes to obtain. Those who desire to have easy access to the material facts connected with the present condition of our country should buy this book. Teachers of public schools, ladies as well as gentlemen, need this manual of accurate information for daily reference. We live in the present. It is more important for us to know what is the condition of our own nation in this particular year, than to have studied the conjectural histories of every Egyptian dynasty which have been written since the first mummy was unrolled. "The National Almanac" is the last four-print of our national progress. The publisher promises a similar record yearly. As no work of the kind in our country has ever been prepared so fully and perfectly as this Annual, we are glad to know that it is to be a permanent "institution" in this good city. Philadelphia is the place for good works; and this large volume will be duly appreciated.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

NO NAME: A Novel. By Wilkie Collins, author of "The Woman in White," etc. Illustrated by John M. Lennan. The mere announcement of a new book by Wilkie Collins is a sufficient guarantee of its merit. But whatever public expectation may have been in regard to this work, it is more than realized. It is even superior to "The Woman in White," which was of itself enough to make Collins' reputation. It is a bold, a dashing book, and will undoubtedly challenge criticism in some quarters. These attacks will be, perhaps, specially directed against the heroine, Magdalene Vanstone. She is a remarkable character, and certainly not without faults; but there is a dash and a recklessness about her which is very captivating in a novel, whatever it may be in real life. But the strongest characters in the book are Captain Wragge, the self-styled "moral agriculturist," the accomplished swindler, and Mrs. Lecount, between whom the war of wit and strategy is both amusing and exciting.

BARRINGTON: A Novel. By Charles Lever, author of "Charles O'Malley," "One of Them," etc. etc. One of the most cleverly written novels of the day, and one which is likely to be widely read. It is a story of Irish life, dating back to the beginning of the present century, and for a character novel we have seldom seen it equalled. First, there is Peter Barrington, a gentleman of the old school, who, though in reduced circumstances, can never forget that he has been and still is a gentleman, and maintains all his courtly manners and generous, even extravagant hospitality, without so much as counting the cost. His sister, a stately lady with manners of the past, is yet the reverse of her brother in her prudence and worldly wisdom. Polly Dill is the spice of the book, and all the remaining characters are boldly drawn. There is quite an ingenious plot, though it is sometime before the reader suspects there is any at all: but it is too intricate in its details for us to attempt a sketch of it.

From DICK & FITZGERALD, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET: A Novel. By Miss M. E. Braddon, author of "Aurora Floyd," "John Marchmont's Legacy," etc.

THE LADY LISLE: A Novel. By Miss M. E. Braddon, author of "Aurora Floyd," "Lady Audley's Secret," etc.

From D. APPLETON & Co., New York, through W. P. HAZARD, Philadelphia:—

ST. PAUL'S EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS: Newly Translated, and Explained from a Missionary point of View. By the Right Rev. J. W. Colenso, D. D., Bishop of Natal. This noted bishop has again prepared a religious work for publication, differing somewhat in character from his last. He gives a new translation of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, accompanying it throughout with carefully prepared original notes explanatory of the text. To the earnest student of the Scripture this will doubtless be a great aid in fully comprehending the apostle's meaning and allusions.

From T. O. H. P. BURNHAM, Boston, through J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

MY DIARY NORTH AND SOUTH. By William Howard Russel. This book has a peculiar interest just now which will doubtless cause the sale of an immense edition. The impressions received by the correspondent of the London Times have been already shadowed forth in his published letters to that paper. This book is not, however, a collection of these letters, although in some instances they are borrowed from and made use of. That the author is candid in his opinions all are ready to agree, and many of these opinions are to be received with a certain consideration. Nevertheless, like foreigners who have preceded him, and who, like him, have given their experience in America to the world, he is influenced more or less by prejudices in his view of our affairs, both politically and socially, and commits about the usual number of blunders, some of them certainly amusing.

From CARTER & BROTHERS, New York, through MARTIN & BROTHER, Philadelphia:—

THE RISEN REDEEMER: The Gospel History from the Resurrection to the Day of Pentecost. By F. W. Krummacher, D. D., author of "Elijah the Tishbite." There are twenty-one "Discourses" in this large volume; the subject is the most important which the Christian teacher can bring before hearer or reader. Such a grand theme requires the highest effort of human intelligence, irradiated by the best knowledge which study imparts, and the wisdom which faith in the Divine Saviour inspires. Dr. Krummacher has not only not failed, but his work is deeply interesting as well as instructive, and will be a welcome comforter to many an humble Christian.

PATRIARCHAL SHADOWS OF CHRIST AND HIS CHURCH: As Exhibited in Passages Drawn from the History of Joseph and his Brethren. By Octavius Winslow, D. D. The aim of this book is to show the reader the great "central part of Christianity—A LIVING CHRIST;" and that the whole Bible is living truth in His life. It is just the book for Sabbath Schools and family readings on the "Lord's Day." Children will read the stories with pleasure as well as profit.

THE THOUGHTS OF GOD. By the Rev. J. R. Macduff, D. D., author of "Morning and Night Watches," etc. This is a little book, but of a large measure in its precious truths. There are "Thoughts"—for every day in the month—short but wonderfully suggestive. It is a continued Gloria in Excelsis; and those who are sorrowful or depressed with cares cannot fail of finding in such outbreathings of faith and love some words of encouragement and comfort.

WAR AND PEACE: A Tale of the Retreat from Cabul. By A. L. O. E. This popular writer for the family circle and particularly for children, has availed herself of the interesting "Journal of Lady Sale" and other accounts of the Afghans, thus furnishing one of her useful and attractive books. The series is now a library, and few of the number deserve more praise than this story of peace and war.

THE AMERICAN JOURNAL OF THE MEDICAL SCIENCES. Edited by Isaac Hays, M. D. Philadelphia: Blanchard and Lea. Price $5 a year.

QUARTERLY REVIEWS. The republication of the British Quarterlies, viz: London, Edinburgh, North British, Westminster, also Blackwood's Magazine, has been for many past years successfully accomplished in New York by Leonard Scott & Co. The great advantage to our literature in thus having easy and cheap access to the rich mines of British scholarship, in all its best productions, can hardly be over-estimated. We name it here to call attention to the following circular, issued in consequence of the loss of the extensive publishing establishment by fire. The republication will go on; Blackwood's Magazine has been issued.*

* "The late fire having destroyed our entire stock of the back numbers of the Reprints, we find ourselves much in want of some of the late numbers. If you do not care to preserve your files, we should take it as a great favor if you would return us by mail as many numbers of the last quarter of 1862 as you conveniently can. The favor will be reciprocated in any way you may desire. Please address them, simply, Blackwood's Magazine, New York."

Godey's Arm-Chair.

THE APRIL GODEY—The first real spring month, and we give spring plates. The first, "Spring, or The Return of the Swallows," is a most beautiful and appropriate engraving—pretty in its design, and admirable in the engraving, and particularly pleasing from its agreeable variety of figures and landscape.

All the incidents connected with the arrival of the swallows, and the pleasurable interests which the event excites in the old-fashioned household which they favor with their annual visit, are very naturally and agreeably expressed. The old man, who takes advantage of the first mild day to snatch a breath of air in the porch; old granny, leaning over his chair, behind him; and two generations of their descendants, watch the newcomers with joyful recognition as the latter proceed to take possession of their nests. The other objects introduced into the picture are the kitten, about to pounce upon a saucy calf of milk the sheep and lambs in the pasture beyond, and the trees just beginning to put forth their first buds, which are completely in harmony with the one all-pervading theme, the revival and replenishment of creation under the benign influence of spring.

We give something entirely new in our Fashion plate—dresses that now appear for the first time in print. The fifth figure is a great novelty, a description of which will be found under the proper head. The plate comprises five figures, and the fashion of each is really a fashion, not a fancy figure. There are very many new devices in dress and adornments, all of which our Fashion editor chronicles with her usual ability. We may here mention something new. A bouquet of natural flowers, with artificial butterflies on it.

"The Rain Hums, or Grinding up April Showers." Here is an original design, and an amusing one. We have all heard of April showers, and here we show how they are produced.

CAUSE OF DELAY—Some of our subscribers had to wait a few days for their numbers after their orders were received. The cause was a flattering one to us. Owing to the immense demand, we were unable to print the Lady's Book fast enough, although we had eight steam-power presses running night and day.

ABOUT POSTAGE—Any postmaster who charges more than four and one-half cent postage for three months' postage on the Lady's Book, if paid in advance, is derelict of his duty, and liable to a suit for recovery of any amount overpaid. Will our subscribers please notice this, and act accordingly?

ARTEMUS WARD, that prince of showmen, has been "speaking a piece" in Philadelphia—"Sixty Minutes in Africa." The house was crowded, and a more delighted audience we never saw. We commend Artemus to our brethren of the press all over the country, as a gentleman and a humorist.

The new Chestnut Street Theatre is a decided success. It is a beautiful house, well lighted, and ably managed.

GENERAL TWIGG'S HAIR-DYE—A lady wishes to procure this receipt.

OUR MUSICAL COLUMN.

New Musical Monthly—The first number of this new and beautiful publication, which we announced last month, is now ready for delivery. It contains one dollar's worth of piano music which subscribers get for the low price of 25 cents. Heretofore there has never been a periodical devoted solely to the publication of music, in the popular sheet form, easy of handling at the piano. The pages of the New Musical Monthly are of the regular sheet music size, the music is all printed from engraved plates, as sheet music is printed, on the best music paper. Each number will contain from three to four 25 cent pieces of music, or their equivalent—songs, ballads, polkas, transcriptions, marches, etc., each piece having a distinct and beautiful title-page of its own, adapting the whole for binding into a handsome volume at the close of the year. This is a feature never before attempted in a musical periodical. The terms of the Musical Monthly are $3.00 per annum. Single numbers, 25 cents.

The first number, for May, now published, contains, first, Brinley Richards' exquisite transcription of Glover's beautiful melody, Floating on the Wind, a charming composition that alone costs 50 cents in the music stores; second, the celebrated Shadow Air, from Meyerbeer's new Opera, Le Pardon de Ploermel, which has created so great a furor in Paris, Philadelphia, etc.; third, At The Gate, a new ballad, never before published, by the author of Poor Ben the Piper, Beautiful Valley, etc.—in all, one dollar's worth of music for 25 cents, and in the style and size of sheet music, it will be remembered, with handsome title-page to each piece. The Musical Monthly is a subscription work, and will not be for sale at any music store in the country. Subscriptions, at $3.00 per annum, must be sent to the publisher, J. Starr Holloway, Philadelphia. Club lists will be furnished on application. As a large subscription list, only, will remunerate us for this undertaking, we trust that our friends everywhere will give us their aid in this attempt to popularize first class music.

New Sheet Music—Loe & Walker, this city, publish three new ballads by Alice Hawthorne, The Cozy Nook, As Dear to Day as Ever, and Friend of my Heart. Also five new patriotic songs, Rally for the Union, The Picket Guard, Comé Rally Round our Flag, Unfurl the Stars and Stripes, and Huzza, the Union Forever; all spirited and stirring melodies, the words mostly by Rev. M. L. Hoford: each 25 cents. The Soldiers' Vision, and We Think of Thee at Home, are two new songs by our contributor, Mr. Everest: each 40 cents, with title in colors.

The same publishers issue, a fine arrangement of Hummel's Battle Prayer, by Grobe, 40 cents. Glory Hallelnjah, varied by Grobe, 50. Tic Tac Polka, Peabody Polka, Donna Schottische, Isabella Schottische, each 25. Col. Hall's Grand March, by Jarvis, with vignette battle scene, 50. Monitor Grand March, colored title, 40. Mocking Bird Quickstep, introducing the favorite air, 40. A new transcription of the Last Rose of Summer, Everest, 25. Also the following Grand Marches and Quicksteps, each embellished with a fine portrait of its respective subject—Gen. Halleck's, Gen. Pope's, Gen. Buell's, Gov. Sprague's, Col. Hartranft's and Parson Brownlow's. All fine pieces, each 30 cents.

The musical editor will mail any music on receipt of price. Address, at Philadelphia,

J. STARR HOLLOWAY.

A SPECIALITÉ OF PARIS.—Can you believe that in the middle of the nineteenth century there exists dressmakers with beards, men, real men like the Zouaves, who, with their strong hands, measure the exact dimensions of the most titled women in Paris, dress them, undress them, and turn them round and round before them, as if they were neither more nor less than wax figures in a hairdresser's window?

Of course you know the Rue de la Paix—so called because it celebrates war in the shape of a column. In that street lives an Englishman who enjoys a very different popularity in the world of frippery from that of a Lent preacher. This Englishman, it must be admitted, has created a new kind of art, the art of screwing-in a woman's figure with a precision hitherto unknown. He has the inspiration of the scissors, the genius of the gore. He knows the exact spot at which the stuff should fit tightly, and where it should float around at will. He understands at a glance, by the whole context of the woman, what should be shown, and what concealed. Providence has created him from all eternity to discover the law of crinolines, and the true curve of the petticoat. He is a perfect gentleman, always fresh and clean shaved, always curled, black coat, white cravat, cambric sleeves, fastened at the wrist with a gold button. He officiates with all the gravity of a diplomatist who carries the future of the world shut up in one of the compartments of his brain.

When he tries a dress upon a live doll of the Chaussée d'Antin, it is with the most profound contemplation that he touches, fits, measures, and marks with chalk the defective fold in the stuff. Anon he steps back, and the better to judge the effect of his handiwork at a distance, he holds his hand before his eye like an opera-glass, and resumes, with an inspired finger, the work of modelling the dress on the body of his customer. Sometimes he plants a flower here, or tries on a ribbon there, in order to test the general harmony of the toilet; and all this time the Eve in process of manufacture stands motionless and resigned, and allows her creator to proceed with the work of her creation in silence.

At last, when he has moulded the silk as if it were clay, and when he has modelled the figure according to his idea, he takes his place at the other end of the room, and seats himself upon a sofa with his head thrown back, and directs his work as with a conductor's baton. "To the right, madam!" and the lady turns accordingly. "To the left!" and round she goes. "Face me!" and she looks straight at the artist. "Right about face," and the obverse is presented. In this manner a German princess, acclimatized at Paris, executes, at the orders of a man, a complete course of drill. After which he dismisses her with a royal gesture, "That will do, madam."

I have never witnessed these mysteries, and only know of them through the indiscretions of the initiated; but this is what a passing zephyr whispered in my ear, and I only repeat the disclosure (be it thoroughly understood) under all possible reserve. The fashionable ladies of Paris, enchanted with the splendid fashions of their trowsered dressmaker, have come to believe that a man who can make a dress so beautifully ought to be able to put it on better than any one else, and set upon it the seal of the master. Therefore, whenever a court ball takes place, or a ball at the Hôtel de Ville, or even a grand reception at the Palais Royal or the Luxembourg, you may see drawn up, about ten o'clock at night, before the door of the foreign dressmaker a long string of carriages, the wretched coachmen sitting on the boxes buried in their great coats. The mistresses have mounted the stairs into this Temple of the Toilet; as they enter, they receive a card bearing the number of their turn, and they pass on into the waiting-room. As they can only appear one by one before this pontiff of the petticoat, the late comers have occasionally to wait a long time; but a delicate piece of attention on the part of the master of the house enables them to relieve as much as possible the fatigues of the ante-chamber. A sideboard, richly provided, offers to the fair expectants the positive consolations of the choicest dishes and pastry, and here the ethereal little dames of the Paris drawing-rooms fortify themselves for the polka by partaking of unlimited pâté de foie gras, washed down with abundant Malmsey. Thus refreshed at the expense of the establishment, they brave with an intrepid spirit the operation of the toilet. The master dispatches them one after another, and with considerable celerity. He examines; turns them about; a final touch; a pin here and there, and madam has realized the prototype of elegance.

The following are his charges: For cutting a dress, $10; for dressing a lady, $15; for fitting her for a dinner, $20; and $25 for a party.

DEAR MR. GODEY: Have just been reading some of your subscribers' complimentary letters on the Lady's Book, and felt as though I should like to let Mr. Godey and his friends know that I, too, think its equal cannot be found in the country. With such a cheerful home-like appearance on every leaf, it never comes without a seeming blessing; I believe I might say with propriety a real blessing; at least I never look at one of its numbers without a smile leaping from my heart. And who am I? you may ask, that I should so appreciate its excellencies. Not one of your city belles, I assure you, who has nothing to do but to read Godey when she finds the hours tedious, but one of the country girls who is heartily thankful for the moment she can lay aside her work and fill her heart with incense from the embalming words in the Lady's Book. I have for years read your Book, but this is the first year I have taken it. The two first numbers, January and February, have already sent many blessings and sweet moments of peace to my heart. How many more shall I receive through the coming year? Dear Godey, if all who are taking your magazine are as deeply in love with it as I am, they will each one continue to hold you up in your well-doing.

INDIANA GIRL.

THE Skanateles Democrat says: "The embellishments are multitudinous, and beautifully executed. As a New Year's gift we think it cannot be surpassed. The price for so elaborately finished a periodical is merely nominal, at the present high prices of paper, barely sufficient to cover the expense of this article alone."

That is a fact.

WHAT OUR FASHION EDITOR CAN SUPPLY. Address Fashion Editor, care L. A. Godey, Philadelphia. Mrs. Hale is not the fashion editress.

Hair-work, patterns for all kinds of garments, and for women and children, jewelry, caps, bonnets, cloaks, mantillas, talmas, mantles, headdresses, shawls, bead-work, materials for wax and paper flowers, embroidery, collars, capes, worsteds, Shetland wool, infants' wardrobes or patterns for the same, stamped collars, orné balls, canvas for working, etc. etc.

THE FLOWER GARDEN.

SPRING, with its vernal showers, is again upon us; and with its return our thoughts are naturally directed to the flower garden. We have from time to time prepared lists for the readers of the Lady's Book of the most desirable plants for general cultivation; and from the many flattering and unsolicited letters of commendation received from those who have ordered both seeds and plants, we feel that our effort has been appreciated. Our mode of packing is so secure that plants can be forwarded in perfect safety as far as Kansas. As general remarks on the cultivation, preparation of soil, etc., have appeared at various times in the Lady's Book, they will, for want of space, be here omitted. To those, however, who may desire further information we refer to DREER'S GARDEN CALENDAR, or Mrs. Loudon's "Ladies' Companion to the Flower Garden." The former will be mailed to any address by inclosing a three-cent stamp; the latter costs $1.50, and is the best work for its size and price ever published.

We herewith subjoin a list of roses and other desirable plants, which cannot fail to give satisfaction.

HYBRID PERPETUAL ROSES. Six varieties $2.50
 Augusta Mia, very large rose; Géant des Batailles, dark scarlet; General Jacqueminot, splendid scarlet; Lou des Combats, purplish crimson; Pœonia, large crimson; Jacques Laffite, rosy blush.

BURBON ROSES. Ever-blooming. Six varieties $2.
 Hermosa, pink; Souvenir de Malmaison, large blush; Sir Joseph Paxton, rosy crimson; Imperatrice Eugénie, rosy lilac; Souvenir de Anselme, brilliant crimson pillar rose; Louise Odier, large rose.

TEA ROSES. Exquisitely fragrant. Six varieties $2.
 Madame Brany, pure white; Gloire de Dijon, large, buff and pink (strong grower); America, creamy white; Eugène Deszanges, waxy rose; Princess Maria, buff rose; Madame Barbet Deschamps, large, creamy white.

BENAL OR DAHLIA ROSES. Six varieties $1.50.
 Archduke Charles, changeable crimson; Indica Alba, pure white; Cois, blush; Louis Philippe, light crimson; Eugène Bonbarnais, deep crimson; La Seduisante, light blush.

HARDY CLIMBING ROSES. Six varieties $2.
 Walter Scott, deep rose; White Microphylla, creamy white; Monstrosa, blush; Trompette de la Duchesse, large blush; Prairie Queen, deep rose; Baltimore Belle, blush white.

LANTANAS. Constant bloomers. Six varieties. $1.
PENSTEMONS. Six beautiful varieties. $1.

FUCHSIA, OR LADIES' EAR-DROP. Six splendid varieties, including the best double sorts $1.50.

PETUNIAS. Double and single varieties. Six for $1.

HELIOTROPE. Six choice varieties for $1.

SCARLET GERANIUMS. Six varieties, including the beautiful variegated-leaved varieties, for $1.

PELAGONIUMS, OR LARGE FLOWERING GERANIUMS. Six distinct and beautiful sorts $1.50.

SCENTED GERANIUMS, including Apple, Nutmeg, Peppermint, Lemon Rose, etc. Six for $1.

DAHLIAS. Twelve very choice and distinct varieties, including all colors, for $2.50.

GLADIOLUS. New French hybrid varieties, now so popular; one of the greatest acquisitions of late years to the flower garden. Twelve distinct fine varieties for $4. Very choice varieties, $5 per dozen.

PANSIES, OR HEARTSEASE. Six large flowering kinds for $1.

COBEA SCANDENS. Rapid summer climbing plant; large bell-shaped flowers, each 25 cents.

IPOMŒA LEAPHII. Large cerulean blue convolvulus flowers, each 25 cents.

GAZANIA SPLENDENS. A new bedding plant, blooming until late in the autumn, each 20 cents.

SALVIA. Six varieties, including the Scarlet Sage, for $1.

PLANTS IN ASSORTMENTS.

One Hundred Plants for Ten Dollars, including a selection from the above, with a number of other desirable bedding plants not here enumerated. These assortments have given general satisfaction, and will be sold much cheaper, and often more satisfactory than when the purchaser makes the selection. We wish it distinctly understood that the assortments are our own selection. No charge will be made for packing.

The following plants are not generally known, and are very desirable:—

THE PAMPAS GRASS. The most magnificent of grasses, with long, terminal silvery plumes. A beautiful and striking object on a lawn, or near a fountain. 50 cents each.

TRITOMA UVARIA, with stately flower-scapes, and magnificent terminal dense spikes of rich orange red flower tubes. 50 cents each.

DAPIFNE CYNORUM. The best hardy evergreen shrub of recent introduction, growing one foot high, very tree, flowering, and fragrant, blooming among the first in the spring, and continuing until the last in the autumn. It is admirably adapted for cemetery lots, city, and suburban yards. Price 50 cents each.

Catalogues of seeds and plants will be forwarded on application to

HENRY A. DREER, Seedsman and Florist,
 327 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

WE copy the following from the Reformer, of Galt, Canada. We noticed last month that we had no travelling agents in Canada or any other place:—

"A SWINDLER—LOOK OUT!—We learn that a rascally swindler has been plying his dishonest vocation in this neighborhood recently. He professed to be a travelling agent for Godey's 'Lady's Book' and Moore's 'Rural New Yorker.' One of the victimized, who resides near Sheffield, and one who generally has his eyes open, informs us that the party gave his name as W. T. Wilson, that he was well-dressed and smooth-tongued, and equally well posted in religion, politics, or the chit-chat of the drawing-room. He offered either of the above periodicals at $1.50, and had about twenty names, some Galt ones amongst the rest, when our friend saw his book, and all paid in advance! Of course none of the subscribers received a single number, Mr. Wilson making himself scarce as soon as possible after the rhuo had been carefully secured."

"The 'nice young man' told our Boverley acquaintance that he was acting for Tunis of Niagara Falls, and actually had the effrontery to give him a receipt in Mr. Tunis's name. This, of course, was untrue. Mr. Wilson has been playing his pranks in various parts of Canada, and it is to be hoped he will yet have the pleasure of ruminating in jail on the design of dishonesty. The publishers of the 'Lady's Book' and the 'New Yorker' never send out travelling agents, so that the public may be sure that one who represents himself as such must either be Mr. Wilson or some gent of the same kidney."

ON our March cover we published the advertisement of Mr. S. Ott, of New York, who, as well as a general agent, is also agent for Boardman & Gray's pianos, those well-known instruments. Mr. Ott's capabilities as a business man are well known, as for years he conducted the immense concern of Boardman & Gray, and by his courtesy and punctuality he won the good opinion of all.

JUVENILE DEPARTMENT.

We have some choice little illustrated hymns, which we will give from time to time in the Juvenile column. We know they will meet with favor from our young friends.

HOLY BIBLE.

HOLY BIBLE, Book divine,
Precious treasure, thou art mine;
Mine to tell me whence I came;
Mine to teach me what I am.

Mine to chide me when I rove;
Mine to show a Saviour's love;
Mine art thou to guide my feet;
Mine to judge, condemn, acquit.

Mine to comfort in distress;
Mine to lead to promises;
Mine to warn of sinners' doom;
Mine to show that doom to shun.

Mine to show the living faith;
Mine to triumph over death;
Mine to tell of joys to come;
Mine to bring an earnest home.

Mine to point me out the road;
Mine to lead my heart to God.
O thou precious Book divine!
Precious treasure, thou art mine.

REASONABLE CONDUITS:—

When is a ship properly in love?—When she is tender to a man of war.

When is she improperly in love?—When she is (b) anchoring after a heavy swell

When foolishly in love?—When attached to a great bray.

When ambitiously in love?—When she is making up to a peer (pier).

If a boy makes a long speech, why is it like a genuine article?—Because it is not an adult-oration!

OUR readers all know by this time that Mr. Stratton, otherwise Barum's "Tom Thumb," has been married to Miss Warren, another dwarf. The following is a description of her dresses and jewelry:—

MISS WARREN'S WEDDING AND TRAVELLING DRESS.

The wedding-dress is of white satin, low in the neck, with deep point both back and front, and laced up the back. The skirt is made with a decided train, and has one point appliqué flounce half a yard deep, headed by a row of appliqué about one-inch wide. The veil is very beautiful, being of rich point appliqué. The tiny slippers are made of white satin, and trimmed with bows powdered with pearl beads. The glove tops are of point appliqué lace.

The travelling-dress is of stone-colored silk poplin. The skirt very long at the back, and trimmed on the edge with a quilting of brown velvet. A long sack is of the same material as the dress, prettily trimmed with brown velvet. The bonnet is of silk, matching the dress in shade, and trimmed with brown velvet. The inside trimming is a full ruche of blonde, and a tuft of pink rose-buds over the forehead.

THE JEWELRY.

A pair of handsome diamond hair-pins, with pendants; two beautiful gold bracelets, with diamond clusters, each of which can be detached and used as a pin; a necklace, with cluster and pendants of diamonds; a diamond locket, pin, and ear-rings; pin, ear-rings, and sleeve buttons of turquoise, with figures of gold and diamonds; pin and ear-rings of pink coral, with green enamelled leaves; a small watch, the shape of a leaf, and covered with green enamel, and studded with diamonds, chain, pin, and keys attached; two handsome diamond rings; a necklace of gold, with coral ornaments attached; also a bunch of very handsome charms.

WE copy the following from our July number, 1862. It is all the rage now, and some most beautiful effects are produced by it. On china it's very pretty:—

"A new style of work has been brought out in Paris, which is called Décalcomanie, or the art of decorating wood, plaster, porcelain, alabaster, ivory, etc. etc. The art is very simple; you have only to take a picture representing flowers, birds, or landscapes, which you cover entirely with varnish, taking great care not to go beyond the outlines of the picture. Place the picture thus prepared on the article you wish to ornament; then cover it with a piece of cloth or muslin dipped in water, and with a paper-cutter press it sufficiently to cause the design to adhere. This done, remove the cloth, and with a paint-brush wet the paper, which will then come off leaving on the paper no trace of the picture, which will be pressed on the object you wish to ornament. Next day you put on a light coat of varnish to brighten the colors.

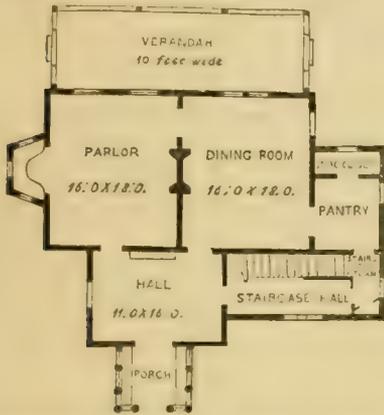

"We find this description in a French work. We cannot vouch for its accuracy, as we have not practised the art ourselves. The work from which we took this description does not state whether the varnished side of the picture is to be placed next to the object to be ornamented, but we think it should be."

A dog is counted mad when he won't "take something to drink;" and a man insane when he takes too much. A financier remains "respectable" with a fortune that don't belong to him, while a beggar becomes a criminal for purloining a piece of meat.

COUNTRY RESIDENCE.

The above design is taken from a work published in New York by Messrs. Harper & Brothers, entitled "Villas and Cottages," and is the best work upon rural architecture yet published. The designs are all by Calvert Vaux, Esq., Architect, late Downing & Vaux.

PHILADELPHIA AGENCY.

No order attended to unless the cash accompanies it.

All persons requiring answers by mail must send a post-office stamp; and for all articles that are to be sent by mail, stamps must be sent to pay return postage.

Be particular, when writing, to mention the town, county, and State you reside in. Nothing can be made out of post-marks.

Mr. C. D. C.—Sent box, January 21st.

Miss M. V.—Sent Garibaldi 23d.

E. B. H.—Sent cloak and cap 24th.

Mrs. E. W. T.—Sent patterns 24th.

Mrs. J. A. D.—Sent silk braid, etc. 24th.

A. M.—Sent hair ring 27th.

Mrs. E. B. E.—Sent Garibaldi and jacket 30th.

L. J. C.—Sent collars 31st.

J. A. H.—Sent crochet jacket by express February 3d.

Mrs. H. S. C.—Sent zephyr and needles by express 3d.

Miss M. Z.—Sent braids 3d.

Mrs. G. W. T.—Sent patterns 3d.

W. E. W.—Dissolve in spirits of wine.

A. F. M.—Sent patterns 3d.

Mrs. A. S. A.—Sent patterns 3d.

E. C. B.—Sent hair ear-rings 15th.

A. R.—Sent braiding pattern 16th.

Meta.—A Tin Wedding is celebrated on the 10th anniversary. Every friend sends some domestic article for the kitchen or dresser—the material being tin. It is a humorous matter. The Silver Wedding is on the 25th anniversary; the Golden on the 50th.

Mrs. S. A. H.—In 1833, the dresses did not reach the ankle by at least four inches. In 1861 and part of 1862, the bonnets were flat on the head; in 1863 they are from four to eight inches above the head.

Madge May.—Nothing improper in the request. All ladies have to do the same thing.

Mrs. V. R. L.—Enamelling of ladies' faces is practised here. We meet constantly on Chestnut Street faces done up in this way. The only trouble is that it is difficult to smile; to laugh they dare not.

R. S. A.—"If you had a wife that was determined to spend every cent you made, what would you do?" We really cannot answer this question. We think it is one that must be brought home to a person before he can reply.

G. S.—You ask what are the popular plays of boys now. We have no boys now. They used to play marbles; they now at the same age play billiards; they formerly played "Old Maid," they now play euchre.

L. C. R.—Yes; we have seen the dancing figures for pianos.

H. A. DREER'S—SEEDSMAN—ANSWERS TO HIS CORRESPONDENTS.

A. M. C.—We herewith give you a selection of a few of the most desirable of the new as well as older varieties of annual flower seeds, which can be recommended. The twelve varieties will be mailed for one dollar.

Asters, new Emperor, very large and fine; Antirrhinum, firely, scarlet white throat; Balsams, new dwarf Camellia, flowered; Cockscomb, superb dwarf, velvet crimson; Dianthus Heddevegi, new Japan pinks; Lobelia erinus speciosa, superb blue, trailing; Lychnis Haageana, brilliant scarlet; Mignonette, new, in size flowering; Nasturtium, Tom Thumb; Phlox Drummondii, Louis Napoleon, brilliant colors; Stocks, new, large flowering; Zinnia, new double.

The best soil to sow in is a light sandy loam; observe not to cover the seeds too deep; failures frequently occur from this cause; from one-eighth to one-quarter inch is sufficient. Use a fine rose to watering pot. We would recommend sowing in a frame and covering with sash; if a slight hot-bed can be made, it would be desirable; transplant the plants into the open border as soon as there is no more danger of frost.

Chemistry for the Young.

LESSON XXIII.

Analysis by fire, or the dry way.—Use of the Blowpipe.—General Outline of Smelting and Assaying.

MATERIALS AND APPARATUS REQUIRED.

BORAX; bone ashes; a blowpipe; a brass thimble; powdered silica; piece of oxidized (rusty) iron; piece of copper; a triangular file; spirit lamp; wax candle; platinum wire; a piece of charcoal.

555. It has been stated in a very early portion of our lessons that the first object to be aimed at in all cases of chemical analysis, is to obtain a solution, which solution is effected either by water, acids, or other fluid menstrua, or by means of fusion. The three former, constituting what is technically known as "the moist process," is by far the more correct—the better adapted for chemical analysis; therefore, the one most usually had recourse to by chemists. Very slight consideration, however, will suffice to prove that the moist process is far too expensive, too delicate, too refined, for application on the large scale. The chemist may get iron, and lead, and copper out of liquids by precipitation; but fancy lead, and silver, and iron dissolved and precipitated by hundreds of thousands of tons! Hence the dry process is always, as a general rule, had recourse to on the large scale, whenever one of two processes might be theoretically employed. Nevertheless, the manufacture of platinum, on account of the great infusibility of this metal, is an exception to the rule; as also, in certain cases, is the extraction of gold.

556. However, the process of analysis in the dry way must not be neglected by the chemist. The branch of it relating to the use of the blowpipe is of almost universal importance, and furnace operations are useful as furnishing the counterparts, so to speak, of the products obtained on the large scale. If a mineral proprietor send a specimen of iron ore to be assayed, he does not want to know absolutely how much iron is there, but how much, by a smelting process, can be got out. Further information, instead of being advantageous, might actually mislead him. Enough, then, having been said to show the importance of this branch of chemistry, let us proceed to the subject of our lesson.

557. The objects of all analyses are either qualitative or quantitative. The latter is generally easy of attainment, when the former has been secured. Now, in this age, no chemist would give himself the trouble to set in action a furnace, however small and portable, for the mere purpose of qualitative investigation. Not only is furnace work troublesome, but one likes to see what is taking place. If a furnace could be rendered portable enough to be carried about, in the pocket, to be set in action at a moment's notice—requiring neither crucibles, tongs, coal, coke, nor charcoal—neither distributing sooty fumes, spoiling furniture, burning the fingers, blackening the face nor hiding the changes that occur within—then chemists might use a furnace more frequently. Chemists have such a furnace in a little instrument termed the blowpipe.

Fashions.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

HAVING had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editor of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Spring and autumn bonnets, materials for dresses, jewelry, envelops, hair-work, worsteds, children's wardrobes, mantillas, and mantelets, will be chosen with a view to economy, as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godey, Esq.
No order will be attended to unless the money is first received. Neither the Editor nor Publisher will be accountable for losses that may occur in remitting.

The Publisher of the Lady's Book has no interest in this department, and knows nothing of the transactions; and whether the person sending the order is or is not a subscriber to the Lady's Book, the Fashion editor does not know.

Instructions to be as minute as is possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice. Dress goods from Evans & Co.'s; mourning goods from Besson & Son; cloaks, mantillas, or talmas, from Brodie's, 51 Canal Street, New York; bonnets from the most celebrated establishments; jewelry from Wriggins & Warden, or Caldwell's, Philadelphia.

When goods are ordered, the fashions that prevail here govern the purchase; therefore, no articles will be taken back. When the goods are sent, the transaction must be considered final.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION-PLATE FOR APRIL.

Fig. 1.—Black silk skirt, with a broad band of Imperial purple silk laid on, four inches from the edge of the skirt, and bordered on each side with three rows of the silk doubled and box-plaited. The waist is a purple silk jockey, trimmed with full ruchings of black silk. The jockey is square, and laid in plaits caught with buttons, and in front are points four inches long. The shawl is of white Thibet, braided with narrow black velvet, and highly ornamented with bead and silk embroidery. It is also trimmed with two rows of black guipure lace. The bonnet is of rice straw, with a curtain of appliqué lace over white silk, and ornamented with clusters of grapes with foliage. The hair is crimped and arranged very low on the neck.

Fig. 2.—Dress of Isley green gros d'Ecosse silk. The edge of the skirt is trimmed with a plaiting of the silk, doubled and sewed in between the facing and the dress. Above this is a wavy trimming of the silk, box-plaited, and between the waves are fans formed also of the silk. The sack, which fits rather tight to the figure, is of gros Italicque, and very elegantly trimmed with jet and gimp passementerie. The collar is standing, and fastened with a gimp bow. White silk bonnet trimmed with loops of Isley green ribbon and tufts of roses. The hair is crimped and brushed over a roller.

Fig. 3.—White and mauve chine silk, made a l'Indiennatrice, and trimmed around the skirt and up the front with three rows of mauve ribbon and two rows of mauve silk ruching. The sleeves and covers of the corsage are trimmed to match. Plated chemisette and plain muslin sleeves; the collar and cuffs are edged with a narrow dotted ruffle. The hair is brushed off the face, and falls in curls behind the ear on one side only. The back hair is arranged in a large bow.

Fig. 4—Dress of mode-cour glaire silk, trimmed with three graduated bands of black velvet, and between the bands are rows of black velvet cut in diamonds and stitched on. The tulle is of black gros grain silk, trimmed with three rows of thread lace, one row being continued up the front and round the neck. The bonnet is of black and white tulle, with a Vesuve crown. The cape, strings, and front binding are also of Vesuve silk or ribbon.

Fig. 5—Dinner-dress of Napoleon gros de Suez, trimmed with a plaiting on the edge of the skirt. At intervals are boxed rings of plaited silk, the lower one having a fan of the silk caught in it. The corsage is of white silk embroidered and trimmed with applique lace. The coiffure consists of a large blue velvet bow, edged with lace, placed over the top of the head, and loops and ends of blue velvet caught in with the puffs at the back of the head.

COIFFURE MAINTENON.

(See engravings, pages 394, 395.)

Figs. 1 and 2 are different views of the Coiffure Maintenon. The natural hair in front is braided smoothly back, à la Chemise, the ends of the front hair terminating in two curls on each side. The back hair is divided in two bows, the hair being tied. The lower bow is first arranged, and with the remainder the upper bow is formed, and is secured in the centre, flowers concealing the fastening, or a chignon like Fig. 3, page 493, June number, 1862, can be pinned on, and the natural hair form only the upper bow. The front of the coiffure is composed of a band of frizzed curls, same as Fig. 3, and the rest of the coiffure is a pointed barbe and flowers.

BREAKFAST CAPS.

Fig. 1—Breakfast-cap made of French muslin, and trimmed with violet ribbons.

Fig. 2—This cap is arranged in the form of a net, trimmed all round with a double row of blonde, and two ribbon streamers behind. Three roses make a pretty bandeau to the front of the cap. Black or white net may be used for the purpose, and whatever colored ribbon best suits the complexion of the wearer.

CHITCHAT UPON NEW YORK AND PHILADELPHIA FASHIONS FOR APRIL.

The crocuses gleaming from the short emerald velvet turf of our lawns, with their delicate tints of mauve, white, and gold, are not more certain harbingers of spring, or, as it happens this season, more beautiful creations than the first fresh spring taffetas unfolded on Stewart's counters.

Quite as chaste as the crocuses are the tiny chinté patterns in delicate spring tints, on a plain mauve, stone, or cuir ground, or that indefinite, pinkish, purplish shade, the exact counterpart of our emblematic flower. Then again, and newer still, we have the same designs and colors on a moiré ground—moiré chinté, an entirely new combination. These are moderate in price, at $2 a yard.

In plain silks, there are the Gros de Suez, d'Ecosse, d'Afrique, Gros Grain, and Gros Italien, one of the most delicate new shades, some only suited to evening dress, such as fleur de pèche, jonquille cœur de melon, the exact shade of the inside of a melon; lanvette, dahlia, ruby, and primrose, a rich creamy tint, suggestive of the cream gathered in Alderay daines only; a new cur and purple, so light, as scarcely to be changed from white, until held up in folds, and then perfectly exquisite, the colors more delicate than any we have ever seen.

In silks suitable for street dress, we have droquet sans envers, or double-faced; the corduroy, one of the standard silks; the raye, that is, striped down, chintes, checks of equal and unequal sizes, and silks simply corded in every available shade of brown, mode, purple, and other colors. We are often asked "are black silks worn this season?" Yes, always worn, very much for street dress, or as a useful home dress, also in costly dinner toilet, ranging from the soft, light apron silk, as ladies call it, from $1 12 to the magnificent moiré, plain or with a superb figure pattern in satin, which has all the effect of velvet by gaslight; as, for instance, a wreath of foxgloves and foliage the natural size, surrounding the hem of the dress, and smaller bunches of the same flower repeated as a figure through the dress itself. These range from $4 to $5 the yard.

One of the newest styles of pattern silks, or robe dresses, is a taud'or, embroidered in black to imitate a sash, which extends half way down the skirt, with heavily fringed ends. The embroidery is an exact imitation of gypure lace. The same design is repeated on the waist and sleeves in a narrower width. Conspicuous among the newest ideas is a large plaid, having the effect of brown, black, and Magenta ribbons, of the richest corded taffeta, four or five inches in width, and thrown across each other with careless weaving of outline. Large plaids are so old as to honey now, but they will only be in the richest materials as yet.

And now we have arrived at the superb brocades, rivalling, or outdoing those of our grandmothers. Delicate grounds of mode, with rich figures in white and a clear brown, usually a flower group, with abundant foliage, rather than the stiff bouquet of roses or pansies lately in vogue. Mauve grounds with rich deep purple and black standing in relief, deep blue with a tiny fretwork of silver powdering the surface, and many other combinations that mock the dulness of the pen.

But we must not pass in silence the rich chintés and moirés that, lovely as they are by the light of day, are richer still in the golden artificial light of the chandelier, by which alone they will be worn. The softest fleur de pèche, the most golden maize, the loveliest amber grounds, with vines and bunches of flowering plants trailed over them, breaking into bloom here and there, in colors that rival the pencil of nature, while bright tinted butterflies and humming-birds of the richest plumage hover over the bending blossoms. Then the robe pyramidale, of amber moiré, the pattern forming a festoon of the richest chinté flowers on each breadth. It is impossible to give the rich yet delicate effect of these wonders of the loom, or of a robe richer still, the Princess Alice, which is a heavy white taffeta, thickly sown with tiny rose-buds of velvet in the most natural hues, perfect buds, scattered leaves, and buds snapped from the stem.

We pass now to cotton goods. The time has been when such a transition would have been thought a step from the sublime to the ridiculous. But every one knows that, at least as far as price is concerned, there is nothing ridiculous about cotton goods now.

We find ourselves first among the Percales, suitable for nursery wear, as well as for shirting. Some are quite original in design. For instance, a white ground with tiny watches of various colors scattered over it, another with pitchers arranged to form figures, others seemingly covered with small dots, but, upon examination, these dots are in some cases small Arabic figures, and in others letters. Others again have de-re-mi-fa arranged in diamond form. The more expensive Percales have the loveliest pearl, mode, and white grounds, with the daintiest figures imaginable. The Lowell calicoes must not be overlooked, for never have they been produced in such perfection as this year. In previous seasons they have been very nice, common, cheap goods, not remarkable for beauty. But this season they are equal to any English prints, and closely resemble small figured delaines. The grounds are of the most approved shades of stone, drab, mode, cuir, and pale green, covered with tiny figures in brilliant and good colors.

The thinner goods, such as lawns and organdies, though beautiful and delicate in design, differ very little from those of previous seasons. Among the new goods we find white grounds, with fine cross bars or stripes of black, and brilliant figures at intervals. Then there are clouded or chânée grounds, with rose-buds and geometrical figures; also large cross bars, three or four inches wide, with large flowers, such as passion-flowers, thrown carelessly over them; also fancy bars forming diamonds, with bouquets of roses and pansies; also large diamonds three inches wide, for instance, of a brown, the ground-work being gray chânée, and in the centre of each diamond a linked square of two shades of brown.

The Grecque figure prevails in all classes of goods, and is one of the prettiest designs.

For travelling wear, we have alpacas, valencias, poplins, toile de Saxe, and Orleans. These are in fine and large cross bars, stripes, broché figures, and Grecques. The colors are light cuir, Havanne, every possible shade of mode, buff, or Nankin (which last will be one of the most approved colors for whole suits), California brown, and other shades. The buff, if not plain, is generally figured or barred with purple or black, the latter the more effective. The newest material for travelling is the toile Nankin, a mixed cloth, unfigured, very serviceable, and generally of brown or gray color.

For children's wear we have the light valencias, poplins, and toile de Saxe, of mode or white grounds, figured or cross-barred with the most lovely colors, or plaided in the most beautiful spring combinations.

The next question most generally asked is, "How are dresses made up?" Our authority on that subject is Mrs. Ellis, of 550 Broadway. She is making a number of gored dresses, with jet frog buttons down the front; wrappers to imitate a vest and Zouave, trimmed with broché trimming; also for dinner or evening-dress, the universally worn Spanish jacket, very dressy and youthful, though nothing new; for if our readers will refer to the August plate, 1862 (Fig. 3), they will see a very good representation of it. Of course it is varied in style, some being made with deep points, and to lace both back and front; others with jockeys at the back, and epaulettes on the shoulders. We frequently see wide sashes with two loops falling from under the deep point at the back. The trimmings are generally quilled ribbon or silk, bugle trimming, also quillings or puffs of illusion.

These waists are made of every shade of silk and velvet, and will we think be the style for summer dresses. The under waists and long sleeves are generally of puffed illusion or muslin, sometimes separated by a beading, through which is run a black velvet. White silk is sometimes substituted for the illusion, when delicate health will not allow much exposure of the neck and arms.

A very pretty dress from Mrs. Ellis's establishment was a black silk, made with crescents of the silk trimmed with bugle trimming, arranged round the skirt and up the front, en tunique. The corsage was made with a jockey, and trimmed to match the skirt. Jockeys at the back and points four inches long in front, and elbow sleeves, and also the Pompadour, or square necked dresses will be worn. The skirts are exceedingly long, and cut with a train, that is, the breadths are even at the waist, but sloped very much at the lower end of the dress. Insertions of black lace over white silk, and true lovers' knots braided in ribbons, are among the prettiest styles. Dresses are also waved on the edge of the skirt, and trimmed with a narrow fluted braid. We also noticed that the dresses of this tasteful modiste were faced with a kind of leather (such as is used for embroidery), which must certainly be a very great protection to them. Another new idea is to have the sash fastened to the dress under the arms, and from thence it falls, and is tied carelessly in a knot half way down the skirt.

We spoke in our last Chat of powdered heads, and new styles of hair-dressing. The hair is still arranged very high, and headdresses are daily becoming more eccentric. For instance, coronets of velvet spotted over with scarabees, or beetles of a brownish red color, spotted with gold and emerald, producing a brilliant effect. A very stylish headdress was of white feathers, with a bow of Azurine blue velvet, on which a butterfly was beautifully poised.

We cannot close without saying a few words about the exquisite creations at Mme. Tilman's, 148 east Ninth Street, late 712 Broadway. Among the beautiful flowers, perfect gems of art, so perfect indeed that one bends down almost involuntarily to catch their fragrance, we see humming-birds, butterflies, and all kinds of brilliant winged insects lighting or seemingly fitting among the beautiful exotics. The birds and butterflies are of course perfect, being the real birds and insects preserved and mounted. The flowers are all arranged in the coronet form, some merely the coronet mounted on a wire, or band of velvet, others with a spray or tuft of flowers directly at the back; while another style which pleased us greatly, both for its simplicity and its exact representation of nature, had a spray and stem of the white locust, forming a coronet, and at the side was another spray of the same pattern falling gracefully over the neck.

Humming-birds and butterflies are also the novelties for bonnets, and we regret that our space will allow us to describe but one of the artistic Parisian bijoux from Mme. Tilman's establishment. This was of white crape, with illusion cape veiled with black lace. At one side was posed a tiny bird's-nest, with a humming-bird lighting upon it. This was partially concealed among feathery grasses. The inside trimming was in the form of a coronet, composed of a variety of mosses intermingled with pink roses. In other bonnets, the birds were arranged in the inside, and looked as if just darting into the lovely blossoms. We would gladly linger over these charming novelties, but space fails us, and we take our leave for this month.

The first system of the musical score for 'ADIEU.' consists of three staves: a vocal line in treble clef with a key signature of one flat and a common time signature, and a piano accompaniment in grand staff (treble and bass clefs). The lyrics 'care. Re - ceive this part - ing sigh, Be-' are written below the vocal line. The piano accompaniment features a steady eighth-note pattern in the right hand and a more active bass line in the left hand.

THE VEGA.

[From the establishment of G. BRODIE, 51 Canal Street, New York. Drawn by L. T. VOIGT, from actual articles of costume.]

The above illustration will remind our fair friends of the modes which ruled some decade of years ago—this present style consisting of a long scarf form, with a flounce plaited upon it for a skirt. Two narrow frills, en suite, ornament the top and head the skirt. These are graced with a button at the upper portion of each facing plait, and the whole series are edged with narrow guipure lace. The tabs are circular, and flounced.

A more ample garment of the talma shape is a great beauty also. It is to say, a circular. At each shoulder one broad plait, and a very narrow one at either side is set on: then start from the apex of the shoulder, the points being arranged to form a  $\Lambda$  head, the tops of which are ornamented with brandebourgs, or drop tassels. The fronts and bottom are richly embroidered.

PHILADELPHIA, MAY, 1863.

A MORNING AT STEWART'S.

BY ALICE B. HAYES.

On the afternoon of a dull November day, in the late dull autumn, we were purchasing some trifle at one of the thronged counters at Stewart's, when we accidentally heard that it was the last week "down town."

Being of the constant conservative temperament that ever deprecates change, whether it is of an article of furniture, a boot maker, or a place of residence, we strolled with a lingering regret, almost amounting to sadness, through those noble saloons for "the last time," calling up the changes that had passed our individual life, since our first bewildered glimpse as a school-girl fresh from the country, of their gay and animated scenes—let us be candid, sixteen years ago!—and the social transition that called for the meditated removal. Then, "Stewart's," opposite the Park, was in the centre of the retail trade; above Canal was up town for general shopping purposes. Now, no one goes below, and the great "quarter"—in which this thronged emporium of spring and fall shoppers stands—is given up, as is "the city," in London to the roar of heavy traffic, and the whirl of vast commercial transactions. They have driven the butterflies from the haunts of trade; the gay equipages and flashing harness give place to the solid dray, or the rattling express; boxes encumber the sidewalk, so lately echoing to the patter of pretty feet, and the light toilets of our "lilies of the field" cease to brighten the anxious, care-worn crowd that throng the public ways. Shall we live to see "below Fourteenth" voted out of reach, and a new Stewart's arise floating Central Park?

On the morning of Nov. 10th, a sunshiny day at last, after a week of storm and English fog, we drove past the deserted palace, which must have waked wondering that morning to its echoing desolation. Groups of surprised and disconcerted looking females patrolled the steps, tried the various entrances, and at last discovered, from the huge placards, that this was a feminine Stewart's no longer. Henceforth it was given over to unpicturesque buyers of the wholesale.

We designed then, and have recently put into execution, an intention of visiting the new establishment for the benefit of our distant readers who have not an opportunity of seeing with their own eyes. They may congratulate themselves on being saved some physical fatigue, if our pen can photograph its scenes so as to give them some idea of "up town Stewart's."

The building itself, like its predecessor, is of white marble, and looms up purely at the angle of Broadway, occupied by Grace Church, between Ninth and Tenth Streets. It does not yet occupy the whole block, that is left for the hereafter. We will enter on Ninth Street, for this corner is built round, and then have a gradual interior view. We find ourselves instantly in the midst of business. This entrance or lobby is occupied by the package department, where many busy hands are checking, tossing and bearing off for delivery the hundreds of neatly enveloped parcels, stamped, signed, countersigned, and registered to prevent mistakes, to their various places of destination: a most important and beautifully regulated department, and one where great strictness and accuracy are of necessity required, when the whole enormous trade is "retail."

A wide staircase, with a neat mahogany balustrade, apparently ascends to the top of the building from this entrance; but we are going below, and descending one flight, come upon a room where great brown rolls of oilcloth, twenty, thirty, and forty feet long, are piled like rows of pipes or leaders near an aqueduct terminus; past these, and we enter the wide carpet room, below the level of the busy street, yet as finely lighted on a sunny day as though intended for the sale of silks or satins. How is this managed?

You noticed a pavement of glass running all around the building as you stepped from the sidewalk; knobs of little glass, but so securely set in its close iron framing, and so thickly moulded, that you trod on it as securely as if it had been stone. That is the transparent roof of the recess or gallery that surrounds the room, and from it comes this soft clear daylight; no windows you perceive, unless these great slabs of the same substance underfoot, in the shape of huge windows, occurring at regular intervals beneath the glass roofing, can be called so. They are, indeed, and light a floor still lower, thirty feet under ground, where carpets are stored until required in this the salesroom devoted to them exclusively. Carpets of every degree are spread out upon the wide floor, or ranged in regular order against the wall; from the cotton and woollen plaids, still found upon the floors of the farmer's cheerful sitting-room, to the gorgeous velvet medallions, thick sewn with tropical blossoming, or reproduced from the bewildering lenses of the kaleidoscope, in all their phantasy of form and richness of coloring. Here, by an ingenious contrivance, like the leaves of a huge volume slowly turning, we can choose conveniently from the cumbersome rolls of oilcloth just past; there, as we make the circuit of the room, and mark its depth and breadth, and the graceful Corinthian columns of iron, pure in color as marble, that bear up the fearful weight above them, are piled the luxurious hassocks, on which the rich man kneels to pray in Grace Church yonder; the soft Persian mats that muffle the footfalls of his chamber, or the velvet rugs on which bask "dogs and game," or an antlered deer couchant, in the brilliant coloring of life, before his glowing grates.

We are passing on to the staircase on the Tenth Street side, and conveniently near it is a neatly decorated ladies' dressing room of good dimensions, a most admirable thought! of which we make special mention.

Emerging from this staircase, we come at once upon the busy scene. This is the main saloon, entered directly from the street, and lighted on all sides by walls of plate-glass windows, the light tempered by plain blue shades. No array of laces, and shawls, and silks are displayed temptingly before them, as in other establishments.

"Le bon vin Needs no sign."

Not even a tendrill of enticement is outwardly put forth here.

At first the hum, the stir, the flashing, changing crowd, prevents anything like a survey in detail; but presently we come to see that there are four departments, or parallel ranges of low shelves, that separate but do not divide the wide space which occupies all the floor, save that one division towards Ninth Street, against which the principal staircase is placed. These divisions are cut in two by a central aisle, running from Tenth towards Ninth Street, and are entered by doors from Broadway fronting them. As we come from the carpet room, we are in the first division, with a long scarlet-covered oval counter directly before us, the glove department. We know it to our cost. We have worn no other gloves but Alexandre's since those schoolgirl days, and Stewart monopolizes his manufacture. Let us acknowledge our one feminine extravagance—a costly self-indulgence with gloves at $1 50 (they were seventy-five cents when we made our first investment in a pair for examination day), and those of the plainest. "Stitched backs" are $1 60; thanks to the rates of foreign exchange! We are not surprised at being told that the business of this counter alone is $300,000 yearly. The other half of the first division is occupied by muslin and cambric embroidered lingerie of all descriptions, and laces, from the neat Valenciennes collar at $2 50, to the Brussels points (shawls) at $100, or $1000, as required.

In the second division we find, on the right as you enter from Broadway, merinoes and all wool goods; opposite are reps, poplins, and fancy fabrics in woollen and cotton, woollen and silk, etc. Beyond the dividing aisle, cheaper mixed fabrics; and opposite them again, one side of the hollow square, which incloses the cashier's desk, divided, yet not concealed from the crowd by a particularly light and graceful screen of iron filagree, painted white. Here is another kindly convenience for ladies—a desk where an order, a note, an address, or a despatch may be written at ease, and intruding upon the time and attention of none. There is a corresponding one on the opposite side of the inclosure.

And here "cash boys most do congregate," with pencils and currency; tricks and jokes—such as serve to keep these ubiquitous juveniles in good spirits. Here each purchase is remeasured, and each check certified to prevent mistakes, or fancied ones. This is the main artery of the great "cash" system, for which Stewart's is distinguished. In these days six months' accounts are out of date; a thing of the past, and the Reade Street dynasty. Bordering this desk, or series of desks, on the inner side, in the third division, we have the silk department, under the immediate care of an untiring and gentlemanly guide through these unaccustomed labyrinths. And here we are dazzled by a display of delicate and gorgeous fabrics, which never meet the eye of a passing, transient customer, reserved for the occupants of cushioned equipages, which would save them from contact with the dust, and whose owners count their incomes by tens of thousands. Some of these could only be seen in their full perfection by the aid of artificial light, under which they are intended to be worn. They were shown to us in a separate apartment, from which the daylight is entirely excluded, lighted brilliantly by jets of gas, and arranged for an effective display of drapery. But we must not trench on the borders of the "fashion chitchat," wherein all these beauties will be found in detail, but pass around the several counters of this department, to which the upper end of two divisions is assigned, not failing to notice "the remnant counter"—dear to a woman's heart, be she rich or poor, for the love of bargains is inherent with the sex.

A similar arrangement is noticeable in the department of woollens; and thus the stock is kept "clear," and customers are made happy.

Opposite the first portion of the silk department is the stock of cotton goods—muslins, cambrics, etc.; and adjoining it, just at the present season, the popular stock of the house-keeping department; that is, table linen, etc., of moderate prices, in large demand. Passing through to the one remaining division, also entered from Broadway, we find cloths or materials for the wear of men and boys opposite to a general gentlemen's furnishing department, and at the other end, a long range of gentlemen's hosiery on one side, and ladies' on the other.

To return to the staircase rising from the last division; it is broad, with shallow steps and a plain but handsome balustrade. On the landing, half way up, we pause for a coup d'œil of the busy sparkling scene below. Now we have a full view of the saloon itself; the light and tasteful frescoes on wall and ceiling; the gilded chandeliers with grand glass globes; the graceful Corinthian columns, all of iron, that support the floor above; the innumerable plate-glass windows, with the pale blue tint pervading the light that painters seek to soften an atmosphere, or tone down color; the gayly dressed, restless, ever-changing throng, like a waving tulip-bed, or the glittering of a kaleidoscope, with an ascending hum that marks a hive of human activity and industry.

The second floor resembles the first in its essential features, save that there are fewer departments and more space. We enter the cloak room, from the staircase where are displayed cloaks of every grade and description, from the street wrap to the delicate cloth or cashmere opera cloaks, of snowy white, crimson lined, and gayly tasselled, that hang in the convenient wardrobes with sliding doors, that line the wall.

Next to this are shawls of lower grades, the neat stella and the comfortable plaid; beyond, in the inner shrine, and exposed to the best light, those marvels of Eastern industry, and Western expenditure, camels' hair shawls and scarfs. Here are displayed to our delighted eyes the graceful combinations of the French looms, and the prouder glories of the "real India," the cost commencing in price at $100 and reaching a climax in this heavy drapery of quaint design valued at $2000. Here we longed to share our morning's experience with other friends, who have an instinctive love for shawls as well as bargains; here we craved, with the last trace of feminine malice, to prove to Mrs. White that her boasted India was only French, and to show Mrs. Black, who had strained her allowance and curtailed her children's winter wardrobes for her one hundred and fifty dollar shawl, how coarse and inferior it was after all, by the side of five and seven hundred dollar cashmeres. How much better it would have been, considering her own position and her husband's means, to have satisfied herself with one of those soft graceful French cashmeres at $50, either that bride-like white centre with its deep gray and black border, or this rich combination of gold and green, and brown and scarlet, in such wondrous toning and perfect harmony, leaving to Mrs. Smith and Jones, whose husbands are mining gold in Wall Street or California, the triumph duly belonging to an immoderate unstinted income.

Their fairy like frostings of lace draperies indicate an approach to the upholstery, but first we have furs, ermine, sable, mink and Siberian gray, then we come upon the heavier stuffs for curtains, the reps, drougets, the satin laine, the pure satin, the rich brocade, and the wonderful "cloth of gold," produced from its hidden niche, of real bullion garlanded with silken blossoms such as we find in "kings' houses," or the Fifth Avenue and Walnut Street palaces of the ladies just alluded to. Only $50 a yard! and how many yards to a lounge, a sofa, or fauteuil! There is a sense of freshness and simplicity in the neat furniture chintzes, and twilled stripes for covers, in the immediate neighborhood, and we pass to the housekeeping department beyond, with its dainty wealth of table damask and luxurious blankets, or the plainer grades of every article. Flannels opposite. And now we beg as an especial favor, since we have reviewed this large display of selections for the daily wants of domestic life, that we may be admitted to the great work rooms we have heard exist above us, yet so silent and secluded in their operations that not one in ten of the "oldest customers" guesses their existence.

Our amiable conductor kindly procures for us the desired permission, and leads to the story above, which is occupied as a store-room for the reserved stock, to the next, where we enter a vestibule, or long narrow apartment, where are tables, a stove surrounded by irons required in pressing, and a flock of girls and women busily engaged in that employment. Here, also, are piles of finished garments, cloaks, sacques, etc. ready for the early trade; beyond they are stamping the braiding patterns with which they are to be ornamented. Passing through, we enter the finest work-room we have ever yet seen; and in our vocation and desire to see the employment of working women, we have visited some of the largest in New York. This is neither "under ground" nor in "an attic," but a saloon, spacious and neat enough for a court ball, occupying the entire space covered by the various departments below, and lighted by windows the same size, with no check to perfect ventilation. Here are ranged work-tables, seating from two hundred and fifty to five hundred girls, as the work demands. Our visit was paid in the "dull season," yet the two hundred and fifty grouped over their work under the superintendence of a careful matron, was no insignificant sight.

Another staircase still—the fifth we have ascended—and a busier, more picturesque scene still, presents itself. In the long room or vestibule are piled bales of black rope, the curled hair, which is to be used in the manufacture of mattresses, like those finished piles; here are women and girls busy in unravelling it; there are great waves and heaps of the picked hair darkening the room—a sight more picturesque than alluring; so we hasten to the light, cheerful saloon beyond, full of work-tables, full of busy groups, of great wicker crates moved on wheels, and piled with orders for house or steamship furnishing—from blankets to kitchen towels. Here the hum of sewing machines where they are hemmed; they are marked yonder; they are reconsigned to a wicker crate again, ready for delivery and use. One may safely say hundreds of dozens of sheets, pillow-cases, towels and napkins, dozens of blankets, counterpanes, etc., pass through these busy hands in a day. There are the costly curtains of the house this order is being executed for; here the carpets, from the Brussels ticketed "Mr. Smith, Fifth Avenue, front basement," to the plain ingrain, "Smith, fifth story, rear hall bedroom;" it is the cook's, probably—and a very good carpet she is to have!

We are certainly lifted "above the world" for once in our mortal life; face to face and on a level with the delicate carving of Grace Church upper spire. Mark the belfries and spires around; the quaint chimney tops; the flat, pointed, square-peaked, gable-roofed houses below; the thread-like openings among them, which are streets and avenues; the jostling crowd of houses stretching out for miles beyond the limit of the eye; the hum of eager life from the far off noisy street; then look back to the busy throng of workers around you; think of the reservoirs of material below; the great warehouse that pours its tide of fabrics and manufactures into this broad outlet; here are the procurers, the producers; there all around you lie the homes of the consumers of this vast centre of industry; even out to the glittering thread of silver that marks the ocean, bearing the floating transient houses "Stewart's" has furnished!

We moralize; it is a sign of advancing age, and one is not ready to confess that there is a point, or a moral in a morning spent amid the trifles that go to make up the sum of household necessities and embellishments; but we thought, as we came back leisurely through the scenes we have attempted to describe, how harmonious was their arrangement, and how those err who break the harmony of social life by vain and ambitious longings for elegancies beyond their stations, and crowd into "a department" where they find only heart-burnings and mali-dious sarcasms for their straining after dress and equipage.

Let us be content, my sisters, with our neat muslins and our simple merinoes, and admire Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Jones in their morbids and cashmeres. Let us repress the bitter slander of "extravagance" and "worldliness" when we speak of them. It is not extravagance for them, but proper expenditure of ample means; and if it could but be realized, you have had far more pleasure and enjoyment in the serviceable black silk, so neat, so becoming, that hangs now in your wardrobe, than they have realized from the costly brocade, or the dainty lace, that they purchased the morning you so envied them. "Each in their own sphere, and happiness to each."

A SUNSET VISION.

BY JULIA.

ONE time, in the autumn's shawl,

When the leaves lay crisp and dead,
And the evening light faintly
On the hills tips and near,

I walked with a faded maiden
In the lam and shadowy wood,
Where the oak and maple softly
In silent grandeur stood.

And her voice was sweet and silver,
While her laughter, free and wild,
Gushed forth from her sunlike music
From the tips of a smooch and curl.

At length her feet grew weary
As the shadows dim and dead
Across the meadows slowly,
And up the dark allèd.

And we sank on a bed of mosses,
While I vainly tried to trace
The holy thoughts appearing
From her white, unsmiled, sweet face.

After the purple distance,
From the mountain's snow descent,
Above the lake's still bosom,
The light clouds came and went.

The last gleam faintly trembled
On the verge of heaven, and then
A violet mist had been Lay where the sun had been.

No breeze fell on its stillness,
While its tideless billows grew
Up, up to the firmament,
And mingled with the blue.

Then the clouds like sunset islands,
Crept slowly back to shore,
And softly sank to landward
Just where the light had lain.

And the solemn silence deepened
With a power that might be felt,
Till, before its mighty presence
My soul in worship knelt.

Then her laughing eyes at a moment
Like the face of summer's sun,
And her parted lips devoutly
Essayed to speak a word.

And her small hands slowly raised,
Casp'd a day round my head,
And I felt that thril'ing presence
Stand a foot or more like a cloud.

And when the last gleam faded,
My heart in transport said,
That it felt a death-like glory
Around her radiant head.

And now the dream is o'er,
I feel a quickening thrill,
When the vision of that evening
Comes o'er me calm and still.

For when my eye is clearest,
My heart is full of tears,
And a vague, uncertain whisper
Flutters at the base of years.

And I think of ever's coming
When I shall see her face,
The fold of her bright tress
With in my dream's space.

The stars will smile on sweetly
From their shores of belted blue,
But their light will bring no answer
The eyes I once looked through.

And when with throbbing temples
And quivering pulse I stand,
I shall miss the cooling presence
Of one little loving hand.

My life is like the sea winds,
My love that purple sun,
Which like those winds returning,
Flows backward silently.

Yet I know that misty ocean
Leads toward a golden shore,
Where her bright, smiling answer
And my tears shall fall no more.

COURTESY AT HOME.—Almost any one can be courteous in a neighbor's house. If anything goes wrong, or is out of time, or is disagreeable there, it is made the best of, not the worst; even efforts are made to excuse it, and to show it is not felt; it is attributed to accident, not to design; and this is not only easy but natural in the house of a friend. I will not, therefore, believe that what is so natural in the house of another, is impossible at home, but maintain, without fear, that all the courtesies of social life may be upheld in domestic society. A husband as willing to be pleased at home as he is anxious to be pleased in a neighbor's house, and a wife as intent on making things comfortable every day, to her family, as on set days to her guests, could not fail to make home happy.

ROXY CROFT.

NESTLED among the hills of New England, yet in these days of locomotion not far distant from the great metropolis, is the little town of Oakfield. To a stranger entering the village, the only conspicuous objects are the church and meeting-house, as still designated, in spite of the remonstrances of the younger portion of the community, who consider the latter appellation, however honored in former times, altogether too primitive for these days. The edifices stand on the brow of a hill, facing each other; and the church, with its lofty spire, its glistening coat of white, and strikingly green blinds, looks down most benignantly upon its inferior neighbor, whose steeple, surmounted by a huge gilded cock, bearing upon its sides the impress of British bullets, was the wonder and admiration of my childish eyes. As a proof that the benevolence of the church was not confined to appearances, it has repeatedly relieved its less prosperous rival of pecuniary difficulties, events which have caused the oldest inhabitants to affirm they distinctly remembered when the balance of power was reversed, and the cock crowed most lustily over the feeble demonstrations of the infant church, which, but for an unseen Power, had been silenced forever. But those days were gone by, and the good-natured people wisely and generously determined to forget past grievances.

A little south of the church formerly stood the mansion of Miss Celia Croft, sole survivor of the family of old Doctor Croft, as she invariably announced herself. The old Doctor, after a pilgrimage of ninety-nine years, whose available portion was wholly absorbed in hoarding up filthy lucre, reluctantly "shuffled off this mortal coil," leaving an ample fortune to his "sole survivor," with a strict injunction she should not allow herself to be defrauded of it by her neighbors—advice, however, little needed, for the mantle of avarice, which for three successive generations had "waxed not old," fell upon shoulders early trained to wear it. Together with her parent's avaricious disposition, she had also inherited an inveterate dislike to children; and yet, by a strange contrariety, she had picked up, none knew where, a poor orphan girl, to relieve her solitude and minister to her necessities; but upon whom she wreaked all her ill-humor.

In close proximity to Miss Croft lived the family of Mr. Jones, not less noted for their benevolence than was their neighbor for its opposite quality; farther down the street, and just within sight of Miss Croft's front windows, stood the mansion of Esquire Wentworth, which, having been destitute of a mistress for more than a year, had become an object of special interest to the eyes of Miss Celia; and several times a day would she put on her spectacles, and trip from the back sitting-room to her parlor window, as if to assure her vision that there was in reality an anchorage ground for her golden hopes.

"Come in, Roxy!" said Miss Celia, in her shrillest tone, one frosty morning, as she tapped on the window-pane, and at the same time beckoning with her finger to the little shivering figure, who stood with broom in hand on the door-steps. "Hav'n't I told you repeatedly when I send you to sweep off my steps, never to speak to any one passing? Answer me, you little vixen!" exclaimed her mistress, seizing her roughly by the shoulder.

"Oh, Miss Croft!" said the frightened child, "I did not mean to do it; but Squire Wentworth called me to the gate, and asked if you were at home; he told me to say he would call in this afternoon or evening, for he wished to see you on special business."

"Oh! he wishes to see me on business, does he?" Her hand suddenly relaxing its gripe, and an evident smile of satisfaction playing over her features. "Very well, Roxy! as Squire Wentworth called you, I shall not punish you this time; but mind you don't disobey me again. Now go to your work; wash the dishes, scour the knives bright as you can, and then come and I'll tell you what next to do. I don't believe in a girl's being idle! Satan always finds mischief for idle hands." So with this invariable finale to all her instructions, Roxy retreated, leaving Miss Celia to herself and her reflections.

"So he wishes to see me on business, does he?" soliloquized our heroine. "I should like to know for a certainty upon what business; but then it does not require much shrewdness to conjecture. Poor man! how I pity him! How gladly would I pour consolation into his wounded heart! How joyfully would I share his griefs and cheer his solitude! And then, those harum scarum girls of his are sadly in need of a mother's oversight! Now, who is there better adapted to this responsible situation than the daughter of old Doctor Croft? Surely no one! But if ever I am mistress of that house, won't I teach those girls better manners! I'll very soon let them know that Mrs. Celia Wentworth is not a woman to be despised or ridiculed!"

So absorbed was Miss Celia in her meditations, that she became no less oblivious to the flight of time, than to her own actual condition. Roxy, having completed her task, had twice knocked at her door for orders; but receiving no answer, had crept cautiously back to the kitchen. Another hour passed; and still was she deafly absorbed in arranging and remodeling the habitation of which she, in imagination, had been installed mistress for more than six months. And now those girls, to whom she had so long owed a grudge, were to be disciplined; and she was actually standing erect on the floor, haranguing Miss Alice, the most guilty of the lawless trio, when the clock struck loud and clear the hour of twelve. At which Roxy, with dilated eyes, rushed in, imagining from the unusual respite to her labors, that something fearful had befallen her mistress. But no! there she stood safe and sound, but with compressed lips and upraised hand, which dealt a succession of violent blows upon the luckless head that moment presenting itself.

"You saucy little brat! Hav'n't I told you repeatedly never to enter this room without knocking? I'll teach you to know your place!"

"Oh, please don't, ma'am. I did knock at the door twice; but you didn't answer, and I thought you were busy, or perhaps asleep, and so—"

"Asleep! you little wretch! You know I never sleep in the daytime. Since you came here I've had something else to do. So don't repeat that lie."

"Oh, Miss Croft!" said the terrified child, "it was so still in here I thought something had happened. I thought!—I thought perhaps you had a fit."

"A fit!" fairly shrieked Miss Croft. "Who ever said I had a fit?"

"Why, I heard Miss Alice say you had one once, and—"

"Go on child, go on—tell me every word she said; if you don't you'll be sorry."

"Well, she said, ma'am, she was in hopes 'twould have made you better; but she didn't see that it had."

"There, take that for your impudence and for listening to her"—giving her a severe blow—"and never let me hear you repeating her falsehoods again. Now be off; split up some kindlings, for I am going to have a fire put in the front room this afternoon—I do wish I knew exactly when the Squire would come. But if I don't have the fire kindled early, he'll be sure to come when I'm unprepared for him; and if I have it lighted this afternoon, he won't be likely to come till evening, and then all that wood will be consumed for nothing. With all my economy I find it impossible to get along without great waste. Roxy," said she, looking up, "what on earth are you standing there for? I'm not talking to you—hurry and get your kindlings, and I'll run into Mr. Jones's yard and borrow an armful of hard wood from his pile, and that will last for the evening. Come, be off with yourself."

Roxy disappeared on her errand.

Forthwith the fire was lighted; but not without many precautions against its burning too briskly. Miss Croft arrayed herself in her second best dress of snuff-colored merino, which, having with commendable prudence been turned inside out, upside down, and back-side in front, was pronounced by its owner fully equal to a new one. A black lace cap of ancient device, lavishly trimmed with pink ribbon, dyed with balsam leaves from the garden, contributed, in her opinion, not a little to the stylishness of her appearance. Her easy-chair and basket of patchwork brought in from the adjoining room, she seated herself most complacently to await the coming of her visitor. As she had sorrowfully predicted, it was not until dusk she heard the well-known sound of the gate latch. Wanting no further proof her guest was at hand, she rushed precipitately into the kitchen, and placed a candle and match within reach of Roxy, giving her strict orders to bring in the light precisely at the hour of six. In a flutter of delight she hastened back to the door, and opening it, exclaimed:

"Ah, Squire Wentworth! How delighted I am to see you! Walk in, walk in, sir! You find me enjoying the twilight all by myself."

The Squire bowing his thanks, modestly entered, and seated himself, utterly unconscious of the imagined import of his visit.

"Do take this arm-chair, and be seated nearer the fire. I fear my room is not as warm as you are accustomed to; but my poor lamented father used to consider hot rooms very unhealthy. Roxy! Roxy!" said she, going to the door, "bring in another stick of wood, and see if you can't make this fire burn more briskly.

Is your general health good, Squire? You appear to have a cold."

"Yes, madam, a slight cold, nothing, however, of any importance."

"Ah! but these slight colds, poor father used to say, ought never to be neglected—they often lead to fatal consequences. I have the receipt for a syrup, which is an infallible cure for one, at least poor father thought so, for he used it with success above fifty years. Poor man! how often he regretted I was a daughter, instead of a son, that he might have taught me his profession. My sex, however, could not prevent my becoming a most skilful nurse; and, I doubt not, poor father owed at least a dozen years of his life to my prescriptions and tender watchfulness. There, Roxy, that is sufficient; the fire will burn now."

"I perceive you are not quite alone," remarked the Squire, as he glanced at the retreating figure—"a child like that affords one company as well as employment."

"I agree with you in thinking they afford employment. This is a poor orphan girl I took entirely out of charity. She is a very peculiar child and a great trial to me. I fear I shall never be able to train her up in the right way. I'm often led to exclaim, Who is sufficient for these things?"

"Very true, Miss Celia; yet, in my view, the cares and anxieties of guardians are more than compensated in anticipating, if not in viewing, the happy result of their labors. If we sow good seed we may reasonably hope for a desirable harvest. True, there are exceptions to such results, but, thank Heaven! they are rare. Some of my happiest hours are those spent with my children; and to mark their mental, moral and physical development is a source of never failing satisfaction."

"I readily believe you, sir; and yet, with all your efforts, you can never supply to them a mother's loss. Those poor girls are constantly on my mind. They have sustained an irreparable loss; and at an age, too, when they most need a mother's oversight. I don't wish to flatter you, Squire; but I must say I never knew three more interesting girls than yours. They have my deepest sympathies," said Miss Celia, taking off her spectacles and wiping her eyes.

"I am fully sensible of my double responsibility, ma'am; and my intention is, to secure the services of some worthy person, who will act as Mentor to them."

"You could not adopt a more judicious course, sir."

"Meanwhile, I shall write to their aunt in Clayton, to come and stay with them, until I can make a more permanent arrangement."

Miss Celia smiled her approbation.

"Do you not sometimes find your solitude wearisome?" continued the Squire.

"Oh very much so! To one endowed with a sympathetic nature like my own, it is a most unnatural mode of life. I have felt it keenly, since poor father's death. But the Crofts being naturally of a literary turn, I am enabled to endure solitude better than most of my sex."

"Well, Miss Celia, you are probably aware that our new minister and his wife are expected here next week, and upon me devolves the duty of providing them a suitable boarding-place. It occurred to me, as your house is so convenient to the church, and you have so many unoccupied apartments, you might be induced to accommodate them."

Poor Miss Celia, thunderstruck at this unlooked for proposition, remained for a moment speechless. "Boarders! boarders!" she at length ejaculated; "who ever heard of a Croft's keeping boarders?"

"Pardon me, if I have offended," said the Squire, marking the sudden change in her countenance.

"Not the least offence," she replied, quickly regaining her composure. "But your proposition is so novel and so unexpected, that I scarcely know how to reply to it."

"Mr. Thorne," continued the Squire, "being the son of an old friend of mine, I feel particularly interested in securing him a pleasant home."

"Of course you do, sir; and I would gladly do all in my power to aid you. I don't mean to live for myself alone, Squire! I am willing to make any sacrifice for the sake of doing good. But you must be conscious that to board a clergyman and his wife will subject me to great inconvenience."

"True, but for which you will be most liberally remunerated."

"That would be quite a consideration with many, but if I consent to take them, it will be entirely from a sense of duty and a desire to gratify my friend."

"Very well, Miss Celia," said the Squire, as he took his leave, "you may consider the matter and give me your earliest decision."

Miss Croft carefully secured the door after her visitor, and proceeded to the kitchen, where, to her utter dismay, she found Roxy fast asleep before the comfortable fire. "Wake up, Roxy! Wake up, you gypsy! Why are you not in bed?"

How dare you sit here, burning out my wood and candles? I believe you are the most provoking child living!" Roxy involuntarily raised her hand to ward off the expected blow. "You needn't try to dodge me, child; I'm not going to whip you, as you deserve; but now mind what I say. You sha'n't eat a morsel to-morrow! What you waste in one way, I'll teach you to save in another. Come, be off to bed."

"Sister Mary!" said Alice Wentworth, as she looked out of the window next morning, "here comes Miss Croft; do promise me you'll be very entertaining, for half an hour at least."

"Why so anxious, sis? I thought you and Miss Croft were not on very good terms."

"Neither are we, nor do I intend to share your disagreeable task; but I have a project in my head which I can't stop now to explain." And out she ran, just as Miss Croft was admitted.

"Here, Uncle Jack," said she, calling to an old negro in the yard, "take this basket and carry it, quick as you can, to Roxy Croft. She won't open the door, if you knock ever so long; for that's against her orders; so you must go directly in; and if you don't see her, you must call to her, and if she isn't locked up somewhere, she'll come to you. Be quick as you can, for Miss Croft is here now, and she must not see you coming out of her house with a basket."

"Yes, Miss, jess so exactly," said Uncle Jack; and off he started on his errand.

Obedying Miss Alice's directions, he entered the house unheralded; and, guided by the sound of a saw, he opened the cellar door, and beheld the object of his search, at the foot of the stairs, vigorously sawing on a stick of wood. "Well! now, if that don't beat all natur!" said he, with a prolonged whistle. "Now do tell, Roxy, if the old gal set ye 'bout this ere work?"

Roxy looked up, and seeing the good-natured face of Uncle Jack, dropped her saw, and hastened to meet him. "Yes, I saw the wood! but we don't burn much; and Miss Croft says it's good exercise for me."

"Well, I'll be hanged, if she ain't too all-fired mean for anything! Roxy, I'll saw that ere wood for ye, the very first chance I git. I've got some feelin', if I am a nigger! But I can't stop a minit now. Here's a basket Miss Alice sent ye; take and empty it quick; for I promised her to be back in less than no time."

"Oh, Uncle Jack, how kind, how good she is!" exclaimed Roxy, peering into the basket. "I never can thank her enough! I didn't expect to eat a mouthful to-day; and here's a real Thanksgiving dinner for me! Chicken pie! cold ham! biscuit! cake! and I don't know what else! Oh, Uncle Jack, she's an angel! I know she is." And the famished child danced about the room in an ecstasy of delight.

"Come, Roxy, you hain't got much time for dancin'. Ef your missus comes in, and ketches me here, you'll have a sorry time on't."

The child, recalled to her senses, hastily seized the basket and ran into the garret to secrete her treasures.

"Uncle Jack," said she, upon returning, "I've been thinking you'd better go through the back gate into Mr. Jones's yard, and out of his gate into the street, for if Miss Croft sees you coming out of ours, she'll ask if you've been here; and then she'll find out all about it, for I can't tell a lie, if it does save me from a beating."

Poor child! fast becoming an adept in artifice; although as yet, she revolted at the idea of uttering a falsehood. Her suggestion proved a fortunate one, for no sooner had Uncle Jack reached neighbor Jones's gate, than he spied Miss Croft about entering her own. She stood and awaited his approach.

"Uncle Jack," said she, "you're the very one I was in search of. The new minister is coming to board with me; and I've got furniture to move, carpets to shake, stoves to set up, and only three days to do it in; and I must have your help."

"Jess so ma'am. I've got an errand down to the Squire's, and if he don't want me, I'll be back right away, ma'am, in less than no time."

Uncle Jack, who deserves a particular introduction to the reader, was considered one of the fixtures of the village, and as indispensable to its inhabitants as the Town Clock, or any other public property. An inveterate habit of whistling betrayed his whereabouts at all hours of the day. It was the first sound that greeted the ear at daybreak; and, for loudness and shrillness, had no competitor. On Sunday, arraying himself in holiday attire, he was invariably at his post in church; where, in harmony with his musical propensities, he held the responsible office of organ-blower. It was here that he first made the acquaintance of Roxy; who, to escape the ridicule of the boys and girls in the gallery, had taken refuge at his side in the organ loft. At the present time he was domiciled in the Squire's carriage house; and, consequently, felt under particular obligations to serve its owner.

At the expiration of the three days, Miss Celia pronounced her arrangements complete.

"Uncle Jack," said she, "you've worked for me now three days."

"Jest exactly so, ma'am."

"And I'm going to pay you well for it. Now, here's a hat poor father used to wear. To be sure it's a little soiled and worn, but 'twill last a long time yet. That hat cost poor father not less than five dollars; but you've been so faithful that I've concluded to let you have it for your work."

Uncle Jack took the old hat, which had once been white, and examined it rather dubiously.

"Dunno, ma'am, as I know exactly what to do with it. The Squire's jest gin me one as good as new."

"Why, then, lay it by, Uncle Jack; you'll want it some time, if you don't want it now."

"Jess so, ma'am; but couldn't you let me have a quarter? I've been out of tobaccer all day, and I was reek 'nin' of buyin' some when you paid me up."

"Well, if you must have tobacco, here's two cents. I can't give you any more. My expenses are very great. Here's Roxy, she eats full as much as a man, and isn't worth a cent to me; so, you see, I am obliged to be very saving."

"I see, ma'am," said Uncle Jack, as he took up the hat and made his exit.

Late, Saturday afternoon, the merry sound of a horn announced the approach of the Oakfield stage—an event which, although occurring three times per week, never failed to produce a commotion. First, old Skilton, the driver, reined his prancing steeds up to the post-office, and handed out the mail-bag; while a group of idlers sauntered out to the stage, and took a survey of the passengers and an inventory of their baggage. Then, gathering up the reins, he was this day seen to drive with an extra flourish around to Miss Crofts, where he deposited a couple of passengers, and no small quantity of luggage. Before night, the intelligence that the new minister had arrived, reached the remotest corner of the town.

The next morning, long before the hour of service arrived, lines of vehicles were seen entering the town in all directions; for people who never entered the sanctuary except on Christmas Eve, now felt it an imperative duty to come, and pronounce upon the merits of the new minister. As the bell began to ring, the villagers issuing from their dwellings swelled the motley throng, until the good old church was filled to its utmost capacity. At last Mr.

and Mrs. Thorne entered, preceded by the sexton, who, passing up the broad aisle, quietly ushered the latter into the "minister's pew," and then conducted his remaining charge to the vestry-room. Meanwhile, Miss Marantha Tufts, who for the last hour had been purposely located in an eligible position, after taking a critical survey of the new comers, looked over to Phete West with a decided nod of approval, and then turned and bestowed a second on Sally Doolittle, who sat a little in her rear. Both met with a hearty response—an occurrence noted with satisfaction by many; for these three individuals were known to be no other than the president, vice-president, and secretary of a clique who, having nothing else to do, had within the last few years taken upon themselves the responsibility of settling and unsettling the minister, ad libitum. Everything had proceeded satisfactorily until Mr. Thorne had finished reading the first hymn; then the profound silence which succeeded revealed a fact before unnoticed, that the choir had deserted their post. In vain Miss Marantha stretched her long neck from side to side in her efforts to spy out the deserters; but her eye fell upon one only, who, to her repeated nods and gesticulations, only returned a vacant stare. At length Mr. Jonathan Vamp arose from his seat, in a remote corner, and broke the uncomfortable silence by giving out, in a shrill, piping voice, the good old tune of "Peterborough."

After several attempts to bring his voice to the proper pitch, he commenced on a key which allowed no one to join him; although, during the singing of the eight verses, two or three modestly made the attempt. As Mr. Thorne gave out no more hymns that day, some people came to the uncharitable conclusion that he did not appreciate Mr. Vamp's musical abilities. But of this Mr. Vamp did not harbor an idea.

At the conclusion of the sermon there was another interchange of approving signals; and Miss Marantha was heard to exclaim loudly, as she passed out of church, that "the sermon was the most evangelical that had ever been preached from that pulpit." To this remark a bevy of "single sisters" as loudly assented. Mr. Simon Quint, who had slept soundly during the entire sermon, not wishing to remain silent, conscientiously remarked that "Mr. Thorne had a head of the finest black hair he ever set eyes on." Even the most cautious of the congregation wore a look of complacency. Mr. and Mrs. Thorne were so overwhelmed with introductions, congratulations, and invitations that they were glad to escape from the crowd, and take refuge in their own quiet apartments.

Six months passed; during which Mr. Thorne and his wife had exchanged calls with all their widely scattered flock, and the great excitement of their first arrival had given place to a corresponding calm.

"What! my little wife in tears!" exclaimed Mr. Thorne, as he abruptly entered the room one day. "Now, tell me," said he, seizing both her little hands, and looking down into her face. "Are you sick or homesick, or has Miss Marantha been giving you another lecture on the duties of a clergyman's wife?"

"Not one of them," replied she, with a faint smile; "but, to tell the truth, I'm in danger of becoming miserable for want of something to do. If I could only write sermons like yourself, I should be the happiest of mortals. But my lack of brains will forever exclude me from the study."

"Well, if my little wife does not aspire to the title of 'Reverend,' like some of her sex, her life may not necessarily be a useless one."

"Oh, you are laughing at me, I see! I do not aspire to titles of any description; nor will my ambition ever lead me beyond my province. I only desire to be useful; in that way alone I feel I shall be happy."

"Yes, I understand you. Your life is a monotonous one—strange I never thought of it before. But my time is so absorbed in official duties, that it has never occurred to me you were not as busy as myself."

"In all our parish visits," continued Mrs. Thorne, "I have never met with a neeedy person; I seem to be as strictly debarred from charitable efforts as from literary ones. I often think I'm the most useless person living."

"Our parish is, indeed, most prosperous; but since you eschew titles, and only desire a field for your charity, I think I can direct you to one, without going from our home."

"What! Do you refer to Roxy? Do you think I can do anything for her?"

"I think you can do much for her. Her little pitiful face haunts me continually; and the shrieks forced upon our ears are enough to drive one distracted."

"Yes, I acknowledge it. Miss Croft has several times apologized for the disturbance. She says Roxy is perfectly incorrigible; that she is in the habit of screaming out of spite when she is not being corrected."

"Roxy's face indicates no such disposition. She looks to me like a little crushed flower, so trodden under, that she hasn't power to raise her head. I don't suppose the child has ever been to school, and, very likely, has never yet been taught to read. If you are willing to devote your evenings to her instruction, you will be conferring upon her a lasting benefit. She is a child susceptible of great improvement."

"If I can obtain Miss Croft's consent, I will do so with all my heart. The plan has often occurred to me; but Miss Croft seems so annoyed, if I express any interest in Roxy, that I've been deterred from mentioning it to her. But I will delay no longer."

"I tell you plainly, Mrs. Thorne, you can't make anything of Roxy if you devote all your time to her. She's just fit for a servant, and nothing else. If you try to teach her, she'll get above her place, and make me more trouble than ever. Why, even now, when she hears the sound of your piano, she begins to sing and dance about the kitchen just as though I were not there: although she understands I never allow anything of the kind about my premises."

"But, my dear Miss Croft," said Mrs. Thorne, persuasively, "I think it's your duty to have her taught to read and write, at least; and as you can't spare her to go to school, I thought you would gladly accept my offer."

"I have no objections to her learning to read and write; but if she can't do it without getting her head filled with notions, she's better off without them. She's a strange child! I can't trust her out of my sight an instant."

"Do promise, Miss Croft, that I may make a trial of her; then, if you find her becoming any more unmanageable for it, I will say nothing farther about teaching her; but I must consult Roxy, too; for, perhaps, she has no desire to be taught."

"No danger of that; she likes anything that will bring her into notice."

"Very well; then you may send her to my room this evening, as soon as she has finished her work; but first, let her put on a clean dress and make herself tidy."

"She hasn't any except her Sunday dress," said Miss Croft, gruffly.

"No matter for that; I'll alter a dress of mine for her, so that she'll have one to wear by Sunday."

"I see plainly, Mrs. Thorne, you're going to ruin that child. I've had a hard task to make her know her place as well as she does."

"Never fear, Miss Croft, of my making her any worse: I trust I shall make her a great deal better." And good Mrs. Thorne, closing the door, ran back to her room to congratulate with her husband on the success of her mission.

At night Roxy appeared at Mrs. Thorne's door arrayed in a clean calico dress, which had once belonged to her robust mistress, but was now adapted to her slight form by a simple shortening of the skirt and sleeves. Mrs. Thorne could scarcely repress a smile at her ludicrous appearance; but she kindly bade her come in and be seated.

"Roxy," said she, "I suppose Miss Croft has told you why I sent for you this evening?"

"No, ma'am," she timidly replied.

"Have you ever been to school?" continued Mrs. Thorne.

"No, ma'am."

"Can you read?"

"I can read a little."

"You have never tried to write?"

"Yes, ma'am," said she, eagerly, "I can make all the letters. I found an old copy-book in the garret where I sleep, and I got Uncle Jack to bring me a nice wide shingle and a piece of chalk, and I've learned to make every one of them."

"How would you like to come and sit with me evenings, and learn to read and write a little better?"

"Oh I should like it so much! But I'm afraid Miss Croft won't let me."

"Yes, Roxy, she's promised to let you come, so long as it doesn't interfere with your work, and you behave well."

"Oh, Mrs. Thorne, I'm afraid then I sha'n't come any more, for I can't please her if I try ever so hard."

"Only do your best," said Mrs. Thorne, encouragingly.

"Yes, ma'am, I shall try to."

"Here's a dress I'm going to give you for your best one. Now stand up by me while I fit it to you. The one you have on you must keep to wear evenings."

"Yes, ma'am, I'll do everything you want me to."

"Have you a book to read in?"

"Yes, ma'am; I've several real nice ones Miss Alice sent me. Oh, Mrs. Thorne, if it hadn't been for her and Uncle Jack, I don't know what I should have done; and now you are going to be my friend too!"

"Yes, Roxy, I'm going to be your friend; and in return, you must try and see how fast you can improve. Now go and bring in your books, and we'll commence with a reading lesson."

Roxy quickly returned with them. And the two became so absorbed in their new duties, that it was not until Mr. Thorne entered from his study that they became aware the evening was drawing to a close.

"Come, Cora," said he, "it's time you had dismissed your pupil; you forget she's obliged to be an early riser."

"True. I had forgotten it; but I must detain her a few moments yet." Mrs. Thorne arose, opened the piano, and seating herself at it called Roxy to her side. "I believe you sing, do you not, Roxy?"

"Sometimes, ma'am," said she, bashfully.

"Can you sing this?" pointing to the Evening Hymn.

Roxy glanced at Mr. Thorne and hesitated.

"You will sing to please me, won't you?" whispered Mrs. Thorne.

Roxy needed no further solicitation, but instantly joined Mrs. Thorne, at first, low and tremulously, but as she gained courage, in a voice so sweet and plaintive as to excite their deepest admiration. At the close of the hymn, Mrs. Thorne dismissed her, cautioning her at the same time against oversleeping in the morning.

"Cora," said Mr. Thorne, as soon as they were left alone, "I think you will find Roxy no ordinary child."

"I am convinced of it," she replied; "and I feel she's worthy of a higher position than she's likely to occupy. Is not her voice a remarkable one?"

"It is, indeed! I could scarcely restrain my admiration while she was singing. But what induced you to ask her to sing?"

"Because the Wentworths have so often spoken to me of her voice. You know they sit in the choir at church; and Roxy, they tell me, stations herself in the organ loft—out of sight, it is true, but not out of hearing."

"Hereafter, I suppose you will take her under your protection?"

"Most assuredly I shall; and I've already commenced preparing a decent suit for her to wear."

"What course do you intend to pursue regarding her studies?"

"That is what I wish to advise with you about. But if I had the entire control of her. I think I should be inclined to give her a musical education. With her natural talent, she could not fail of becoming an accomplished performer; and besides, as a music teacher, she would always obtain a good support."

"If she could have the necessary time for practice, I should advise you to commence with music at once."

"There is no time for it, unless she gets up at daylight and practices until her usual time for rising—that, I fear, would be somewhat annoying to those accustomed to a morning nap."

"For her sake, I am quite willing to forego mine," said Mr. Thorne.

"And I mine," echoed Mrs. Thorne. "And as for Miss Croft, her room is so remote from ours that I don't think she can be in the least disturbed."

So it was finally decided that Roxy should be taught music in addition to the simple English branches.

"How comes on your protégé?" asked Squire Wentworth of Mrs. Thorne, one day.

"Oh, admirably! It is less than a year since I commenced teaching her, and she's made double the progress an ordinary girl would have done."

"You have hit upon an inexhaustible theme," said Mr. Thorne, laughingly. "Mrs. Thorne is so interested in Roxy, that nothing but the fear of Miss Croft prevents her from going into the kitchen to share her domestic duties also."

"But," said Mrs. Thorne, "if you could only witness her ambition, and knew what daily sacrifices she makes to prosecute her studies, you would not wonder at the interest I take in her. Only think, Squire Wentworth, she has never yet failed to rise at daybreak to practice her music lesson. Then, after working hard all day, she studies till late in the evening. I think you will agree with me, that a girl of her age and position, who thus perseveres, is really a prodigy, and justly entitled to the sympathies of every one."

"Most truly; but I must relieve you of a portion of your duties, by sending Savelli to instruct her in music."

"I am very, very grateful to you for an offer so much to her advantage; for her genius in that department merits a teacher superior to myself."

"He will be at my house to-morrow;—shall I send him to you then?"

"She will not be at leisure until evening."

"Very well! then I will arrange to have him come at that time."

"My dear," said Mr. Thorne, "what think you Miss Croft will say to this new arrangement?"

"Oh, nothing at all," said she, archly; "when I tell her it's Squire Wentworth's proposition."

"If there is likely to be any trouble about it, you must refer her to me," said the Squire, blandly, as he took his leave.

"This is a world full of trouble, Miss Croft. I have my trials, and I suppose you have yours," said Miss Mariutha, one day, in a suggestive tone.

"You would think you had trials if you were in my place," sighed Miss Croft. "Have you heard how that book peddler swindled me out of his board bill?"

"Why no! I haven't heard a word about it."

"Well, he came here with a parcel of books to sell. I told him I shouldn't buy any; but he insisted on my looking at them. He said it wouldn't cost anything to do that. So, at last, I sat down and examined them. I found two elegantly bound volumes, that suited me exactly; and in exchange for them, I offered him a razor and lancet for which poor father paid double the price he asked for the books; but he refused everything but cash. As he was preparing to leave, he asked me if I knew of a private family who would board him a couple of weeks. He said he needed quiet as well as rest, and on that account avoided a hotel. I told him, as I had already two boarders, perhaps I would accommodate him, if we could agree upon the terms. Well, we made a bargain without difficulty. He proved to be a very light eater, and agreeable in every respect. After staying nearly a fortnight, he took his books one day, and walked out; and that's the last I've seen of him."

"Why! do tell, if he did? Well it's astonishing to see how wicked people are in these days. They're a great deal worse than they used to be."

"Yes, poor father often made the same remark. Then it's a great undertaking for me to board the minister and his wife. There isn't another one in the parish who would make the sacrifices for them that I do."

"But they say he pays you an enormous price for it."

"Well, it costs me a great deal! Mr. Thorne is an enormous eater; and it's worth a dollar more a week to board him than I had calculated on."

"I'm not surprised to hear it. He always looked to me like a great eater."

"It would astonish you, I am sure, to see him at the table. At breakfast, he always takes four cups of coffee—and you know the size of my cups?—besides eating as much bread and meat as would last me a week."

"Is it possible!" exclaimed Miss Marantha.

"And at dinner, he eats twice as much as at breakfast; and at supper, he devours everything on the table, except a cracker and cup of tea, which Mrs. Thorne takes. Roxy and I don't eat anything at night—we don't consider it healthy."

"Well, it does seem incredible!"

"And takes so little exercise," continued Miss Croft, that's what troubles me. I fear he's inclined to apoplexy; and I've felt it my duty to recommend to him a low diet, and plenty of exercise."

"It was very kind in you, I am sure! What did he say to your advice?"

"He said very little; but I thought he eat rather more afterwards than he did before."

"Strange that he'll be so perverse!"

"I think, too, he's naturally very indolent."

"I don't doubt it," said Miss Marantha. "I have observed he keeps very much in his study."

"Yes! he never allows himself but one day in the week for visiting."

"If he visited his parishioners as often as he should, he wouldn't suffer for want of exercise."

"But how much better still," said Miss Croft, "if he would only take a hoe and work a couple of hours every day in my garden. I've often hinted to him there was plenty to do there; but he never profits by my suggestion."

"That's a very sensible idea; I never thought of it before. But I should think he would be delighted with the charge of your garden."

"No! nothing like work delights him; he has never even chopped a stick of wood for himself, since he came here."

"Is it possible he's so inefficient!"

"Yes! it's a fact."

"Well, Miss Croft, we pay our minister a liberal salary; and we expect him to devote his whole time to us. An energetic man would write two sermons a day, and devote the remainder of the week to visiting the Parish; besides chopping wood or cultivating a garden at 'odd spells.' Deacon Billsby and I have been talking over this matter; and he agrees with me precisely."

"Now, Marantha," said Miss Croft, drawing her chair a little nearer her friend, "I'm telling you confidentially a few of my trials. There's Mrs. Thorne—she has her faults, as well as the rest of us. As she has no business of her own, she seems to think she must attend to other people's. You've heard, I suppose, what a fool she's making of my Roxy?"

"I've only heard she was trying to educate her."

"Well, I promised Mrs. Thorne she might learn her to read and write; but she wasn't long satisfied with that. She went on teaching her everything she could think of, until at last she got that Italian music master to give her lessons on the piano. You know if you give some people 'an inch they'll take an ell.'"

"Yes, Mrs. Thorne looks to me like just such a woman."

"Roxy has no time for study, except she gets up before daylight, and sits up late in the evening; and you don't know what a trial it is to me to see her deprived of her needful rest—girls of her age require a great deal of sleep."

"It must be a dreadful trial to you; can't you put a stop to it?"

"No, not as long as she has Mrs. Thorne to encourage her; but I'll tell you in confidence that I sha'n't board them much longer, just on her account. I can't afford to have my help spoiled in that way."

"I don't blame you in the least," said Marantha. "I think somebody ought to advise them both; and if nobody else does, I believe I shall undertake the task."

Roxy had now reached her fourteenth year. In every respect she had thus far exceeded the most sanguine expectations of her friends. Still, she was like a plant reared in an uncongenial locality. To Mrs. Thorne, as to the warm sunlight, she turned with all her wealth of affection and talent; while in the atmosphere of a tyrannical mistress, the tree of promise displayed but sickly leaves and blighted buds. Her face, once so wan and pitiful, might now, in its rounded outlines, be styled almost beautiful; and in the lithe figure, so neatly clad, the Roxy of old can scarcely be recognized. Her dark, mournful eyes alone remained unchanged; yet even these in the presence of her benefactress seem to forget their habitual expression.

"Roxy," said Mrs. Thorne one evening, as the former entered her room, "Mr. Thorne and myself are going to Boston to-morrow."

"To Boston!" exclaimed Roxy in great dismay. "How long shall you be absent?"

"About a fortnight; but Mr. Thorne will return sooner. I shall not be able to hear your usual recitations this evening; but you may sit here and study if you wish."

Roxy sat down and opened a book. Mrs. Thorne glanced at her, and saw her eyes were filled with tears.

"Why, Roxy," said she, "do you think I'm going so far that I shall never get back again."

"No, ma'am," she sadly replied. "I'm getting very selfish, I know; but I feel I can't live a day without you; and a fortnight seems such a very long time."

"It will soon pass, my child. You must practise every morning while I'm gone, and as much more as Miss Croft will allow. I dare say you will have plenty of leisure when we are away."

Roxy shook her head, doubtfully.

"Mr. Savelli says he can give you but one more lesson, as he is about to leave town."

"He is!" exclaimed she with surprise. "He has never mentioned it to me, though that is not strange; for he seldom speaks except about my lesson. But I'm sorry he is going; for although he looks so stern and sad, I can't help liking him."

"He speaks very flatteringly of your progress and ability; and I am sorry to have him leave us; but Esquire Wentworth will employ another teacher in his place; so that you will not be interrupted in your music."

"You are all too kind, Mrs. Thorne; and I only wish I could do something to show you how grateful I am."

She then resumed her study, but evidently her mind was not upon it; for soon closing the book, she said:

"Mrs. Thorne, has Miss Croft ever told you how I came to live with her?"

"No, Roxy, she has never told me anything about you."

"I thought she had not; and I've felt lately I was doing wrong to keep any secret from you who are so good and kind to me. Hav'n't you sometimes heard her call me a gypsy?"

"Yes; but only when she was scolding you."

"Oh, Mrs. Thorne, do not despise me when I tell you I am one! I almost hate myself for belonging to such a race. I never thought I should tell any one my secret, for I know Miss Croft never has; but I couldn't endure the thought of deceiving you any longer." And Roxy, hiding her face in her hands, burst into an uncontrollable flood of tears.

"Be assured," replied Mrs. Thorne, "that I shall never think the less of you for your origin; as long as your conduct is praiseworthy, you will have my sympathy and affection. Now compose yourself, and tell me your whole story."

"Only one person, I think," continued Roxy, "ever suspected me, and that is Mr. Savelli.

Didn't you notice, the first time he came here, how keenly he looked at me? I was so confused, I would have gladly quit the room, and nothing but the fear of displeasing you prevented me from doing so. As soon as you left us, he said, 'Roxy, you are not an American!' I told him I was; but I think he doubted me, for he looked at me a long time very suspiciously. I think he must have seen me somewhere with the gypsies."

"Very possibly he has. But were not they foreigners?"

"I don't know, ma'am; I never thought though but that they were Americans. When I was between three and four years old, Annita told me, my mother died, and my father died before she ever knew us. I was very sick, too, at that time, and for a long while after; but, finally, I began to get better, and as there was no one who wanted me, she said she coaxed her husband, Pietro, to let her keep me; for she had just lost a child of my age, and was very sad and lonesome."

"Where were you before Annita took you?" asked Mrs. Thorne.

"I don't know, ma'am; I never could remember—I seemed to forget everything that happened before I was sick. The first that I do remember was Annita's taking me to the encampment. Everything seemed so different from what I had seen before, that I could never forget it. I was so weak that I couldn't walk much; so Annita carried me most of the way in her arms. We seemed to go a great distance; then we came to a thick wood. Right in the midst of it was a tent, and a great fire burning on the ground before it, where two women were cooking supper. Close by stood a wagon with a horse tied to it, and ever so many people were lounging about. Annita went right into the tent with me, and they came flocking in to see us. They laughed and talked so loud I was afraid of them; so I got into Annita's lap, and hid my face under her arm. Finally, Pietro came in; when he saw me he was very angry. He didn't expect, he said, Annita was going to bring home such a little skeleton as I was. He told her she must carry me back; but she refused, and then he tried to force me from her; but she held me fast, and I clung to her in such terror that he couldn't separate us. I could never afterward get over my fear of him; and whenever I saw him coming, if Annita wasn't with me, I always ran and hid myself. We stayed here some weeks; then they packed up their things and moved on. Annita and I rode in the wagon with the baggage, while the rest followed on foot. There were eight of us in all. In a few days we came to a large town. Here Pietro and his wife left the company, taking me with them, but not without another dispute about me; for Pietro was determined not to take me any farther. But Annita would not give me up; so we all went on board a ship. I never knew how long we stayed there or where we went, for I fell sick again, and when I got well enough to notice things, we were riding about the country, just as we did before. Whenever we came near a town we would stop, sometimes for several days. Pietro and his wife made baskets, which he sold; while she, taking me by the hand, went from house to house begging and telling fortunes. In this way we got along very well through the summer; but when winter came, I used to suffer very much from the cold, and so often fell sick that I must have been a great trouble to Annita; although she never complained, and always treated me with the greatest kindness. Sometimes Pietro would drink too much, and then he was very cruel to us both. He would steal, too, whenever he had a chance; and once he was put into prison for it. Then they took away our horse and wagon; and Annita and I wandered around the country till they let him out. I lived in this way until I was eight years old. At last, we came to this place. We stayed at night in Uncle Simon Quint's barn. In the morning Annita woke me, and told me, with tears in her eyes, that she'd promised Pietro not to keep me any longer; and she was going out to see if she could find a good home for me. She then went out, leaving me alone, for Pietro had gone before I was up. She didn't get back till noon. She brought a bundle with her, which she opened; and taking out some clean clothes, stripped off the rags that covered me, and put them on me. Then she combed my hair, which hung in long curls over my shoulders, and tying on me a bonnet I had never seen before, we set out together for the village. When we came to the Cross Roads, which you know is just a mile from here, we sat down on the great rock to rest ourselves. Annita then told me she had found a lady who would take me to live with her, where I should have a nice pleasant home, and where I should be a great deal better off than I had ever been with her. But she said, if 'twere not for Pietro, she could never be willing to part with me. I loved Annita; and yet I wasn't sorry to quit my wandering life; for, young as I was, I disliked it, and always envied the well-dressed children I saw in their comfortable homes. While we were sitting there, Annita took a little packet she had concealed about her, and opening it, took out a gold chain with a miniature fastened to it. 'Teresa,' said she, putting it around my neck, 'this is your mother's picture. I've kept it safe from you ever since she died. I hav'n't even let Pietro see it, for fear he would take it from me. Promise me you'll take care of it.' I took the picture in my hand, and as I looked at it, I seemed all at once to remember my mother, as distinctly as though I had seen her but yesterday. 'Oh, Annita!' I cried, 'do tell me something about her.' 'I can't tell you anything,' she said; 'I only know she died and left you a little sickly thing that nobody cared for, and so I took you for my own; but keep the picture, Teresa, it may be of use to you some time.'

"While we were talking, we saw Pietro coming down the road. Annita seized me by the hand, and we hurried on. We were not long in coming to Miss Croft's; for she was the lady I was going to live with. Miss Croft met us at the door. Annita led me in, and throwing her arms around me, kissed me repeatedly; then, without saying a word, she darted out of the house, and I never saw her any more. I was so grieved when I found she had really left me that I threw myself on the floor, and cried as though my heart would break. Miss Croft, at first, tried to pacify me, but finding nothing would quiet me she concluded to send me to bed. It was scarcely dark when she led the way up into the garret where I was to sleep. I had always been cowardly; but I shall never forget my terror at finding myself, for the first time in my life, alone at night in a strange place. I would have given worlds to have been once more with Pietro and his wife. I took my picture, which seemed to console me a little, and when it became too dark for me to see it any longer, I put it under my pillow and cried myself to sleep.

"Early next morning I heard Miss Croft calling me. I got up and dressed myself as quick as I could, and taking my picture from the chain laid it carefully away; then, putting the chain around my neck, I went down stairs.

"After I had eaten my breakfast, she called me to her, and, taking the scissors from her work-basket, cut off my hair as short as she could. I felt very bad; for Annita had always taken so much pains with it, that I was rather vain of it. Next she took off my chain, and though I told her it was my mother's, and begged her to let me keep it, she wouldn't listen to me ; and I didn't see it again, until one day a peddler called here, and I saw her swap it away for those gold spectacles she wears and a silver thimble. After this I took good care of the miniature ; for I know if she saw it, she would take that too. I hadn't lived here long before I found that Miss Croft was quite as much to be feared as Pietro, and perhaps more ; for here there was no one to protect me when she ill-used me. You know something, Mrs. Thorne, of the life I lead here. If it were not for your kindness, I don't think I could endure it ; and do you wonder, ma'am, that I dread to have you leave me even for a visit ? I believe, now, my story is ended. Shall I show you my mother's picture ?"

"By all means, Roxy ; I am very desirous of seeing it."

Roxy left the room for it. When she returned, finding Mr. Thorne present, she hesitated about showing it ; but Mrs. Thorne, extending her hand, she silently placed in it the much-prized treasure.

"Beautiful ! beautiful !" exclaimed Mrs. Thorne, the instant her eye fell upon the picture. "Look, Mr. Thorne, was there ever anything more exquisite ?"

"It is truly exquisite !" said he, examining it with curiosity. "The face, though, seems to be of foreign cast ; and this costly setting is evidently of foreign workmanship. But whose miniature is it ?"

"It is that of Roxy's mother," said Mrs. Thorne.

"And her name was Theresa," said he, deciphering the faintly-traced characters beneath.

"Yes, sir," replied Roxy, modestly ; "and it's my name, too. But Miss Croft didn't like it, so she changed it to Roxy."

Both gazed long and ardently upon the face, whose matchless beauty seemed rather the embodiment of an artist's dream than a sketch from reality.

"Roxy," said Mrs. Thorne, with enthusiasm, "if this is truly your mother's picture, you need no longer lament your origin. This is not one of the forest flowers, beautiful as they often are. In every lineament, I trace high birth and breeding."

"It is my mother, I know," said she, earnestly. "When Annita gave me the picture, I knew at once the face that had always looked so kindly on me in my dreams, but I never knew till then that it was my mother's. Oh, Mrs. Thorne, if I could only believe I were not a gypsy, I should be too happy ! Miss Croft says every day nobody can make anything of them ; and I know myself everybody despises them. Annita was the only one I could ever love."

"I cannot think you are one ; but even if it be so, you have nothing to discourage you. Your friends will never desert you on that account. Here, take your picture, but bring it to me again some time, for I am not half satisfied with looking at it."

At four o'clock the next morning Roxy bade her kind friends good-by. She watched the stage until out of sight, and then with a heavy heart obeyed the summons to the kitchen.

OBSTINACY.

AN obstinate man does not hold opinions, but they hold him ; for when he is once possessed with an error it is like a devil, only cast out with great difficulty. Whatsoever he lays hold on, like a drowning man, he never looses, though it do but help to sink him the sooner. His ignorance is abrupt and inaccessible, impregnable both by art and nature, and will hold out to the last, though it has nothing but rubbish to defend. It is as dark as pitch, and sticks as fast to anything it lays hold on. His skull is so thick that it is proof against any reason, and never cracks but on a wrong side, just opposite to that against which the impression is made, which surgeons say does happen very frequently. The slighter and more inconsistent his opinions are the faster he holds them, otherwise they would fall asunder of themselves ; for opinions that are false ought to be held with more strictness and assurance than those that are true, otherwise they will be apt to betray their owners before they are aware. He delights most of all to differ in things indifferent ; no matter how frivolous they are, they are weighty enough in proportion to his weak judgment ; and he will rather suffer self-martyrdom than part with the least scruple of his freehold ; for it is impossible to dye his dark ignorance into any lighter color. He is resolved to understand no man's reason but his own, because he finds no man can understand his but himself. His wits are like a sack, which the French proverb says is tied faster before it is full than when it is ; and his opinions are like plants that grow upon rocks, that stick fast though they have no rooting. His understanding is burdened like Pharaoh's heart, and is proof against all sorts of judgments whatsoever.

A RAILWAY JOURNEY: AND WHAT CAME OF IT.

BY BELLE RUTLEDGE.

UPON a sunny morning in early June, the post-boy rapped at the door of Judge Marston's dwelling, and left a letter for his pretty daughter Hattie.

Now this letter was nothing remarkable of itself, not being a love-letter, and not even coming from a gentleman correspondent. It simply bore a western post-mark, but it set little Hattie Marston all in a flutter after she had eagerly perused its contents; and, with it in her hand, she hastily sought her mother, who was superintending dinner.

"Oh, mother, a letter from Cousin Lizzie, from Cleveland! Uncle and aunt wished her to write for me to visit them next month. There is a gentleman of their acquaintance coming east in a week or two, who will call for me—a Mr. Farlow—who, Lizzie writes, is the son of an old college friend of uncle's and father's. Lizzie has told him about me, and he politely offers to be my travelling companion on his return. What a grand opportunity it will be! won't it, mother? You know I have been wishing to go West for a year or more; and father is so much engaged that he cannot accompany me. I can go, can't I, mother?" said Hattie, eagerly.

"Wait, and see what your father says. I know we have long promised you a western visit; and now, if the Judge thinks it best, and this young man is a proper escort, I shall be willing for you to leave us for awhile. When your father returns to dinner, read the letter to him, and see what his opinion is."

At dinner, Judge Marston, with his dignified mien, silvery hair, and frank, genial countenance, was met by his daughter.

"What is it, Hattie? what has happened?" he asked, as he noted her eager, flushed face, and the open letter in her hand.

"Oh, father, a letter from Cousin Lizzie, wishing me to pay them a visit! I will read it to you; and shall expect you will gladly say that I may go forthwith." And Hattie proceeded to read aloud her cousin's letter. "There, father, what do you think? May I not go?" she asked, as she finished reading.

"Why, what a girl, Hattie! so eager to leave your old father and mother!" said the Judge, teasingly, "and with a strange young gentleman, too! I don't know about trusting my Hattie to the care of this handsome friend of Cousin Lizzie's. Who knows what might come of it, eh, Hattie?" and the Judge laughed provokingly.

"Don't talk so, father!" said Hattie. "You forget that Lizzie says his father is an old friend of yours, and that he is one of the ablest lawyers of Cleveland."

"Well, if Robert Farlow inherits any of his father's qualities, he is a noble young man. His father was my most intimate college friend, and many a scrape did he save me from while there. I should like to see the young man right well, and hope he has the same traits of character which distinguished his father. You can write your Cousin Lizzie that your mother and I give our consent, and that she may expect 'our plague' at the time appointed," and the Judge turned to his dinner.

Two weeks later, Robert Farlow arrived in W——, and stopped at the village hotel. On the evening after his arrival he called at Judge Marston's, with a letter of introduction from the Judge's brother, Mr. Marston, of Cleveland.

A frank, manly bearing—like that of his father's in youth—quickly won the Judge's favor; and he cordially proffered the hospitalities of his house to the young lawyer during his stay in the place, remarking laughingly to his wife, "That, now, he had no fears of intrusting Hattie to his care!"

And Hattie, what did she think of her escort? Ah, methinks if the pillow whereon she pressed her golden head could tell tales, it would speak of a strong prepossession in the young lawyer's favor.

A week later, and the westward train bore Hattie Marston and Robert Farlow among its passengers.

It was something new for Hattie to travel, having never been farther from home than a neighboring boarding-school; and everything was fresh and delightful to her. The varied scenery of lake and forest delighted her; and her fresh, childish remarks pleased her companion, who had hitherto been accustomed only to the society of fashionable ladies. He discovered in her a true child of nature, whose unhackneyed guilelessness attracted and gratified him. But, as night drew on, poor Hattie became tired of asking questions and looking from the window. She gradually grew silent; and after many vain efforts to keep her eyes open, they unconsciously closed, and she was really fast asleep, while a gentle hand drew her head down against a manly shoulder, and tender eyes, in which beamed a new light, gazed upon the sweet face nestling there in quiet security.

The succeeding two days and nights were similar to the first to our travellers, save that the manner of Robert Farlow grew more tender and thoughtful for his charge. On the third eve they arrived at their journey's end, and Hattie was safely transferred to her uncle's house.

"And how did you like your escort, Cousin Hattie?" asked Lizzie Marston, as the two girls sat in the latter's room late that night.

"Oh I think he is splendid!" answered Hattie, while a blush unconsciously stole up her face. "He was so polite and gentlemanly! It seemed as if he could not do enough to make me comfortable."

"I thought you'd like him; and I knew he couldn't help liking Cousin Hattie, as I told him he would! He is usually averse to making himself agreeable to ladies; though they, dear creatures, perfectly dote on him when in his society," said Lizzie, laughingly. "Now I'll tell you a little secret, Hattie, if you'll promise not to scold me. Do you want to hear it, Hattie? If so, promise not to look cross."

"Yes, I'll promise, if it is anything that I ought to know."

"Well, it is; and so here's the story! You see, for a year or more, I've been wanting a certain gentleman and a certain cousin of mine to become acquainted; and, for awhile, I really despaired of effecting a meeting. But one day a bright idea occurred to me. I had just received a letter from this cousin of mine, who shall, for the present, be nameless; and it so chanced that the gentleman in question, who also shall be without a name, happened in as I was reading the letter, when what could I do but read aloud a few passages, and then tell him of the writer? Of course I had never mentioned her before! Then I hinted that a journey east would do him no harm, and that one west would do the lady heaps of good; so, very naturally, he took the hint, and offered to be your escort, Cousin Hattie. There, now, aren't I nice for planning?"

"O you cruel, wicked girl! how could you?" exclaimed Hattie, hiding her glowing face, which had gradually grown a deeper hue, till her cousin finished, when it seemed a-blaze with fire—"How could you do it, Hattie? I never would have come one step, had I known of your plans!" And Hattie's voice really betrayed injured feeling and wounded pride.

"There, don't be angry, dear Hattie, or I shall regret having told you!" said her cousin, putting her arm around her and kissing her. "There is no harm done; for I know Robert Farlow doesn't regret his journey, if I can judge from his countenance this evening; and you, Hattie, you, of course, hav'n't been foolish enough to fall in love with him; so, my dear, kiss me forgiveness, and let's seek our pillows, for I know you must be fatigued enough with the journey!"

But little slumber refreshed Hattie Marston's eyes that night, for her cousin's words rang in her ears: "You hav'n't been foolish enough to fall in love with him?" Had she? She hid her face in the pillow, and tears of shame dimmed her blue eyes.

The next morning Robert Farlow called, as a matter of course, to inquire after the health of his compagnon du voyage. Hattie's manner was cool and reserved toward him, a marked change from what it had previously been; and he felt it.

"Are you ill, Miss Marston?" he asked, anxiously, as he noted her pale face and heavy eyes.

"No, oh no, not in the least," she answered, quickly, the color rapidly mantling her cheek.

"I'm afraid, Mr. Farlow, the journey has made her ill. It was almost too long to take without stopping to rest upon the way," said her aunt, Mrs. Marston.

"O no; Cousin Hattie is only a little fatigued; she will recover in a day or two," said Lizzie, demurely.

The wicked girl knew all the while that her words of the previous night had caused the change in her cousin's manner toward their visitor; but she had a plan in her head, which she was determined should be fulfilled.

Time passed, and Hattie Marston enjoyed her visit exceedingly. A gay summer and fall she had at her cousin's in the West, cantering over the flowery prairies, or sailing upon the lakes; and her time was fully occupied. Her beauty and grace attracted much attention, and many suitors were at her side; but to all she turned a deaf ear.

But there was one whom she saw daily—yet who stood aloof when others flocked around her—one word from whose lips would have sent fullest happiness to her heart. But this word was not spoken; for her guarded manner, since the night of their arrival, had continued; and so they two, so near, walked apart, each mistaken in the other. Ah, Lizzie Marston, your plan should not have been told so soon! You made a sad mistake in its betrayal; for Hattie guards her heart with a double bolt and lock, and Robert Farlow, equally watchful over his own, catches no glimpse of what is hidden so securely within hers whom he deems he loves in vain.

As the autumn days deepened and the beauty of the season departed, one morning, at breakfast, Hattie avowed her intention of returning home, and would not listen to entreaties to remain longer.

"But you cannot go until the last of next month, Hattie," said her uncle, "for I shall not be able to go East until then, and your father cannot come for you now."

"But I must go, uncle! I have made you a long visit already. I can go in charge of the conductor, and shall arrive safely; never fear for that," she replied, stoutly.

"Hattie homesick? why, child!" said her aunt, looking at her scrutinizingly. "Well, I don't much wonder at it, for I expect Lizzie would be if she were on east. But try, dear, and content yourself until your uncle can go on with you. I shouldn't feel right to have you go without a companion."

"Hattie, dear, you mustn't go a step now; so don't say another word about it," said her Cousin Lizzie. "Here we have just begun to enjoy ourselves, and you must take this freak into your head to return home. I sha'n't allow it! so don't give it another thought, but content yourself to remain until uncle comes for you; and then, if, of your own accord, you do not wish to remain longer, why, I won't say another word against it. Will you, Mr. Farlow?" said Lizzie, turning to that gentleman, who had just entered.

"Against what, Miss Lizzie? What is it I am expected to influence your cousin in favor of? I must know the case in question before I give my decision, he answered, smilingly."

"Oh, of course," answered Lizzie. "I did not realize but that you were here just now, when Hattie made known her intention of returning home immediately. Now, what we want is, that you should try your powers of persuasion in behalf of her remaining until her father comes for her, which will be only too soon for us to lose her."

"I hardly flatter myself that anything I can say will have the desired effect if you all have failed," he answered; "but if, on the contrary, your cousin wishes to go, perhaps I might be of benefit to her on the journey, as the duties of my profession call me to New York next week. If she will again accept my escort, I shall be but too happy in rendering it."

"Just the thing!" said Mr. Marston and Lizzie in a breath; the latter continuing, with a smile lurking in the corners of her mouth:

"Well, Hattie, if you are determined to go, why, you can have your old travelling companion!"

Poor Hattie blushed, and murmured out a few words in thanks; and then, pleading a headache, retired.

A week later found our travelling companions upon the return route. Hattie still maintained her old reserved manner; and Robert Farlow despaired of obtaining her love; so he wrapped himself in a reserve equal to her own. But accident was destined to place that happiness within the young lawyer's grasp, which, otherwise, would never have been given him.

It was the last night of their journey. Hattie had sunk into a deep slumber, unbroken by the jolt of the cars or the hoarse breathing of the engine. She slept; and the eyes of the young lawyer rested upon her with tenderness beaming from their depths. He felt that the time was fast nearing when he would be obliged to yield his lovely charge to her parents; and he found himself unconsciously wishing that something might occur to prolong their journey. This desired "something" came.

A sharp, shrill whistle—a sudden crash, mingled with loud shrieks—told that a frightful accident had occurred to the train; and Robert Farlow felt himself whirled rapidly down a steep embankment. Unconsciously, at the first jar, he had grasped the sleeping girl in his strong arms, and, with her clasped to his heart, had been borne down amid the crashing seats of the car. Very fortunate it was that they had taken passage in the last car, and in the rear of that; otherwise, neither would have been saved the sad fate of mangled limbs met by so many of their fellow-passengers.

Five minutes after that terrible crash of the two fiery engines that came in collision, Robert Farlow, with pale face and one hand bleeding and crushed, arose from the ruin around him, with Hattie still clasped to his breast. Faint and stunned from the shock, moments had passed before he recovered his senses; but awakening to a realization of his situation, he rose with his unconscious burden, and stood out in the clear moonlight.

A crimson mark stained Hattie Marston's white forehead, and her eyes were closed; while the moonbeams showed the otherwise deathly pallor of her face framed in her loosened golden hair which floated around her.

"Oh, my God!" exclaimed Robert Farlow, as he gazed upon her and saw that she did not revive. "Oh, Hattie! my beloved! my angel, is dead!" he cried, passionately, as he pressed his lips to hers in a first long kiss.

The lips of the young girl trembled at the pressure of his, and her eyelids slowly unclosed, while she murmured softly:

"Where am I? Am I dreaming?" and she passed in confusion, putting her hand to her head.

"No, you are not dreaming, dearest Hattie! It is true that I love you better than life, that I would gladly meet death, if thereby I might save you a pang!" he answered, tenderly and rapidly.

"But where am I? and what is the matter with your hand? There is blood upon my face too!" she said, as she put her hand to her head.

"We have met with a fearful accident, Hattie," he answered, "and many are seriously injured. I was afraid, at first, that you were; but, thank God, it is not so! My hand is slightly injured, and the blood must have touched your forehead, for there is no wound there. You are not harmed. Oh how thankful I am that you are safe!"

It was a strange place for an avowal of love; there, at that midnight hour and in the moonlight, with the sound of the sufferers still in their ears. But a moment they lingered; yet that was sufficient for Robert Farlow to read an answer—not only in the eyes of his companion, but in her few spoken words:

"You have saved my life, Robert; henceforth it shall be given to its preserver!" Then they turned to assist the unfortunate sufferers around them.

A few hours of detention, and they were again on the road, and arrived safely the next nightfall at Hattie's home, where they were tearfully welcomed by her parents, who had just read the news of the accident.

A month later, a wedding was celebrated at Judge Marston's mansion; and when Hattie again left the home of her girlhood for another western journey, it was as the wife of Robert Farlow.

WHAT PRECIOUS STONES ARE MADE OF.

FIRST, as to the diamond, which, though the king and chief of all, may be dismissed in two words—pure carbon. The diamond is the ultimate effort, the idealization, the spiritual evolution of coal—the butterfly escaped from its antenatal tomb, the realization of the coal's highest being. Then the ruby, the flaming red oriental ruby, side by side with the sapphire, and the oriental topaz—both rubies of different colors—what are they? Crystals of our commonest argillaceous earth, the earth which makes our potters' clay, our pipe-clay, and common roofing slate—mere bits of alumina. Yet these are among our best gems, these idealizations of our common potters' clay. In every one hundred grains of beautiful blue sapphire, ninety-two are pure alumina with one grain of iron to make that glorious light within. The ruby is colored with chromic acid. The amethyst is only silica or flint. In one hundred grains of amethyst, ninety-eight are pure flint—the same substance as that which made the old flint in the tinder-box, used before our phosphorus and sulphur-headed matches; of this same silica are also cornelian, cat's-eye, rock crystal, Egyptian jasper and opal. In one hundred grains of opal, ninety are pure silica, and ten water. It is the water, then, which gives the gem the peculiarly changeable and iridescent coloring which is so beautiful, and which renders the opal the moonlight queen of the kingly diamond. The garnet, the Brazilian topaz, but not the oriental—the oriental emerald which is of the same species as the beryl; all are compounds of flint and alumina. But the beryl and emerald are not composed exclusively of silica and alumina; they contain another earth called glucina—from glukos, sweet, because its salts are sweet to the taste. The hyacinth gem is composed of the earth called zirconia, first discovered in that species of stone called zircon, found in Scotland. A chrysolite is a portion of pure silicate of magnesia. Without carbonate of copper there would be no malachite in Russia, or in the Burra Burra mines in Australia; without carbonate of lime there would be no Carrara marble. The turquoise is nothing but a phosphate of alumina colored blue by copper. Lapis Lazuli is only a bit of earth painted throughout with sulphuret of sodium.

LET us consider that youth is of no long duration, and that, in mature age, when the enchantments of fancy shall cease, and phantoms of delight dance no more about us, we shall have no comfort but the esteem of wise men, and the means of doing good.

PRACTICAL LESSONS IN DRAWING.

SECOND LESSON.

As you have learned to draw straight lines parallel to one another, it will be necessary to make you connect them in some way, so as to form the outline of an object.

Draw two straight lines parallel to one another like a, in Fig. 3; then connect the ends of them by a small curved line, and from that draw a short perpendicular and a short horizontal line (as b, in Fig. 3); repeat until the outline of a set of steps is complete.

Draw a horizontal straight line, and from either extremity of it draw two perpendicular straight lines as in c, Fig. 3.

Draw two oblique lines, so that their lower extremities shall meet, as a, Fig. 4. Then draw two parallel straight lines, so that the beginning of the upper one shall be almost immediately over the end of the lower one, and join the ends of these lines with oblique lines, as b, in Fig. 4.

Draw a perpendicular straight line, and from the upper end of it an oblique line from right to left, then unite the end of the oblique line to another oblique line, as in c, Fig. 4.

Fig. 5.

Draw a perpendicular line, and from the lower part of it draw a horizontal line from right to left, as b, in Fig. 5.

Draw four horizontal lines, and then join their extremities by four perpendicular lines, as in a, Fig. 5. This will represent a block of wood (called a cube in geometry), having six faces, and eight corners or angles, like a die.

Here is another geometrical figure which you are requested to copy. To do so correctly, begin by making two dots, and then forming the upper line; then calculate that the distance of the second line is twice the depth of the fore part of the stone (which is represented in Fig. 6), and draw a very faint short stroke to fix the distance. You must now fix the place to commence the second line, and you therefore place a dot at about the same depth as the fore part of the stone towards the right, and another dot at about one and a half of the depth from the right of the end of the upper line; then draw a line between the two dots. Join the ends of these two lines by oblique lines, as represented in the figure above, and proceeding in the same manner to place dots upon the paper for the other parts, draw the short perpendicular lines and the oblique and horizontal lines. The figure is now complete in outline, and you must therefore finish it by the addition of a few strokes and dots as shown in the figure.

To form the outline of the figure, use a F pencil, and a HB to fill in the other strokes.

Here is another figure that you must practise frequently, because it will give you a fair knowledge of the combination of form and proportion, and will school your eyes to the perspective of solids. In this, as in all cases, proceed by making dots before you commence drawing your lines; and we merely repeat this again because we wish our pupils to understand most distinctly that no line should be drawn until the length of it has been marked upon the paper by dots. When you have drawn the upper horizontal line of a, in Fig. 7, draw a perpendicular line from each end of it, and let each of these lines be one and a half the length of the horizontal line; then unite the two lower ends of the perpendicular lines. Now draw a faint horizontal line along the base of a, and at about half the height of the oblong a place a dot on the faint horizontal line, and another dot at rather more than a third of the length of the dot just placed upon the line from the left lower angle of the oblong. You must then place a dot at about half the length of the above distance above the horizontal line, and the same distance from the second dot as the width of the base a. From these several dots draw oblique lines as in b, Fig. 7, and join them by other lines as shown in the figure. You must now draw other short lines from the oblique ones to the face of the oblong, and finish the figure by a few short strokes at the base, as shown in the figure.

Fig. 7.

It is required to represent the two sides of a pyramid. Draw two faint horizontal lines b c, and another one a, perpendicular to them; then draw a line from c to b, commencing at the place where a cuts c; then draw another line from c to b, one-third longer than the line on the right of a, commencing at the point of junction between a and c. Place a dot on the left of the perpendicular a, at nearly the same distance from it as the space between the lines b and c, and twice the length of the oblique line on the right of its base, between the line c b. From this point or dot draw lines to meet those drawn before, and the figure will be complete.

Draw a horizontal line, a b, and then draw a perpendicular line, c d, across it, as in Fig. 9.

You will have formed four right angles, a e c, c e b, b e d, d e a; but we are not going to study angles now; that is not our object. We wish you to notice our remarks and practise the figure; then, when you can draw this well, you should draw the lines in different directions so near that c may be brought nearer to b, and d to a; by this means you will form various kinds of angles.

THE BROKEN TENDRIL.

BY MRS. WOLVERTON.

THE twilight dew is falling,
The soft moon sailing near,
Within her court of beauty
The starry lights appear.

They waken sleeping memory,
Unfold a view for me:
A mother wildly weeping,
A dying babe I see.

God's guardian angel waiting,
In robe of holy love,
To bear that precious infant
Up to the home above.

Then quick I go in spirit
Through all that shadow dim,
Enfold that stricken mother,
And whisper words of Him.

My tears with hers are falling,
Her head upon my breast;
To still the wild heart tumult,
Her cheek to mine is prest.

None see us but Our Father
Beneath this cloud of grief,
Nor hear the words I utter
To give that heart relief.

And He, unseen, is bending
Within that lonely room,
His faith light gently holding
To break the night of gloom.

Most dear the one He chastens!
That one he calls "His own,"
His angel bears the infant,
The mother follows on.

United in his heaven, on
Its bright and happy shore,
Will be the earthly parted
Forever, ever more.

"HUSKS."

"And he would fain have filled himself with the husks that the swine did eat; and no man gave unto him."

CHAPTER IX.

It was at the close of an evening party which both the Hunts attended, and where Mr. Hammond's devotion was as marked as anything so modest could be, that Sarah felt him slip an envelope in her hand, as he put her into the carriage. Surprised as she was at the singularity of the occurrence, and disposed to take offence at the familiarity it implied, she had yet the presence of mind to conceal the missive from Lucy, and talk about other things, until they were set down at home. In the privacy of her chamber, she broke the seal and read her first love-letter.

It was a characteristic composition. If the strong hand had trembled above the lines, the clear, clerky penmanship did not witness to the weakness. Nor was there anything in the subject matter that did not appear to Sarah as business-like and unimpassioned. It was a frank and manly avowal of attachment for her; a compliment implied, rather than broadly stated, to her virtues; the traits that had gained his esteem; then his love—a deprecatory sentence as to his ability to deserve the treasure he dared to ask—and then the question! in plain black and white, unequivocal to bluntness, simple and direct to curtness.

"As he would ask the price of a bale of goods!" burst forth Sarah, indignant, as she threw the paper on the floor, and buried her burning face in her hands.

"That there comes sometimes a glory to the Present, beside which the hues of Past and Future fade and are forgotten, I must and will believe. Such, it seems to me, must be the rapture of acknowledged and reciprocal affection!" This was the echo memory repeated to her soul. She saw again the gently gliding river, with its waves of crimson and gold; breathed the pure fragrance of the summer evening; floated on, towards the sunset, with the loved voice in her ear; the dawn of a strange and beautiful life, shedding blissful calm throughout her being.

And from this review, dangerous as it was, for one fleeting instant sweet, she returned to the proposal that had amazed and angered her. Lewis's undemonstrative exterior had misled her, as it did most persons, in the estimate of his inner nature. Kind she was compelled to confess that he was, in the remembrance of his goodness to her father; his demeanor was always gentlemanly, and she had caught here and there rumors of his generosity to the needy that prevented a suspicion of sordidness. No doubt he was very well in his way; but he wanted to marry her! With the intensity of her fiery spirit, her will arose against the presumptuous request. It was the natural recoil of the woman who already loves, at the suggestion of a union with another than the man of her choice; the spontaneous outspokening of a heart whose allegiance vows have been pledged and cannot be nullified. But she would not see this. Upon the unfortunate letter and its writer descended the storm of passionate repugnance aroused by its contents. With the reaction of excited feeling came tears—a plentiful shower that relaxed the overwrought nerves, until they were ready to receive the benediction of sleep.

Lewis had not asked a written or verbal reply.

"I will call to take you to drive to-morrow afternoon," he wrote. "Should your decision upon the question I have proposed be favorable, your consent to accompany me in my ride will be understood as a signal that you have accepted my graver suit. If your conclusion is adverse to my hopes, you can signify the same to me in a letter, to be handed me when I ask for you. This course will spare us both embarrassment—perhaps pain. In any event, be assured that you will ever have a firm friend in Yours truly, LEWIS HAMMOND."

Sarah's lip curled as she reperused this clause of the letter on the following morning.

"It is a comfort to know that I have not to answer for the sin of breaking my ardent suitor's heart!" she said, as she drew towards her the sheet upon which she was to indite her refusal. It was brief and courteous—freezing in its punctilious civility, and prepared without a pang, or a solitary misgiving that its reception would not be philosophically calm. Her design was to intrust it to the footman, to be delivered when Mr. Hammond called; and as the hour approached at which the expectant was to present himself, she took the note from the desk, and started down stairs with it.

The sitting-room door was open, and aware that Victoria West was in there with Lucy, Sarah trod very softly as she neared it. Her own name arrested her as she was going by. She stopped involuntarily.

"I thought Sarah a girl of better regulated mind," said Victoria, in a tone of censorious pity. "Of course she suffers! It is the inevitable consequence of an unrequited attachment. Such miserable folly, such unpardonable weakness brings its punishment with it. But my sympathies are all yours, my dearest. I only wish you were not so sensitive. You are not to blame for her blind mistake."

"I cannot help it!" said Lucy, plaintively. "It seems so sad that I should be made the means of depriving her of happiness. I wish I had never known that she was attached to poor Philip. I can't tell you how awkward I feel when any allusion is made in her hearing to the dear fellow, or to our marriage."

"I meant it for the best, dear, in telling you of my discovery," replied Victoria, slightly hurt.

"I know that, my dear creature! And it is well that I should not be kept in the dark as to the state of her affections. I only hope that Philip never penetrated her secret. I should die of mortification for her, if he were to find it out. It is a lamentable affair—and I am sure that he is not in fault. What did you say that you gave for that set of handkerchiefs you showed me yesterday?"

"The cheapest things you ever saw! I got them at Stewart's, and they averaged six dollars apiece! As to Mr. Benson, I trust, with you, that he is as unsuspecting as he seems; but he has remarkable discernment, you know. What I could not help seeing, before I had any other proof than her behavior, is not likely to have escaped him."

Half an hour later, the twain were disturbed in their confidences by the sound of wheels stopping before the house, followed by a ring at the door. Victoria, ever on the alert, peeped, with feline caution and curiosity, around the edge of the curtain.

"What is going to happen? Look, Lucy! Mr. Hammond in a handsome light carriage, and driving a lovely pair of horses! I never thought to see him go in such style. How well he looks! Take care! he will see you!"

Both dodged as he glanced at the upper windows; but resumed their look-out in time to see the light that was kindled in his face when Sarah emerged from the front door. He was at her side in a second, to lead her down the steps, and his manner in this movement, and in assisting her into the carriage, the more striking in one generally so self-contained and deliberate, inspired the pair of initiated observers with the same conviction. As the spirited horses disappeared into the Avenue, the friends drew back from their loop-hole, and stared each other in the eyes, with the simultaneous exclamation—"They are engaged!"

They were engaged! Lewis felt it with a glad bound of the heart—but a minute before sickening in deadly suspense; felt, as he seated himself by her side, that the sorrows of a lonely and struggling youth, the years of manhood's isolation and unsatisfied longings were swept from memory by this hour of abundant, unalloyed happiness.

And Sarah felt it! As her hand touched his, at their meeting upon the steps, a chill ran through her frame that told the consummation of the sacrifice which was to atone for past folly; to silence, and brand as a lying rumor, the fearful tale that hinted abroad the revelation of that weakness. In her mad horror at the knowledge of its discovery, she had rushed upon this alternative. Better an estate of honorable misery, than to live on, solitary, disgraced, condemned and pitied by her meanest foe! Now that the irreversible step was taken, she experienced no sharp regret, no wild impulse of retreat, but a gradual sinking of spirit into hopeless apathy.

Her veil concealed her dull eyes and stolid features, and to Lewis's happy mood there was nothing surprising or discouraging in her disposition to silence. With a tact, for which she had not given him credit, and did not now value aright, he refrained from any direct reference to their altered relation until they were returning homeward. Then, changing his tone of pleasant chat for one of deeper meaning, he said:—

"I have dared to hope much—everything—from your consent to become my companion for this afternoon. Before I ventured to address you directly, I had a long and frank conversation with your father."

"What did he say?" asked Sarah, turning towards him for the first time.

"He referred me to you for my answer, which, he said, must be final and positive, since he would never attempt to influence your choice. In the event of an affirmative reply from you, he promised that his sanction should not be withheld."

Sarah was silent. She comprehended fully her father's warm interest in his friend's suit, which the speaker was too diffident to imply, and how this expression of his wishes set the seal upon her fate.

"We are poor and proud! Mr. Hammond is rich and seeks to marry me!" was her bitter thought. "It is a fine bargain in the eyes of both my parents. It would be high treason in me to dispute their will. Mr. Hammond has conceived the notion that I am a useful domestic character; a good housekeeper and nurse, and he is willing to bid liberally for my services. It is all arranged between them! Mine is a passive part, to copy Lucy's sweet, submissive ways for a season, for fear of frightening away the game, afterwards to attend to my business, while he looks after his. I have chosen my lot, and I will abide by it!"

"Have I your permission to call this evening and inform your father of my success—may I say of our engagement?" asked Lewis.

"It is best, I suppose, to call things by their right names," replied Sarah, in a cold voice, that was to him only coy. He smiled, and was about to speak, when she resumed: "Since we are virtually engaged"—she caught her breath, as she brought out the word—"I see no reason why we should hesitate to announce it to those whose right it is to know it."

"Thank you! That was spoken like the noble, unaffected woman you are! Will you always be equally sincere with me—Sarah?" His accent trembled with excess of emotion in calling the name.

Is it, then, an easy lot that you have chosen, Sarah Hunt? You, whose pride and glory it was to be truthful, who spurned whatever assimilated in the least degree to deception, what think you of a life where a lie meets you on the threshold, and must be accepted and perpetuated, if you would preserve your name and position in his eyes and those of the world. "It is the way two-thirds of the married people live!" you were saying to yourself, just now. It may be so; but it is none the less a career of duplicity, perjury—crime!

"I will endeavor to please you!" she faltered, her face in a flame of shame and confusion.

And this was the hue that met Lewis's eye, as her veil was blown aside, in her descent to the pavement, a blush he interpreted to suit his own wishes. Mr. Hunt appeared in the door-way as she alighted, and read in Hammond's smile and joyous salutation all that he most desired to learn. When the door was closed upon the departing suitor, the father drew his best-beloved child to him, and kissed her, without a word of uttered blessing.

"It would break his heart were I to recede now!" thought Sarah, as she bore hers—heavy, hard—up to her room.

That evening was the proudest era of Mrs. Hunt's existence. Two daughters well engaged—unexceptionably paired off! What mother more blest than she? Where could be found other children so dutiful? other sons-in-law so acceptable? By breakfast time, next day, she had arranged everything—Sarah's trousseau, her house, and the double wedding.

Lucy expostulated here. "But, mother, this is the first of November."

"I know that, my dear; but the ceremony will not come off until Christmas, and much can be done in six weeks for your sister—your work is so forward. Then, again, 'tisn't as if Sarah couldn't get everything she needs right here, if she shouldn't have enough. It will be tremendously expensive—awful, in fact; but we must make sacrifices. We can live economical after you're married and gone, and save enough to meet the bills."

"If you please, madam, I prefer a plain outfit, and no debts," said Sarah's most abrupt tones.

"If you please, my dear, I understand my affairs, and mean to do as I think proper," retorted the no less strong-willed mother.

Sarah was not cowed. "And as to the time you set, I cannot agree to it. I presume that in this matter I have some voice. I say six months instead of six weeks!"

"Very well, my love." Mrs. Hunt went on polishing a tumbler with her napkin. She always washed her silver and glass herself. "You must settle that with your father and Mr. Hammond. They are crazy for this plan. They were talking to me about it last night, and I told them that I would engage to have everything ready in time; but you must be consulted. I never saw your father more set upon anything. He said to me, private, that he did hope that you wouldn't raise any squeamish objections, and upset their arrangements."

Mrs. Hunt took up a handful of spoons as composedly as if she had never stretched her conscience in her life.

Sarah's head drooped upon the table. She was very, very miserable. In her morbid state of mind she did not dream of questioning the accuracy of her mother's assertion. That a marriageable single daughter was a burden to one parent, she knew but too well; that to this able financier the prospect of getting two out of the way, with the éclat of a double ceremony that should cost no more than Lucy's nuptials would have done, was a stupendous temptation, she also perceived. But that the father whom she so loved; whose sick bed she had tended so faithfully; whose lonely hours it was her province and delight to solace—that he should acquiesce—nay, more, rejoice in this indelicate haste to get rid of her, was a cruel stab. "Very well," she said, raising an ashy face. "Let it be as you say. The sooner it is over, the better."

This clause was unheeded by her mother and sister. Had they heard it, they might have understood it as little as they did the composure with which she joined in the work which was begun, without an hour's delay. In this trying juncture, Mrs. Hunt came out in all her strength. Her sewing-machine (she was one of the earliest purchasers of these inestimable time, labor, and money-savers) went night and day; she shopped largely and judiciously, giving orders to tradespeople with the air of a princess; "Jewed" her butcher; watched her pantry, and served up poorer dinners than ever. Jeannie's winter outfit was ingeniously contrived from her sister's cast-off wardrobe; Mr. Hunt's and the boys' shirts and socks were patched and darned until but a trifling quantity of the original material remained; and this pearl of mothers had her two year old cloak and last season's hat "done over" for this year's wear.

Foremost among the visitors to the Hunts, after this latest engagement was made public, was Mrs. Marlow, the wife of Mr. Hammond's benefactor and partner. Sarah was out when she called; so Mrs. Hunt received her, and discovering very soon that, in spite of her husband's wealth and her splendid establishment, she was not, as Mrs. Hunt phrased it to her daughters, "one mite proud, and thought the world and all of Lewis"—the mother opened her heart to her so freely, with regard to the prospective weddings and her maternal anxieties, that Mrs. Marlow was emboldened to introduce a subject which had taken hold of her thoughts as soon as she heard from Mr. Hammond of his expected marriage.

She had a daughter resident, for the winter, in Paris, whose taste in female attire was unquestionable, and her good nature as praiseworthy. If Miss Sarah Hunt would prepare a memorandum of such articles as she would like to have selected in that emporium of fashion, she would promise, for her daughter, that they should be forwarded in time for "the occasion."

"Some friends of mine, now abroad, have kindly offered to bring me over any quantity of fine dresses with their baggage," said the complaisant old lady; "and, as I do not need their services for myself, I can smuggle in whatever your daughter may order. You would be surprised at the difference in prices here and there—to say nothing of the superior excellence and variety of the assortment from which one can choose. My friends will return early in December. Therefore, should you like this arrangement, I ought to have the list and write my letters to-morrow."

Energetic, fussy, snobbish Mrs. Hunt! She stood an inch taller in her shoes at the imagination of this climax to the glory of the dual ceremony. "Trousseau ordered directly from Paris!" She seemed already to hear the envious and admiring buzz of her set; saw herself the most blessed of women—her daughters the brides of the season. She would order for Lucy, also; for the longer the list, the more importance would the future Mrs. Hammond acquire in the sight of her husband's friends. They could not know that it was not for her alone. Then, as Mrs. Marlow intimated, it would be a saving. Here, like a cold shower-bath, came the agonizing query—"Where was the money to come from?" It would never do to run in debt to such people as the Marlows. If they were hard-pressed shopkeepers, who needed the money, it would be another thing. No! the cash in hand, or its representative, must accompany the memorandum.

Sarah was secretly pleased at this obstacle; for she despised the ostentation and extravagance going on in their hungry household. Strive as she did, with wicked pertinacity, to conform herself to the world's code, there was as yet too much of the ancient and better leaven left to permit more than an outward obedience to the dictates of customs so irrational and tyrannical.

That very evening there arrived a letter that settled the question, and inflated Mrs. Hunt's collapsed spirits to an expansion hitherto unequaled. It was from Aunt Sarah to her namesake niece; a guileless, fervent expression of good wishes and unabated affection, and a request from "husband" and herself that she would accept the inclosure as a mark of that hopeful regard.

"Since our daughters died"—wrote this true and gentle mother—"we have always intended to give you just exactly what we would have done one of them, as a wedding-present—as you were named for me, and I had nursed you before your mother ever did, and you seemed in some way to belong to us. But since you paid us a visit we have felt nearer to you than ever, and seeing that the Lord has prospered us in this world's goods, we have made up our minds to give you a double portion, dear, what both of our girls would have had, if it had pleased our Father to spare them to have homes of their own upon earth. Living is high in New York, but we have calculated that what we send will buy your wedding-clothes and furnish your house."

The inclosed gift, to Sarah's astonishment, was a check upon a city bank for a thousand dollars!

"Was there ever such a child for luck!" exclaimed Mrs. Hunt, clapping her hands. "What a fortunate thing we sent you down there when we did! That was one of my plans, you remember, Mr. H.! Really, Lucy, our little Sarah understands how to play her cards, after all! I never did you justice, my dear daughter. I ain't ashamed to confess it. This puts all straight, and is real handsome in Sister Benson—more than I expected. Go to work right away upon your list, girls! We'll have to set up the best part of the night to get it ready. Ah, well! this comes of putting one's trust in Providence and going ahead!"

Sarah thought, with aching heart and moistened eyes, of Aunt Sarah's mind-pictures of the neat apparel and snug dwelling she deemed proper for a young couple just beginning house-keeping, and rebelled at this waste, this frivolous expenditure of her love-portion. Mr. Hunt sided with her so far as to urge the propriety of her doing as she pleased with what was her exclusive property; but, as in a majority of former altercations, their arguments and powers of endurance were no match for the determination and mind of the real head of the family. With a sigh of pain, disgust, and despair, Mr. Hunt succumbed, and, deserted by her ally, Sarah contended but a short time longer ere she yielded up the cause of the combat to the indomitable victress.

CHAPTER X.

THE bridal day came; frosty and clear, dazzlingly bright, by reason of the reflection from the snow, which lay deep and firm upon the ground.

"What a delightful novelty this is, coming to a wedding in a sleigh!" lisped one of the triad of bridesmaids, who were to do double duty for the sisters. "How very gay it makes one to hear the bells outside! Have they come, Vic.?"

Victoria, whose marriage was but one week off, was, true to instinct and habit, on the lookout behind the friendly curtain.

She nodded. "Yes—both of them, but not together. What a magnificent sleigh that is of the Marlows! They brought Mr. Hammond. See the bridegrooms shake hands on the sidewalk! That looks so sweet and brotherly! They will be up here, almost directly I suppose."

The attendants immediately began to shake out their robes and stroke their white gloves. They were collected in the sitting-room so often mentioned, and the sisters were also present. In accordance with the ridiculous custom of very parvenu modern marriages, although the ceremony was to take place precisely at twelve o'clock, daylight was carefully excluded from the parlors below, gas made its sickly substitute, and the whole company was in full evening costume.

"Am I all right?" inquired Lucy, with a cautious wave of her flowing veil. "Look at me, Vic.!"

"You are perfect, my dearest!" replied the devoted parasite. "How I admire your beautiful self-possession! And as for you, Sarah, your calmness is wonderful! I fear that I should be terribly agitated"—blushing, and casting a meaning smile at Lucy.

Sarah's statuesque repose was broken by a ray of scorn from the eye, and a slight disdainful smile. Whatever were the feelings working beneath her marble mask, she was not yet reduced to the depth of wretchedness that would humble her to accept the insolent pity couched under the pretended praise. She vouchsafed no other reply; but remained standing a little apart from the rest; her gloved hands crossed carelessly before her; her gaze bent downwards; her whole posture that of one who neither waited, nor hoped, nor feared.

"Who would have thought that she could be made such an elegant-looking woman!" whispered one of the bridesmaids aside to another.

"She has actually a high-bred air! I never imagined it was in her. So much for a Parisian toilette!"

"I am so much afraid that I shall lose my color when we enter the room," said Lucy, surveying her pink cheeks in the mirror. "They say it is so trying to the nerves, and I am odious when I am pale."

"Never fear, my sweetest. It is more likely that the unavoidable excitement will improve your complexion. There they are!" returned Victoria, hurriedly, and—unconsciously, no doubt—the three attendants and one of the principals in the forthcoming transaction, "struck an attitude," as the sound of footsteps approached the door.

Lucy had only time for a whisper—a last injunction—to her faithful cory. "Remember to see that my veil and dress hang right when we get down stairs." And the masculine portion of the procession marched in in order.

Sarah did not look up. She bent her head as the formal exchange of salutations was executed, and yielded her hand to the person who took it in his warm pressure, and then transferred it to his arm. It was one of the freaks, thus denominated by her acquaintances, in which she had been indulged, that she desired to have her marriage ceremony precede her sister's. She assigned what Lucy at least considered a sufficient reason for this caprice.

"Nobody will care to look at me after you stand aside, Lucy. Keep the best wine until the last. My only chance of getting an approving glance lies in going in before you attract and fix the public gaze."

She had her way. A limited number of select friends were admitted to behold "the ceremony;" yet the parlors were comfortably filled, excepting in the magical semicircle described by an invisible line in the centre of which stood the clergyman in his robes.

Still dull and calm, Sarah went through the brief role that fell to her share. "Behaved charmingly," was the unanimous verdict of the beholders, and surprised other people, as well as the complimentary bridemaid, by her thorough-bred air and Parisian toilet. Without the pause of a second, so perfect was the drill of the performers, the wedded pair stepped aside, and made way for the second happy couple. Lucy's solicitude on the score of her complexion was needless. As the solemn words were commenced, a rosy blush flickered up to its appointed resting-place—another and another—until, when Philip released her to the congratulatory throng, she was the most enchanting type of a radiant Hebe that poet ever sang, or painter burned to immortalize on canvass.

Philip stood beside her and sustained his proportion of the hand-shaking and felicitation; until the press diminished, then stepped hastily over to where Hammond and his bride were undergoing a similar martyrdom. Until this moment Sarah had not looked at, or spoken to him—had never met him face to face since their parting in the summer at Aunt Sarah's. Now, not aware who it was that approached her, she raised her eyes with the serious dignity with which she had received all other salutations, and met his downward gaze—full of warm and honest feeling. "Sister!" he said, and in brotherly fondness he bent towards her, and left a kiss upon her mouth.

A hot glow, the lurid red of offended modesty or self-convicted guilt, overspread her face; the lips parted, quivered, and closed tightly after an ineffectual effort to articulate; the room swam around her, and Mr. Hammond caught her just in time to save her from falling. It was Nature's vengeful reaction for the long and unnatural strain upon her energies. She did not faint entirely away, although several moments elapsed before she regained perfect consciousness of her situation and surrounding objects. She had been placed in an easy-chair; her head rested against her father's shoulder, and on the other side stood Lewis, almost as pale as herself, holding a glass of wine to her lips. Around her were grouped her mother, Lucy, and Philip. The guests had withdrawn politely to the background, and maintained a respectful silence.

"What have I betrayed?" was her first coherent reflection; and, with an instinctive perception of the quarter where such disclosures would do most harm, her eye turned with a sort of appealing terror to Lewis. His heart leaped at the movement, revealing, as he fancied it did, dependence upon his strength, recognition of his right to be with and nearest to her.

"You are better," he said, with a moved tenderness he could not and cared not to restrain.

The words, the manner were an inexpressible relief to her fears, and trying to return his smile, she would have arisen but for her father's interposition.

"Sit still," he advised. "Mrs. Hunt, Lucy, Mr. Benson, will you entertain our friends? She will be all right in a little while, Mr. Hammond."

"Tableaux vivants!" said Lucy's soft, rich voice, as she advanced towards the reassured guests. "This is a part of the performance not set down in the programme. Quite theatrical, was it, not?"

It is very possible that Philip Benson would not have regarded this as an apropos or refined witticism, had any one else been the speaker; but as the round, liquid tones rolled it forth, and her delicious laugh led off the instant revival of mirth and badinage, he marvelled at her consummate tact, her happy play of fancy (!), and returned devout thanks to the stars that had bestowed upon him this prodigy of grace, wit, and beauty. Sarah rallied speedily; and, contrary to the advice of her father and husband, maintained her post in the drawing-room all during the reception, which continued from half-past twelve to half-past two.

It was a gay and shifting scene—a sparkling, murmuring tide, that ebbed and flowed to and from the quartette who formed the attractive power. Silks, laces, velvets, furs, and diamonds; faces young, old, and middle-aged; handsome, fair, and homely; all decked in the same conventional holiday smile; bodies tall and short, executing every variety of bow and courtesy; voices sweet, sharp, and guttural, uttering the senseless formula of congratulation—these were Sarah's impressions of the tedious ceremonial. Restored to her rigid composure, she too bowed and spoke the word or sentence custom exacted—an emotionless automaton in seeming, while Lucy's matchless inflections lent interest and beauty to the like nothings, as she rehearsed them in her turn; and Philip Benson, having no solicitude for his bride's health or ability to endure the fatigue, was collected enough to compare the two, and, while exulting in his selection, to commiserate the proprietor of the colder and less gifted sister.

At last, the trial was over; the hospitable mansion was closed; the parlors deserted; the preparations for travelling hurried through; and the daughters went forth from their girlhood's home. Philip had cordially invited Sarah and Lewis, by letter, to accompany Lucy and himself to Georgia; but Sarah would not hear of it, and Lewis, while he left the decision to her, was not sorry that she preferred to journey instead with him alone. It was too cold to go northward, and the Hammonds now proposed to proceed with the others as far as Baltimore, there to diverge upon a Western and Southern tour, which was to occupy three weeks, perhaps four.

CHAPTER XI.

DURING the month preceding his marriage, Lewis Hammond had spent much time and many thoughts in providing and furnishing a house for his wife. His coadjutor in this labor of love was not, as one might have expected, Mrs. Hunt—but his early friend, Mrs. Marlow. His omission of his future mother-in-law, in his committee of consultation, he explained to her by representing the number of duties already pressing upon her, and his unwillingness to add aught to their weight. But when both girls were married and gone, and the work of "getting to rights" was all over, this indefatigable woman paid Mrs. Marlow a visit, and offered her assistance in completing the arrangements for the young housekeepers. "There is nothing for us to do," said Mrs. Marlow. "Lewis attended to the purchase of everything before leaving; and the orders are all in the hands of a competent upholsterer whom he has employed, as is also the key of the house. I offered to have the house-cleaning done, but Lewis refused to let me help him even in this. He is very methodical, and rather strict in some of his ideas. When the premises are pronounced ready for the occupancy of the future residents, you and I will play inspectors, and find as much fault as we can."

Mrs. Hunt went around by the house, on her way home. It was new and handsome, a brown stone front, with stone balconies and balustrades; but three stories high, it was true, yet of ample width and pitch of ceiling, and—as she discovered by skirting the square—at least three rooms deep all the way up. The location was unobjectionable; not more than four blocks from the paternal residence, and in a wider street. On the whole, she had no fault to find, provided Mr. Hammond had furnished it in such style as she would have recommended. She had her fears lest his sober taste in other respects should extend to these matters, and hinted something of the kind to her husband.

"I have confidence in Mr. Hammond to believe that he will allow his wife every indulgence compatible with his means," was the reply.

Mr. Hunt did not deem it obligatory upon him to state that his son-in-law had conferred with him upon numerous questions pertaining to Sarah's likes and probable wishes; that he had examined and approved of the entire collection of furniture, etc. selected for her use. Why should he, how could he, without engen-dering in his wife's bosom the suspicion that had accounted to him for Lewis's choice of the father as an adviser? namely, that the newly made husband had gained a pretty correct estimate of this managing lady's character, her penny-wise and pound-foolish policy, and intended to inaugurate altogether a different one in his house.

Regardless of Mrs. Marlow's polite insinuation that their room was preferable to their company until all things should be in readiness for inspection, the ambitious mother made sundry visits to the premises while they were being fitted up, and delivered herself of divers suggestions and recommendations, which fell like sand on a rock upon the presiding man of business.

On the day appointed for the tourists' return, Mrs. Marlow's carriage drew up at Mr. Hunt's door, by appointment, to take the mistress of the house upon the proposed visit of criticism of her daughter's establishment. Mrs. Marlow was in a sunny mood, and indisposed to censure, as was evinced by her ejaculations of pleasure at the general effect of each apartment as they entered, and praise of its component parts. Mrs. Hunt was not so indiscriminating. The millionaire's wife must not imagine that she was dazzled by any show of elegance, or that she was overjoyed at the prospect of her child's having so beautiful and commodious a home.

“The everlasting oak and green!” she uttered as they reached the dining-room. “It is a pity Mr. Hammond did not select walnut and crimson instead! Green is very unbecoming to Sarah.”

“Then we must impress upon her the importance of cultivating healthy roses in her cheeks, and wearing bright warm colors. This combination—green and oak—is pretty and serviceable, I think. The table is very neatly set, Mary,” continued Mrs. Marlow, kindly, to the tidy serving-maid. “Keep an eye on the silver, my good girl, until your mistress comes. Mrs. Hunt, shall we peep into the china-closets before we go to the kitchen? I have taken the liberty, at Lewis's request, of offering to your daughter the services of a couple of my protégées, excellent servants, who hired for years with one of my own children—Mrs. Marlaud, now in Paris. They are honest, willing, and, I think, competent. The manservant, if Lewis sees fit to keep one, he must procure himself.”

The china, glass, and pantries were in capital order; the kitchen well stocked, light, and clean, and dinner over the fire.

“You will be punctual to the minute, Katy, please!” was the warning here. “Mr. Hammond is particular in the matter of time.”

“And you will see that my daughter has a cup of clear, strong coffee!” ordered Mrs. Hunt, magisterially. “She is delicate, and accustomed to the very best of cookery.” And having demonstrated her importance and superior housewifery to the round-eyed cook, she swept out.

To an unprejudiced eye, the whole establishment was without a flaw; and, undisturbed by the captious objections of her companion in the survey, Mrs. Marlow saw and judged for herself, and carried home with her a most pleasing imagination of Lewis's gratification, and Sarah's delighted surprise with the scene that was to close their day of cold and weariness.

By Mr. Hammond's expressed desire to his father-in-law, there was no one except the domestics in the house when they arrived. As the carriage stopped, the listening maid opened the door, and a stream of radiance shot into the misty night across the wet pavement upon the two figures that stepped from the conveyance.

“He sees the light in happy homes!” The mental quotation brought back to Sarah the vision of that lonely evening ten months before, when she had moaned it in her dreary twilight musings at the window of her little room. “Dreary then, hopeless now!” and with this voiceless sigh, she crossed the threshold of her destined abode. With a kindly greeting to the servants in the hall, Lewis hurried his wife onward, past the parlor doors, into a library sitting-room, back of the show apartments, warm and bright, smiling a very home welcome. Here he placed her in a deep, cushioned chair, and, pressing her hands in his, kissed her, with a heartfelt—“May you be very happy in our home, dear wife!”

“Thank you!” she replied. “It is pleasant here, and you are too kind.”

“That is impossible where you are concerned. Sit here, while I see to the trunks. When they are carried up stairs, you can go to your room. Throw off your hat and cloak.”

He was very thoughtful of her comfort—too thoughtful, because his love made him watchful of her every look, word, and gesture. She was glad of the brief respite from this vigilance that allowed her to bury her face in her hands and groan aloud. She had no heart to look around her cage. No doubt it was luxurious; the bars softly and richly lined: the various arrangements the best of their kind; still, it was nothing but a cage—a prison, from which death only could release her.

The trim maid came for her wrappings, and directly afterwards Lewis, to take her up stairs.

"Not a very elaborate toilet, dear," he said, as he left her for his dressing-room. "You will see no one this evening but our father and mother, and they will remember that you have been travelling all day."

When she was ready, it lacked still a quarter of an hour of dinner-time, and she acceded to Lewis's proposal that they should go over their dwelling. By his order, there were lights in every room. The graceful furniture, the well contrasted hues of the soft carpets, the curtains and pictures showed to fine advantage. Everything was in place, from cellar to attic; not a symptom of parsimony or cheapness in the whole; and all betokened, besides excellent judgment, such conformity to, or unison with her taste, that Sarah, with all her heaviness of heart, was pleased. She was touched too with gratitude or remorse; for, when they were back in the cozy sitting-room, she laid her hand timidly on that of her husband, and said, falteringly:

"I do not deserve that you should take so much pains to gratify me, Mr. Hammond."

Over Lewis's face there flushed one of the rare smiles that made him positively handsome while they lasted. He grasped the shrinking fingers firmly, and drew his wife close to his side.

"Shall I tell you how to repay me for all that I have done, or ever can do, to promote your ease and enjoyment?"

"If you please." But her heart sank, as she foresaw some demands upon a love that had never existed—a treasury that, to him, was sealed and empty; yet whose poverty she dared not avow.

"Call me 'Lewis,' now that we are at home, dear. I cannot realize that you are indeed all mine—that our lives are one and the same, while you continue that very proper 'Mr. Hammond.'"

"It comes more naturally to my tongue, and don't you think it more respectful than—than—the other?"

"I ask no such form of respect from you. I do not fear lest you should fail 'to honor and obey' me, you little paragon of duty! Believe me, dearest, I fully understand and reverence the modest reserve, that has not yet ceased to be shyness, in the expression of your sentiments towards me. You are not demonstrative by nature. Neither am I. But since you are my other self, and there is no living being nearer to you than myself, ought we not to overcome this propensity to, or custom of locking up our feelings in our own breasts? Let me begin by a confession of one uncomfortable complaint, under which I have labored ever since our engagement. Do you know, darling, that I absolutely hunger—I cannot give any other name to the longing—I hunger and thirst to hear you say that you love me! Do you remember that you have never told me in so many words what you have given me other good reasons for believing? I need but one thing this evening to fill my cup with purest content. It is to have you say—openly, fearlessly, as my wife has a right to do—"Lewis, I love you!"

"It need be a source of no unhappiness to be married to a man whom one does not love, provided he is kind and generous!" say match-makers and worldly-wise mothers. Perhaps not, after one's conscience is seared into callousness by perjuries, and her forehead grown bold as brass; but the neophyte in the laudable work of adaptation to such circumstances will trip in her words and color awkwardly while acquiring this enviable hardihood.

Sarah's head fell, and her face was stained with blushes. One wild impulse was to throw herself at the feet of him whom she had wronged so foully, and confessing her mad, wicked deception upon his holiest feelings, pray him to send her away—to cast her adrift, and rid himself of a curse, while he freed her from the gentle, yet intolerable bondage of his love.

"Dinner is ready!" announced the servant. Sarah's senses returned and with them self-control. With a strange smile, she glanced up at him—a look he did not understand, yet could not guess was born of anguish—and said, with a hesitation that seemed pretty and coquettish to him—"Lewis! do you hear? May it please your worship, I am very hungry!"

"Tease! I will have my revenge yet! See if I do not!"

Laughing lightly, she eluded his outstretched arm, and sprang past him into the hall leading to the dining-room. She assumed the seat at the head of the table with a burlesque of dignity, and throughout the meal was more talkative and frolicsome than he had ever seen her before. So captivated was he by her lively discourse and bright looks, that he was sorry to hear the ring, proclaiming the coming of the expected visitors. The dessert had not been removed, and the girl was instructed to show them immediately into the dining-room.

A toast was drunk to the prosperity of the lately established household, and the gentlemen went off to the library.

"Always see to putting away your silver, Sarah!" counselled the mother. "And you had ought to get a common set of dinner and breakfast things. This china is too nice for every day use. Of course, Mr. Hammond can afford to get more when this is broken; but it's a first-rate rule, child, as you'll find, to put your money where it will show most. That's the secret of my management. Mr. Hammond must give you an allowance for housekeeping and pin-money. Speak to him about it right away. Men are more liberal while the honeymoon lasts than they ever are afterwards. Strike while the iron is hot. You can't complain of your husband so far. He has set you up very handsome. If I had been consulted about furnishing, I would have saved enough off of those third-story chambers and the kitchen to buy another pair of mirrors for your parlors. The mantels has a bare look. I noticed it directly I went in. To be sure, the Parian ornaments are pretty and tasty, and expensive enough—dear knows! but they don't make much of a display."

"I do not like the fashion of lining walls with mirrors," said Sarah in her old, short way; "and am satisfied with the house as it is. Shall we join the gentlemen?"

Nothing had ever showed her more plainly the degradation of her false position than the confident air her mother wore in making her coarse observations, and instructing her as to the method of managing her generous, confiding husband. It was the free-masonry of a mercenary wife, whose spouse would have been better represented to her mind by his money-bag than his own proper person, towards another of the same craft, who rated her lawful banker by corresponding rules.

"Will I then really grow to be like her and her associates?" Sarah questioned inly. "Will a fine house and its fixtures, will dress and equipage and pin-money so increase in importance as to fill this aching vacuum in my heart? Will a position in life, and the envy of my neighbors, make up to me for the loss of the love of which I used to dream, the happiness which the world owes me yet? Is this the coin in which it would redeem its promises?"

Mr. Hunt's mild features wore their happiest expression this evening. He arose at the ladies' entrance, and beckoned his daughter to a seat on the sofa beside him.

"You are a little travel-worn!" he said. "Your cheeks are not very ruddy."

"Did you ever see them when they were?" asked Sarah, playfully.

"She was always just that pale—when she was a baby," said Mrs. Hunt, setting herself in the arm-chair proffered by her son-in-law. "Lucy stole all the roses from her." Sarah may have thought that other and more grievous thefts had succeeded this doubtful one, but she neither looked nor said this. "And that reminds me, Mr. H.! Did you bring Lucy's letter for Sarah to read?"

"I did." Mr. Hunt produced it. "Keep it, and read it at your leisure, Sarah."

"They are supremely happy, I suppose?" remarked Lewis, with the benevolent interest incident to his fellowship of feeling with them.

"For all the world like two turtle-doves!" Mrs. Hunt rejoined. "Their letters are a curiosity. It is 'Phil.' and 'Lucy' from one end to the other. I mean to keep them to show to them five years from now. Hot love is soon cool, and by and by they will settle down as sensible as any of the rest of us. You don't begin so, I see, Sarah, and I am pleased at it. Between me and you, it's two-thirds of it humbug! There is Victoria West that was! She looks ready, in company, to eat up that lean monkey of a George Bond. I don't believe but she shows him the other side of the picture in private."

Sarah heard her father's suppressed sigh, and felt, without looking up, that her husband's eyes sought hers wistfully. The unobservant dame pursued her free and easy discourse. Mr. Hammond was "one of the family" now, and there was no more occasion for choice grammar or fine sentiments before him.

"Not that I blame Victoria for taking him. He was a good offer, and she wasn't much admired by the gentlemen—rich as Mr. West is. Mr. Bond is twenty-five years older than she is, and wears false teeth and a toupee; but I suppose she is willing to overlook trifles. She watches out for the main chance, and will help him take care of his money, as well as spend it. Vic. is a prudent girl."

"Lucy—Mrs. Benson—was at home when she wrote, was she not?" interrogated Mr. Hammond.

"Yes, at his father's. His mother keeps house, and Lucy has nothing to do but ride, visit, and entertain company. She says the house is crowded the whole time, and she has so many beaux that Philip stands no chance of speaking a word to her. She is perfectly happy."

Notwithstanding the various feelings of the listeners, none of them could resist this picture of a felicitous honeymoon, so naively spoken. Lewis's laugh cleared the vapors from his brow, and the pain at Sarah's heart did not hinder her from joining in.

"And the ousted bridegroom, perforce, seeks consolation in the society of his fair friends?" said Lewis. "If this is the way young married people show the love-sickness you complained of just now, Mrs. Hunt, I am content with our more staid ways—eh, Sarah?"

"Quiet ways suit me best," was the answer.

"Still water runs deep," quoted Mrs. Hunt. "I used to worry over your stay-at-home habits and eternal study of books, Sarah; but I'm ready to say now that you was sensible to behave as you did, as it has turned out. I don't mean to flatter Mr. Hammond, but I'd ten times rather you had taken him than a dried-up widower like George Bond."

"Thank you!" bowed Lewis, desirous of diverting attention from Sarah's growing uneasiness beneath her mother's congratulations.

Mrs. Hunt held on her way. "I never had a fear lest Lucy shouldn't marry well. She was pretty and attractive, and knew too much about the world to throw herself away for the sake of love in a cottage. But now the danger is over, I will allow that I used to mistrust Sarah here sometimes. You was just queer enough to fall in love with some adventurer with a foreign name, and never a cent in his pocket—yes, and marry him, too, in spite of all that could be said and done to prevent it. I was forever in a 'feaze' about you; fancying that you was born to make an out-and-out love-match—the silliest thing a girl can do, in my opinion."

"You never dreamed of her 'taking up,' as the phrase is, with a humdrum individual like myself," said Lewis. "Nor, to be candid, did I, for a long time, Mrs. Hunt. Yet I cannot say that I regret her action, disadvantageous to herself though it was. I wrote to you of our visit to New Orleans, did I not, sir?" he continued to Mr. Hunt, inwardly a little disgusted by the frank revelations his mamma-in-law was making of her principles and plans.

The subject so interesting to most wedded people, so embarrassing to one of the present party, was not again introduced during the elder couple's stay. When Lewis returned to the library, after seeing them out, Sarah sat where he had left her, her hand shading her eyes—deep in thought, or overcome by weariness.

"You had better go up to your room, dear," said Lewis. "I wonder you are not worn out completely."

She arose to obey; walked as far as the door, then came back to him.

"It may appear strange to you that I should speak openly of such a suspicion; but I must beg you not to suppose for an instant that in my acceptance of your offer of—marriage, I was actuated by mercenary motives. You look surprised"—she hurried on yet faster while her resolution lasted—"but I could not rest without doing myself this act of justice. Much that mother said to-night might—must have led you to this conclusion. I would not have you think worse of me than I deserve, and of this one act of baseness I am innocent."

"My precious little wife, how excited you are! and over what a nonsensical imagination! Suspect you—the noblest as well as the dearest of women—of selling yourself, body and soul, for money? Listen to my speech now, dear Sarah!"

He sat down and pulled her to his knee. "I esteem you, as I love you above all the rest of your sex—above any other created mortal. I know you to be a pure, highminded woman. When I part with this persuasion, may I part also with the life that doubt on this point would render wretched! Judge, then, whether it be possible for me to link this holy realization of womanhood with the thought of another character, which I will describe. I hold that she who enters the hallowed state of wedlock through motives of pecuniary interest, or ambition, or convenience—indeed, through any consideration save that of love, single and entire, for him to whom she pledges her vows, stands, in the sight of her Maker and the angels, on a level with the most abandoned outcast that pollutes the earth she treads. I shock you, I see; but on this subject I feel strongly. I have seen much, too much, of fashionable marriages formed for worldly aggrandizement—for riches; sometimes in pique at having lost a coveted lover. With my peculiar sentiments, I feel that I could endure no heavier curse than to contract an alliance like any of these. I repeat it, I believe in Woman as God made her and intended she should live, if for no other reason than because I recollect my mother, boy as I was when she died; and because I know and have you, my true, blessed Wife!"

THE MAIDS OF HONOR TO MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS.

THEY were allowed one gallon of wine, among them all, two rolls of bread each, and the same diet as their royal mistress, which on flesh days consisted of four sorts of soup, and four entrées, a piece of boiled beef, boiled loin of mutton, and a boiled capon. The second course was of roast meats, one joint of mutton, one capon, three pullets or pigeons, three leverets or rabbits, and two pieces of bacon. No sweet dishes are enumerated. The dessert consisted of seven dishes of fruit and preserves, and one dish of chicory paste.

Supper, which was served at four o'clock in the afternoon, was a repetition of the same viands as at dinner—good, plain, substantial fare, with nothing fanciful. Neither tea, coffee, nor chocolate was known in the sixteenth century; milk, whey, and eau sucrée were the light beverages which supplied the place of those luxuries with Mary Stuart and her maids of honor. Each of these ladies had a manservant and a maid. The men dined with an officer called the Usher of the Ladies and the passementier, an ingenious needleman who worked the borders of dresses and beds, and designed patterns.

Their maids dined at a separate table with the wife of one of the queen's butlers, and one of her female drolls, or fools, called La Jardinière. There were several of these in Queen Mary's establishment, who were dressed in the royal livery—scarlet and yellow. Mary Fleming and her three associate Maries were allowed half a pound of candles between them every night, from the 1st of November till the last of March, and, besides this, a bougie of yellow wax, weighing an ounce, each.

Their salaries on their return to Scotland were 200 livres de Tournois, which would be about the rate of twenty pounds a year; but then they were clothed at the queen's expense, and that very sumptuously. On the anniversary of the death of Francis II. of France, the lamented consort of their royal mistress, black velvet was delivered from her wardrobe stores to each of the four Maries for their second mourning; also black cloth for their riding-cloaks and hoods when the court was going on a progress into the country; and there were tailors in the royal household who made their dresses—no greater impropriety than the employment of male habit-makers in modern times. They had received much higher salaries when Mary was Queen Consort of France, but considerable reductions were necessarily made in the wages of both her Scotch and French ladies on her return to Scotland, where the strictest economy was practised in the queen's household, in order not to exceed her reduced income.

THE CASKET OF THE YEAR.

BY WILLIE E. PAROR.

Pearl to the P'ble.—May.

O SWEETEST month of all the year!
All nature with a welcome waits
To greet you as you pass the gates
That open to this manifold sphere.

Thy sister April, coy and chill,
(Like a chaste virgin, love forsworn,)
Scarce yielded daisies for the lawn,
Or a green mantle for the hill.

But thou! whose genial bosom glows
With all a lover's ardor—thou!
With radiance streaming from thy brow;
With cheeks the color of the rose—

With steps whose touch to bloom gives birth;
With lips whose breath yields odors rare—
Thou comest, bidding all to share
The glories born to mother Earth.

All day the birds thy praises sing;
All day the roses yield perfume;
And even night discards her gloom
To fold thee 'neath her starry wing.

The farmer at his daily task,
The merchant at his ledger leaves,
The schoolboy binding wisdom's sheaves,
Children, who in thy sunshine bask,

Bless thee in various word and way,
And feel the impulse of thy spell,
While even old age loves to dwell
Upon the memories of May.

Hope—the bright Phosphor of youth's sky—
Points forward unto coming May,
Within whose wealth of winning ways
The endless charms of pleasure lie.

While Memory, whose horizon
Holds Hesper—star of life's decline—
To old age teaches, line by line,
The lessons she from Time hath won.

O sweetest month of all the year!
Of lightness, brightness, bliss, and bloom,
Of song, of sunshine, of perfume,
Of all that human hearts hold dear—

All hail! and may thy blessings stay
About our daily paths, to yield
The treasures of a harvest-field
White with the memories of May!

VANITY is the fruit of ignorance, which thrives best in subterranean places, where the air of heaven and the light of the sun cannot reach it.

A ROUGH DOSE.

BY MARY FORMAN.

MRS. LAWRENCE WILLIAMS was an invalid!

In one brief sentence were comprised all the domestic miseries of Lawrence Williams, who had given, fourteen years before our story commences, his heart, hand, and honest love to the lady bearing his name. Poor Lawrence! His hopes of happiness faded slowly year by year before the tyrant who held his wife chained to her sofa or bed from New Year's till Christmas. He was an upright, simple-minded man, this cousin of mine, about whom I write, yet withal shrewd, and not easily imposed upon, and when I came to spend a few weeks in his particularly uncomfortable residence, he opened his heart to me. We had been companions and confidants in childhood and youth, indeed until his marriage took him from his native town, so I could listen and understand.

"You see how it is, Lizzie," he said, one morning, as he came into the library where I was sitting; "my home is not fit to invite you into."

"Why Larry!" I said, surprised to see his genial face so overcast, "what a doleful face!"

"And a doleful heart, Lizzie! For the last ten years I have not had a meal in comfort. My children are neglected, my home wretched, ill-trained servants rule the house, and were it not for—Oh, Lizzie, what can I do! I love Mary, and this is all that keeps me from absolutely running away. I have thought of getting a house-keeper, but she resents that as a positive insult."

"But, Larry, if she is sick"—

He interrupted me.

"It pains me more than I can express to say so, Lizzie, but Mary is not so sick as she fancies. I have no doubt that she suffers; for who can be idle for weeks together, and not feel weak and miserable. But she is never too ill for a party, recovers rapidly when the opera is here, and can attend to a tea-party with perfect ease, but is too ill to see to her house, her husband, or her children."

It was all true. Five days' residence in the house gave me a complete insight into Mary's character. She was a blonde, who in her days of girlhood was very pretty, but who, in her now neglected dress, with languid movements and sleepy, half opened eyes, was far from lovely. Her natural indolence, overcome by her love for her husband in the first years of their married life, had degenerated into a laziness that took advantage of every trifling ailment to keep up weeks of invalid privileges. At times shame would drive her into trying to rectify some of the abuses of which her husband justly complained; but the over-exertion at such times acting upon a system weakened by long spells of inertness, produced pain and actual suffering, that formed for her an admirable excuse for "letting things go." Her children, dirty and ragged, left entirely to the care of servants, were fast becoming vicious. With a heavy heart, I watched my cousin's course. His love of order outraged, his paternal feelings violated, his complaints met with threats or murmurings, he was becoming desperate. Mary's favorite weapon was a fainting fit, and a gloomy appeal to his feelings.

"I cannot live long; and when I am gone you will regret such cruelty," she would sigh, if he remonstrated; and then a flood of tears, or a faint, would bring his kind heart to penitence and a promise to try to "get along."

Another trial was the dear intimate friend of the invalid, a Miss Elvira Jenkins, who revenged herself for the bad taste that left her a lonely maiden, by violent abuse of the whole male sex. Upon Mary she lavished her pity and sympathy, and did not spare her tongue in opinions of Larry's hard-hearted cruelty in expecting this suffering angel to exert herself. My cousin and myself were both convinced that if Miss Elvira were once removed Mary's better sense and feelings might prompt her to a reformation. At last, a plan suggested itself to me, and I, in solemn confidence imparted it to Larry.

"Lizzie," he cried, aghast, "it is too cruel!"

"Harsh medicine must be used, when mild ones fail," I said, resolutely.

"But, Lizzie, to hint at such a possibility."

"Doesn't she speak of it every day?"

He paced up and down the room with much agitation. Finally, stopping in front of me, he said: "I'll try it!"

The following morning I was in Mary's room, removing from a stand the breakfast dishes, when Larry came in.

"Coffee all cold, and weak as water," he said, in a sulky way, without any of his customary kind words for his wife.

"Shall I make you a cup of coffee?" I asked.

"No," he answered, roughly; "you were not invited here to wait on me. If the house were properly managed, there would be coffee fit to drink served on the table."

"O dear!" whined Mary, "I am sure the servants do as well as can be expected, left so much to themselves."

"They need not be left to themselves."

"Oh, Larry, this eternal song is killing me. You complain all the time. I'm sure it is not my fault that I am a poor, suffering invalid"—here she began to grow pathetic; "I wish I was a hearty, strong woman like Lizzie, and could make you comfortable. I'm sure I love you too much to have you uncomfortable if I was able to prevent it." Here Larry would have softened, but I looked daggers at him. "Bear it for a little while, Lawrence; I am sure it will not be long before I die—I am so delicate"—this was between sobs—"and these scenes—wear on my constitution—you will soon be rid of me—and then—when your harshness has driven me—to the grave—you will repent of it—but—I—forgive you"—and then the hysterics came in.

Larry waited patiently till she was quiet again, and then, with a perfection of acting that would have made his fortune on the stage, he stepped coolly to the mirror and began to brush his hair.

"Mary," he said, quietly, not turning his head, "do you really think you will die soon?"

With utter amazement at the matter-of-fact tone, Mary said, "Yes!"

"Well, so you've said a number of times, and I've been thinking it over lately. I think, after you are gone, allowing of course a decent time for mourning, that it will be my duty to the children to marry again."

"What!" The word came from the bed with the force of a pistol shot.

"You see I am still young and good-looking, and I shall try to select a healthy, active partner, who will make my house a home, and be truly a mother to the children. A woman who loves me will of course take pride in my home and family, and I can, I know, make her happy. There is a fund of love in my heart for the woman who really loves me."

Poor Mary was sitting up, with straining eyes and pale face. "Lawrence!" she gasped. Then with a sickening fear that her husband's long tried affections had in reality strayed from her, she said, "Who?"

"Well, I was thinking," he said, "of Miss Elvira Jenkins. She is accustomed to the children, and knows my ways, and if you could exert yourself, Mary, and show her round the house a little"—

He was interrupted by a well aimed pillow flying straight at his head. Mary was crimson with fury. Bottles, spoons, glasses followed the pillow!

"So! that's what she comes here for, is it? To make love to the most cruel, falsehearted man that ever lived! You've made all your arrangements, have you?"—here a bottle of lavender water smashed the mirror. "You'd be very glad to have me die and leave her a clear field"—a tablespoon took Larry in one eye—"but I won't! I won't! I won't!" The last word was a scream, and Mary, utterly exhausted, fell back, this time in a real fainting fit. Lawrence, all penitence, would have ruined all by staying to coax her back to amiability, but I drove him from the house. My patient recovered with a flood of tears. Gravely yet kindly I tried to make her realize the full error of her life, and, softened by the horrible fear that she was really losing the love of her kind, indulgent husband, she made many vows of amendment.

It was a long day's work we did, and when Lawrence came home his eyes fairly shone with pleasure. The well-spread tea-table was covered with nicely arranged dishes, a spotless cloth, and clear glass, silver, and china. His two little girls, in simple but neat dresses, were in the room, but his eyes rested on his wife.

Flushed by exercise and agitation, Mary's cheeks and eyes were bright as of old. She wore a light blue dress, with snowy collar and sleeves, and her soft blonde hair was arranged in wide becoming braids. With a quiet grace, though her hand trembled with excitement, she presided over the table, and led the conversation to indifferent subjects. The evening was spent in the long unoccupied parlor, where the piano did good service in giving fingers the power to take the place of talk. It was not till after the children had retired that Mary went up to her husband. He was standing by the fireplace looking at her with fond eyes. She stole into his arms, whispering, "Forgive me, Larry!"

"My wife! My own dear Mary!"

I crept away with eyes full of tears.

Two years later, I visited them again. A neat, well-ordered household, and quiet, well-behaved, well-dressed children bore witness to Mary's reform; while she assures me that when, as often occurs, she is prostrated by real sickness, no kindness can exceed that paid her by Larry. Miss Jenkins has retired in disgust, not relishing the cure effected by the "rough dose."

LETTERS FROM AUNT BETSY BROOMCORN.

LETTER V.

DEAR MR. GODEY: Since I begun to tell you about my experience at Pendle Holler, I 'spose I orter finish; but it seems ruther foolish in an old woman like me to tell you all these things. You must take it into count, that I was young then, and didn't know so much about the world as some girls of my age, that had been about more. I don't mind tellin' you so much, or havin' the folks in Scrub Oak know it, but I shouldn't like to have it get back to Pendle Holler that I told these things over, twenty years afterward.

You see I went back to Mr. Stowerses to board, a few days after the old lady died. Nat was drefle glad to see me. He said that jest as soon as the moon changed, father and he was goin' to saw off the lims to the apple-trees, that grew up agin the house, so the sun could shine in a little. "Ain't you glad," says he, "we're goin' to sow some grass seed there 'n' put some new steps where them old monldy ones was. I dug up 'bout a cart-load of burdocks, 'n' if you'll go with the gals 'n' me we're goin' to burn em out in the medder to-night. Father said we might. Schoolma'am, dast you set in granny's chair?" I said I didn't want to, but I 'd go with em to burn the burdocks. So, after supper, we put on our sun-bonnets and helped Nat make a pile of the old steps, the dry burdocks, and some straw, and after the cows was milked, and it was dark enough to see stars, we took a shovel-full of coals and went out into the medder. Nat put the coals down among the straw, and fanned them with his straw hat till they begun to blaze. Great white puffs of smoke come out of the pile first. Then little threads of flame crept out in sight, and finally a great clump of waverin' red flames flashed out of the top, and swayed round with the wind. The light shone on Nat's brown face, and old lop-brimmed hat, and made a perfect picter of him, paintin' up his clothes till they looked like anything else but jest a coarse cotton shirt and tow trowsers. Clary and Idy poked the fire with sticks, and laughed right out to see the sparks flyin' up among the stars. There was a great oak tree close by, and I remember the nearest leaves looked as if they was gilty. While the girls was at play, Nat come round to me. Says he, "Schoolma'am, Liddy was over here last night, 'n' I heard her tell mother that she 'n' Kezier had settled with Square Kinyon. Mother wanted to know what on airth she meant, 'n' she said the Square was a drefle good-natured man 'n' he 'd make a good neighbor; but, says she, you never did hear of sich a trick as he played Kezier 'n' me. He come to our house two or three times runnin' about five o'clock, 'n' got his supper with us; 'n' then he 'd set 'n' talk to father 'n' mother all the evenin'. Finally he got a chance to talk to Kezier a minit, he up 'n' asked her if she 'd have him. Kezier was took so suddin she didn't know what to say at fust, but she told him she reckoned she didn't want to. 'Now,' says Liddy, 'what d' you s'pose he said?' 'I dunno,' says mother. 'Well,' says Liddy, 'he said, you don't understand me, Kezier. I wanted to know if you didn't think Liddy 'd have me. I've got a pooty comfortable place; seems to me 'twould jest suit a spry gal like Liddy. Now don't you think so, Kezier? And she said she wouldn't wonder. Geuss he 'd find out by askin'. Says he, 'won't you ask her yourself?' She reckoned she hadn't better, Liddy might n't like it, she was ruther techy bout sich things. 'Well,' says he, 'ef I had a chance.' 'La,' says she, 'be you in a hurry, Square?' He said, 'No, but when he 'd made up his mind he hated to wait,' so says she, 'Kezier jest called me to come 'n' husk them roastin' ears fur the Square. She was going to get some salt to eat with em.' When she come back the Square was sayin' as crank as could be, 'I'm sorry you're so short, Liddy, I only asked ye 'cause you seemed to be ruther 'spectin' it. I didn't mean nothin'. I'll tell ye now, I'm going to be married rite off, 'n' if ye want to, I'll ask you to my weddin'.' Says she, 'I laughed 'n' said I didn't care where I went if ony they had plenty of fun.' 'Now,' says she, 'did you ever hear the like of that? He asked me to have him, jest as if he meant it, 'n' I said, I thought I hadn't better, 'cause I was too young.' 'O shaw,' says he, 'I don't care anything about that.' 'Maybe I shouldn't,' says I, 'ef you wasn't quite so old.' 'Well,' says he, 'woun't you have me, Liddy?' 'No,' says I. 'I won't,' 'n' so he up 'n' pretended he didn't mean it. Now, schoolma'am, what's the use in a man's havin' to make sich a fool of hisself to git married? The Square thinks because he's middlin well off, he kin jest have his pick out of all the gals in the Holler. I wish he'd ask my advice. I should tell him that Darkis Blinn was jist sich a woman as he orter to marry." "I wish he would ask your advice, Nat, and take it too, for Darkis needs a good hum," says I. "But he wouln't do it, schoolma'am. He's got so stuck up that he thinks nobody's good enuff, but the smartest 'n' pootiest gals in the Holler. Now I reckon Tilda Button was about the nicest gal, 'round here. I wish 't I knew where she was 'n' what she was a doin'. Oh, but she rit some su-relement poetry though, didn't she? There's one verse.

"An' all the stars was stannin'
A-listenin' in the sky.
Their eyes a-weepin' britteness
For sich a melodi' "

"Go on, Nat," says I; "let's hear the rest on't."

"The waves upon the oshun
Was chained to the shore;
The wind-foam up the mountains
Had ceased their holler roar

"The thunder and the litenin'
Was folded in a cloud,
And to the ground, the waterfall
Its silver forrid bowed.

"The rustlin' corn was silent,
The popple leaves hung still,
And all the world was listenin' to
The lonesome whippoorwill."

"Ain't that got a tang to it? Tell ye what, I like sich. I know a good lot more she writ; maybe I'll tell 'em to ye some time; but jest now I reckon we'd better go in. The gals has laft over this burnin' some; I'm jest goin' to see ef I can't brighten 'em up some. 'Sposin' I learn to play on the drum? Wouldn't that be kind of lively-like, 'n' chirk our folks up a little?" "I don't know, Nat," says I. "I guess you'd better ask your father. I reckon a fiddle is liveliest." "You don't say so!" says Nat. "I didn't think so, for every time I've hearn one, I've felt as ef I should bust right out a-cryin'; it made me feel so kind of solemn 'n' bad, jest as ef I wanted to lay down in the woods somewhere 'n' die, 'n' have the leaves all fall off the trees 'n' cover me up. Don't you never feel kind of baddish when you hear a fiddle?" "Why, Nat," says I, "don't you know everybody uses a fiddle to make music for dancin'; it can't be solemn." "But I say it is," says Nat; "'n' dancin' 's solemn, too; seems to me ef the Lord was to come down out of the clouds before me, I should be just as likely to dance as David. I've hearn granny read about his dancin' afore the Lord, 'n' I 'spect it was the solemnest thing he could do."

A few days after that, when I was in school one afternoon, just a-hearin' the first class spell, somebody rapped on the door. I went and looked out, for you see the door was wide open, and there stood Square Kinyon, his everlastin' invisible green Sunday coat and hat, and oh, such a smile lookin' out of his little blue-gray eyes! I colored up in a minit, and I didn't know what on earth to say. He took hold of his hat, and pulled it over one side, and bowed, and said: "Good afternoon, Miss Broomcorn; I'm one of the trustees. Been a-comin' in to see your school ever and ever so long. Didn't have time till to-day. Hope you'll overlook it." "Oh yes," says I, "certainly. Won't you come in?" So he come and took my chair, and sot down, and put his hands together on the desk before him, with all the pints of the fingers twirlin', and the thumbs stuck up some like a fox's ears. Says he: "Go right on with your school, don't mind me; I'm only an obsarver." If he only knew how provoked I was at him for comin' alone, he would have took his hat and cleared out; but, bless you, he hadn't any notion of clearin' out. He took a book pretty soon and looked over, while I put out words. Somehow the children didn't like to have him there either, for they acted ridiculous. They yelled out their letters when they was spellin', and spit from one end of the house to the other, and pretended they had monstrous clunks of tobaccer in their mouths all the time. I felt my face burn like fire, and tears reddy to come into my eyes; but I was too mad to cry. When they was done spelling, Gains Jones went down to the foot from his place at the head, and Sally Wood standing' in his place, said, "'Tention!" and they all brightened up, and looked straight at me. "Hands down," says Sally. They all unfolded their hands at once. "Decence," says Sally, and the boys bobbed their chins on to their stummaks, and jerked 'em up agin in a twinklin', while the girls curcheyed all at once with a straight up and down stoop and rise motion. Then they scattered to their seats, and the Square rubbed his hands and said, "Very good, very good!" I caught little Sam Stowers flippin' paper at him with a quill, and stopped him; but in a minit more they was all a-snickerin' at one of the little Joneses for puttin' his hands upon the desk jest as the Square did his. I was goin' to dismiss school rite away, but the Square wanted to look at the 'ritin' books. I got out the 'ritin'-books and samples and showed him. Great deel he knew about samples anyway; but he looked 'em all over, big and little letters, flower-baskets, hearts, marks, stars, and crosses. I thought he never would leave off. Then he read most every copy in the 'ritin'-books, and praised 'em up wonderful. Finally, when he got done, I read over the list of scholars and dismissed the school. The scholars gave a yell, pitched on their hats and bunnits, and started fur home. So didn't the Square. I tied on my bunnit, pinned my shawl, and there he sot, as smilin' as a basket of chips. I wasn't goin' to wait for him; so says I, "Square Kinyon, I shall have to lock this door." "Oh, certin," says he, a-springin' up and coming out doors. "I'd forgot where I was. Very pleasant place here?" "Ruther," says I, startin' off for hum. "How do you like Pendle Holler?" says he. "Don't you think it's a drefle nice place to live in, only the company ain't much to brag of, the young folks, 'specially. They're ruther shaller, considering their advantages." "I don't know," says I; "I ain't so much acquainted with the folks as you be." "Oh, of course not, Miss Broomcorn; but then I hope you will be afore long. "I hope you mean to stay here." I declare I didn't think what I was about when I answered: "Maybe they won't want me to stay." I meant to keep school agin, of course; but the Square took me up quicker 'n a flash. "Oh, if that 's all, you 'll stay. I want ye to. I've set my heart on it. I loved ye the first minit I set eyes on ye. You 'll marry me, and stay here, won't ye? I am well off. I've got considerable money, and you shall have a silk frock, and I'll take you to Boston for a weddin' tower, and there 's heaps of things for housekeepin' in my house—heaps of 'em. I wouldn't have anybody else but you for all the world. Lemme see, I'll git Skimmer to buy you some earrings and gold beads, wouldn't you like that? Just tell me when it shall be; but don't, for massy sake, put it off long." I felt my forehead all break out in a cold sweat while he was goin' on so. Says I, as soon as I got a chance: "For goodness sake, Square Kinyon, jest hear me. I don't want your gold beads, nor silk frock, nor I don't wan't to marry you. There 's too much difference in our ages." "Why," says he "that 's a slim excuse. I ain't so old as I might be; besides I'll git some new teeth when we go to Boston. They do sich things there. You 'd better think of it now. You will, won't ye? I'll give you till to-morrer to think about it." "I wouldn't for all the world," says I. "It would kill me to think about it till to-morrer. I can tell ye now jest as well as then. I can't have you for a husband, Square." "Oh, but you think about it. I'll fetch my hosses round and give you a ride after supper, and we 'll talk it over agin." I begun to feel cross. Says I: "No, Square Kinyon, you needn't fetch your hosses round where I'm goin; if you do, I won't speak to you. I sha'n't marry you, and you may consider it settled, and drop the subjeck." "Well," says he, a-colorin' up, "such young flirts never know what's good for 'em. You 'll be sorry yet, I reckon, when it won't du you any good. Good-arternoon, Miss." And the Square turned 'round, and hopped over the fence into a medder as spry as a boy. Reckon he wanted to show how smart he was. I could see him a-footin' it 'cross lots, and he stepped off as if he was a little riled in his temper. I was, I own. Not but what I'd thought my chance might come with all the rest to git an offer from the Square. He 'd took every good-natured, neighborly word to heart so much, he really thought everybody was settin' caps at him. Well, it was Polly Mariar's turn now, sence Dr. Stirrup's girl was jest a-goin' to marry somebody else, and there wa'n't no chance there. I hearn Ma'am Jinks say once that if she was a bit like her mother, she 'd make the Square stan' 'round, if she took a notion to marry him. Maybe she would; I didn't care sence I'd got rid of him now.

I hadn't but four weeks left, and I begun to feel lonesome and homesick. I'd boarded at Sam Stowers's, and ever so many other places; but I was a-goin' to stay with Deacon Pendle's folks a few days before I went home; so I went down there one Saturday night. Miss Pendle had a cake in the bake-kettle, and the tea-kettle on. She made me come out behind the house to see her chickens, and she drawed a bucket of water, and turned it over my hands while I washed my dusty face, and neck, and arms. Oh, such water! it was as cool and sweet as a spring in a shady place. Then I went up stairs, and put on my pink calico frock and silk apron, and smoothed down my hair, and come down stairs as fresh as if I'd jest got up in the mornin'. When the Deacon come in, he shook hands with me, and said he never see me look so bright. Jest as we was settin' down to supper, who should drive up but Deacon Moody and his wife. Of course they had to come in, and Miss Pendle put some more plates on the table, and we all sot down together. The Deacon, Deacon Moody I mean, was jest as glum as ever, and his wife jest as sharp and loud-spoken. She said they'd been over to the Corners a-looking at some furniture. Mr. Damerill owed 'em, and they had got to take furniture for pay. "Why," says Deacon Pendle, "Polly Mariar ain't goin' to get married, is she, Miss Moody?" "I dunno but she may some time, Deacon; anyway, we've got to take the things, and if Polly Mariar gits married, she knows how to take care on 'em better 'n the most of folks, ef I do say it. She is none of your poor shirks. I'll warrant her to make any man fore-handed in the house. And Polly Mariar needn't go out of the way to git married either. There's them as good as the best she can have any minit. Miss Pendle, is your four-and-twenty reed to hum, and your new linen harness? I should like to try 'em on a new piece I'm going to put in, one of these days." "Why, massy on us," says Miss Pendle, "what be you a going to do with so much linen?" "Well," says Miss Moody, liftin' up her eyebrows, "somebody can use it ef I can't. I'm allers exposed to gittin' clean out of a thing before I have anything to supply myself with new. It's a sartin sign of a poor housekeeper. Miss Broomcorn, I wisht you 'd let me have a pattern of your frock sleeves—seems to me they stick out good. Where do you git your pattern? Oh, that's it? Land sakes! There, Deacon, you'll git the stum-rak ake if you take another piece of cake." "Oh no," says Miss Pendle, "not a mite of it. Do take another slice, Deacon. You take another, Miss Moody." "Well, I will; come to think," says Miss Moody, "you're allers famous for cake. Have another piece ef your mind to, Deacon." The Deacon had been lookin' at the cake ruther wishful, but he didn't take one till Deacon Pendle passed him the plate. "I reckon," says he, afterwards, "they don't 'low him to eat cake at hum."

After supper, Miss Moody borrowed a lot of quills, and a shuttle out of Miss Pendle's loom, a pair of hand cards and a quill wheel. Then they went off hum—Miss Moody's big thick shoulders almost crowdin' the Deacon's poor, lean, little body out of the seat; and Dolly, as big and fat as Miss Moody herself, joggin' off at her own rate without mindin' the Deacon's slappin' the lines over her back when they started.

Next day we went to meetin'. Of course, you know, 'most everybody in Pendle Holler would be there. I could see Dolly Jinks makin' mouths at me from Gran'ther Jinks's pew. She wanted me to look at Square Kinyon. He sat with Darkis Blinn and his little girl. Darkis was a sober-lookin' mortal; but the Square wasn't, I can assure you. His face fairly glistened with grins, and he had on a new blue and white neck hankercher, and a speckled vest. I 'spose he 'd about wore out the others, wearin' 'em 'round so much lately, courtin'. Pooty soon Miss Moody come in, with Polly Mariar close behind her, and the Deacon shirkin' along after 'em as meek as a sheep. They wasn't fairly settled before meetin' begun, but somehow folks would look at 'em. They looked when they stood up at prayers, and when they set down for sermon, and when they ought to be findin' their places in the hymn book, they looked; but they looked all at once and together when Elder Jones got up and read out the names of "Timothy Kinyon" and "Polly Mariar Moody," who intended marriage. I 'spose nobody had anything agin it, though they was asked to say so, if they had. Well, the folks didn't want anything to talk about that noon-time I can tell you, if it was Sunday. Dolly Jinks told me that she and Reuben found it out in season, or they'd been called at the same time. "I wouldn't have stood that," says Dolly, "so I jest told Reuben to run over to Elder Jones's, and take back the notis. I put it off a hull week," says she; "though Reuben did look a little put out, I reckon he'll git over it. Now, you'll see what a bustle Miss Moody will be in, and how she'll snub the Deacon. That's the way Polly Mariar'll snub Square Kinyon one of these days, and she'll have her mother to help her, too. That little gal is to be pitied. There ain't no chance for her unless she grows up as big and stout as Polly Mariar herself. Her father won't dast to do a thing for her. Come, don't you wish you was goin' to the weddin'? There'll be one kind of cake baked in four different ways, and they won't let the Deacon eat any of that. Poor Deacon! I tell ye what, Betsy, I'm a-goin' to manage to have the Deacon come when Reube and I git married, and I'll stuff him with goodies then, for once in his life."

In the afternoon meetin', Square Kinyon looked redder, and more pleased than ever. Everybody 'd been a wishin' him joy, and he really begun to think he'd done something smart. As for Mrs. Moody, a great pair of brass rimmed spectacles was all she had on in the way of extra fixins, and Polly Mariar didn't look as if she knew anything about it, or had ever heard of Square Kinyon at all. I set in the gallery that afternoon, and Nat Stowers was there. He looked so sober I couldn't help thinkin' about him, and wonderin' what he was thinkin' about all the afternoon, when he set and watched the wasps a sailin' round, and round, and bumpin' their backs agin the walls, and buzzin' up and down the windows. After meetin' was out, Nat went with me over to Deacon Pendle's, and set down on the door step, and begun to whittle a laylock sprout. "Why, Nat," says Deacon Pendle, "be you always so sober?" Nat bust out a laffin'. Says he, "I've been a wantin' to tell somebody so bad, that it laid heavy on my mind. You ain't agoin' to laugh at me, schoolma'am, nor you, Deacon, 'cause you stan' as good a chance to git scart as I did, afore it happened. You see I goes right by the old Biddle house when I drive away my cows, 'n' it's all shackly 'n' tumblin' to pieces. Well, I was comin' along one evenin' pooty late. I warn't thinkin' of nothin', till all at once I heard somebody knockin' in the house. I thought to be sure somebody's in there 't aint no sort of business there. So I jist went 'n' pushed the door back, 'n' peeped in. There warn't nobody there; I could see into the bed-room 'n' all over. It was all still. Wall, says I, that's curus. Guess 'twas a woodpecker, so I went off. When I come back I hearn it agin. I didn't turn out to look for 't; but next mornin' I hearn it agin, louder. So I shyed round and looked. There warn't no woodpecker there at all, but somethin' rapped, rapped hard summers inside the house. I climbed into a winder on the back side 'n' looked agin. It was all as empty as a last year's snail shell. Wall, I jist went off 'n' said nothin'. Fur three mornings 'n' nights, I hearn that rappin' every time I went by the house, 'n' I begun to feel as ef I'd a little rather not go there, but you see I darn't tell, so I gin a little run 'n' whistled sum when I cum there so as not to hear it. Wall, day before yesterday I spunked up a bit. Thinks I it won't hurt me wuss to see it than it does to hear it. I'll jist go 'n' search down cellar, 'n' up garret. So I went there. I hadn't teched the door stone before I hearn three faint raps. Just as if they didn't mean to scare me. I felt my heart give a big thump 'n' my face 'n' hands prickled all over. I thought of Gran'ther Biddle's wooden leg stumpin' over the floor. I was jist as sure it was he as ef I'd seen him. But I walked in 'n' stood 'n' looked round. I couldn't see nothin' agin. After I'd stood a minit I went 'n' opened the trap door, 'n' went down celler. The outside door was down, 'n' the sheep use to sleep there, but there warn't nothin' onnatural in sight. I went up 'n' looked 'n' listened a minit. Bymby, says I, pooty loud, 'Gran'ther.' 'B-a-a-a,' says a little weakly voice in the stair-way. Oh, Diner, how I bounded! I opened the door, 'n' I boo-hooed rite out. I couldn't help it, deacon; I swan I couldn't, for there was our corset sheep Nancy layin' on the broad stair enamost starved to deth. She'd scraped the door with her huff every time she hearn me, 'n' stomped when she could stan' up. That was Nancy's way; she'd stop when she wanted anything. I never see a poor thing so pitiful; I s'pose she'd laid down there, and the wind blowed the door to; she couldn't stan' up, nor but jist make a noise. I run 'n' gathered sum grass 'n' wet it in the brook, 'n' Nancy eat a little; but she wanted some water. I peeled some bark in a jiffin', made a cup 'n' carried her water. She dranked it up 'n' eat the grass 'n' then I helped her up 'n' out doors, 'n' she lay down 'n' begun to reach out till she'd cleaned a good ring 'roun her. Then I helped her to a spot o' clover, 'n' run home to git her some milk. Nancy's about well, 'n' I reckon I sha'n't come across any more ghosts there. You needen't laugh at me, schoolma'am; I've seen my last ghost." "I hope you have," says I, "fur they ain't agreeable company, I've heard say." "Well, I s'pect they aint," says Deacon Pendle, "leastways they don't appear to make themselves agreeable to them that they allows to see em." "Wall," says Nat, "I reckon I'll run hum. I wish you'd come to our house afore you go off, schoolma'am. We're offe lonesome, 'n' I want you to see how the sun shines into the winders, 'n' makes the gals play like as if they was kittens." I promised him I would, and he put on his straw hat and went away.

I went down to Miss Jones's the next day, and she said Miss Moody had been there 'most all day long a-havin' her cut and baste a couple of frocks for Polly Mariar, and says she, "Only see what she brought me." She opened a box, and there was about four quarts of Indjin meal, and a paper full of sage. She said sage made good, hulsome tea, better 'n common tea for nervous folks like brother Jones, and she and the Deacon had sage tea and corn coffee all the time. Of course that was a first-rate reason why we should drink it, too. I jest told Mr. Jones he orter contrive to furnish the folks with sage tea, and corn coffee sermons. Then, only think, Square Kinyon has paraded 'round a five-frank piece he 's goin' to give Mr. Jones for marryin' him. "O, Lord!" says she, "to think anybody can live and bear such things! I wouldn't if I was a man. They're wonderful pious, but they're stingier about religion than anything else on earth."

When Mr. Jones come in he looked 'most as discouraged as his wife; but he took the baby and rocked it to sleep, and then made a top for one boy, and a boat for another, and a paper kite, with a string tail to it, for the little girl, and kep 'em busy till bedtime. I come off next day, thinkin' I wouldn't marry a minister for nothin' on airth.

Well, after I'd been 'round to all the places where I'd boarded, and bid the folks good-by, I come back to Deacon Pendle's to stay till I went home. Square Kinyon was tearin' 'round, gittin' ready to bring a wife home; I 'sposed he had the geese picked closer than ever, and all the feathers he'd been savin' for a year was hung on one of the great elm trees in the dooryard to git sunned. There they hung and swung two or three days, lookin' like some monstrous kind of fruit growin' on the tree. The fences was full of blankets airin', and they said there was a new coat of paint put on the north room floor, and all the kitchen chairs was painted over bright blue. The Square put up a new well sweep with his own hands, and got Tom Potter to put a new slat fence before the front yard. Such a fixin' up hadn't happened in Pendle Holler in ever so many years, folks said. But, then, he could afford it jest as well as not, and Square Kinyon wa'n't the man to flinch when he put his hand to a business. The weddin' was comin' off next week; but I didn't stay to see or hear anything more about it. When Saturday come, Deacon Pendle was to take me hum in his bellus-top shay. I dismissed my school the last day, and give every one of the children a little primer with picters and stories in it, and they went off my very best friends. Then, after my trunk was put into the shay, and I was all ready to start, I went down the little path from the bird-cage portico to the gate where the Deacon was waiting for me. Miss Pendle went along with me, and she couldn't help tellin' me that she hoped I'd been happy there. "Fur," says she, "I never see a poor gal so forlorn and pale as you looked when you come here; but, deary me, you've got as plump and rosy as a pippin. I hope you'll come and see us agin." I promised her I certain would; and, after sayin' good-by, we drove off toward hum. The fields and hills that was so fresh and green when I come to the Holler, was yeller and bare now, and the crickets was singin' in the stubble all day long. The orchards begun to show their red and yeller apples, and the swallows was gatherin' in great flocks on the roofs or the barns, that had their doors wide open for the wind to blow through, and keep the grain and hay that was crammed into them, dry and cool. The ditches along the road, that in the spring was full of white vilots and blue, had scarlit pinks and bogle-flowers growin' in them now. There was vervine and daisies in the corners of fences, and blackberries beginnin' to git ripe in the new clearin's. If things was different now, they was jest as pleasant, and I felt almost a pain at my heart when I thought that I was goin' home. It was such a gladness as nobody can feel but jest them that's been away the first time in their lives. Gone away too, with such a dreadful faint heart as I had carried with me. But now I was glad I had gone, for I had got a little better able to bear my troubles. I liked the world better, and felt as if I could take hold and help myself, or anybody else that needed help, and not sit down as I use to, and groan and moan, and feel as if I'd like to die—jest because what I hoped for had all melted away into nothin', jest as I was a-goin' to realize what was too much happiness for this world. So I felt glad to go home, and when I come to the turn in the road, I didn't cry, I only said to myself, "I'll make Susan glad, too, to see how I've gained in courage sense I went away." You needn't ask me to tell you any more about that; but I'll tell you how I went back to the Holler visitin' afterwards.

Your obedient,

BETSY BROOMCORN.

BY L. S.

The newsboy in his usual round left the daily paper at Mr. Mason's. Kitty was alone in the sitting-room, father had gone away, and mother was busy in her own room; so Kitty had the paper all to herself—a rare occurrence; for, so great was the anxiety to get the news, that the paper was cut into parts that more might read at a time. Now she dropped her sewing, leaned back in her chair, and devoted herself to the perusal of it. First, the headings: "Important from Washington;" "General McClellan's operations on the Peninsula—Rebels reconnoitering, etc. etc.;" then letters from "our own correspondents;" then the "Editorials;" she stopped then to think over what she had read, and her mind wandered off to the "sunny South," where was her soldier brother; no present anxiety about him though, as she received a long letter from him last night; so she resumed her reading. "Matrimonial" meets her eyes first. "A young gentleman of prepossessing appearance, of good family and fortune, wishes to correspond with some young lady, with a view to matrimony. Address, in sincerity, Leonidas. Box No. —, Post Office."

"Bah!" said Kitty to herself, after running it over, "I guess it is in sincerity. I presume, though, the writer will have scores of answers and applications for the honor of his hand, over which he will make merry. I wish I could punish the audacity of such fellows. An idea strikes me—ah, that's the very thing!" And the little gypsy sprang up and ran off to her room, putting her curly head in at her mother's door on the way: "No one killed or wounded in this morning's paper, mother."

That afternoon Kitty sallied out to make some calls. She took the Post Office in her way; fortunately for her, no one was in but the Postmaster, an old friend of the family.

"Here 's a letter to mail, Mr. Jamison."

He glanced at the superscription—Leonidas. Box No. —, Post Office. "What does this mean, Kitty?"

"Oh, mischief, I suppose," said the gay little thing. "And, Mr. Jamison, when you stamp it, put the stamp on very lightly, and give it a little 'skew,' will you not—please; for I do not want my friend Leonidas to know where I am?"

Mr. Jamison could not resist her bewitching look, and he promised. Kitty then went on her way rejoicing, and made some of her dear five hundred—no, she had not as many friends as that, but some of her friends happy by calling on them.

In an elegantly furnished room in the city sat two gentlemen, young and handsome. "Morris," said Frank Lucas, "I'm going to have some fun."

"Ah! that's something unusual for you."

"Well, I mean a new kind of fun. I'm going to advertise in the papers for a wife; going to lay it down strong about prepossessing appearances. You know the style, and see how many answers I will get from silly girls. I'll not be selfish either; but you may help me read the letters."

"I wish neither part or lot in the matter, Frank; and I think it wrong in you to trifle so," said Harry Morris. "To be sure, some will understand your advertisement in its true light—a humbug—and, for the fun, will answer; but I know there are many others, regarding it 'in sincerity,' as you have written it here, will answer in sincerity."

"So much the more fools they; but, Morris, you always defend the women so, why have you never got one of the angels to torment—no, I mean to bless your life? You look ferocious—no matter about answering; good-morning, old fellow; but I'll be sure to come around when the letters come, and read them to you."

A few days afterwards, Frank made his appearance again at Morris' rooms, with his coat pockets stuffed full of letters, letters in his trousers pockets, letters in his vest pockets, and some in his hand.

"I have come," he shouted. "Morris, you must hear some of these precious documents. I have had a peck measure full; have brought some of the richest, and here are some I took out of the office on my way, which I have not opened yet."

"Away with you, Frank Lucas. Did I not tell you I would have nothing to do with them?"

"Oh, but I won't away; so here goes No. 1."

"Dear Leonidas—sweet, precious youth! my heart goes forth to you as the dove went from Noah's Ark.' Beautiful comparison! I recognize in you a congenial spirit from the mere advertisement you inserted."

"Frank, I never have quarrelled with you yet, and I should be sorry to, now; but I tell you plainly, once for all, I will not hear any more of that twaddle," said Morris, looking so much in earnest that Frank thought it best to stop.

"Will your Majesty grant me gracious permission to open the rest of these letters here, or will it desecrate your premises?"

"You know you have the freedom of my rooms when you behave like a loyal subject," replied Morris, smiling. "Proceed."

Silence reigned for a few minutes; it was broken by an exclamation from Frank:

"By Jupiter, a fairy! Look here, Harry Morris." And he handed across the table a sheet of paper containing a full length photograph of a young lady, and these words—"Dear Leonidas," then below the picture, "I remain truly yours, Kitty."

"Frank Lucas, where did this come from?" demanded Harry.

"Don't snap a fellow up so; I know no more about it than you. Let's see if there's any postmark, though," said Frank, turning over the envelope. "No, I cannot make it out; it is so indistinct. I can see an s, and a g, and an a—that's all. Let me look at the picture again."

While he is looking, we will peep over his shoulder. A beautiful girl, not too tall, her form exquisitely moulded, dark brown hair falling in curls, small pretty hands resting lightly on the back of a chair, by which she is standing, while out of her splendid eyes such a mischievous sprite peeps just now, that Frank thinks she is ready to laugh at his amazement. Ah, Kitty Mason, we understand your little plan now: we are in your secret, though these two gentlemen are not, and in a pretty state of bewilderment are they—no postmark or any other mark by which they can gain the slightest clue to the whereabouts of the original.

"Frank, I implore you, give me that picture. If there is such a woman on earth, she shall be my wife, though I have to compass heaven and earth to find her."

"Do you hear that big vow of Harry Morris, Miss Kitty? Ha! ha!" laughed Frank. "Changed your song, hav'n't you? Are you not the young man who was declaiming with so much vehemence against such immoralities as advertising for wives? I guess you will have to compass heaven and earth to find the original of this picture. I hav'n't time; promised to go jaunting this summer with the Newtons; am off to-morrow; so you may have it. I only stipulate that, after you get to house-keeping, I may have the entrée of your house as I now do of your rooms."

"I grant anything you ask."

Frank soon took his leave, with many satirical wishes for the success of his friend, and then Harry commenced his investigations. He gazed at the lovely picture a long time until every feature was impressed upon his memory, then he looked at the few written words; nothing to be gained there, except the inference that the writer was a lady from the delicate handwriting; and now the envelope claims his attention: he studied it as intently as a school-boy his task; but Mr. Jamison had so well obeyed orders, that not much was to be discovered. "That s," he soliloquized, "is the first letter, I am sure; then all is blank until the g—there's room for three or four letters between; then another space, and then an a. Is that the last letter of the name?" He thought of all the names of towns that had an s, a g, and an a in them; he strewed his room with directories and gazetteers; he spent three or four days consulting his maps—he would not give up, though the search seemed so fruitless. Finally, he bethought himself to go to the city Post Office—perhaps he could get some light on the subject there. Accordingly, he took the envelope to the postmaster, and told him it was a matter of life or death to him to find out the postmark on that envelope.

The good man took it into consideration, as it was such an important affair, looked over his post books, fitted letters into the vacant places, and next day handed it to Harry with "Stringham" marked on it. "That," said the postmaster, "is the nearest I can come to it. If it proves not to be the right place, I will try again." The resolve of Mr. Morris was quickly taken; anything was better than this terrible suspense; he would go to Stringham. On the next train for the north is Mr. Harry Morris, in search of a young lady named "Kitty"; he could not help laughing at himself. He did not meet with any adventures, nor did he find Miss Kitty on the cars, though he could not help looking into every lady's face, if perchance it might be her, but arrived safe and sound at O—the terminus of the railroad in that direction. As soon as possible he procured horses and a carriage, and drove on towards Stringham. His plan was to domesticate himself at the hotel, if there was such a convenience in the place—go to church, and to all places of public assembly—ingratiate himself into the favor of the landlady, and by skilful questionings find out regarding young ladies named Kitty.

"Fortune favors the brave," as you may have heard. Our hero was riding along, when he espied a pretty cottage near by—some children playing in the yard, and a young lady standing on the piazza, with her back to him. Attracted by the sound of wheels, she turns her face—good heavens! does he see aright?—it is—yes, it is, "Kitty." Driving up before the gate, he stops, gets out and walks bravely up to the young lady, who stands amazed, not recognizing him as belonging to her circle of acquaintance—and—

"Will the lady please give me a drink of water, as it is very warm and dusty?"

With a graceful nod of acquiescence, she goes into the house, while he improves the opportunity by asking a little girl who stood near what her name was.

"Mary Meade, sir."

"And that's your sister who has gone after some water?"

"No, it's cousin Kitty."

"Kitty who?" he asked again, thinking it best to gain all possible information.

"Kitty Mason, to be sure—don't you know her?"

Kitty Mason came just then with the water, and prevented further questioning. Harry knew it was not polite to gaze at her while he was drinking, but he could not resist the temptation of seeing if this was certainly the original of the picture he was so sacredly preserving. There could be no mistake—the same hair, eyes, and figure. Mr. Harry drove to the hotel in good spirits, though there was considerable to be done yet in the way of getting introductions to the father, and to the young lady herself. These difficulties overcome as soon as practicable, he desired a private interview with Mr. Mason. It was rather awkward asking a man for his daughter when he had seen neither of them but once or twice before, and was an entire stranger to them, but Harry plunged in heroically.

"Mr. Mason, I rode by your house last week; I saw your daughter; I wish your permission to address her; I am, I know, an entire stranger, but I can refer you to Rev. Dr. Drayton, Mr. Olmstead; and many other prominent persons in my native city as to my character and standing."

To make a long story short, Mr. Mason went to the city himself, obtained satisfactory evidence as to the moral character and standing of Mr. Harry Morris, and gave his consent.

Not a word about the picture yet, you see, until one day Harry took it out of his pocket, and said, "Kitty, did you ever see this before?"

She looked first at the picture, then at him, and exclaimed, "Harry Morris, where did you get that? Are you Leonidas? How did you find out who I was and where I lived?"

"I think there was a Providence in it," he replied, laughing at her amazement, "for I never should have found you without," and then he told her the whole story. Harry and his beautiful wife spent the summer in travelling, and then went in the fall to the pleasant home in the city which Harry had caused to be prepared. Frank Lucas is almost inconsolable, because he had not perseverance enough to "track" Kitty and get her himself.

ANGEL FOOTSTEPS.

BY IVY BELL.

SHE had waited for their coming
Through all the summer hours;
She had seen their shadows throwing
A light o'er fairest flowers.

SHE had heard their footsteps falling
Upon the soft, thick grass,
Till now the dry leaves rustled
Beneath them as they passed.

Then her sweet, young face grew fairer,
And holier yet her brow:
And like autumn's golden lustre
Was her bright hair in its flow.

Then her eyes grew yet more earnest,
Till, as shorter grew the days,
A veil seemed drawn before them
Like the autumn's faint blue haze.

She was like unto the angels,
As she walked from us apart;
Ever listening to the footsteps,
And the voices in her heart.

Thus ever passed she onward,
Still singing as she went;
Till we knew that she must leave us,
Yet we could not feel content.

But the footsteps came still nearer—
She said she heard their fall—
Come slowly up the pathway
Beneath the garden wall.

And the shadow fell still deeper
Upon her fair, young brow,
And within those earnest eyes
That song is broken now.

TO ELSIE.

But for thee, lovely lady,
I long had remained
In a passionless torpor
Despairingly chained,
With naught to impart
The least light to my heart,
Where gloominess only had reigned.

But as the calm twilight
In summer is broke
By the robin's sweet music,
Thy beauty awoke
My soul from its dream
By a magical beam,
And in Hope's soothing melody spoke.

The theme of my musings
Thy beauty shall be;
And my dream shall be nightly,
Dear lady, of thee.
O'er my heart thou shalt reign,
And I never again
From thy power would wish to be free.

Fig. 1.—A fancy muslin spencer, with ribbon run between the plaits.

Fig. 2.—A new and pretty style for a summer dress. The scarf bretelle can be either of ribbon or silk, embroidered or braided. It is suitable both for thick and thin materials. With a white waist the effect is charming.

Fig. 3.—A bonnet shade, in England called an "Ugly," which we think a very appropriate title for it. It is, however, very convenient for travelling, and a great protection to the face, and for weak eyes very beneficial. Green or blue silk is the most appropriate material. The casings should be as represented in the engraving. The screen can be caught to the bonnet by a spring, or tied with ribbon under the chin.

Fig. 4.—Fancy sack, suitable for a little boy or girl.

Fig. 6.—Black silk apron, trimmed with a box-plaited ribbon.

Fig. 5.—Dress for a child of five years old. Made of blue merino, and black and white shepherd's check.

PATTERNS FROM MADAME DEMOREST'S ESTABLISHMENT,

No. 473 Broadway, New York.

The Military Jacket.—This very becoming and stylish jacket closes over the vest, midway to the waist, rounding off to the side and back with a slight spring which descends over the hips. The vest is pointed and closes with buttons. The material may be in any solid color, the vest black, or contrasting. The decoration consists of a simple braided border, in an interlaced pattern. The sleeves terminate in a deeply pointed cuff, braided to match the body part of the jacket.

Jerome Coat.—This is a pretty sack coat, trimmed with velvet bands, so as to give something the appearance of a pelka jacket. On the right side, the curl of the velvet forms the pocket, from whence may be seen issuing, the folds of the handkerchief. Velvet in points, with buttons in the spaces between, constitutes the decoration of the skirt. The sleeves plain, loose, and trimmed with velvet, to match the waist.

Greek Jacket.—The upper part of this jacket buttons over a plain waist, and then rounds off from the front to the side seam under the arm, where the jacket terminates. The trimming consists of a double quilling, with a narrow velvet run through the centre, and forms a bodice in front of the waist. This decoration is carried round to the back part of the waist, which terminates in a point. The sleeve is plain at the top, demi-flowing, and is decorated with the quilling in the form of the letter S.

French Waist.—This is an elegantly fitting waist, high and plain, with a slight spring descending upon the hips, and deepening into points at the back and front. The fastening consists of buttons and button-holes, and descends only to the line of the waist, from whence the points are cut away. The sleeve is demi-flowing, and rounded up on the back, where it is finished with bow and ends of ribbon.

The Lady Alice Sleeve.—This is an admirable style of sleeve for the small checked goods, so much in vogue for house wear. The fulness on the lower front of the sleeve is held by a quilling of silk, in a solid, contrasting color, a narrow velvet, placed below the upper edge, forming a heading. The trimming crosses directly in front of the arm, and terminates in flat bows. At the top of the sleeve, the silk quilling is arranged in the form of a pointed cap, which completes the decoration.

A RUSTIC HANGING BASKET FOR WINDOW OR PORCH.

PROCURE a fancifully-shaped wire basket at the wire-workers; line the inside with moss, with the green side outwards; it will look very pretty through the wide wire openings. Then fill the hollow with earth, and place in the centre a scarlet geranium, or dwarf fuchsia, or other elegant plant. It will live and grow there a long time; and so will the German ivy, which will hang gracefully over the basket, and twine upon the cords by which it hangs. Can anything be prettier than this as an ornament for the vine-shaded porch or window? So easily, too, is it made, that no one need be without one; but you must not forget to water it every few days, and, once in a while, the whole basket had better be dipped in a pail of water, which will make the moss perfectly green and fresh.

FANCY SLIPPER, WITHOUT HEEL, FOR A LADY.

MADE of strands of straw sewed together, and crossed in diamond form with black velvet. In the centre of each diamond a figure is worked with scarlet chenille. The slipper is lined and quilted with scarlet silk, and trimmed with a quilling of scarlet ribbon.

SPRING COSTUME FOR A BOY AND GIRL.

Fig. 1.

Fig. 1. Spring costume for a Boy.—The body is a Garibaldi, with a short skirt of the same material, which would be pretty of gray summer poplin. The dress skirt is trimmed with five rows of narrow black velvet or braid, and looped up on each side, in the Watteau style.

Fig. 2.

The underskirt is of black and white striped material, and edged with a Marie Louise blue braid, quilted. The collar and cuffs of the dress are made of the striped black and white material, and edged with the quilted blue braid. Our cut represents both back and front of the same dress.

Fig. 2. New Spring Costume for a little Girl.—Skirt, low peasant's waist, sleeves, and sash of a silver gray alpaca. All the edges of the dress are cut in scallops, and bordered with a black and white braid. Underneath the scallops is sewed a plaited ruffle of blue silk, which has a charming effect. The high waist is of blue silk, finished at the throat with a silk ruching edged with black and white braid. The pockets are trimmed with blue silk and braid.

CROCHET COLLAR.

Material.—Cotton No. 36.

For this pretty and easy collar make a chain of 360 stitches, and work into these 2 rows of dc. The thread is cut off at the end of each row. 3d row.—* 5 long in the first 5 stitches of the previous row, 7 chain, miss 5, repeat from * to the end of the row, arranging the stitches that there may be 5 long at the end as at the beginning, cut the cotton off, and commence the 4th row: * 5 long, 3 chain, 2 long in the middle of the 7 chain of the previous row, 3 chain, repeat from * to the end. 5th.—* 5 long, 3 chain, 2 long on the 2 long of the previous row, 3 chain, repeat from * to the end of the row. 6th.—* 5 long, 4 chain, 2 long, 4 chain, repeat from * to the end. The 7th and 8th rows are worked the same as the 6th. 9th.—* 5 long, 5 chain, 2 long, 5 chain, repeat from * to the end. The 10th and 11th rows are worked like the 9th. 12th.—* 5 long, 6 chain, 2 long, 6 chain, repeat from *. The 13th and 14th rows are the same as the 12th. 15th.—* 5 double long in the 5 long of the previous row, 5 chain, 1 dc. on to the first of the two long in the previous row, 4 chain, 1 dc. on the second long stitch, 5 chain, repeat from * to the end. 16th.—* 5 long, 15 chain, repeat from * to the end. The 17th is commenced at the narrow end of the collar, close on the two rows of dc. The cotton is fastened on, and the little scallops plainly seen in the engraving are made. They consist of three long stitches, each separated by 3 chain, and all worked into one of the edge stitches. After the 3d long crochet 3 chain, miss 1 or 2 stitches, so that the border does not stretch, and make 1 dc. When the small square side of the collar is trimmed in this way, crochet 6 long into the chain forming each scallop at the edge; these stitches must be separated each by 3 chain, and the 4 middle ones must be double long stitches. When the other side of the collar is reached, it must be edged with the small scallops.

PETTICOAT INSERTION.

IN DRAW LINES, ORNAMENTED WITH SCARLET.

Materials.—Some good linen, rather coarse, some scarlet crewel.

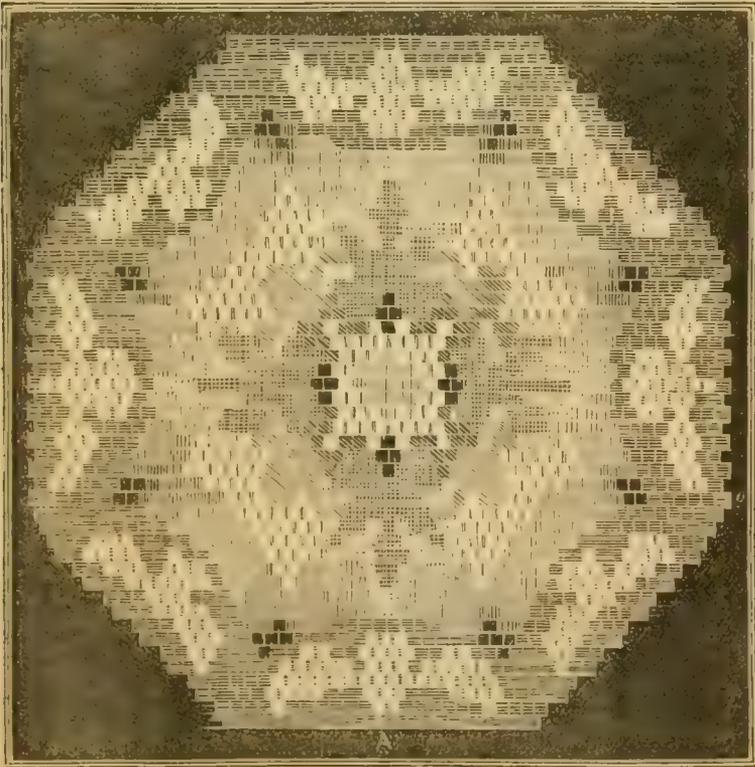

THESE insertions are intended for ornamenting petticoats or children's frocks, and are made of drawn linen, the threads being interlaced with scarlet braid, and the cross stitches worked in a very old-fashioned material, called crewel. This washes beautifully. If liked entirely in white, the threads may be secured with bobbin, and the fancy stitches worked in coarse cotton. Arranged in this manner, a colored ribbon should be laid under the insertion to show the work off to advantage. The linen, which should not be of too fine a quality, should be nicely washed and ironed, which will soften the threads, and make them easier to draw. The linen should then be marked at equal distances, allowing one inch for the open part, and three-quarters of an inch for the insertion between. The threads must then be drawn across the linen for the open part, and caught in and out in the following manner:

Thread a needle with bobbin or scarlet braid, fasten it to one end of the linen, count 16 threads, and divide them into four. Put the first 4 threads over the third 4 threads, draw the needle through, then pass the second 4 threads over the last 4 threads, and draw the needle through; count another sixteen threads, and proceed in the same manner. When the fancy stripe is finished, one thread must be drawn right in the centre of the plain stripe. The cross-stitch is then worked in and out both on the wrong side and right side, the line where the thread is drawn forming the place where the stitches start from on each side. These stitches, being worked over on to the wrong side, keep the edges of the linen from unravelling. This portion of the work is done in scarlet crewel, or in coarse cotton.

GLASS BEAD MAT.

Materials.—Twelve rows dark blue beads, one row black, twelve rows white, four rows light yellow, two rows dark yellow, two rows green (two shades), four rows dark red, four rows middle shade red.

This mat must be begun with one bead in the middle of the thread, taking two beads and one alternately until the centre row is completed; afterwards work backwards and forwards with one needle only, but work both sides simultaneously in all mats where the pattern is regular: it will save counting, and will insure accuracy in the work. The diminishing must be worked from the pattern.

FLOWER VASE.

THE five parts which form the whole are to be cut separately in either cloth or velvet of some pleasing color, the size being determined according to the place which it is intended to occupy, being larger for the centre of the table than for the mantleshelf. It is to be observed that the part which bends over the top and that which spreads out to form the stand at the bottom are each attached to the centre piece, there being only five in all. Work on the outer piece of cloth or velvet some pretty design in seed beads in a mixture of clear and opaque white, gold and steel, taking that which we have given for an example; or cover it with little stars in beads, or in some of those gilt stars or other gilt ornaments which have been so much used for trimming hair-nets. The outside pieces of the five parts are left plain at the top; but the tops of the inside pieces are dotted over with chalk-white beads. Cut the shape in five pieces of cardboard, sew a fine wire round each, stretch the work on the outside with its lining in the inside, bind with a very narrow white ribbon, and sew all round with short strings of beads, so as entirely to conceal the ribbon. It will be necessary to procure a wire framework for the inside, which, having a ring round the upper part as well as at the stem, will support the five pieces which are to be attached to them, the tops being bent over, and the bottoms spread out, which can easily be done by means of the wire. It is an improvement to have the outside of one color and the lining of another—namely, crimson and purple, or violet and brown. Any simple glass vessel containing flowers may be slipped into the interior of these vases which have a rich and tasteful effect either on the mantleshelf or on the centre of the table.

INITIAL FOR SQUARE PILLOW-CASE.

BRAIDING PATTERN.

SEAM KNITTING FOR SOFA PILLOWS.

Materials—Magenta, or any other colored Andalusian wool; knitting pins with knobs, which shall measure round nearly half an inch.

For a trial pattern cast on 19 stitches, and knit a row.

1st row.—Knit 4, Slip 2, taking off the stitches as for knitting; repeat; K 1 at the end.

2d.—P (or pearl) 1, S 2, taking off the stitches as for knitting; repeat; K 4 at the end.

3d.—K 4, S 2; repeat; K 1 at the end.

4th.—Same as 2d row.

5th.—Same as 3d row.

6th.—Pearl row; purling every stitch and dividing the slip stitches, which are twisted; count nineteen stitches.

7th.—Plain row.

8th.—Pearl row.

8th.—K 1, * Slip 2, K 4; repeat from *; end with K 4.

10th.—P 4, S 2; repeat.

11th.—K 1, * S 2, K 4; repeat from *.

12th.—P 4, S 2.

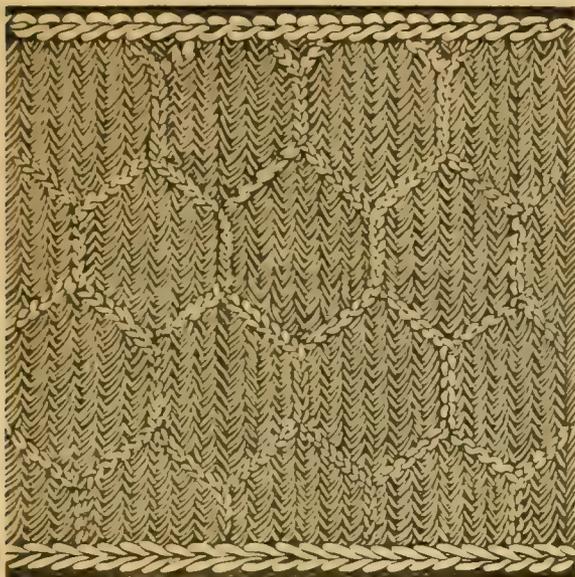

13th.—Same as 9.

14th.—Pearl.

15th.—Plain.

16th.—Pearl, and begin at 1st

row. When this much is knitted and measured, the number of stitches or patterns can be calculated for a pillow cover.

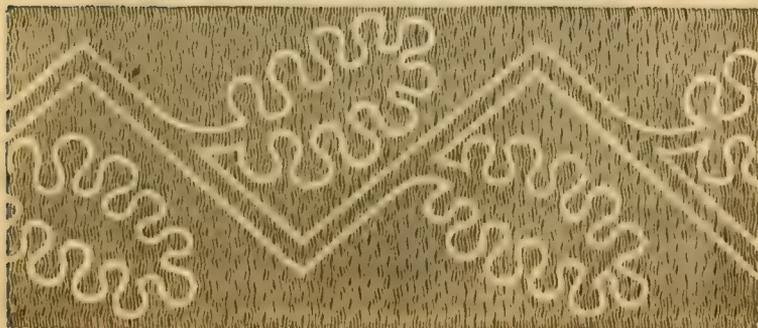

This is a pattern which requires stretching over such a solid surface as a pillow to prevent its curling.

MISCELLANEOUS COOKING.

BACON AND CABBAGE SOUP.—Put your piece of bacon on to boil in a pot with two gallons (more or less, according to the number you have to provide for) of water, and when it has boiled up, and has been well skimmed, add the cabbages, kale, greens, or sprouts, whichever may be used, well washed and split down, and also some parsnips and carrots; season with pepper, but no salt, as the bacon will season the soup sufficiently; and when the whole has boiled together very gently for about two hours, take up the bacon surrounded with the cabbage, parsnips, and carrots, leaving a small portion of the vegetables in the soup, and pour this into a large bowl containing slices of bread; eat the soup first, and make it a rule that those who eat most soup are entitled to the largest share of bacon.

STEWED LEG OF BEEF.—Procure four pounds of leg or shin of beef; cut this into pieces the size of an egg, and fry them of a brown color with a little dripping fat, in a good sized saucepan, then shake in a large handful of flour, add carrots and onions cut up in pieces the same as the meat, season with pepper and salt, moisten with water enough to cover in the whole, stir the stew on the fire till it boils, and then set it on the hob to continue boiling very gently for about an hour and a half, and you will then be able to enjoy an excellent dinner.

PORK CHOPS, GRILLED OR BOILED.—Score the rind of each chop by cutting through the rind at distances of half an inch apart; season the chops with pepper and salt, and place them on a clean gridiron over a clear fire to broil; the chops must be turned over every two minutes until they are done; this will take about fifteen minutes. The chops are then to be eaten plain, or, if convenient, with brown gravy.

POTATO PUDDING.—Ingredients: three pounds of potatoes, two quarts of milk, two ounces of butter, two ounces of sugar, a bit of lemon-peel, a good pinch of salt, and three eggs. First, bake the potatoes, and if you have no means of baking them, let them be either steamed or boiled, and, when done, scoop out all their starchy pulp without waste into a large saucepan, and immediately beat it up vigorously with a large fork or a spoon; then add all the remainder of the above-named ingredients (excepting the eggs), stir the potato batter carefully on the fire till it comes to a boil, then add the beaten eggs; pour the batter into a greased pie-dish, and bake the pudding for an hour in your oven, if you have one; if not, send it to the baker's.

MEAT PIE.—Of whatever kind, let the pieces of meat be first fried brown over a quick fire, in a little fat or butter, and seasoned with pepper and salt; put these into a pie-dish with chopped onions, a few slices of half cooked potatoes, and enough water just to cover the meat. Cover the dish with a crust, made with two pounds of flour and six ounces of butter, or lard, or fat dripping, and just enough water to knead it into a stiff kind of dough or paste, and then bake it for about an hour and a half.

GIBLET SOUP.—Let the giblets be well cleaned; cut them into small pieces, and wash them well in water. Put them into a saucepan with one quart of good broth, and all sorts of herbs chopped fine. Let these simmer together until the giblets are tender; then thicken with flour and butter, and season with salt and cayenne according to taste. Asparagus tops, if in season, may be added; these must be boiled first. If you wish the soup to be white, take the yolks of four eggs, beaten up with half a pint of cream, and add them to the soup five minutes before serving, stirring them in gently, but not allowing them to boil. If the soup is required to be brown, put in a little browning and a glassful of sherry wine.

FRIED STEAKS AND ONIONS.—Season the steak with pepper and salt, and when done brown on both sides, without being overdone, place them in a dish before the fire while you fry some sliced onions in the fat which remains in the pan; as soon as the onions are done, and laid upon the steaks, shake a spoonful of flour in the pan, add a gill of water and a few drops of vinegar; give this gravy a boil up on the fire, and pour it over the steaks, &c.

POTATO BALLS.—Mash some potatoes very well, with butter, pepper, and salt, taking care, as in all mashed potatoes, that no lumps remain; shape them into balls, cover them with egg and bread-crumbs, and fry them a light brown. This is a very nice supper dish, or a pretty garnish for hashes and ragouts.

ROOT VEGETABLES.—Turnips should be pared, have two gashes half through cut in each, to hasten the cooking, and put in plenty of water with a little salt. They must be boiled until quite soft (more than half an hour must be allowed), and mashed with butter, pepper, and salt. Carrots and parsnips must be scraped clean, boiled for much longer, and served cut in quarters.

VEAL CUTLETS WITH TOMATOES.—Wash two or three pounds of cutlets, and season them with salt and pepper. Have some lard and butter hot in a pan; put them in and fry brown on both sides. When done, take it up on a plate. Have ready a quarter-peck of tomatoes; drain and season them with pepper and salt. Pour the tomatoes into the pan with the gravy, and stir them well together. Pour them over the cutlets, and serve.

COLLARED BEEF.—Choose the thick end of a flank of beef, but do not let it be too fat; let it lie in salt or pickle for a week or ten days. The brisket of beef will also serve for this purpose, from which the bones should be taken, and the inside skin removed. When sufficiently salted, prepare the following seasoning: one handful of parsley, chopped fine, some thyme, marjoram, and basil; season the whole with pepper, and mix all well together, and cover the inside of the beef with it. Roll the meat up tight, then roll it in a clean cloth; bind it with strong string or tape, and tie it close at the ends. Boil it gently from three to four hours, and, when cooked, take it up; tie the ends again quite close to the meat, and place it between two dishes, with a heavy weight at the top. When it is cold, remove the cloth.

CALVES' HEAD CAKE.—Parboil a calf's head with some sage; then cut off the meat, and return the bones into the broth, and boil them until the latter is greatly reduced. Put the meat which is already cut into pieces into a jar with the tongue, some cloves, mace, nutmeg, and some slices of ham. Cover the jar with a plate, and bake the whole some hours until it is thoroughly well cooked, then add the brains, beaten up with an egg. Some hard-boiled eggs must be placed round a mould, and the meat poured in.

SHEEP'S HEAD SOUP.—Cut the liver and lights into pieces, and stew them in four quarts of water, with some onion, carrots, and turnips; half a pound of pearl barley, pepper and salt, cloves, a little marjoram, parsley, and thyme. Stew all these until nearly sufficiently cooked, then put in the head, and boil it until quite tender. Take it out, and strain everything from the liquor, and let it stand until cold, when remove the fat from the top. Before serving it must be thickened with flour and butter, as though it were mock turtle. A wineglassful of sherry should be put into the tureen before the soup is poured in. The heart cut into small pieces with rump steak makes an excellent pudding.

CAKES, PUDDINGS, ETC.

COTTAGE PUDDING.—Three cups flour, one cup sugar, one cup milk, two tablespoonfuls butter, two teaspoonfuls cream tartar, one egg; beat all together, then add one teaspoonful soda; flavor with lemon. Bake one-half hour; serve with sauce.

Sauce.—One cup butter, two cups powdered sugar beaten to a cream, two tablespoonfuls wine, half spoonful vanilla beaten with it, half pint boiling water.

LIGHT TEA CAKES.—One pound and a half of fine flour, two ounces fresh lard, one pint of new milk, one large egg, one teaspoonful of salt, ounce and a half fresh yeast. Beat the egg, warm the milk, and mix very well; let it rise as common dough; then put into tins, and let it rise quickly before the fire. It makes nice buns, with spices added after the dough is risen.

CORN STARCH PUDDING.—One pint of milk, two eggs, two teaspoonfuls corn starch, four teaspoonfuls sugar in pudding, and same in whites.

COCOA-NUT CHEESECAKES.—Take the white part of a cocoa-nut, three ounces of lump sugar, and one-half a gill of water. The sugar must be first dissolved in the water, and the cocoa-nut (grated) to be added to it. Let all boil for a few minutes over a slow fire; let it get cold and then add the yolks of three eggs, and the white of one well beaten up. Put the mixture into small tins with thin paste at the bottom, and bake in a slow oven.

FRENCH PANCAKES.—Beat half a pint of cream to a froth, lay it on a sieve; beat the whites and yolks (separately) of three eggs, add one tablespoonful of flour, and the same quantity of white sugar; mix all lightly, and bake in three saucers for twenty minutes. Dish them up with raspberry or any other preserve, between.

APPLE CREAM.—Boil twelve apples in water until they are soft; take off the peel and press the pulp through a hair sieve upon a half pound of powdered sugar; whip the whites of two eggs, add them to the apples, and beat altogether until it becomes quite stiff, and looks white. Serve it heaped upon a dish, with some fresh cream around it.

ALMOND CHEESE CAKES.—The yolks of three well-beaten eggs, one-quarter pound of bitter almonds, three-quarters pound of sweet almonds, one-quarter pound of sifted sugar. Pound the almonds, but not too fine. The eggs must be beaten to a cream. Mix the sugar with them, then add the almonds.

POUND CAKE.—One pound of sugar, one of butter, one of flour, and the whites of twelve eggs, beaten to a froth; flavor with the essence of lemon. Bake in a quick oven. This quantity will make two good-sized cakes, baked in six-quart pans.

INDIAN PUDDING.—Two quarts of boiling milk, with Indian meal enough to make a thin batter; stir in while boiling hot. Add sugar, allspice, to your taste; also a teaspoonful of cold milk. Bake five hours in a moderate oven.

TO MAKE CREAM PANCAKES.—Take the yolks of two eggs, mix them with half a pint of good cream and two ounces of sugar, heat the pan over a clear fire and rub it with lard, and fry the batter as thin as possible. Grate loaf sugar over them and serve them up hot.

PUFF PUDDING.—One pint of milk, three eggs, six spoonfuls of flour, a little salt. Beat the yolks, then add the milk and flour; pour in a buttered dish, then add the beaten whites, but don't stir in thoroughly—one and a half hours.

A QUICK MADE PUDDING.—One pound flour, one pound suet, four eggs, one fourth pint new milk, little mace and nutmeg, half pound raisins, quarter pound currants; mix well, and boil three-quarters of an hour.

AN ITALIAN PUDDING.—Take two eggs and their weight in butter and loaf sugar, melt the butter a little, and beat up all well together. Line the dish with a puff paste, and lay some apricot or other good preserve upon it. Pour the mixture of butter, eggs and sugar over it, and bake for twenty minutes.

A SWEET OMELET.—Mix a tablespoonful of fine flour in one pint of new milk, whisk together the yolks and whites of four eggs, and add them to the milk. Put enough fresh butter as will fry the omelet into the frying pan, make it hot over a clear fire, and pour in half the mixture. When this is a little set, put four teaspoonfuls of current jelly, or any other preserve, in the centre, and the remainder of the mixture over the top. As soon as the upper portion is fixed send it to table; or the omelet being fried, spread the preserve on it and roll it.

THE TOILET.

HOW TO PREVENT THE HAIR FROM FALLING OFF.—The following lotion and pomatums have sometimes proved successful in restoring the growth of the hair. The lotion is the receipt of Dr. Erasmus Wilson's.

The Lotion.—Two ounces of eau de Cologne, two drachms of tincture of cantharides, ten drops of oil of lavender, and ten drops of oil of rosemary. This lotion should be used once or twice a day for a considerable time.

The Pomatum.—Take the marrow out of two beef bones, put it into cold water, and let it remain until it is quite clean and white. Before this is effected the water must be changed several times. Dissolve and strain the marrow; then add four ounces of the best castor oil. Beat both well together until cold, then add, before the pomatum becomes firm, half an ounce of strong scent. This pomatum should be well rubbed into the skin of the head every night, and the hair should be well brushed both night and morning.

POMADE FOR CHAPPED ARMS AND HANDS.—Spermaceti, two drachms; white wax, one and a half drachm; sweet oil of almonds, half an ounce; Florence oil of olives, half an ounce; oil of poppies, half an ounce; melt all together gently, and beat into it four drops of the liquid balsam of Peru.

HAIR POMATUM.—To a flask of the finest Lucca oil add an ounce and a half of spermaceti, half an ounce of white wax, and scent of any kind. Cut up the wax and spermaceti, and put it in the oven to melt with a little of the oil. When well mixed, pour in the remainder of the oil, and stir until cold; add the scent when the mixture is cool. If the hair is inclining to gray, add, by drops, a teaspoonful of balsam of Peru, taking care to stir it well in.

FRESH milk mixed with oatmeal is very beneficial to a scabrous complexion. May use buttermilk with equal success. Sugar mixed with fresh milk is also excellent for washing the skin with. Glycerine, too, is efficacious.

PRACTICAL DIRECTIONS TO GARDENERS.

PERFORM every operation in the proper season. Perform every operation in the best manner. This is to be acquired in part by practice, and partly also by reflection. For example, in digging over a piece of ground, it is a common practice with slovens to throw the weeds and stones on the dug ground, or on the adjoining alley or walk, with the intention of gathering them off afterwards. A better way is to have a wheelbarrow, or a large basket, in which to put the weeds and extraneous matter, as they are picked out of the ground.

Complete every part of an operation as you proceed; this is an essential point in garden operations, and the judicious gardener will keep it in view as much as possible: hoeing, raking, and earthing up a small part at a time, so that, leave off where he will, what is done will be complete.

In leaving off working at any job, leave the work and tools in an orderly manner.

In leaving off work for the day, make a temporary finish, and carry the tools to the tool-house.

In passing to and from the work, or on any occasion through any part of the garden, keep a vigilant look-out for weeds, decayed leaves, or any other deformity, and remove them.

In gathering a crop, remove at the same time the roots, leaves, stem, or whatever else is of no further use.

Let no crop of fruit, or herbaceous vegetables, go to waste on the spot.

Cut down the flower-stalks of all plants.

Keep every part of what is under your care perfect in its kind.

Attend in the spring and autumn to walls and buildings, and get them repaired, pointed, glazed, and painted, where wanted. Attend at all times to machines, implements, and tools, keeping them clean, sharp, and in perfect repair. See particularly that they are placed in their proper situations in the tool-house. House every implement, utensil, or machine not in use. Let the edgings be cut to the utmost nicety. Keep all walks in perfect form, whether raised or flat, free from weeds, dry, and well retted. Let all the lawns be of a close texture, and of a dark-green velvet appearance. Keep the water clean and free from weeds, and let not ponds or lakes rise to the brim in winter, nor sink under it in summer. If too much impured by trees, the water is rendered impure, and its clearness is destroyed.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A VALUABLE REMEDY.—Every family should keep a small quantity of chloride of potash. We have never found anything equal to it for a simple ulcerated sore throat. Dissolve a small teaspoonful of it in a tumbler of water; and then occasionally take a teaspoonful of the solution, so as to gargle the throat. It is nearly tasteless, and not at all offensive to take, and hence it is well adapted to children.

Nothing is better than this for chapped or cracked hands. Wash them in the weak solution, and they will soon be well. It is also good for a rough, pimply or chapped face. It may be had at any druggist's.

TO FLOWER BULBS AT ANY SEASON IN THREE WEEKS.—Fill a flower pot half full of quick lime, fill up with good earth, plant the bulb, and keep the earth damp.

HOW TO OBTAIN THE GENUINE FLAVOR OF COFFEE.—"Knighten's Foreign Life in Ceylon," furnishes the following hints, derived from long experience, for preparing coffee. The aroma, which resides in the essential oil of the coffee berry, is gradually dissipated after roasting, and of course still more so after being ground. In order to enjoy the full flavor in perfection, the berry should pass at once from the roasting pan to the mill, and thence to the coffee-pot; and, again, after being made, should be mixed, when at almost boiling heat, with hot milk. It must be very bad coffee, indeed, which, these precautions being followed, will not afford an agreeable and exhilarating drink.

TO REMOVE INK-STAINS.—When fresh done and wet, hasten to provide some cold water, an empty cup and a spoon. Pour a little of the water on the stain, not having touched it previously with anything. The water of course dilutes the ink and lessens the mark; then ladle it up into an empty cup. Continue pouring the clean water on the stain and lading it up, until there is not the slightest mark left. No matter how great the quantity of ink spilt, patience and perseverance will remove every indication of it. To remove a dry ink-stain, dip the part stained into hot milk, and gently rub it; repeat until no sign is left. This is an unfailling remedy.

KNIVES AND FORKS.—The best knife-board is a piece of deal planed very smooth, about three feet long and eight inches wide, with thick wash leather stretched very tightly over it. Clean the knives with rottenstone and fine emery mixed. Bath brick is very commonly used; two pieces may be rubbed together, so as to cause a fine powder to descend on the cleaning board. Forks should be cleaned with leather and the above-named powder, and a thin piece of wood covered with leather to go between the prongs. Knives and forks should be wiped clean as soon as they are brought from the table.

TO PRESERVE ASPARAGUS FOR WINTER.—Prepare the heads by scraping and trimming, in the same way as you would to serve at table, tie them in bundles and put them into boiling salt and water for one moment.

PASTE BLACKING.—Twelve ounces troy of black, eight ounces of treacle, two ounces of oil, two ounces and a quarter of vinegar, one ounce of alum, three-quarters of an ounce of spirits of salt; a proper quantity of pale seal oil to be added last to make it of a proper consistency. Let it stand two or three days, and put it in boxes.

DRIED HERBS.—Herbs are dried by spreading them thinly on trays, and exposing them to the heat of the sun or a current of dry air, or by placing them in a stove-room; observing in either case to turn them repeatedly. When dried in the sun they should be covered with thin paper to prevent their color being injured by the light. The quicker they are dried the better, as "heating" or "fermentation" will be thereby prevented. When sufficiently dried, they should be shaken in a coarse sieve, to remove any sand, or the eggs of insects, that may be mixed with them. Aromatic herbs should be dried very quickly, and by a gentle heat, that their odor may be preserved. Tops and leaves are dried in the same way as whole plants. In every case discolored and rotten leaves and branches should be rejected, and earth and dirt should be screened off before proceeding to dry them.

WOMAN!

HER MORAL DESTINY.

"I will put enmity between thee and the woman."

Thus runs the first clause of the sentence which the Lord God pronounced against the serpent, or Satan, before the human pair were called to hear their doom: "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel."—Gen. iii. 15.

In this sentence against the evil power, the prophecy of the moral destiny of woman is comprised; she was then and there appointed guardian of moral goodness on earth, and through her the glorious seed, the MESSIAH, the Saviour of man and the Destroyer of evil would be derived.

Let us briefly examine the Bible record of the Fall, which differs materially from Milton's "Paradise Lost;" yet this last seems the generally received standard.

Adam and his wife, when created, were placed in Eden, where grew the tree "of the knowledge of good and evil," the fruit of which they were forbidden to eat on pain of death. The woman, being deceived by the serpent, or Spirit of Evil, into the belief that the penalty would not be inflicted, and that the fruit would confer on the human pair a higher degree of spiritual knowledge than they then possessed—"Ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil," was the promise of the subtle tempter—"she took of the fruit, and did eat, and gave also unto her husband with her, and he did eat." Such is the precise account of the Fall.

Commentators have imputed weakness of mind to the woman, because the tempter first assailed her. Does it not rather show that she was the spiritual leader, the most difficult to be won where duty was in question, and the serpent knew if he could gain her, the result was sure? Remember that "her husband was with her"—the serpent addressed them both: "Ye shall be as gods." Is it not reasonable to conclude that the nature (the human pair was then a unity) best qualified to judge of those high subjects would respond? The decision was, apparently, left to her. The woman led, the man followed. Which showed the greater spiritual power—the controlling impulse of mind? Were not the arguments used by the tempter addressed to the higher faculties as her predominating feelings, namely, the desire for knowledge and wisdom?

We next come to the trial of the guilty pair, and their sentence from the mouth of their Maker. Every word confirms the truth of the position, that woman's moral sense was of a higher standard than man's. She was first sentenced. Meekly and truly she confessed her fault; the sign of a repentant soul betrayed into sin when seeking for good. Her temporal punishment implied deep affections and tender sensibilities, requiring moral and spiritual endowments.

Woman was to suffer "sorrow" for her children, and be subjected to the rule of her husband, to whom "her desire shall be;" that is, her hopes, of escaping from the ignorance and inferiority to which he, through the temptations of Satan, would consign her (see all heathen lands for illustration), must be centred on winning by her love, gentleness, and submission, her husband's heart; and through the influence of her clearer moral sense, aided by the help of God, who had "put enmity" between her and the Spirit of Evil, she could infuse into the minds of her sons better and holier ideas which would soften and ennoble man's more earthly and selfish nature. Her doom was sad, but not degrading; for, though like an angel with wings broken and bound, she was to minister to her husband, yet the promise of wondrous blessings preceded her sentence.

Not so with Adam. He had shown at every step that his mind was of a different stamp. He had disobeyed God from a lower motive; and, when arraigned, he showed fear and selfishness. He sought to excuse his sin by throwing the blame on his wife, and on God who had "given her" to her husband. True, he was not deceived. His worldly wisdom had not been dazzled by the idea of gaining heavenly wisdom.

Man's sentence seems, therefore, in accordance with the character he then manifested; addressed to the material and sensuous rather than to the spiritual and intellectual in human nature. He was condemned to hard labor for life, on the ground "cursed" for his sake; and, reminded of his origin "from the dust," he was consigned to death and the grave. Not a ray of hope was given the man, save through the promise made to the woman. Does it not seem true that God committed to her care the kindly virtues that conserve the family and society when He "put enmity between the devil and the woman?" She was to be the moral power when man, his will turned aside from God and centred on himself, would be using his strength and skill, his understanding and reason, selfishly, for his own good and glory; then she, by her obedience, tenderness, and self-sacrificing affection, was to exemplify the truth of a better life, and keep alive the hope of the promised Deliverer.

This, then, seems the plan of progress and salvation for the human race which God ordained when their disobedience to Him had closed the gates of Eden on our First Parents.

Man was the worker and provider, the protector, and the lawgiver.

Woman was the helper and preserver, the teacher or inspirer, and the exemplar.

Thus, if working in unison, they would have foiled the arts of the Deceiver, till the Deliverer came who was to destroy sin and bring to ransomed humanity eternal life and immortal glory.

But sin was with them to poison their happiness, divide their hopes, and corrupt their inclinations. Still the Bible record shows that the sources of wickedness were in man's passions, and lusts, and power of working his own will. Murder, polygamy, and the sins of the Old World, when "the earth was filled with violence," are not descriptive of woman's acts; but the picture does show that her moral gifts had been crushed, her influence for good destroyed, and her better nature overcome by the evil. And when the "enmity" of Satan towards the woman had thus triumphed in corrupting her "imagination," the ruin of the race was inevitable; the Flood came "on the world of the ungodly."

It is not till the calling of Abraham and the establishment of a sure line through which her seed should be manifested, that woman's destiny as the moral helper of man, when he is overborne by sin and the punishments of sin, and doomed, apparently, to utter destruction, is brought out and clearly established. We might cite many Bible proofs of her spiritual insight in discerning the true way, and her aid in helping men to keep the true faith; but three photographs of woman's work stand out broadly defined, and are all we have room here, even briefly, to describe.

Our first, from the land of the Nile, shows the Hebrew men so crushed beneath the lash of the cruel Egyptian bondage, that their souls had become as abject as their tools. Pharaoh had, in effect, doomed the Hebrew race to extinction by his decree that "every male child" should, at birth, be destroyed; then the Hebrew women must have amalgamated with other races. Not a Hebrew man was found who dared resist this cruel decree; utter ruin seemed sure. Not a ray of hope appeared, till on the dark surface of the picture the light of a mother's love, and hope, and faith comes softly in, as she lays her "godly child" in his cradle of "bulrushes," and with her whole heart, trusts him to the Lord.

Ah, Jacob's fear not. A woman's prayer of faith is mightier than Pharaoh's will. That "ark of bulrushes," woven by thy trembling hands, is a structure more glorious and important to mankind than all the works of Egypt. "The daughter of Pharaoh will have compassion on the babe," she will take him for her own; but his mother shall train his infancy and childhood. From her heart and soul he shall imbibe the true faith and feelings of an Hebrew, and this influence shall never be lost. In the mind of Moses may be stored "all the wisdom of the Egyptians;" he may, before their great world, be "mighty in word and deed;" but these things will all be foolishness to him when the God of his fathers, in whom his mother taught him to believe, shall call him to the work for which he was saved. Then, in obedience to the Lord God, this Deliverer of Israel, this inspired Lawgiver for all mankind, will appear as meek as the babe laid down by his weeping, praying mother in the "ark of bulrushes." This picture is woman's heart.

The second photograph shows the young Josiah King of Judah; but the nation holds only two tribes; and these so sunk in ignorance and idolatry, that even the knowledge that there is a Book of God's Law has passed away. The Book is accidentally found, and the picture shows the astonishment of the scribes and priests, and the terror and sorrow of the king, when there was not a prophet in Jerusalem who could interpret the Law and reveal the will of the Lord. Then, "the servants of the king were sent to Huldah, the prophetess (she dwelt in Jerusalem in the college)"; her memory should be dear to every woman who loves God's Book, for she had kept its precepts in her heart, and its knowledge in her soul when the light was lost to scribe and priest, to king and people. Thus her enlightened soul influenced and directed the soul of the king, and the destiny of the nation.

Our third photograph shows the great king, who "reigned from India even unto Ethiopia," in his royal house, seated upon the royal throne, where no person, "whether man or woman," might come, uncalled, without incurring instant death, unless the king held out his golden sceptre. This despot, in his drunken orgies, and under the control of a wicked favorite, had doomed to a swift and bloody destruction all the Jews who dwelt in his wide dominions—God's people, exiled from Jerusalem, were in one terrible day to be blotted out; and no human power seemed able to stay the cruel sentence.

A light comes over the sullen gloom of the king's countenance, as his beautiful queen appears a suppliant before him; to her the golden sceptre is held out, and she is promised her request, even "to the half of my kingdom."

Does it seem strange that she did not then fall on her knees and plead for her own people? She had a more difficult task before her: the man who had decreed the destruction of the Jews was her husband as well as her sovereign. She must save him. He must be drawn from his wicked favorite, his sensual debaucheries, and won to love innocent pleasures, and find his noblest enjoyment in judging his kingdom righteously. Therefore the young wife, faint with fasting and pale with fear, had yet so restrained her own feelings that she seemed to her husband in her "royal apparel" like a sunbeam of joy, as she invited him to "her banquet," which she intended should give him more real happiness, in novelty of home enjoyment than the orgies of the palace had ever been able to confer.

And how wise was her discretion that did not separate the king from his favorite, whom she must have abhorred. Queen Esther, by inviting Haman to her banquet, and thus putting herself in direct competition for the favor of the king with this villainous ruler of her husband's mind, showed the resolution of a wise and pious woman who determined to shun no pain nor peril to herself in the effort to gain the confidence and save the honor of the man she was pledged to love and reverence.

She succeeded. Her reply, when the king asked, "what was her petition?" appealed to his judgment as a righteous man and a wise monarch. And how courageous was her truthful accusation of "this wicked Haman" spoken out to his face!

The result is known to every one who has read the "Book of Esther." Haman was hanged. The Jews were saved and exalted; King Ahasuerus was brought into close personal friendship with pious believers in the true God; many of the people of the land became Jews; and the memory of this great deliverance is even to the present day held sacred by all pious Israelites. This lovely picture of piety, patriotism, and conjugal duty we call the moral power of woman's mind.

RED-HAIRED LADIES.—We have received a very touching letter from a young lady who is afflicted with this bright-colored hair; it is so wonderfully abundant, so wavy and curling, that the owner is obliged to give up all idea of relief from hair-dye; and so she pleads for a few words of consoling philosophy or some examples of patient endurance of similar calamities. We give a scrap or two from a writer whose sensible remarks are worth reading:—

"The greatest painters of Italy have given bright auburn heads to their heroines; and at the present day, throughout the entire Latin peninsula, red-haired girls are esteemed the greatest beauties. Rubens, the immortal founder of the Flemish School of Art, has followed his southern contemporaries in this matter. The 'gorgeous hue' is prominent in his best efforts. The history of painting shows that the grand, inspiring color of 'rosy-fingered morn'—of the luxurious tropics—is the finest of all hues, while the biographies of the fair prove that the greatest and most beautiful of the sex had red hair.

"In the face of acquaintance with such facts of positive testimony, the prevalent objection to red hair is unaccountable. It must rest on illiterate, vulgar prejudice. What superiority has black, or brown, or mere dark hair over red? None whatever. In real truth, if there be any natural superiority in the matter, it belongs to the red hair. That takes a finer polish, grows more wavy and luxuriantly, and remains much longer without turning gray, than hair of any other hue."

The following lines, from a contributor who has long been a devoted friend of our Book, are not "soaring poetry," but they are true sentiment; those young ladies who keep such beauty in their minds will not be unhappy, even if they have red hair.

CHEERFUL THOUGHTS.

Open your mind to cheerful thoughts,

Till they fill each corner and nook,

And no room is left for those that bring

The sigh and the doleful look,

The mind is the brush that paints the hour,

And bright will the colors glow

If, in the chalice held by Time,

Content its hues doth throw,

But dark and drear the scene will appear,

If gloom steals in the cup;

Then fill the mind with buoyant Hope,

And smile each tear drop up.

MRS. FRANCIS.

THE CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL OF PHILADELPHIA.—We have the Seventh Annual Report of this interesting and useful Institution before us. It shows that great good has been done, much suffering relieved, and many dear little sufferers saved from, probably, a life-long decrepitude or early death, by the kind ministrations of this Hospital. It only needs better opportunities, that is, a suitable building, well furnished. This is a pressing want. There is a fund of about $7000 invested, and as soon as $3000 more are obtained, the Child's Hospital will be commenced. Surely this sum will soon be advanced. Thirty dollars makes a life member. One hundred new life members would fill up the amount. The blessings of "little children" are treasures laid up in heaven.

THE WOMAN'S HOSPITAL OF PHILADELPHIA.—This Second Annual Report is very encouraging. The Hospital is situated on North College Avenue, near Girard College. The situation is delightful; the salubrity of the air, and the pleasant surroundings are found beneficial to the invalids.

The same buildings contain the rooms of the "Woman's Medical College" of Pennsylvania; both institutions are benefited by this arrangement. The managers close their interesting report with cheering words, when they say—

"We cannot but regard it as a proof of the strong conviction in the minds of good men and women, of the great necessity for this Institution, and as an evidence of a guiding Providence in the movement, that at a time when public sorrow and pecuniary embarrassment have rested so heavily upon the community, means have been so generously furnished to purchase our building, and initiate successfully the benevolent enterprise for which we are organized."

Those who want more particular information should address Mrs. Cleveland, M. D., Woman's Hospital, North College Avenue, Philadelphia, Pa.

POSTMISTRESS.—Mrs. Caroline F. Cowan has been appointed postmistress at Bideford, Me., in place of Louis O. Cowan (her husband), deceased.

WIDOWS' PENSIONS.—There have been filed, since the breaking out of the war, 15,000 applications for widows' pensions, and 9,000 for invalids'.

MISS S. J. HALE'S BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES, 1826 Rittenhouse Square, Philadelphia, Penna.

This school has now entered on its seventh year. The success and present prosperity are very satisfactory to its friends.

The design of the Principal is to give a thorough and liberal English education, to furnish the best facilities for acquiring the French language, and the best instruction in music and the other accomplishments. The Assistants employed are of the first class and highest merit. French is taught by an experienced instructress, a lady lately from France who resides in the family; and thus the pupils have ample opportunities of acquiring the accomplishment of speaking the language.

Particular and continued attention is paid to the moral training, and also to the health and physical development of the young ladies.

Circulars will be sent wherever required.

TO OUR CORRESPONDENTS.—We shall make room for these articles: "The Unfortunate Music Scholar"—"Did you"—"Belle Dana's Temptation"—"A Visit to the Old Manor"—and "Seventeen."

These articles are not needed: "Dew Drops"—"Oh, then I have Thoughts of thee!" (we are not in want of anything at present)—"Minnie Browne" (nothing more)—"A Cloudy Day"—"An Appeal for a Correspondent" (good for a newspaper)—"The Lover's Leap"—"A Glance into the Life of the Poor"—"The Confession"—"The Women of the Revolution" (we had a series of excellent papers on this subject, written by Mrs. Ellet, some years ago)—"The Height of the Ridiculous"—"Lucy Dye" and the other poem (we have no room)—"To my Mother" (pretty for a Christmas Tree, and does credit to the writer's heart)—"A Letter to a Friend"—"A Dream" (we are sorry to refuse the request of "a friend to the Lady's Book," but we must)—"Lines" (the writer can do better)—"A Small Resentment"—"My Awful Wife" (which proves there must be some fault on the husband's side. The poet who wrote "My Little Wife" went home early, and loved to be at home; that was the reason why Love was waiting for him)—"Give, and it shall be given you"—"Intemperance"—"A Request"—"The Robin's Nest," and other poems—"The Last Wedding I went to"—"The First Spring Violet"—"The Lover's Song"—"The Little Shoe"—"To a Friend"—and "Squeaky Boots."

We have others on hand which will be examined next month.

"April Fool," by Lex, received too late. The April number was published when the story was received. The same day we received a story with a request that it should be published in March. An article intended for any particular number must be sent four months in advance of the date of the number that it is intended for.

Health Department.

BY JNO. STAINBACK WILSON, M. D.

MUMPS.—This is a common affection of children and young persons. It is a contagious inflammation of one or both the glands beneath the ear, called the parotid glands.

Symptoms.—Slight feverishness, with stiffness of the jaws, and redness, soreness, and swelling of one or both of the above glands.

Treatment.—A mild laxative of Epsom salts if the bowels are costive; the warm bath, or warm wet-sheet pack; warm sweating teas of sage, balm, etc.; or cold water, if there is much fever. As local applications to the throat, it is the custom to use all kinds of stimulating liniment, poultices, and plasters, under the idea that the disease may be driven off to some other part. But the danger from this source is much exaggerated, and there is no good reason to believe that cold applications have any tendency to cause translation of the disease. We have no hesitation, therefore, in recommending cold wet cloths to the throat, where there is considerable fever and local inflammation. Should the inflammation be slight, a fannel bound around the throat will be all-sufficient. When the inflammation runs high, the wet cloths should be frequently changed, and exposed to the air, so that the cooling process of evaporation may go on freely. But when the inflammation is more moderate, a towel, three or four double, should be dipped in water, applied over the affected part, and then a dry binder should be placed over the towel. This acts as a warm poultice, and promotes perspiration of the skin to which it is applied, while it is far superior in comfort, cleanliness, and convenience to any kind of poultice or plaster. The diet of a patient with mumps should be light and unstimulating, and exposure to cold should be avoided for some time after the subsidence of the disease.

The symptoms of ascarides, or thread-worms, are a troublesome itching of the parts in which they find a lodgment, with the occasional expulsion, or escape of the troublesome little parasites in the form of very slender, short, white, pointed threads; and hence the name thread-worms. These are to be removed by injections; as medicines given in the ordinary way will not reach them. First, wash out the bowel well, by injecting warm water; and then throw up either of the following: 1. Take muriated tincture of iron a teaspoonful; warm water eight tablespoonfuls. 2. Take powdered aloes, a level teaspoonful; boiling water, half a pint. 3. Take sulphuric ether, half a teaspoonful; cold water, four tablespoonfuls. 4. Take common salt, a level tablespoonful; warm water, half a pint.

Whichever one of these injections is selected, it should be used at least once a day, and should be followed by warm water injections, or warm water and salt. This will wash out the worms that have been destroyed, or detached by the means used for that purpose.

Literary Notices.

OWING to the immense increase in the price of books, we will not receive further orders to send by mail. It never was a source of profit to us, but generally a loss, on account of the postage we had to pay.

From PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

THE SLEEPING SENTINEL. By Francis de Haes Janvier, author of "The Skeleton Monk," "The Voyage of Life," and other poems. This poem has acquired considerable prestige by being read by Mr. James E. Murdoch in Washington, Philadelphia, and other cities, to large and appreciative audiences. It is written in ballad style, and narrates how a young soldier, having fallen asleep while on duty as sentinel at night, was condemned to die, but was pardoned by the President.

From J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

OUTLINES OF UNIVERSAL HISTORY. In three parts; with a copious index to each part, showing the correct mode of pronouncing every name mentioned in it. By Joseph J. Reed. Part I. Ancient History. The importance of historical knowledge need not be urged. To authors, publishers, teachers, and to all who have any vocation or desire for public employment, this kind of information is of the first necessity and importance. The unlettered and those whose daily occupations prevent steady and diligent reading, may, by the aid of properly prepared works of history, gain information which will be of real use as well as pleasure. It needs considerable historical knowledge to understand the allusions and comparisons in the daily paper, or the last popular novel. And family reading, when the Bible is the centre of improvement, gains illustration, interest, and importance from the aid of History. It is a kind of learning in which women may and should excel; by its aid they may do much to improve social intercourse and promote home enjoyments. All these things Mr. Reed seems to have taken into account when he prepared this—his first volume of "Ancient History." By his method, the shapeless mass of old world events have been reduced to such lucid order, that children will love the study. As a manual of general history, it will be invaluable in schools and families. As a book of reference, professional men as well as students and artists, will find it just what they have wanted. The author deserves a rich reward for devoting his talents to this long and arduous course of study which it must have required to produce such an original and remarkably well-written work. The plan has one new and important feature: Mr. Reed treats of the "Christian Church" as a distinct "Power" in the world; its rise commences in this first volume. In the next the height of its wonderful dominion as developed in the Roman Catholic Church will appear. In the third volume Protestantism will have its mighty influence unfolded.

CHAMBERS' ENCYCLOPEDIA OF USEFUL KNOWLEDGE FOR THE PEOPLE. Parts 54 and 60 of this valuable work have been received; price only 20 cents each. Why does not every one subscribe for it. Such a store of information has never before been given to the public.

From GEO. W. CHILDS, Philadelphia:—

THE NATIONAL ALMANAC AND ANNUAL RECORD for 1863. We noticed this valuable work in our last number; we again call attention to it because it contains more matter, better arranged, and more generally useful and entertaining, of a public character, than any almanac ever issued in this country. It will be found a most valuable book for reference, not only for the year, but for succeeding time, for its contents have more than the ephemeral value usually contained in an almanac.

From FISHER & BROTHER, Philadelphia:—

FOX'S MUSICAL COMPANION. A good collection of banjo and comic songs, sentimental ballads, stump speeches, etc. The songs are set to music.

From D. APPLETON & Co., New York, through W. P. HAZARD, Philadelphia:—

HOLLY'S COUNTRY SEATS: Containing Litlographic Designs for Cottages, Villas, Mansions, etc. By Henry Hudson Holly, architect. We recommend this work especially to those who are contemplating the purchase or erection of a country residence. Its numerous designs for cottages and villas are all of them so excellent that a man of liberal means cannot fail to find one among them to suit his taste. The author gives, moreover, many useful hints concerning the selection of sites, landscape gardening, etc., which it is well not to overlook.

THE SPIRITUAL POINT-OF-VIEW: or, The Glass Reversed. An answer to Bishop Colenso. By M. Mahan, D. D., St. Mark's-in-the-Bowery, Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the General Theological Seminary. The author of this volume has felt it his duty to enter his earnest protest against the work which recently appeared from the pen of Bishop Colenso. He regards that book as "intensely infidel and materialistic," and altogether of such a character as should emanate from any other source, than that of a bishop in the church who professes to uphold the faith. He proceeds with zeal to correct the various mistakes, and to refute the fallacies of the bishop's work, and in all faith to reconcile the Scriptures with reason, and with the discoveries of modern science. That this publication will be eagerly hailed by the Christian world there is not a doubt.

THE SOLDIER'S BOOK: A Pocket Diary for Accounts and Memoranda for Non-Commissioned Officers and Privates of the U. S. Volunteer and Regular Army. The title sufficiently explains the object of the work.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

CHRONICLES OF CARLINGFORD; A Novel. By the Author of "Margaret Maitland," "The Last of the Mortimers," etc. etc. This book is composed of four separate stories, "The Executor," "The Rector," "The Doctor's Family" and "Salem Chapel." The first three were published together in book form about a year since; and now they reappear, with the addition of the last named, which alone occupies more than one-half the book of three hundred, double columned, closely printed pages. "Salem Chapel" narrates the trials of a young non-conformist minister who takes charge of the little dissenting chapel at Carlingford. He has been educated in a superior fashion, and possesses refined and fastidious tastes, and he finds it very hard to assimilate with the vulgar though friendly natures of his little flock. He cannot meet them on their own level, and, as a result, jealousy is engendered, dissatisfactions are expressed; and finally, in a spirit which we can regard as little better than stubborn pride, he refuses all the peace-offerings of his congregation, and retires from his charge. Interwoven with this simple story is quite a romance of mystery and misfortune, though in the end poetical justice is meted to all.

MODERN WAR: Its Theory and Practice. Illustrated from celebrated Campaigns and Battles, with Maps and Diagrams. By Emeric Szabad, Captain U. S. A. Embodying, in a popular form, "an exposition of military operations from their most elementary principles up to their highest development," this volume will be an acceptable one at the present time to a large number of readers. Apart from its lucid explanations of military terms and expressions, many of which are now in general use, without a corresponding clear or precise knowledge of their meaning, the book contains much military information, of an historic character, not readily to be found in any other single work. Its author has seen service in Hungary and Italy, as well as in our own country, and seems to write with a full acquaintance with his subject.

From CARLETON, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

THE GREAT CONSUMMATION: The Millennial Rest; or the World as it will be. By the Rev. John Cumming, D. D., F. R. S. E., author of "The Great Tribulation," and "The Great Preparation." The renown of Dr. Cumming both as a preacher and an author will secure for this book not only all who are of the same faith with him, but many others who do not accept his views of the Millennium.

NOTES, CRITICISMS, AND CORRESPONDENCE UPON SHAKESPEARE'S PLAYS AND ACTORS. By James Henry Hackett. Few who have seen Mr. Hackett upon the stage will deny that he stands first as a delineator of a certain class of Shakespeare's characters. Of his "Notes and Criticisms" we are not prepared to give our unqualified approval. There is much that is excellent; while, on the other hand, much with which the vast majority of readers will differ. A lengthy correspondence with John Q. Adams on dramatic matters, particularly the different characters in the play of "Othello," will be read with attention.

GARRET VAN HORN: or, The Beggar on Horseback. By John S. Sauzade. Regarding this work as a simple autobiography, there is much in it that will interest, and much that will profit the thoughtful reader. As a novel, the style is too crude, and both characters and plot insufficiently elaborated to create any sensation. In brief, it is a very good, though a dull book.

TACTICS; or, Cupid in Shoulder-straps: A West Point Love Story. By Hearston Drille, U. S. A. If this is presented as a bona fide picture of West Point society, we fear the world at large will not obtain a very favorable opinion of it. Whatever may be the case in this respect, we believe the author has wasted a great deal of time, and the publisher a great deal of that choice material just now—paper, in the production of a book which is not likely to meet the approval of those of accredited taste and judgment.

From T. O. H. P. BURNHAM, Boston, through J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

A TANGLED SKEIN. By Albany Fonblanque, Jr. The publisher of this volume is entitled to the gratitude of the American reading public for introducing to its notice an author already so favorably known in England. This novel is a superior one, and for carefully arranged plot, and concealed denouement, has seldom been surpassed.

From J. E. TILTON & Co., Boston:—

ILLUSTRATED JUVENILE BOOKS. This firm must become famous for the beautiful manner in which their works for the young are prepared. A set of these juveniles is a valuable library for the child. We noticed the "Alden Books" some months since; there is the "famous Winnie and Walter Series" and others, which we hope to notice. Now we would call attention to NEWTON'S PREPARED COLORS FOR ALBUM PAINTING. The box contains nine varieties of colors, a large bottle of reducing liquid, and "directions." By the aid of these rules, any person who knows the use of water colors can paint a photograph. When well executed, these photographs are nearly as beautiful as the finest miniature painting. It is really a charming art—this tinting of the sombre portraits of our friends, till they take the hues of life, and seem to be almost able to thank us for the improvement. Photograph landscapes, flowers, and objects of all kinds can be thus tinted to imitate nature, by the dextrous and delicate use of these "prepared colors," an art that may at small expense, and with great pleasure, be practised in every family.

From WALKER, WISE, & Co., Boston:—

THE EMPLOYMENTS OF WOMEN: A Cyclopaedia of Woman's Work. By Virginia Penny. (pp. 500.) The authoress has done good service in the cause of her sex by this summary of industrial pursuits now open to their needs. In the arrangement of her materials, Miss Penny shows much thoughtfulness, research, and good sense. In the practical facts given, she evinces clear judgment and an earnest desire to point out ways of usefulness. We warmly commend her book to our readers. It has a mass of valuable information for those who do not need to earn their own livelihood, as well as for those who do. This knowledge should be widely diffused; it will be useful in many ways. We have not time now to enter into this subject of woman's work for an independent support as its importance deserves. Whenever we have room we shall introduce this "Cyclopædia" in our own "Table." Now we counsel all persons who wish for information connected with the practical employments of woman—from the little girl to the educated lady—to examine this useful volume.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

GODEY FOR MAY, 1863.—A May party in an humble way. We have often given plates showing how the better, or rather richer class, not better, kept the first day of May; but here is a party determined to celebrate the day, despite of riches. The young ones seem to enjoy their repast, evidencing, though not saying, "Contentment is better than wealth."

Our Fashions for May—five figures, colored—and need we repeat that they are the Fashions? We would like all our subscribers to see the miserable fare, in this respect, that is meted out to the subscribers of other publications, either American, French, or English, on this, to the ladies, important subject, and then see the superiority of Godey. We would rest our case there. But we may appeal to those who are not subscribers; those who are, know our superiority.

We lately had the pleasure of exchanging photographs with our oldest subscriber—one who commenced with us in July, 1830. Have we any others who can date from the same period? We think there must be.

A MODEL EDITOR.—L. M. Young, editor of the Despatch, Erie, Pa., a most worthy gentleman, informs us that he does not lend the Lady's Book, or any of the books he receives for noticing. We commend this example to other editors throughout the United States.

LOUISVILLE, KY.—How can a lady expect us to answer a letter that is anonymous? Send a stamp, and address letter to Fashion editress, with your name attached to it, and it will be answered. The writer asks, as a great many others do, why we do not publish the prices. The prices of what? Of everything we can supply? Why the whole number of the Lady's Book for one month would not contain the catalogue.

AMERICAN BUTTERFLIES.—We published an advertisement in our March number about these cards. We have received Part I, and the cards in it are beautiful. Here we have the butterfly colored after nature, and artistically executed. They are both pleasing and instructive. See advertisement, page 315 March number.

"NO CARDS."—This practice is becoming prevalent. It saves a great deal of heart-burning and expense. Somebody is sure to be forgotten, and just the very person you ought not to have forgotten. The expense saved is very great. We expect very soon to see under the head of every matrimonial notice, "No Cards."

MR. HOLLOWAY'S MUSICAL MONTHLY.—We have received the first number of this new and beautiful periodical, which has been announced in the regular "Column" of our Musical Editor for a month or two past. In outward beauty, in the excellence of its contents, and in cheapness, we find it to be all that the publisher claims for it. In this single number, which costs subscribers but 25 cents, are given three pieces of music which in the music stores cost respectively, 50, 30, and 25 cents. These are Brinley Richards' beautiful transcription of Glover's melody, Floating on the Wind; At the Gate, a new song by the author of Poor Ben the Piper, Beautiful Valley, and other well known ballads; and the celebrated Shadow Air, from Meyerbeer's new Opera Dinorah, which has created so great a furore in Paris, Philadelphia, etc. The three title-pages to these pieces are beautifully engraved and printed, and the whole style of the publication is much superior to the average of sheet music.

As the terms are but $3 00 per annum, a rate that is unprecedentedly low for a work of such high character and cost, Mr. Holloway should have an enormous subscription list. Every lady or gentleman who purchases three dollars' worth of music in a year should subscribe for the work and get five times the value for the same outlay; in fact the Musical Monthly should be found in every house where there is a piano and a lady to sing or play. Mr. Holloway will send single numbers, containing one dollar's worth of music, as samples, at 50 cents. Or we will send the Lady's Book and the Musical Monthly one year for $5 00, and the money may be sent to ourselves or to Mr. Holloway. Mr. Holloway's address is J. Starr Holloway, Box Post Office, Philadelphia.

INDIANA, Dec. 29, 1862.

I am a stranger to you, personally, yet I have been an admirer of your excellent magazine for years, and have been both profited and entertained. I think it far superior to any other in circulation, and I desire to share the benefit of it for another year, and therefore inclose you $3.

LADY BLANCHE CRAVEN.—Presentation costume composed of train of white poul de soie, trimmed with thulle puffings, held by white roses, with crystals and grass; corsage to correspond; jupon of white glacé, trimmed with thulle, studded with white roses, grass, etc. Headdress of white roses, blond lappets, and plumes; pearl ornaments.

THAT our subscribers may see that there is some reason for the rise in the price of periodicals and newspapers, we copy the following:—

PAPER FAMINE.—The Rochester Union, one of the most prosperous dailies in the State, has reduced its size by cutting off a column from each page. The Oswego Daily Times, a smart and prosperous paper, has cut down its dimensions to six columns a page, on account of the paper famine. The New York Times, the last to increase its price, now announces that it will be sold at three cents, or 88 a year. The price here will be either four or five cents a copy. A new phase in journalism. The Albany Standard announces that on and after Monday it will be printed on manilla paper, and sold at one cent a copy. The paper famine is evidently taking effect. The New York World, following the Tribune and Herald, has advanced its rates to eight dollars a year, or eighteen cents a week. New York papers will not be sold hereafter today at less than four cents a copy, or twenty cents a week—possibly a higher price may be demanded for them.—Troy Times.

THE PARLOR GARDENER.—A complete illustrated guide to the cultivation of house plants, care of green-houses, aquariums, and instructions to many new and beautiful methods of growing plants, of grafting, budding, etc. etc. Price 65 cents. By mail, 70 cents. J. E. Tilton & Co., Boston, Publishers.

THE following is a reply to an article that will be found on page 206 of the February number—"A Bachelor's Thoughts about Matrimony":—

DEAR GODEY: I want to talk a few moments with that charming gent. who longs so ardently for a perfect woman. Twelve pages of Astronomy, thirteen of Moral Science, and five of Schiller's William Tell, are forming a strange chemical compound in my brain, I should think, by the way it aches; and for a respite, I would like a chat with the nice bachelor who has such clever "thoughts on matrimony." Of course I will not be so presumptuous as to aspire to be such an amiable bundle of perfections as he longs for, what though I fall far short of his exalted standard. I like the picture he draws, and would like to shake hands with him, with my whole heart in my eyes—if he is worthy such a woman! Because you see one does not very often see such a specimen of the genus homo—a man of soul, and sense, and candor, that would consent to be held by the silken chain of affection after the honeymoon had waned. But there is one stunner! "She must be good and sweet—bread and sugar, flavored with something sharp." I see you are fond of lemon-drops, and your bread must be light with the foam and snap of good hop yeast.

Oh, I am getting awful sleepy! and I don't believe you are so very interesting after all. But, old bachelor, if you are good and handsome, and a Christian, if so— "Would that Heaven had made me such a husband."

OUR MUSICAL COLUMN.

New Musical Monthly—This beautiful and attractive publication promises to be a decided success. It is just what all music players, of every capacity, whether beginners or finished performers, have wanted, furnishing as it does the very best music at a cheaper rate than has ever before been attempted, and in a form that is new for a periodical. The pages are of sheet music size, style and form, and each number is done up in colored covers, giving it the outward appearance of a high-priced piece of music. The music is printed from beautifully engraved plates prepared expressly for this work, and every piece in every number has a distinct and handsome title page of its own, a feature never before attempted in a periodical. The value of the Monthly, for its cheapness alone, will be best understood when we say that its cost to subscribers is but about a cent a page, while all music in stores costs five cents. The terms are three dollars per annum in advance, or four copies for ten dollars. Single numbers, containing one dollar's worth of music, 50 cents. For a list of the contents of the first number, which is now ready, we refer our readers to our last month's "Column" in the book. All remittances must be made to the publisher direct, J. Starr Holloway, Box Post Office, Philadelphia.

New Sheet Music.—We can furnish any of the following pieces. Parlor Spanish Dance, introducing several beautiful airs, 30 cents. Moonlight Warblings, fantasia, introducing the celebrated S'ndow Air from Meyerbeer's new Opera, Le Pardon de Plormel, a beautiful composition, 30. Les Cloches du Monastere (Monastery bells), a new edition of this exquisite composition, 35. Floating on the Wind, transcription by Brinley Richards of this favorite melody, 35. Schreiber's Band Drum Polka, capital piece, as played by the military bands, 25. Airy Castles, 35.

Messrs. O. Ditson & Co., Boston, publish the Fairy Tale Waltzes, brilliant set by Faust, 10 pages, 50 cents. L'Ange Gardien, one of Blumenthal's most delightful compositions, 50. Overture to the Doctor of Alcantara, grand Opera Buffa, 50. Grand Valse Brillante, by Leybach, very showy and beautiful, 50. Medora Valse, by D'Albert, with fac-simile of the London title, very handsome, 60. March of the 41st Massachusetts Regiment, with fine portrait, 40. Coldstream Guard's March, by Glover, 30. General Howard's Grand March, 25. Chopin's Mazourkas, first set, 40. Chopin's classical music is always admired by the educated musician.

The same publishers issue the following songs and ballads. A Young and Artless Maiden, The Love You've Slighted, and There's Truth in Woman Still, three pretty songs from Howard Glover's Operetta, Once Too Often, each 25 cents. Forth into the Fields, beautiful cavatina, 30. Softly into Heaven she Faded, ballad; The Magic of Moonlight, song; When a Lover is Poor, from the Doctor of Alcantara; Jale Fanes, ballad; The Flag of Our Country, new patriotic song and chorus; If e'er thy heart should Falter, pretty duet; Only in Jest, song; Come back to me, Fair Inez; Friendship, pretty ballad by Haycraft; My Heart remains with Thee; and Benedict's beautiful Echo Song; each 25 cents.

Orders for any of the foregoing will be promptly attended to. Address the Musical Editor, at Philadelphia, J. STARR HOLLOWAY.

The story of the "Origin of the P. H. B. Society" in our April number seems to have pleased our readers very much.

TORTOISE-SHELL.—Think of the following, ladies, when you are handling your tortoise-shell combs: What is called the tortoise-shell is not, as is generally supposed, the bony covering or shield of the turtle, but only the scales which cover it. These are thirteen in number; eight of them flat and five a little curved. Of the flat ones four are large, being sometimes a foot long and seven inches broad, semi-transparent, elegantly variegated with white, red, yellow, and dark brown clouds, which are fully brought out when the shell is prepared and polished. The laminae, as we have said, constitute the external coating of the solid or bony part of the shell, and a large turtle affords about eight pounds of them, the plates varying from an eighth to a quarter of an inch in thickness. The fishers do not kill the turtles; did they so, they would in a few years exterminate them. When a turtle is caught, they fasten him, and cover his back with dry leaves or grass, to which they set fire. The heat causes the plates to separate at their joints; a large knife is then carefully inserted horizontally beneath them, and the laminae lifted from the back, care being taken not to injure the shell by too much heat, nor to force it off until the heat has fully prepared it for separation. Many turtles die under this cruel operation; but instances are numerous in which they have been caught a second time, with the outer coating reproduced; but in these cases, instead of thirteen pieces, it is a single piece.

LETTER from an editor:—

"Yours is the only lady's periodical with which we have exchanged for several years, and I hesitate not to say here, as we do in our paper, that it is the excellent one of all devoted to the interests and entertainment of the women of America. Yours, most truly, L. L. P."

It has always been considered a difficult matter to make a rhyme to Timbuctoo. We published one some months since, and here is another:—

"I went a hunting on the plains,
The plains of Timbuctoo;
I shot one buck for all my pains,
And he was a slim buck too."

Messrs. J. E. Tilton & Co., Boston, have for sale all materials for the different styles of Painting and Drawing taught in their book, ART RECREATIONS. They will send a price list, if requested, and answer necessary questions, and will send, post paid, the book for $1 75. It teaches Pencil and Crayon Drawing, Oil Painting of every kind, Wax-work, Leather-work, Water Color Painting, and hundreds of fancy kinds of drawing, painting, etc. etc.

MAY is considered an unfortunate marrying month. A country editor says that a girl was asked not long since, to unite herself in the silken tie, to a brisk chap who named May in his proposals. The lady tenderly hinted that May was an unlucky month for marrying. "Well, make it June, then," honestly replied the swain, anxious to accommodate. The damsel paused a moment, hesitated, cast down her eyes, and with a blush said:

"Wouldn't April do as well?"

CHOICE PHOTOGRAPHS of Tom Thumb and Lady, in group, or of any other distinguished personages, at 15 cents each. Send for a circular. Agents and the trade supplied. G. W. TOMLINSON, Boston, Mass.

SOMETHING ABOUT THE LONDON POST OFFICE.—When Mr. Rowland Hill's cheap postage system went into operation, the size, style, and contents, of the various articles sent were very various. One letter that came to the dead-letter office, had, for contents, as officially described, "Three dozen birds' eyes!" A letter from Hull to London contained "one boiled lobster." From Norwich to Cheltenham, a live blackbird, which was actually transported, kept, and fed, and safely delivered to the address. An affectionate mother sent to her son a pottle of strawberries. This was reduced to a jam on the way, and out of pure sympathy, it jammed its next neighbor, whose original contents consisted of a quantity of valuable lace, and its prospective owner—the person addressed—was the late Queen Dowager. A black bottle, with no wrapper, only a label, addressed, "Tin M——," "a wee drop o' the crater," was mailed at Dublin, for Bradford, in Yorkshire. From Perth to Berwick, a salmon. Not unfrequently, bank notes are sent in the mail, without any envelope or covering, merely by fastening the two ends of the note together with wafers, and then addressing it. Notes as large as £50 have been sent in this way. From Aberdeen to Ayr, two hares and a grouse; from Wootton Bassett to Sawbridgeworth, six packages of wedding-cake, and one plum-pudding, in the same mail. Live leeches have been sent in bladders, and the bladders bursting, the leeches have been found investigating and exploring the interior of her Majesty's mails. A live mouse, a cork-screw, a paper of shoe-nails, a roast pheasant to Mrs. ———, Bughton; part of a human limb for dissection (detected by the smell), rolls of cigars, lucifer matches, detonating powder, prussic acid, a pistol, loaded to the muzzle, a poodle dog, a sailor's jacket, bottles of perfumery, a sheath knife, a full suit for an infant, to Lady J——, "with love;" a jar of pickles, a pocket-book, a porcelain tea-set, a box full of live spiders, a young alligator, or horned lizard—alive—"to Master J—— H——, to assist him in his natural history studies;" a case of dentist's instruments, daguerreotype portraits, and a live frog, are among the multifarious articles that are sometimes sent as letters. There is a regulation that requires all glass, edged tools, pyrotechnics, liquids, and whatever is liable to injure the mail, to be stopped, but many of these things travel, unobserved to their journey's end.

The Blind Man's Department.—The "blind" letters are taken to the "Blind Man," the title of a clerk whose vision is so sharp that hieroglyphics, which would puzzle a Philadelphia lawyer, or a professor of the Black Art, are generally straightened out, and the exact meaning written legibly over or under the original superscription. The correspondent, who directed a letter to "Sromfredevi," was not supposed to know the exact name, style, and title of "Sir Humphrey Davy." The man that wrote "dandy" for Dundee, "Emboro" for Edinburgh, "Dufferlin" for Dunfermline, was, probably, not exceedingly well versed in Scottish geography. It was supposed to be a fresh student of phonetics that addressed a letter to "jonsmeetne Wcasal pin Tin," instead of John Smith, Newcastle-upon-Tyne. The letter that was addressed, "Cally Phorni Togow the Niggeranger Rought," was evidently penned by some one who had a brother in the mines. All these "Blind Man" deceivers, or nearly all of them, for some directions are stone blind, and defy the powers of our hieroglyphic reader. Sometimes the "Blind Man" is seen eying a letter intensely, and humming an air, when suddenly, as if by inspiration, down comes his pen, and the full superscription is at once made plain.

SUMMER PRUNING OR STOPPING OF THE GRAPE VINE.—Our attention has been called, by Mr. Phin's admirable work on Grape Culture, to the great importance of proper summer care of the fruiting vines—in order to secure a full and satisfactory yield of luscious grapes—by stopping, is meant pinching off the ends of the shoots. "If the lateral shoot is allowed to grow unchecked, it will consume its portion of food, in the production of many leaves and some grapes, and the more there is of the former the less will be the weight of the latter. But if the shoot is stopped after having formed two leaves, all that quantity of food which would have been consumed in the production of other leaves, is applied to the increase of size in the grapes and the two leaves that are left, which are to give flavor, sweetness and color to the grapes. By summer pruning, we do not mean the removal of large quantities of leaves, as is often done to the injury of the fruit, as it is well known that the finest bunches grow and ripen under the shade of the leaves. But what is required is simply to break off the ends of the shoots, this should be attended to at this season. For full instruction in this most important branch of grape culture, we would refer our readers to the Sixth Chapter of Phin's Open Air Grape Culture." D. M. Dewey, of Rochester, N. Y., has the work for sale.

SMOKE FROM MY CHIMNEY-CORNER:—

Oh, I'm lonely! sad and lonely,

Now my precious wife's away!

E'en the sun don't shine so brightly,

Nor her flowers look so gay!

If I'm seated by the window,

In her boudoir all alone,

I am listening for her footstep,

Or her voice's loving tone.

I have fed her pet Canary,

But he sings not now to me;

I have dressed his cage with chickweed,

But he listens, love, for thee.

Stay not longer with thy mother,

For thy husband's all alone;

She has others, dear, to love her,

But thou art my only one!

Hark! the postman brings a letter!

From my "wife" it has come!

She is homesick there without me—

And I fly to bring her home.

TO COLOR PHOTOGRAPHS.—A new preparation called Newton's Prepared Colors for Albumen pictures is for sale by J. E. Tilton & Co., Boston. Price, with a bottle of Reducing Liquid complete, with full directions for painting, so that any person, though not an artist, may paint in a most beautiful manner, and very rapidly, the cartes de visite and photograph, etc., $3 25.

There has been offered for sale a worthless imitation that will injure the photograph. See that the box obtained has the name and seal of J. E. Tilton & Co., Boston, who are sole agents for the United States.

J. E. T. & Co. have also beautiful copies of flowers from nature (photographs) for coloring with these colors, or for copies for drawing and painting, which they will send by mail for 25 cents each. Also, cartes de visite of all distinguished persons.

JUVENILE DEPARTMENT.

We give this month another one of these amusing Charades in Tableaux we have had prepared for our young friends.

MAY QUEEN.

TABLEAU I.—MAY—

Let the furniture be removed from the stage, and the background draped with white, looped with garlands of flowers and leaves; the floor covered with white, and flowers scattered over it. One single figure represents May. A beautiful blonde should be selected. Let her wear pure white; the dress long, full, and floating. Her hair should fall free, either in curls or waving ripples, and a wreath of delicate flowers rest on her head; flowers should appear to fall all about her; in her hair and on her dress (small pins, or a few stitches of thread will fasten them); her hands are raised, her eyes up-lifted, as if she were just about to rise and soar away. The writer has seen a lovely child so dressed and standing, and the tableau was as beautiful as can be imagined.

TABLEAU II.—QUEEN.

The celebrated historical scene of Raleigh spreading his cloak for Queen Elizabeth to step upon, makes here a most effective tableau. Let the group of attendants, maids of honor, and courtiers be as large as the wardrobe of the company will allow. Queen Bess, in the centre of the stage, should be a little girl with red hair. She wears the high ruff, small crown, and long train of the famous sovereign; at her feet kneels Raleigh, spreading his velvet cloak before her. He wears the courtier's dress of the time. The queen, smiling, lifts her robe with one hand, and extends the other to wave her thanks to the courtier. A full description of the scene may be found in Scott's Kenilworth, and the costumes should be prepared from pictures of the times.

TABLEAU III.—MAY QUEEN.

In the centre of stage is a throne, with an arch of flowers above it, and seated upon this is the May queen. She wears white, and holds a sceptre of a long-stemmed lily or branch of tuberose. At her right, one foot on the upper step of the platform of the throne, one on the step lower, is another young girl in pink, who holds the crown of roses over the May queen's head. Kneeling at the left, before the throne, is a third little girl in pale blue, who offers a basket of flowers. A group of children, boys and girls, in light dresses, trimmed with flowers, the boys wearing wreaths on their hats, the girls flowers in their hair and on their dresses, are standing round the throne, their hands joined and forming a circle, as if just dancing round the newly-crowned queen.

MISCELLANEOUS AMUSEMENTS.

The Balanced Egg.

Upon a perfectly level table lay a looking-glass. Take a fresh egg, and shake it for some time, so as thoroughly to incorporate the yolk and the white. Then carefully and steadily proceed to balance it upon its end. It will remain upright upon the mirror; an impossibility were the egg in its natural state.

The Balanced Stick.

Obtain a piece of wood about eight inches in length, and half an inch thick. Adix to its upper end the blades of two pen-knives, and on each side. Carefully place the lower end of the stick on the point of your forefinger, when it will retain its position without falling.

To Melt a Bullet in Paper.

Wrap up a smooth bullet in a piece of paper in such a manner that no wrinkles may be left, and that the paper touches the lead at every part. Next hold this over the flame of a candle, and, in time, the lead will be melted without the paper being burnt, but when the lead has become fused, it will pierce the paper and fall through.

PHILADELPHIA AGENCY.

No order attended to unless the cash accompanies it.

All persons requiring answers by mail must send a post-office stamp; and for all articles that are to be sent by mail, stamps must be sent to pay return postage.

Be particular, when writing, to mention the town, county, and State you reside in. Nothing can be made out of post-marks.

Y. P. F.—We know that a strict regimen of meat, no vegetables, very little sleep, and but little of any kind of liquids will accomplish much; but we have never made up our minds to try it, although coming under the denomination of “fleshy.”

Mrs. A. F.—The same complaint that Lady Macbeth made: Her hands were so red! We know of nothing that will whiten your hands.

Chemistry for the Young.

558 The blowpipe consists in a tube, usually of metal, large at one extremity, opening to a small orifice at the other, and bent towards that extremity at right angles on itself. By means of it, the flame of a candle or lamp may be deflected from its upward course, and bent laterally, thus—

559. The proper use of the blowpipe can only be learned by practice. Just as easy would it be to teach swimming by writing a book on swimming, as by a parallel method to teach the use of the blowpipe. This proper use consists in acquiring the power of breathing and blowing at one and the same time—a compound operation which seems so impossible that it has passed into the Spanish proverb—“Ne se puede sorber y soplar a uno y mismo tiempo.” Nevertheless, this can be done, and must be done before the blowpipe is worth anything in the hands of a chemist, although, strange to say, artisans who use the blowpipe in their avocations—gold-chain makers and gas-filters, for instance—never acquire this art. The consequence is that, after a short exertion, they suffer from the attempt to maintain long blasts without stopping to breathe, and they are obliged to use the blaze of a torch, when the flame of a common tallow dip candle should have sufficed. This operation of maintaining a continuous blast of air is effected by first inflating the cheeks, then gently contracting them, and thus forcing air, in a very gentle current, held between the lips, or pressed like the mouthpieces of a trumpet (we prefer the latter) externally. It is evident that the degree of facility with which a continuous blast of air may be continued, must greatly depend on the orifice of the small nozzle or jet of the blowpipe. All delicate blowpipes are supplied with two or three movable jets of different sizes; but the bore of the largest should be scarcely adequate to admit a small hog's bristle. We do not recommend the young chemists who study from this book to purchase a high-priced blowpipe. Let them procure an instrument of the commonest description. When procured, let each individual consider at what distance his power of vision is most acute, and cut the blowpipe accordingly. This being done, the mouth part should be made hot, and whilst in this condition smeared with sealing wax in order to protect the lips from the brass of the tube. High-priced blowpipes have silver mouth-pieces and platinum jets. Next, tightly wind some stout waxed thread around the angular bend of the blowpipe, some little distance on towards the jet. The use of this contrivance will become evident by and by.

560. Having described the blowpipe, I must now mention that the source of flame to be employed in conjunction with it, may be (1) that of a candle, wax by preference; and for purposes of analysis, this is best of all; (2 and 3) gas, and the spirit-lamp, both of which, on account of the readiness with which they may be used, are of frequent extemporaneous application for the purpose of glass-blowing and glass-bending, although, in this respect, greatly inferior to (4) a lamp having a large wick supplied with oil, or, still better, tallow. This kind of lamp is used by artisans who work in barometers and thermometers, and the accompanying blowpipe is worked by double bellows. Such an apparatus is unnecessary to all young chemists, and the greater number of old ones.

Fashions.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

HAVING had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editor of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Spring and autumn bonnets, materials for dresses, jewelry, envelops, hair-work, worsteds, children's wardrobes, mantillas, and mantelets, will be chosen with a view to economy, as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godey, Esq.

No order will be attended to unless the money is first received. Neither the Editor nor Publisher will be accountable for losses that may occur in remitting.

The Publisher of the Lady's Book has no interest in this department, and knows nothing of the transactions; and whether the person sending the order is or is not a subscriber to the Lady's Book, the Fashion editor does not know.

Instructions to be as minute as is possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice. Dress goods from Evans & Co.'s; mourning goods from Besson & Son; cloaks, mantillas, or talmas, from Brodie's, 51 Canal Street, New York; bonnets from the most celebrated establishments; jewelry from Wriggins & Warden, or Caldwell's, Philadelphia.

When goods are ordered, the fashions that prevail here govern the purchase; therefore, no articles will be taken back. When the goods are sent, the transaction must be considered final.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION-PLATE FOR MAY.

Fig. 1.—Green changeable silk dress, barred with a darker shade of green. The dress is somewhat of the Empress style, the corsage and skirt being in one. The skirt is trimmed with a broad Grecque formed of black velvet, with a white edge. The same design, reduced, is on the corsage. The sleeves are rather small, and slashed up to the elbow, being caught together at the edge with a fancy sleeve button. The white sleeve is very full, sufficiently loose to slip the hand through, and finished with a very full muslin ruching. The collar is of embroidered muslin. Buff gante de Suede with three buttons at the wrist. Shawl-shaped mantle of black silk, richly embroidered, and trimmed with a fall of deep lace. The hair is slightly crepe, and is arranged in loops at the back.

Fig. 2.—Mourning suit of violet pique, braided en tunique, with a fancy black braid. Graduated black and white buttons are up the front of the dress. The wrap is of the shawl shape, bound with black braid, and braided to suit the skirt, the design forming a large corner piece in the point. Fancy summer capuchon, made like two half handkerchiefs fitted to the neck at the back. One half is brought over the head and arranged in the Marie Stuart style; the other part falls over the shoulders. It is made of black net, bordered with Vesuvio ribbon and edged with thread lace.

Fig. 3.—Walking suit of gray mohair lustre, braided with black; the sack being also trimmed with narrow black velvet and drop buttons. White straw garden hat trimmed with fancy feathers. Hair rolled, and arranged very low on the neck.

Fig. 4.—A golden tan Pongee dress, trimmed with one small flounce, headed by a ruching. Down each side of the skirt and on the front of the corsage are graduated gimp bows. The mantle is of the scarf shape, and of the same material as the dress. It is trimmed with one ruffle, worked in buttonhole stitch, and headed by a ruching. White straw bonnet, trimmed with green, and coronet trimming of pink roses with foliage.

Fig. 5.—A very stylish morning costume for a watering-place. It is made of white alpaca, with one box-placed flounce bound with black on the edge of the skirt. Above the flounce is a lace-like embroidery, and three rows of black velvet. A short sack cut to the figure, but not fitting closely, is worn over a white muslin waist. The hat is of Leghorn, with rather high crown and straight brim drooping slightly both back and front, trimmed with a black lace scarf and black and sea let feather. The hair is rolled from the face, and arranged in a chignon at the back.

THE SOUTACHE ROBE.

This robe is of mode-color alpaca, with a bordering of brown made on the dress, and printed to imitate a very rich braiding. It is one of the newest and prettiest of the Spring styles. The bow at the neck can be of silk or white muslin. Fancy muslin cap, with Islay green ribbon bow over the forehead.

HEADRESSES, ETC.

Fig. 1.—A coiffure for the back of the head. It is formed of very rich and wide black ribbon, with moss-roses, buds, and foliage.

Fig. 2.—A coiffure in the coronet style. It can be made of any color to suit the complexion of the wearer. We would suggest, as very stylish, the roll and front puffed loops to be of a rich garnet ribbon, with gold ornament and short white plumes.

Fig. 3.—A ball coiffure, composed of green ribbon and a large tuft of roses, with foliage.

Fig. 4.—One of the newest ball coiffures. Branches of wood twined together, with a large tuft of Narcissus blossoms, with long, graceful leaves, forming a coronet. A smaller tuft of flowers rests on the neck at the back.

Fig. 5.—Coiffure for full ball dress. A scarlet peony forming the coronet, and at the sides sprigs of ivy, oak-leaves, and gold acorns on branches of wood.

Fig. 6.—A wreath formed of white lilies, violet hyacinths, and Vesuvio ribbons, twined gracefully round the wood branches. This is also in the coronet style, and being of moderate height it is exceedingly pretty and becoming.

CHITCHAT UPON NEW YORK AND PHILADELPHIA FASHIONS FOR MAY.

ALTHOUGH some time has elapsed since the wedding of Tom Thumb and the little Warren amused the town, we think a description of a dress designed and made for her at Mme. Demorest's may be acceptable to many of our readers.

It was of a golden maize-colored silk, the skirt cut en traine, and ornamented with designs, intended to be emblematical of our own country, England, Ireland, Scotland, France, Germany, and Italy. The decorations were formed of very narrow pipings of white satin, softened by rich point appliqué lace. The design in front was an ear of corn, the grains in seed pearls, for America. On the right, a rose encircled with buds and leaves for England; on the left, laurel for France; Germany was represented by acorns, with leaves; Italy, by grapes; Ireland, by shamrocks; and Scotland, by the thistle. This rich drapery was caught up at the left to display the petticoat of white silk, with its blonde puttings and diamond-shaped crossings of strong Roman pearls. The corsage was low, with short sleeves, very tastefully trimmed with satin pipings and point lace. But even this elegant robe was not so fascinating to us as the dainty little corset of white satin, elaborately stitched and embroidered, moulded to fit the perfect little figure it was destined to inclose. Its proportions strongly reminded us of doll-dressing days in the nursery. We must not forget to mention the hoop, also a model in its way, and so closely woven that, though perfect in proportion to the tiny figure of the wearer, it contained fifty-two hoops, covered with white silk. The binding and facings were of white satin to match the corset. We venture to say that these contributions of Mme. Demorest to the trousseau of Mrs. Thumb have never been excelled. While on the subject of hoops, we must not neglect the new style called Quaker skirt. This is much smaller than the usual hoop, tapering most gracefully from the base to the top. It is especially suited to light summer, and airy ball dresses. Heavier dresses, being very long and ample, require a large hoop with a decided spring to give them a graceful appearance.

We select from the many beautiful articles in Mme. Demorest's salons, the following: A rich mauve moiré dress, ornamented on the corsage and sleeves with guipure applications, laid upon the material in elegant and varied patterns, which is quite a relief from the ordinary lace with one straight edge. Another was a jacket of white silk, bordered with a piping of cerise silk, covered with a tiny guipure edge. On each side of the corsage was a true lover's knot, formed of guipure, lined with cerise silk, closely stitched down. The sleeves were ornamented to correspond. Another attractive garment was an opera cloak of white cloth, bound with pink silk. It was a circle, bias at the back, with seam down the centre. The front was caught up very gracefully, and thrown over the left shoulder like a Spanish cloak, where it fell in soft graceful folds. We consider this one of the most stylish garments of the season, and one that will be very suitable for street wear, made of drab or cuir-colored cloths. We noticed that most of the white bodies at Mme. Demorest's were tucked in bunches, which is a slight, but very pretty change from last season. We may remark, en passant, that both thick and thin muslins can be purchased striped, to imitate tucks in all their different styles, which, of course, will be a great saving of trouble to the Blanchisseuse.

As mothers are becoming anxious about the little folks' hats, we are now able to gratify them, having paid a recent visit to Mr. Genin's establishment on Broadway. We found a most excellent variety, both in shape and style, the colors being entirely new. For instance, a dark cuir-colored straw, and a mixture of the most brilliant purple with black and white, besides every possible combination of black and white. For boys, there is the Harrow cap, of a cuir-color, a turban with closely fitting brim, and a vizor, with a binding of a rich blue straw. Others are trimmed with bindings of fancy leather, and bound with velvet the exact shade of the leather. The Berwick is another pretty style, with straight and taper crown, brim very wide and heavily rolled at the sides, and slightly rolled in front. This style is suitable for boys from two to four. Then the Eton, for boys from four to seven, generally of a mixed straw, with sailor brim an inch and a half wide, and the crown a complete round. This style has a dark blue ribbon tied at the side, and fastened with a straw knot. The same style, slightly modified, will be worn by older boys, the difference being that the crown is straight, and rounding only on top. One of the most artistic hats is a Leghorn with double brim, the brim turning from the under part to the outside, reaching the crown, where the straw is fluted, and forms the sole trimming of the hat. Conspicuous among the straw and hair ornaments for children's hats are bees, flies, butterfly bows, bangles, cornets, and other devices.

For little girls, there is the Dartford hat. This is one of the prettiest styles. It has a high taper crown, drooping slightly both back and front, bound with velvet and a piping of velvet, the same width as the binding, laid on the brim. It is trimmed with two bands of velvet round the crown, and a tuft of field flowers directly in front. The trimmings will be flowers, and scarfs of silk with fringed ends.

The riding-hats are of the Spanish styles, very high pointed crowns, with brims rolled at the sides. They are made of every variety of straw, and are very stylish.

We have but few decided novelties to record. One, however, is a monstrosity in the shape of a pocket handkerchief. It is of grass cloth, the color of brown wrapping-paper, ornamented by a single row of hem-stitch, and a narrow border of either blue or red.

Black lace leaves are among the newest things. These are used for ornamenting white muslin jackets, dresses, and opera cloaks. The effect is striking and beautiful. We have seen some pretty grenadine veils, with borders formed of pin stripes. For instance, a light mode-color veil, with a border of black stripes, is very effective. For morning collars, we have the Byron style; that is, a standing collar at the back, and the ends turned down in front. These are worn by both sexes. Another style, called the Alexandra collar, has the Prince of Wales leather stitched on them with colored cotton.

Piqués will be very fashionable, and the colored ones more varied in design and color than in former years. The designs being the same as on the muslins, large Grecques, stars, pin dots, and other styles. We use the future tense respecting piqués, for though we are told it is Spring, it is difficult to believe it, and nothing thinner than summer poplins, India silks, mohair lustres, queen's cloth, alpaca, and such goods, can yet be worn.

Many of the dress sleeves are made quite small at the wrist, barely admitting a small undersleeve. Dresses of all kinds are being trimmed with flutings, which are to be had ready fluted in tarletane, ribbon and silk, and any material can be quilted at a trifling expense.

Perfect scaffoldings of hair are now built on the head—roll upon roll—puff upon puff. Some of the styles are extremely odd; not the least odd, is that, for which are used two rats, two mice, a cat, and a cataract. Lest, however, we should be the means of some pussy being cut off by a premature death from the circle of which she is the ornament, we hasten to explain. The rats are the long frizetts of curled hair for the side rolls; the mice are the smaller ones above them; the cat is for the roll laid over the top of the head; and the cataract is for the chignon at the back of the head—which is sometimes called waterfall, cataract, and jet d'eau.

Little girls are wearing their hair in short frizzed curls, and, in some instances, we have seen very long hair floating down the back only slightly crept. This, however, is not a pretty style, and we would not advise its adoption.

For coiffures, the humming-bird alone disputes with the butterfly the favor of fashion. These ornaments were introduced by the Empress of the French, and bring fabulous prices, many of them being made of precious stones, or of enamel worked with gold. They are worn by young ladies as well as matrons; the humming-birds, being the natural bird of the rarest plumage, frequently set with diamond eyes.

At a recent ball the dress of the Empress was hooked up with diamond butterflies. The coiffure was composed of tufts of violets, from which a brilliant diamond butterfly seemed ready to spring into the air. The natural butterfly is however a coveted headdress, and as it is extremely fragile, it is rather an expensive fashion. They, as well as humming-birds, are frequently mounted on barbes, with charming effect. One of the prettiest ball dresses we have seen, was a mass of little puffings over which were scattered butterflies of every hue and shade. The mania extends still further. We see them in the florist's windows hovering over plants, baskets of flowers, and choice hand bouquets. The last novelty however is this; every variety of humming-bird and butterfly is gotten up on cartes of the carte de visite size for albums.

Mrs. Ellis, of 880 Broadway, is making up with her usual good taste, a number of very recherché walking suits. A very attractive one is an ashes of roses. Spring poplin, with very deep braiding in black above the hem. A talma of the same has a narrower braiding above the binding, and on the shoulders it is braided to represent a guipure round cape, the same as worn on the velvet cloaks this winter. The effect is beautiful. Another is a buff mohair lustre, braided in large palms round the skirt, with a talma of the same braided with smaller palms of the same style.

Brodie is making up Rotundes, sacks, and circles of every shade of steel, mode, and cuir. Most of them are braided in very striking pattered, some with merely a braided epaulet, while others are elegantly trimmed with gimp and jet ornaments. The silk wraps are generally trimmed with rich lace, oftentimes laid over white silk or satin, which gives a very distingué appearance. There is a great variety of out door garments, and the choice is left to the individual taste of the wearer.

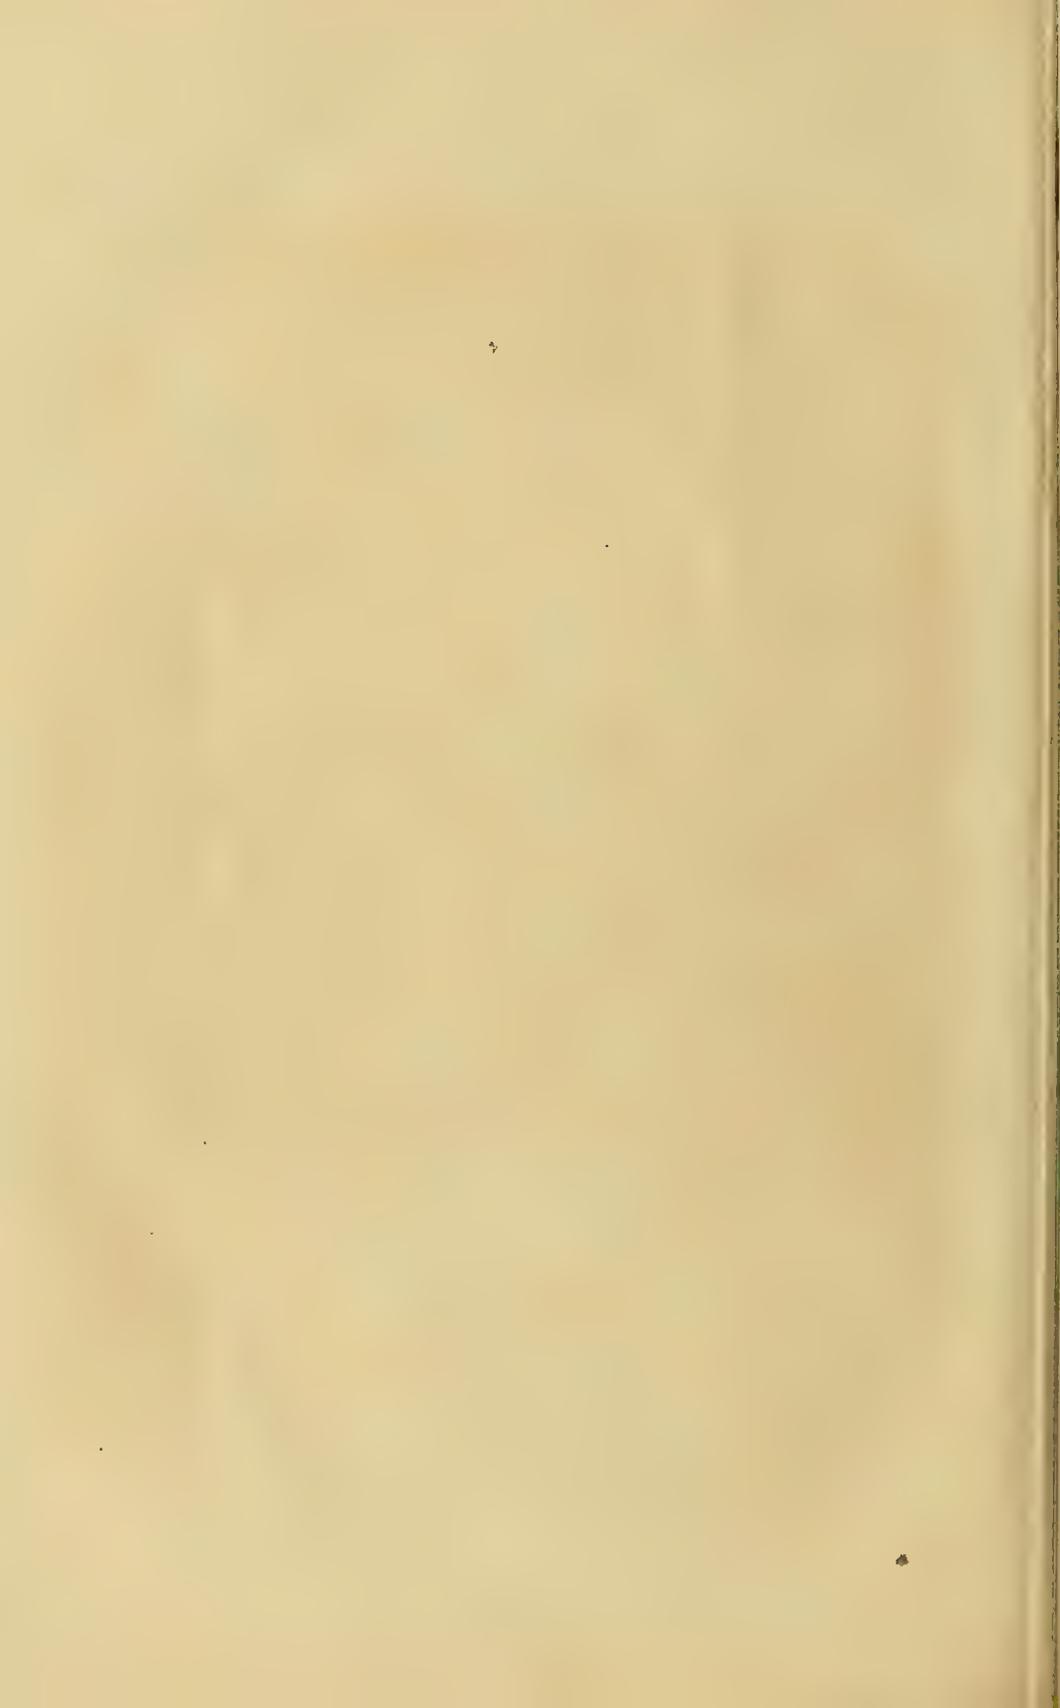

We see but little alteration in the shape of bonnets. They are quite high, very shallow at the sides, and a gradual slope from the crown to the front. Gray straws are very fashionable, also silk bonnets closely shirred, sometimes with puffs between. In our next we will give more definite information respecting bonnets.

THE LEONESE.

[From the establishment of G. BRODIE, 51 Canal Street, New York. Drawn by L. T. VOIGT, from actual articles of costume.]

We feel a special pride in the style of this mantilla. In explanation of the few points which may be required we should state that the reversed plaits which form its entire extent are confined close from the neck to the waist (which is marked by a beautiful macaron set on the face of each plait there—with pendants); from these the plaits fall free to the bottom of the garment. The neck and the lower edge are adorned with rich falls of black guipure lace. It is unnecessary to state that it is black taffetas.

TOILET MAT IN CROCHET.

Small mats are required in every apartment, as much on the toilet-table as the drawing-room; but those executed in crochet are more especially suited for bed-room and dressing-room service. They are strong, ornamental and easily worked from the illustration. They are commenced in the centre, and continued round and round, the pattern being worked in every stitch, with the intermediate parts in chain. Care must be taken that the chained lines are left the right length, so that they should neither draw the work up nor leave it too loose. The edge may be completed either with the small pattern given in the engraving, or a wider edge, worked separately, may be sewn on. A fringe is sometimes preferred, as saving additional work.

THE DOCTOR.

BY METTA VICTORIA VICTOR.

"It must give you great pain to refuse so many lovers, Belle."

"I never refused one in my life, Lizzie."

"You don't mean to say that you accept every young gentleman who proposes? There have been five to my certain knowledge since the picnic last July."

"O no! I only refer them to papa."

"Leaving it to his judgment whether to reject or encourage?"

"No, indeed! He has standing orders. I have given him standing orders to reject, unconditionally, every proposition for the next two years. That takes all the bother off my mind, you see! It isn't so hard on the poor fellows, either. They don't know whether it's papa or myself who isn't quite suited."

The two girls laughed in the sauciest manner. I could hear every word they said, my door being open into the hall on account of the heat, and theirs opposite being also partially unclosed. It was evident they thought I had gone to my office.

"But supposing you should see reason within the two years to rescind that 'standing order?'"

"Not a bit of danger, my dear. I don't believe in early marriages. I won't have a lover before I'm twenty, nor become a wife before I'm twenty-two. That's young enough, and too young. Besides, I expect to live and die an old maid unless papa takes me away from this stupid village. I am sure I shall never admire anybody in this vicinity."

"Then you don't admire the Doc?"—

Here I coughed loudly and suddenly; I was hearing more than was proper; and the next instant the opposite door banged to with startling emphasis. I could not help smiling at the probable dismay of the vain little witches; yet I felt very wretched as I put on my hat, went down the stairs out into the hot, dusty street, and off to my office. That earnest assertion of Miss Belle's had shaken down a very pretty castle which I had been building up on the airy foundations of a summer afternoon reverie.

A boy stood on the steps awaiting me, as I came up and unlocked my office. I knew that I should have been there an hour earlier, but the day was an August one, and dinner had made me indolent.

"Mother's very bad with the neurology to-day. Dr. Doseall's medicines don't do her no good, and she wants you to send her something."

Like the rest of the doctors in Brownville, I kept an assortment of drugs and put up my own prescriptions. I prepared some pills as efficacious as anything, perhaps, in lulling that rather hopeless disease, and gave them to the boy.

"What's the charge?"

Looking down at his ragged clothes, I checked the customary reply. I didn't think a dollar dear for advice and medicine; but a dollar would plainly be a large sum to this shabby little fellow.

"Who is your mother?" I asked.

"The Widdy Graves, sir."

"What does she do?"

"She sews when she hasn't the neurology too bad; it's in her head."

"Well, run home with the pills. I don't charge anything for them. Tell your mother not to try to sew when her head is bad ; and to take hop-tea when she goes to bed."

He stared at me a moment and ran away ; I went in and sank down in my leather-cushioned chair, feeling a gentle complacency at the act I had performed. It soothed some of the disturbance I suffered ; yet the relief was but momentary. I was soon absorbed in watching the shaking and tottering of my castle in the air ; silver pillars, golden turrets, diamond windows, fairy arches, lofty towers, shimmered and glimmered and melted together in the most confusing manner.

I had come to Brownville three months ago to commence the practice of my profession. I had, as it were, "bearded the lion in his den" ; for I had opened an office within a stone's throw of that of the celebrated Dr. Doseall. I had no wife, and I had no partner, nor was I connected with any of the leading families, except with that of Mrs. Ripley, who was a great aunt of mine, and whose daughter Lizzie was, consequently, my second cousin. With them I boarded. I had good looks, good character, and good testimonials. As for reputation, I had it—to make ! Brownville was a growing and promising town, named after the grandfather of Belle Browne, the young lady whom I had overheard in confidential discourse with my cousin. Her father was one of the great little men of the place, rich, respected, and a judge. I had brought letters to him when I came, which had been the means of my receiving a cordial welcome to the circle of his acquaintance ; though I should soon have found my way there through the help of Lizzie, who was Miss Belle's bosom friend.

It was a very nice thing for me that my aunt consented to board me. She had a fine old house and grounds ; plenty of roses about the windows, great cool parlors, a refined table, an excellent piano, with plenty of music of evenings. I loved and respected her, and was charmed with my gay, pretty cousin. Altogether I was settled in a manner to make the great number of young men envy me—all the comforts and delights of home, without any of the responsibility. I could afford to wait for a practice, as I had some little means of my own left over from the expenses of my education. I did not expect Judge Browne, nor any other of my influential well-wishers, to drop their old family physician and take up with a new-comer ; I was not so foolish ; I was content to build up a business slowly.

Only, when I saw Belle Browne, I became in haste to be rich, famous, et cetera. I could not look at her brown eyes and browner hair—all as brown as her name—without visions of wonderful cures, acknowledged skill, rapid wealth, and rising honors seeming to hover and flit about her. Pleasant as was my aunt's house, its greatest charm to me was found in the fact that Miss Browne came there so often. I only ventured to call formally at her home, occasionally ; but I saw her every day with my cousin—sometimes at dinner or tea, very often in the evening. Those two gypsies made the old mansion musical. They never did anything rude ; but every deed of graceful mischief which their artful cunning could devise was enacted, and "the doctor" came in for his share of the teasings and tricks. I bore these with a patience which ought to have won their applause—it was the patience of content. They were both of them eighteen, only daughters, accomplished, and pretty. Belle was more than pretty ; she was lovely ; and full of spirit and girlish frolic as she was, there was something soft and womanly through all her actions—a nice reserve, too, which allowed no one to take advantage of her gayety to approach with familiarity.

Well, for three months I had been in a pleasant dream ; enjoying myself without hardly stopping to question the future ; and all the time, half consciously, half unconsciously, I had been building up the castle which Belle's gay speech had that afternoon demolished. I had hoped that I was not indifferent to her. I had coupled her with myself in my thoughts of the future, as my wife, when I should venture to take one ; always with becoming doubt, with deferential fear, but still I had hoped. I knew it then, if not before, by my disappointment when I heard her vow that she should live and die an old maid if her father did not take her away from this stupid village. Plainly, then, she had no particular interest in any one in this village ; she was too good for any of us—even the new-comer, the promising young doctor, the present lion of the young ladies, myself.

If she had made this spiteful remark expecting me to overhear it, I might have flattered myself that it was only a girlish art to excite my interest and apprehension ; but they were evidently unsuspecting of my proximity until my cough alarmed them. I sat in my chair thinking it over, feeling warm, and dull, and uncomfortable. Dr. Doseall's gig, as it rolled by, raised an unpleasant dust. I didn't keep a gig, and I hadn't had six calls in as many days. Brownville was a frightfully healthy place, and the old doctor was very popular. I remembered what Mrs. Ripley had said to me that very day at dinner, with Belle sitting opposite, that "if I wanted to get into practice, I must get married. A wife was a valuable adjunct to a young physician."

I recalled the furtive glance I stole across the table, and the blush which I was so foolish as to have fancied I saw rising to a fair young face. Blush—fiddlestick! it was the hot day and the hot dinner. Roly-poly of raspberries in August, with boiled sauce, would make anybody blush. Iced-cream would have been more appropriate. I couldn't half entertain the young lawyer who came across the street to have a chat with me. He, too, seemed in low spirits. I recollected that he had been very attentive to Belle at the fatal picnic, where she had been so bewitching in her white dress and straw hat, and I wondered if he had been one of the five victims—perhaps the latest! I resolved that I would not make the sixth. Forewarned, forearmed. I felt relieved when he went away. Presently the town-clock struck six. Mrs. Ripley had tea at seven. I waited awhile and started for home. I knew Belle would not be there, for I had seen her pass, on the other side, on her way back.

As I loitered along I perceived the boy for whose mother I had prescribed; he was down in the dust with a quantity of marbles, and his face was smeared with molasses-candy.

"Is your mother any better?" I inquired, the weakness of human nature causing me to fish for the thanks she had probably uttered at receiving the medicine gratis.

"She says she thought a doctor all the way from New York would know somethin' greater'n hop tea. Anybody might know that. She didn't believe in such common stuff; she'd a notion not to take the pills."

I was about to characterize her, mentally, as an ungrateful woman when the sight of the candy and marbles filled me with a sudden conviction—the little rascal had not informed her of my generosity—he had spent the quarter or half which she had given him in this rare and exhilarating treat. When we have on our blue spectacles, the whole world is colored accordingly. This little incident deepened my misanthropic mood. Probably if I had been wearing my rose-colored ones, I should have contemplated the afternoon's happiness of this young rogue with satisfaction. He saw the suspicious look I cast upon the marbles, and put his thumb to his nose, giving me a sly smile, but taking care to edge away from my proximity.

When I reached home, Lizzie was in the parlor reading the last novel with a very absorbed air. She stole a side look at me; finally venturing the remark:

"Oh, Doctor, have you read 'Rutledge?'—the heroine is so interesting!"

"A charming creature, no doubt; refuses five lovers in as many weeks, perhaps. The existence of such enchantresses is very fatal to our sex."

"Please, now, don't be sarcastic. We had no idea you were in your room. Belle's dreadfully mortified—"

"Ah?" witheringly.

"Besides, she can't help it if she is admired," a little angry. "It isn't her fault. She despises flirting; she wouldn't be guilty of it! If the fellows will persist in making themselves disagreeable, she gets rid of them as gently as possible."

"By referring them to papa!"

"Yes, just that way. She's so tender-hearted! She wouldn't hurt a fly if she could help it. However, we don't either of us think it hurts them much."

"Hurts what?"

"The suitors, sir. They get over it without any deep scars. She has sense enough to know that even her pretty face wouldn't be so attractive if it wasn't for her father's wealth and position."

Here I winced a little. Had not thoughts of the material benefits to be gained with such a wife cast a rosy glow over the heaven of my dreams? Yes, I had thought of these appendages with pleasure, because Belle chanced to possess them; but, if I knew my own heart, I should have loved just as deeply, have been just as anxious to win her love, if she had neither.

Lizzie went on with her reading a few moments, then continued:

"I wonder you didn't have some curiosity to hear her opinion of yourself. You coughed just at the wrong moment."

Curiosity! I would have given one of my ten fingers to know just what she thought of me; but I did not consider it honorable to satisfy my wish in that manner.

"You wouldn't have me play eavesdropper, my dear cousin?"

"Why, no, certainly not. I didn't think of that. Besides, I'm afraid you would not have heard anything very flattering," regretfully.

"Belle doesn't seem to think as much of you as I expected she would. I told her, before you came, that she would like you ever so much. I don't see why it is. You are good and handsome, used to refined society, talented, and have an unusually fine manner, I think; and you're romantic, too; I told her so."

"Thank you for your inventory of my qualities, Lizzie. I suppose you think the last-mentioned the crowning grace of all?"

"Well, Belle and I have always imagined we should like a touch of the old romantic grandeur in our lovers," replied Miss Elizabeth, blushing very prettily through the dimples of her laughter.

"You'll have to go to some castle in Spain for them then, I fear. Come, put away your novel and yield to the fascinations of tea. The bell rang three minutes ago. And, by the way, don't try to expound my merits to your friend. I'm no fortune-hunter; and I have not the slightest idea of being 'referred to papa' just yet."

"Oh, dear! I've hurt your pride again, doctor. You've such an uncomfortable stock of it about you that people can never quite get out of its way. That's your fault; everybody has at least one, they say. I'm so sorry you don't like each other as much as I hoped. Mamma and I thought it would be such a help to you, too, in getting into practice."

"Thought what would be a help?"

"How stupid you are. To marry Belle, of course."

"It's a wonder you and your good mamma didn't present the matter in that light to her mind also. The romance of the view would have proved very attractive. I hope and believe that I shall be able to take care of myself—and a wife, too, when I get ready for one. I hope to afford the luxury of marrying for love. If I haven't got wit enough to make my own way in the world, I can starve in my office, or poison myself with my own drugs. I sha'n't get a wife to take care of me."

"How terribly grave you are about it! I wish Belle could see you in your present savage mood. It's what I call romance—to starve out of pride, you know!" And the little thing laughed in my face as she took my arm, dragging me towards the tea-room. "But I would not begin to famish just yet—not in a land of plenty—not until the season of peaches is over, and cook forgets how to make such delicious little wafers of soda biscuits."

It was impossible to be solemn with this pretty cousin; the tea was exhilarating; the sunset breeze waved the window-curtains. If Belle had been present to complete the delight of the scene, I am afraid I should have forgotten the warning crash—have gone to work to build up my 'baseless fabric' again.

As it was, she stayed away for several days from my aunt's house. Lizzie had to do all the visiting, which took so much of her time that I was left to the desolation of my own reflections. With no music of evenings, no flashes of wit across the dinner-table, no light forms haunting the porticos, or flirting through the shades of the garden, it was easy for me to feel misanthropical. Bitter as quinine was the powder of pride with which I medicined my mind.

The house was so lonesome I was forced to betake myself almost entirely to my office, where my most cheerful recreation consisted in watching the numerous calls made at the office of my elderly friend, Dr. Doseall. My solitary rich patient was convalescent. I was wondering one day what I was going to do for another, when there appeared at my door a messenger requesting my attendance at the house of Miss Waffle. I knew the name and the person. I had met Miss Waffle several times at evening parties; I had danced with her once at the picnic. She dwelt in a handsome brick residence of her own, was well-to-do, tolerable looking, and an old maid.

Why she had never married it was not easy to say. Worse-appearing maidens, with not half her worldly attractions, were led to the altar every day. It may be that in the freshness of her early conquests, conscious of the solid character of her merits, she had been too particular; and now, having got nearly through the woods, she was loth to take up with a crooked stick.

"Is the case urgent?" I inquired of the saucy-aired servant-girl who delivered the message.

"Don't know what you mean; but if you want to know if she's bad, I guess she ain't dreadful. She's dressed to fits and settin' in the parlor, with a smelin'-bottle in her hand."

"I will be there in half an hour." And, at the end of that space of time, I was ushered into Miss Waffle's parlor, panoplied in all the dignity of my profession.

The lady sat in an easy-chair, one slippers foot resting on a footstool, a highly perfumed handkerchief and a bottle of salts in her lap. It must have taken a couple of hours to "get up" her elaborate invalid costume. She had rosettes on her slippers; she wore a new cashmere robe, open in front, with a tucked and embroidered petticoat, faced and trimmed with blue silk; there was a pink flush on either cheek, which I at first mistook for hectic, but gradually concluded was carmine-saucer; her ringlets were just out of papers, and had a languid droop in them suggestive of indisposition. The room was shaded down to a mellow dimness, probably very soothing to her headache.

"Ah, doctor," she said, pointing to a chair close beside her, "I trust you'll not deem me foolish about myself. I don't think I am at all well. And, although I have always previously consulted Dr. Doseall, I have concluded that I am growing worse under his treatment. The doctor is getting to be an old man, you know—quite behind the times, I dare say. While you," with a smile, "being fresh from the latest authorities, ought to inspire confidence."

I bowed.

"What do you think is the matter with yourself, Miss Waffle?"

"Ah, doctor, that's just what I want you to tell me! I don't rest well nights; I'm nervous"—Here I took out my memorandum book, and began writing, requesting her to go on with the statement of her case. Had she seen the prescription I was making up, I am afraid she would have recalled Dr. Doseall; but, though a much more sensible one than that I afterwards compounded, my office did not furnish the necessary ingredients, and I did not order it. "Have palpitation of the heart frequently; had it just now, before you came in—the mere anticipation of your visit. Headache every morning for several hours. Oh, dear me, doctor, I can't describe half my bad feelings; but I'm certain there's something serious. I think I should receive daily medical advice, at least for a time. Sometimes I have feared it was my lungs; for I've quite a cough when I catch cold—and again, my heart. Won't you feel my pulse? I think it's quite too fast for health."

She pushed up a heavy gold bracelet from the wrist she gave me. I made such inquiries as the case warranted. Miss Waffle was rich, and I regarded every wealthy patient as a stepping-stone to—what?—the eminence from whence the soft eyes of Belle looked down at me so carelessly. I had as soon doctor the lady for fancied as real indisposition; I was sure that in either case she would take care not to get well too quickly.

"Be sure you come every day, doctor, until you see some improvement," was her parting appeal.

The prescription which was never made up for Miss Waffle read—

"Gold Wedding-ring,	$\frac{1}{2}$ ounce.
Sugar of Love,	0 scruples.
Common Sense,	3 grains.
Matrimonial Wine,	1 pint.

Dissolve, take teaspoonful night and morning."

I continued to visit my new patient with great punctuality. Every day I had the pleasure of taking her delicate wrist in my fingers, while I inquired earnestly how she felt, and of charging a dollar for my gentle solicitude. "Misfortunes never come single." Good fortunes, also, are apt to come in flocks. I had been in attendance upon Miss Waffle only three days when I received a summons to attend, in haste, upon Mrs. Darling, a young widow who had just thrown off mourning since I came to the village. Mrs. Darling had burned her arm, and wished me to come and dress it. The artfulness of widows is well known to surpass that of old maids. My new patron looked just pale enough with pain to awaken pity, which is akin to love; her pink cambric wrapper was very coquettish; the color set off handsomely the round white arm which was presented to me to heal, and upon which there was indeed a burn, not deep enough to threaten permanent disfigurement, but sufficient for present purposes. I am not vain enough to assert that that burn was not accidentally received; I only know that there was a bitter rivalry between the pretty widow and the ripe maiden, which had existed previous to their having any knowledge of my existence. The novel writers tell us of burning jealousy, and this may have been a specimen of that passion; if it was, I will give the widow the credit of having played a smart trick. It seemed as if the injury would never heal; the length of time it was in getting well did not speak much for my skill. As long as there was the faintest crimson scarring that handsome arm, I must go every day to look at it. After that could no longer be made available, a series of little ailments beset the rosy and dimpled little Darling, which were enough to make her tremble at the thought of the doctor's bill. However she, too, was able to pay; and it was not for me to quarrel with my bread-and-butter.

All this time Belle Browne grew shyer and more shy of my aunt's house. I was certain that she had read the nature of my presumptuous hopes, and that she wished to show me, by her coldness, how entirely she discounted them. As Lizzie had said, she despised coquetry; she would not give me a smile or glance other than she gave to all.

It seemed as if that witch Lizzie always took occasion when she was present to felicitate me upon my two patients, to inquire about Miss Waffle's palpitation of the heart, and if Mrs. Darling was threatened at present with diphtheria or cholera morbus? And once that grave, practical aunt of mine actually suggested that, if I could give up some of my high-flown poetry and settle down into the realities of life, it would not be a bad thing for me to make the most of the encouragement I received. Miss Waffle, especially, was a very excellent person, a little foolish about some things, but would make a devoted wife. Then the two girls looked at each other and laughed. I was angry at them for laughing, and responded that "age sometimes gave discretion at least," in so severe a tone that Belle turned away quite abashed.

"We don't think our daughter looks quite well lately," said Judge Browne to me, one evening in September, when I had gone with Mr. Ripley to pay a visit at his house. "She seems in low spirits, and not quite as blooming as usual. She's been asking me to take her away somewhere on a journey; and I've about made up my mind to do so. I've a few weeks of leisure now, before the October courts sit. What do you think, doctor?"

My eyes, albeit lover's eyes, were also those of a physician. It had not escaped me that the young lady had lost flesh and color—a shade less of bloom, a line less of roundness to the cheeks. "Change of air will be the best medicine, without doubt," I replied, fixing upon the patient the scrutinizing look which my profession warranted. "Change of scene and of association is also very beneficial in some cases. There may be some elements lacking in the air, water, food, and society of Brownville that a more favored locality will supply in abundance."

The Judge bowed assent to my profound observation, while a blush rose and deepened to scarlet over the face and neck of his daughter. The insinuation that she was going away to find the husband which this "stupid village" could not afford her was enough to make her blush. She ought to have resented my want of respect for the delicacy of young maidenhood, and perhaps she did, for she turned away, remaining for the rest of the evening so pale and quiet that my inmost heart was touched with yearning. I wanted to apologize to her for my seeming rudeness, which had sprung out of my unhappiness, and to tell her how earnestly I wished the proposed visit might restore her to the fulness of her sweetest bloom; but instead, I did just the opposite, was as gay as possible, and apparently indifferent to her approaching absence.

"Belle is really quite in a decline," said Lizzie, on our way home. "I've seen it for some time. She's always either melancholy or unnaturally gay—her head feels feverish at times—she has no appetite. Oh dear, I hope it's nothing serious!" and she burst into tears.

To tell the truth, I felt a little like crying myself, though nobody suspected it. I considered Belle's going away as fatal to the last few faint hopes which my human nature would persist in keeping alive; and I felt distressed to think my ailment, however slight, should beset her; and then the thought crossed my mind that she might be nourishing some secret passion, like myself, and this might be sapping the foundations of health.

"Perhaps she is in love—unrequited affection!" I ventured.

"Belle in love and I not know it!" cried Lizzie, the fire of indignation drying her tears; "that would be impossible. Besides, there is nobody here she would condescend to pine away for. Everybody I know would be only too glad to obtain her interest. Humph! unrequited affection, indeed! There's nobody here who's fit for her but you—and you two seem bound to hate each other. People are so contrary. I only hope she will fall in love with somebody while she's gone, and come home and tell me all about it; that will be some return for my self-denial in letting her go. It would be so nice, wouldn't it?"

I subdued a groan and answered that I supposed it would.

"The child caught cold getting her feet wet in the brook the day of the picnic, and she's never been quite well since," said my aunt, and with this sensible explanation of the cause of the young lady's decline in health, we entered our house and went to bed.

The evening of the day before the intended journey Lizzie returned quite late from the Judge's house. I had not called there since the projection of the journey; but even declined to pay a visit of farewell with my cousin this very evening. I walked back and forth on the porch, however, too restless to remain in any room, until about eleven, when a servant of the family brought Lizzie home.

"Belle will not go to-morrow," she said, coming up and joining me in my promenade.

"Why not?"

"She is too ill. She has been feverish and excited for several days. Until to-night, after I came, she grew worse suddenly, and had to give up and go to bed. They called in Dr. Doseall about two hours ago. He says the fever is of a low insidious kind that has crept upon her so stealthily that she is now completely in its power. It was dreadful to see him shake his head. Poor Mrs. Browne feels awfully. I'm just going to run up stairs and tell mother, and then I'm going back to stay all night."

I do not intend to give the history of the next week. Sickness is never interesting except to the patient, the friends, and sometimes to the physician. During those long days of suspense, I doubt if ever the father and mother suffered much more deeply than I. They had at least the consolation of being with, of doing for, of watching over the object of their love, while I was doomed to lonely wanderings, to vacant sitting in my office, to hurried, tiresome walks to kill time, until I could hear chance tidings through my aunt and cousin. I think I should have blessed my stars if I could have been then and there transformed into portly, wrinkled, good old Dr. Doseall, with the privilege of entering, three times a day, the sick-chamber where disease was doing its evil work upon the lovely temple of a lovelier soul.

I heard that he considered her case critical—then almost hopeless—and still I had not been consulted with. Pride was strong within me; for I thought my standing and recommendations and my friendly intercourse with the family such as to render it proper, in a time of such trial, that they should include me, in case another physician was called in consultation. Pride was strong, but it was not as strong as love. When I heard that the friends were almost in despair, I resolved to solicit the Judge and the doctor for permission to see the sick girl. I hoped, from descriptions which I obtained of her state, that a new treatment, just coming into practice, and with which the old doctor was not familiar, might prove valuable. Hoping and thinking this, could I allow pride to keep me silent, while the woman I worshipped was dying?

I put on my hat, and went over to see Dr. Doseall's office, asking permission to accompany him on his next visit.

"We wished to consult you several days ago," he said; "but the patient herself would not consent. She seemed so troubled by the mention of it that we were obliged to forbear. However, she's delirious now, poor child! the low, muttering kind; and she won't know it if you do call. Come, I'll go with you now. However, there's no hope, in my judgment."

I took with me the medicine I wished to administer. When I entered the darkened room and went up to the bed, I trembled from head to foot, accustomed, as I necessarily was, to self-control. The sight of the large, bright, restless eyes and thin, flushed face unmanned me. Having the draught prepared according to my directions, I myself administered it. She took it quietly from the glass.

"Is that you, doctor?" she asked, fixing her eyes piercingly on mine. "I never thought to see you again. It's your hating me so that is killing me; but you mustn't let him know it"—with a distressed air of appeal. "Do not tell him I said so, doctor!" She caught my hand, gazing at me with a fondness which, even in that solemn moment, thrilled through me like fire. "Lizzie doesn't guess it."

The next moment her fancies and looks were turned in another direction. I felt as if in a dream. "Doctor," she had said; very true—there were two doctors—and her words were the utterance of delirium. Yet, despite the uncertain conveyance, an idea had passed from her mind into mine. Then, oh then, I wished more earnestly than ever that she might live.

Another week dragged its slow length away. Miss Browne was improving; the crisis was passed in safety, and there was every reason to hope, no untoward event occurring, that health might be gradually brought back. I had the intense satisfaction of knowing that to my course of treatment even Dr. Doseall attributed the favorable change. The fever and delirium were gone; nothing but weakness now to combat, unless the seeds from which the malady first sprung still remained in the system to sprout again. Evidently something yet weighed upon the patient's mind, preventing rapid recovery. If I felt my suspicions were correct, they needed fuller confirmation.

It was at this time Lizzie sought a confidential interview with me one afternoon in our parlor.

"Cousin," said she, very gravely, "I'm going to trust in your honor as a man and a gentleman in a very delicate matter."

"If you think it safe, you can do so."

"I have found out the true cause of Belle's illness."

"You have?"

"Yes. And nothing but the wish to save the life and secure the happiness of my dearest, dearest friend would induce me to say what I'm going to say. Belle would die of chagrin if she knew of it; and you must never, never tell her, no matter what happens. You see she betrayed it in her fever—that she was in love with you! The whole family know of it. She's putting herself to death, secretly, for fear you, too, have discovered her secret. She asked me last evening if I thought she had said anything in her delirium. She'd sooner die, she said, than that you should ever dream, and she begged me never to hint. Her parents feel so sorry for her. They would have been very well satisfied with the match; and I think they wonder why you did not fancy their daughter as much as she you; it would have been an excellent alliance for you. Of course they are proud, and will keep the dear girl's secret for her. They are going to take her away as soon as she is well enough. Now, cousin, thumbscrews couldn't have wrung this out of me about sweet, dear Belle, if I hadn't thought—if I hadn't hoped—if, perhaps—say, doctor, couldn't you like a little, little bit?"

"No, I couldn't!" I almost thundered, in a tone which made the pretty pleader start.

Without another word I started from the house, went straight to Judge Browne's, was admitted to the sick-chamber, where I found the patient looking much better and stronger. I felt her pulse, and sent the nurse down to the kitchen to dissolve some gum arabic in warm water as a drink for her—the only errand I could invent just then which would consume sufficient time.

"Miss Browne, how do you like my doctoring?"

"I suppose you have saved my life," she answered listlessly, not showing surprise at the unusual question.

"Well, I've got a new prescription for you to take. It's an ugly, unpalatable one, I can tell you. It was the fear that you would refuse it utterly which has prevented my daring to urge it hitherto."

"What can it be?"

"My heart and hand—the one haughty, the other empty. Dear Belle, I know their unworthiness; but this I can promise you, they will serve you devotedly." She looked up at me in doubt, a glow spreading over her pale face. I did not wish to agitate her. I took up the poor, pale little hand from the counterpane, stroked it gently, and kissed it. "I am in earnest," I said; "I wish you would promise to never have any doctor but me?"

Whether that day or some other is no matter; she promised.

"You said you couldn't like her a little even," said Lizzie, when she heard, a few days later, how matters had turned out.

"Neither could I, cousin. No little measure would hold the liking I have had for your friend since the first day I beheld her."

"And she says she liked you from the first. How foolish people in love are! Just see how much trouble you've made yourselves, because one was too modest and one too proud."

Belle paid for her folly by the loss of her beautiful hair. But I think a bridal veil never floated over a lovelier head than hers when the thick, soft, dark-brown ringlets began to ring it about with infantile beauty. When she took the long-talked-of journey for her health, I felt in duty bound to accompany her, to watch over her, she having taken me for her lifelong physician, for better, for worse. In gaining this patient I lost two others. Miss Waffle and Mrs. Darling went back to Dr. Dose-all, declaring that my bills were too high, and that I did not understand their cases.

COMPLIMENTS.

It is very much to be wished, for the benefit of bashful men, that society would come to some general agreement upon the subject of compliments. At present, the whole social law upon the subject is in a state of confusion which is a mere pitfall for the unwary. There are some occasions when a compliment is very little less than an insult; and there are others when it is scarcely less insulting to omit the compliment; and the distinction in principle between the two sets of occasions is not very obvious. To compliment a lady on her dress is a rude familiarity. A panegyric upon her beauty is only tolerated if she belongs to the emaciated sisterhood of "fast girls," and is apt to be resented even then if there are many listeners to overhear it. But seat her at a piano-forte, and everything is changed. Compliments cease to be rude on one side, or repulsive on the other. The man who would stand at the piano-forte listening to a song, and omit at the end of it to ejaculate "Beautiful!" would be condemned by every right-thinking mind as unworthy the name of a man and an American. Compliments on such occasions are not simply permissible, but they are exacted with rigor as an item of the ordinary tribute of civility which man owes to woman. You might as well let a lady stand for want of a chair while you are sitting down, as to allow the music to languish for want of a plentiful supply of eulogy. And the young lady, who would blush and bridle if she was told she was pretty, submits with smiling impassibility to the most fulsome flattery on the subject of her singing. In fact, if the song did not close amid a chorus of admiration, every one would feel that there was an awkward silence. People would force conversation fitfully and uneasily, as if somebody had uttered a startling impropriety; and the performer would be perfectly justified in flouncing away from the pianoforte, and passing the rest of the evening in the dumps. The idea appears to be that a public performance is incompatible with retiring modesty. It is a proclamation that the young lady is not satisfied to remain unnoticed in the throng, but wishes to attract a special share of general attention to herself; and it naturally follows that she desires some assurance that her efforts have not been in vain. The world is too good-natured to refuse compliments to any one who professedly caters for them; and, fortunately, there are people who derive a positive pleasure from the act of flattering others. Their souls are a living well of butter, and a little of it escapes upon every passer-by. Probably they began the practice from calculation, to secure as many friends as possible at a cheap cost; but the habit soon grows upon them, and clings to them long after the hope of getting on in the world has lost its power. They are very disagreeable people to meet in society, upon ordinary occasions, for they are always putting somebody out of countenance; but their real mission in the world is to attend at musical parties. They should be jammed in between the pianoforte and the wall and left there. So placed, they are in position to perform services which, in their absence, it would be impossible to supply; for complimenting does not come by nature, and the master of the house who should try it for the first time, in ignorance of the difficulties of the attempt, and without proper preparation, is very liable to come to an unseemly halt in the very middle of his pretty speech.

MUSINGS AND MEMORIES.

BY J. L. M'CREERY.

O how rich with rarest beauty
Is this sunny world of ours,
When the virgin Spring comes blushing,
Like a bride arrayed in flowers!
When the warbling warblers waken
Merry melody that seems Like the gentle, joyous music
Wafted from the land of dreams!

Welcome, Spring! Again thou bringest
Flowers fair and odors sweet,
While the wood and birds are singing,
Thy return with joy to greet!
All the beauty that lay buried,
Bound by Winter's icy chain—
All the joys we feared had perished—
Thou hast brought to us again.

No, not all! My restless spirit
From thy presence sadly turns,
And for one thou canst not bring me,
With a weary longing yearns.
Oh my heart—my heart is buried
Where the weeping willows wave!
Spring! thy forest flowers are growing
Green upon my mother's grave!

At thy presence beauty smileth
Bright from every flower and tree;
But 'tis not the smile of kindness
That my mother had for me.
Thou hast taught the merry songsters
At thy coming to rejoice;
But ye bring me not the music
Of my mother's gentle voice.

Winter had the earth enshrouded
In a snowy winding-sheet,
When the angels came to bear her
To her home with noiseless feet:
Then the sun went out in heaven,
While my heart grew faint and chill,
And though all around be brightens,
Winter rests upon it still!

Midnight darkness gathered o'er me,
As we looked that last "good-night;"
I to roam this world of sorrow—
She to tread the halls of light;
And 'tis only when in slumber
Freed, my spirit soars above,
That she walks again beside me,
With my mother's smile of love.

And in dreamy mood I often
Roam amid the forest wild
Heedless of the world around me—
In her arms again a child;
Or beside the placid river,
Wander when the day is o'er,
Listening as the mimic billows
Wash against the pebbly shore.

And I wonder when the angel,
Death, shall come to bear me on O'er the dark and foaming river
To the land where she is gone;
For the fragrance of its flowers
Morning zephyrs oftentimes bring,
And I almost catch the music
From that land of endless Spring.

MANY a true heart that would have come back like the dove to the ark, after the first transgression, has been frightened beyond recall by the angry look and menace, the taunt, the savage charity of an unforgiving soul.

ROXY CROFT.

"Roxy," said Miss Croft, "I'm going to see if we can't have some work done while they're away. Go, put on your old dress, and come with me into the garden. I'm going to have every weed got out of it. If some people hadn't been so lazy, it would never have got so weedy. Here, begin on this onion-bed; now, mind, if you pull up a single onion, I'll make you remember it to your sorrow!"

"But they're so small, I can hardly see them," said Roxy.

"No, I suppose not. You'd rather be in Mrs. Thorne's parlor playing on the piano. You're never troubled to see there, are you? Now, go to work; if you're smart, you'll get through the onion-bed by noon."

Roxy worked faithfully until noon, when, tired and hungry, she ventured into the house.

"Well," said Miss Croft, looking over her spectacles, "who sent for you to come in?"

"No one, ma'am; but I've finished the onions, and I thought it must be dinner-time, and—"

"Oh! you've come into dinner, have you? Well, I want you to understand we're going to do something besides cook and eat all the time. I've enough of that when Mr. Thorne and his wife are here. If you're hungry, take one of those potatoes in the pantry, and then go directly back to your work."

"Yes, ma'am," said Roxy; "but where shall I weed now?"

"Wherever you please. You've got to get them all out of the garden, and it don't make any difference where you begin."

Roxy took the cold potato and hastened back to her task. She worked till dark without interruption, when, looking up, she spied her mistress carefully examining the heap of weeds from the onion-bed, and at last to hold up in triumph an unfortunate onion. Roxy remembered her threat, and, with dismay, beheld her seize a beanpole, and advance with rapid strides. But good luck in the form of neighbor Jones appeared, at the sight of whom Miss Croft prudently expended her wrath upon a hen, that instant peering out from an adjacent currant bush; and then, with an aggrieved look, she hastened forward to recapitulate to Mr. Jones the damages she sustained from his fowls. Roxy in the mean time retreated to the house, and for once in her life Miss Croft failed to keep her word.

The days that succeeded were but a repetition of the first. At length Roxy petitioned her mistress one afternoon to allow her a short time for practice, as Mr. Savelli was coming that evening to give her another lesson.

"I'm not going to have any more time fooled away in that manner," said Miss Croft. "I've things of more consequence for you to attend to. If Savelli comes this evening, you can take your lesson, because I promised Mrs. Thorne you might; but I want you to understand that will be the end of your music. I've made up my mind Mr. Thorne and his wife will have to look for another boarding-place when they come back." Poor Roxy stood aghast at this unexpected announcement. The miserable future thus suddenly opened up to her seemed beyond human endurance. "I want you," continued Miss Croft, "to get up by daylight to-morrow, and go to work again in that garden, and don't you come in till I call you to breakfast. You've got to finish it to-morrow. I sha'n't have you out there another day."

"Yes, ma'am," said Roxy, mechanically; and with aching limbs, and still more aching heart, she resumed her laborious employment.

Miss Croft was up the next morning an hour earlier than usual. She looked out the window to see if the Joneses were up. Having satisfied herself on this point, she took her teapot and went in there to beg of Mrs. Jones a little boiling water, and permission to draw her tea by the fire, as she apologetically remarked to Mrs. Jones, "It seemed a needless waste of fuel to light a fire just for herself."

Having dispatched her frugal meal, she called for Roxy to come and take hers. She waited for her a reasonable time; then, becoming impatient at the delay, went herself into the garden. Judge of her astonishment when she found Roxy had not been at work there. Everything remained precisely as when she inspected it the night before. Overflowing with indignation, she armed herself for a conflict, and hastened to Roxy's dormitory, not doubting she had overslept herself. But when she entered all was silent there; even the bed was undisturbed. Miss Croft was ill-prepared for the sudden revelation that flashed upon her. Roxy had always been so submissive and cowardly that she had never dreamed of being thus outwitted. Upon examining her clothes, she found the best suit missing. Then she turned and slowly walked down stairs, feeling for the first time humbled, and at a loss to know what to do. Putting on her spectacles, she went to the gate, and stood looking up and down the broad street. Not a being was in sight save Uncle Jack.

"Have you seen anything of my Roxy?" inquired she, eagerly.

"No, missus, hain't seen nothin' on her."

"Well, Uncle Jack, I suspect she's run away, for I can't find her anywhere."

"Whew! shouldn't wonder a mite ef she had, missus."

"Did you see the stage this morning?"

"I reckon I did; 'twas most full when it cum along; nobody went from here 'cept that ar music-master."

"Didn't you see any one before that?"

"I didn't see no living soul, missus, 'cept a small boy. I sot a trap down below the Cross Roads, and I got up airly this mornin' to see if thar wa'n't somethin' ketched; and a leetle this side of thar, I see a boy."

"How large a boy?"

"'Bout so hight, missus. 'Twa'n't nobody I ever seed afore."

"Well, Uncle Jack, you must come in awhile. I've got to look over my things and see if the baggage hasn't stolen something. She belongs to a dreadful thievish race, and I shouldn't wonder if she'd carried off every one of my silver spoons."

Uncle Jack followed Miss Croft into the house and seated himself, while she proceeded to investigate the premises. She soon returned and reported nothing missing; and, strange to relate, a shilling she had accidentally left on the table remained untouched.

"Uncle Jack," said she, "I want you now to go to Mrs. Parker's, and ask her if she'll let one of her girls come and help me a few days. Tell her Roxy's gone, and I'm expecting Mr. Thorne every day, and I must have one of them. If she can't accommodate me, go to Miss Wilson's, and ask her to come, or anywhere else you may think of; but be sure not to come back without getting some one."

"'Zactly so, missus. I reckon I can find somebody for ye."

In a couple of hours Uncle Jack returned. "I say, missus," said he, in a tone of desperation, "thar ain't nobody to be had, that's sartin. I've been to Miss Wilson's; she's sick. Miss Parker's gals is all away 'cept one, and she can't let her come nobow. Then I went to Deacon Stun's, and over to Miss Riddle's, and down to Pat Flynn's, and into Miss Ritter's; and there's nobody to be had for sartin."

"Well," said Miss Croft, drawing a deep sigh, "there's only one thing I can do. Go and ask Squire Wentworth if he will step in here a few minutes."

"Bress your soul, missus, he hain't been to hum for pretty nigh a week."

"When is he expected back?"

"Can't say, missus; he never told me nothin' 'bout it; but Judy sez he's gone to Boston to get a wife."

"A wife! I don't believe it!" exclaimed Miss Croft.

"Well, I reckon somebody's coming back with the Squire, for they've got the house all turned topsy-turvy, and they're doin' an awful sight of cookin' thar."

"Yes, I dare say they're expecting company. Now, Uncle Jack, if I don't succeed in finding any help before Mr. Thorne returns, I shall want to employ you a few days."

"'Zactly so, missus. I'll be around then."

As soon as Uncle Jack left, Miss Croft put on her bonnet and started out to pour her troubles into the sympathizing ear of Marantha Tufts. Marantha so perfectly understood her trials, and so feelingly condoled with her, that it was late in the afternoon before she could summon sufficient resolution to return to her solitude. When she did so, it was with the impression fully confirmed that the Thornes were the sole cause of her present grievances. Although, during her protracted visit, she had taken such frequent surveys of her domicile as would seem to preclude all possibility of one's entering unobserved, yet the instant she reached it, the friendly voice of Mrs. Thorne greeted her ear.

"You are surprised to see me home so soon, are you not?" said she.

"No!" replied Miss Croft, coolly, and without noticing the proffered hand. "Nothing that happens in these days surprises me."

"It was my intention," continued Mrs. Thorne, "to remain another week; but when Mr. Thorne was ready to return, I thought it best to come with him. I knew Roxy would be impatient to see me. But where is she? I have some things for her which I am sure will delight her."

"She's gone!"

"Gone!" echoed Mrs. Thorne.

"Yes, Mrs. Thorne; it's turned out exactly as I told you. This comes of people's not attending to their own business. You put so many high notions into her head that she felt entirely above her business. She was mad, I suppose, because I set her to work in the garden. 'Twa'n't so agreeable as playing on the piano; so she concluded to run off. She's gone with that silk dress you made for her, and those new gaiters you bought, and her best bonnet; so I hope you will be satisfied with her appearance." With that Miss Croft flounced out of the room.

Poor Mrs. Thorne, overwhelmed with grief and surprise at Roxy's disappearance, and indignation at Miss Croft's uncalled-for rebuke, sat motionless in her chair until the tea-bell rang. Then, upon Mr. Thorne's coming to seek her, she briefly related the occurrence of the afternoon, and pleaded a violent headache as an excuse for not appearing at the tea-table.

A brief interval of solitude had caused Miss Croft to feel some compunctions respecting her treatment of Mrs. Thorne; and when Mr. Thorne entered alone, she was profuse in attentions to him, as well as in expressions of regret at his wife's indisposition. The intelligence also that the anticipated wedding at the Squire's was one in which the eldest daughter was more deeply concerned than the father so completely mollified Miss Croft's feelings that, taking a cup of tea in her hand, she hastened to Mrs. Thorne, anxious to propitiate one whom she knew to be a favorite of the Squire's.

"I hope I don't intrude," whispered she, as she was bidden to enter. "Mr. Thorne told me you had a severe headache, and I brought you a cup of nice tea. Poor father used to be very much troubled with his head, and he thought a cup of strong tea the best remedy in the world for it."

"Thank you," said Mrs. Thorne, languidly taking the tea from her.

Miss Croft glanced at the swollen eyes, and felt uneasy. "I hope," said she, "you won't think hard of anything I've said about Roxy. I'm pretty plain-spoken, and sometimes say more than I ought to. But you can't think how I was tried to have her run off just at this time."

"I do not doubt it; you will miss her very much, as well as myself," said Mrs. Thorne.

"She was only eight years old when I took her; and she's been nothing but an expense to me until now. It's very ungrateful in her to run away after all we've done for her. I don't care so much on my own account; but it makes me feel bad to see her treat you with such ingratitude."

"I am grieved beyond measure to lose her," replied Mrs. Thorne.

"I always knew she'd come to some bad end," continued Miss Croft; "for she was nothing but a gypsy; and you know it's no use to try to make anything of one of them."

"But she has improved beyond all my expectations."

"I admit that, but you see now what it's going to amount to. She's grown to be the handsomest girl in town. You've dressed her well; and in one way and another spent about half your time on her. For more than two years you and Mr. Thorne hav'n't slept a wink after daylight, just for the sake of having her practise music; and now I suppose she'll go back to the gypsies, if she can find them."

"You do her great injustice," said Mrs. Thorne, with evident warmth. "She is by nature a noble-minded girl; sensitive beyond measure, and endowed with no ordinary talents, all her aspirations are for the good and beautiful; and, depend upon it, she will never voluntarily seek unworthy associates. If she is so fortunate as to fall among those who can appreciate her, she will yet be all I have fondly hoped; and though I may never again be permitted to see her, I shall not regret my efforts in her behalf. Good instruction is never lost upon such a character; though circumstances may check its natural development."

"I don't doubt your sincerity, but when you've lived as many years as I have, you won't be quite so visionary. You've always acted as though you thought Roxy some wonderful being in disguise. Now, for the life of me, I never could see anything remarkable about her, except a pretty face, but that don't amount to much. Beauty is only skin deep."

"Yes, but had you sought an entrance to her affections, you would have beheld a beauty far surpassing that of the face!"

"Well, you and I never could agree about Roxy," said Mrs. Croft, impatiently; "and it's useless to say anymore about her. She's gone; and I'm left without help. Uncle Jack went all over town this morning for a girl; but there's none to be had, and I don't see as I shall be able to board you and Mr. Thorne any longer. But I'm waiting to see Squire Wentworth. I don't wish to make any change without consulting him. Won't you take another cup of tea, Mrs. Thorne? Dear me! how thoughtless I am to stay so long, when you're suffering with a headache; but I entirely forgot about it!"

"Not any more, Miss Croft; a good night's rest will benefit me more than anything else."

As soon as Miss Croft withdrew, Mrs. Thorne arose and commenced a diligent search for some token of Roxy; but, finding none, she retired for the night, more weary and dispirited than ever.

The next day Uncle Jack, in clean shirt sleeves and Sunday vest, was installed in Miss Croft's kitchen, where he endeavored to make himself generally useful; but he proved a poor substitute for the well-trained Roxy; and displayed so much extravagance in the use of fuel, that before night he and his employer had a serious difficulty, and, in consequence, he declined a re-appointment for the next day. Miss Croft's troubles were destined not to come alone. Before the month had ended, Mr. Jones died, and his family removed to a neighboring town. The first act of his successor, who was an old acquaintance of Miss Croft's, was to nail up the little back gate, which had afforded such ready access to Mr. Jones's kitchen and wood-pile. Miss Croft could never afterward speak of the loss of her neighbor without shedding a copious flood of tears. But as she invariably mentioned in connection the unfriendly demonstration of the successor, it was never precisely ascertained which of the two events affected her the more deeply.

In the mean time the bustle at the Squire's, consequent upon the marriage of his eldest daughter, had subsided. Mary and Alice were sent to a boarding-school, and Miss Croft, seeing now no obstacle in her pathway to elysium, determined to bring matters to a crisis. Accordingly, she dispatched a brief note to the Squire, begging an interview at his earliest convenience. The conversation that took place on this occasion was never made public; but, at its close, Miss Croft sat down and penned an affecting epistle to Mr. Timotheus Smith, a distant relative, who lived "out West," then calling Mrs. Thorne to her apartment, she communicated the intelligence that failing health not only rendered it necessary she should break up housekeeping, but demanded also an instant change of climate; and she had resolved to sell out immediately. Till the "Society" had purchased her house as a parsonage, Mr. Thorne relieved her of the furniture; and a young Mr. Timotheus Smith arrived to conduct her to a distant home, where, as she remarked, sterling worth would be appreciated.

During the period of eight years that Mr. Thorne had now been settled in the parsonage, no tidings had been received of Roxy. For months after she left, Mrs. Thorne anxiously watched the mails, not doubting she would write; but when years passed without revealing a trace of her, she was forced to believe her no longer living; or as having met with a fate more fearful even than death. New cares and duties had so multiplied with her, that in these days she had no occasion to complain for the want of employment. Besides the manifold duties of housekeeping, five young "olive branches" had sprung up around her, and to provide for these numerous wants with means always limited seemed to tax every faculty of mind and body.

As for Mr. Thorne, no vestal ever tended the "sacred fire" with greater assiduity than did Miss Marantha the little spark of dissipation she observed soon after his arrival at Oakfield. By dint of vigorous fanning it had now, after a lapse of years, burst into a flame, which threatened to sweep all before it. Of the many who were formerly loud in their commendations of Mr. Thorne, some found the ministrations at the "meeting-house" better adapted to their spiritual edification; while others, drawing upon themselves the appellation of "bigots," remained at home on Sunday unless a brother clergyman officiated. It was not sufficient that Mr. Thorne ministered without reproach to their spiritual wants. Other requirements were demanded which would have taxed the brain of a modern psychologist, and would have comforted far better with his profession than with that of a Christian minister. In default of these requirements, a host of charges were brought against him, as diverse as the individuals who proffered them. They were acknowledged by all to be insignificant in themselves, but said, "straws show which way the wind blows." A few of the flock remained faithful to their minister, and in all his difficulties strove by expressions of sympathy and benevolence to make amends for the delinquencies of the majority. Though conscious of a faithful discharge of duty, and of strict integrity of purpose, Mr. Thorne felt his situation a galling one. Yet he pursued the even tenor of his way uncomplainingly; even to his wife he avoided the subject of his grievances, and she little suspected that his failing health was but the manifestation of a crushed and wounded spirit.

She was startled one morning upon entering his study in observing the unusual pallor of his countenance. An open letter lay on the table before him, in which he was so deeply engrossed as not to notice her approach.

"What is the matter?" exclaimed Mrs. Thorne, anxiously. "Have you received any ill news?"

"No!" replied he, sadly; "that is, nothing unexpected. This letter refers entirely to parish matters."

"Oh, is that all?" exclaimed she. "How relieved I am! I feared something worse. Now let me run to the kitchen and bring you a lunch. You look on the eve of fainting, and I remember now, you ate no breakfast this morning."

"No, Cora, I want nothing but have you sit down that I may talk with you awhile."

"Not another word," said she, laughingly, "until you have taken my prescription. Now lay aside that annoying letter; take this easy-chair by the window, and wait with patience my return. Bridget is out on an errand; so I will prepare it myself."

When Mrs. Thorne entered her kitchen, she stood riveted to the floor at the sight which met her eyes. By the fire stood Marantha Tufts, with a steaming cover in one hand, and a fork in the other, plunged deeply into a piece of pork she had fished out of the boiling pot.

"Miss Marantha! Is that you?" exclaimed Mrs. Thorne, scarcely crediting her senses.

Marantha dropped the pork into the pot and replaced the cover, looking for an instant quite abashed. Then, straightening herself up with the air of one conscious of performing a duty, she replied:

"Yes, Mrs. Thorne, it's I, and I ain't ashamed to own it. When I heard of Mr. Thorne's pleading up poverty, and trying to get his salary raised, 'cause it wouldn't support him, I made up my mind there was a fearful leak somewhere, and I'm pretty well satisfied where it is," said she, with a knowing look at the pot. "We pay Mr. Thorne just as much as we paid Dr. Smiley that was before him; and he never complained."

"But he had only a wife to support," faintly suggested Mrs. Thorne.

"No matter for that," said Marantha. "If they'd had half a dozen children, 'twould have been just the same. They were excellent managers, and set an example that many a clergyman's family would be wise in following. This ain't the first time I've been in your kitchen, Mrs. Thorne, and I ain't ashamed to own it. You've got twice as much pork boiling in that pot as you ought to have. 'Twould last us a week. Then, again, I don't like to hear of a minister's pleading poverty when he can afford to buy fresh every time the butcher comes along; it's dreadful expensive! We don't buy it half a dozen times a year." Marantha paused to take breath; but Mrs. Thorne continuing silent, she proceeded again. "People around here that can afford to keep help generally expect to look after them a little; if they didn't, I reckon they'd soon find themselves coming out 'the little end of the horn.' I tell you plainly, Mrs. Thorne, if you don't look after your help, you'll never find a salary that will support you; and if Mr. Thorne can't get along with what we raise for him, it's my opinion he'd better be looking out for another parish."

Mrs. Thorne was too much agitated to reply. Marantha adjusted her bonnet, and without another word took her departure.

When Mrs. Thorne rejoined her husband with the delicate luncheon, a flushed countenance alone betrayed the agitation to which she had been subjected. Mr. Thorne observed it, but attributed it to a cause very different from the real one; and she, unwilling to add to his disquietude, wisely refrained from an explanation of it.

"Cora," said he, "if I did not firmly believe in an overruling Providence, who mercifully orders all things for our good, I should be tempted to give up in despair. For the past year my salary has been insufficient for our support. Six months ago, before I was aware of the extent of my unpopularity, I petitioned for its increase. My petition met with no response until after the parish meeting of last evening, when this letter was handed me. You will see it contains a flat refusal of my request."

"But why not send in a resignation at once, and take another parish?" asked Mrs. Thorne.

"A natural suggestion, I confess; but, in my case, not of easy accomplishment. I do not know of a vacant parish. I have neither the means nor time at my disposal to search for one. I am already six months in arrears to the tradespeople here, with no prospect of liquidating my debts, or of preventing an accumulation of them. When I leave here, I must do so honorably. Convinced, as I am, that my usefulness in this place is at an end, and longing as I do to escape from thralldom, I see every avenue hedged up before me. My life has become one of perpetual humiliation, and my only hope is that, when I am sufficiently disciplined, a kind Providence will open a door for my escape."

"Can you devise any way by which we might retrench our expenses?" asked Mrs. Thorne.

"No," replied he, "not without divorcing body from soul."

"How would it answer to keep the children from school next quarter, and let their tuition go towards paying Bridget's wages? I'm owing her now for the last month, and she depends on being regularly paid on account of her aged mother; and it was for that I came to seek you this morning."

"Yes, she ought to be punctually paid; she is indispensable to us. But I have nothing for her to-day, and cannot tell when I shall have anything."

"Oh, Mr. Thorne, had you forgotten Uncle Simon Quint is to be married to-night? People say he's as rich as a Jew. Who knows how generous a wedding fee he may bestow?"

"Yes, this is the very evening. But do not build any castles upon his anticipated generosity; for from the evidences I have already received it will prove a foundation too contracted for a fly."

"Well, to lay aside all extravagances of hope, he will not favor you with less than five dollars, which will relieve me of my indebtedness to Bridget, and elicit our grateful acknowledgments. But he professes to be your friend; and, conscious of our straitened circumstances, he will doubtless embrace this opportunity to manifest his sympathy."

Punctual to the appointment, Mr. Thorne reached Uncle Simon's gate precisely at the hour of six. Barefooted, and with pants rolled above his knees, he spied the bridegroom elect, standing at a rude bench outside the door, busily performing his ablutions. Dripping and panting like a huge Newfoundland he rushed forward, and seizing Mr. Thorne's hand with a grasp which threatened its annihilation, bade him welcome. "Come right in, parson," said he; "I've been at work all day like a hoss, and you see I've got a leetle belated; but you'll find the widdier in thar; she's been ready above an hour."

Mr. Thorne entered the house, but only caught a glimpse of the "widdier" as she retreated through the opposite door. He seated himself to await the coming of the happy pair. Soon a step in an adjoining room, which called forth a creaking and jarring from every portion of the old house, apprised Mr. Thorne that Uncle Simon had come in to put the finishing touch to his toilet. Long, however, before the completion of the task, sundry exclamations reached Mr. Thorne's ear, plainly indicating Uncle Simon's patience was being sorely taxed; a fact not to be doubted when he finally appeared with the widow on his arm. A young woman noiselessly followed them, and seated herself in one corner, while the hired man, after a ceremonious introduction, slunk into another. Uncle Simon standing wonderfully erect, a position to which his closely-fitting coat inclined him, in a tone of desperation exclaimed: "Now, parson, I believe I'm ready. You may go at it as quick as you're a mind to." In an incredibly short time, the two were made one, and the spectators silently withdrew.

"Parson," said Uncle Simon, looking quite distressed, "ef you and Miss Quint will take hold and help me ease off this ere coat, I believe I shall feel better. I had a cussed time gittin' into it, and ef I should happen to sneeze I should split it from eend to eend, and spile it entirely. There's no knowin' but what I may want it ag'in," said he, chuckling at what he thought a witty suggestion. The joint efforts of the two soon brought relief to Uncle Simon. "That coat, parson," continued he, holding it up to view, "is thirty odd year old. I had it when I was married to Miss Quint that's now dead. Old Stephen Crane made it; and I tell you, parson, you never see such a fit—it sot like a ribbin. See, what a grand piece of cloth it is! Well, I thought I couldn't have anything more suitable to wear now; but, hang it! I felt as though I'd got into a strait-jacket. I used to be a mighty slim feller, parson, but I've got along up to two hundred and fifty weight now."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Mr. Thorne.

"Yes, it's a fact. Here, Miss Quint, take the key in my tother trousers pocket, and run down cellar and draw some of that ere Monongahela; bring in a pitcher of water and the molasses cup. I tell you what, parson, there's nothin' equal to it, when a man gits all beat out and low spirited."

Miss Quint soon returned, laden with refreshments, which she placed on the table, and again left the room.

"Miss Quint," continued Uncle Simon, gazing after her with the eye of a connoisseur, "looks dreadful slim; but she's spry as a kitten, and tough, sir, tough as a pitch knot. She's kept house for me upwards of a year, and I've had a pretty good chance to find out."

"She appears remarkably active," said Mr. Thorne.

"Yes, s-i-r, she ain't to be beat! Come, parson, set right up to the table now, and help yourself; don't be mealy-mouthed."

"Excuse me, Mr. Quint, if I only take a glass of water. I have a severe headache this evening, which forbids me partaking your hospitalities."

"Well, I don't believe a glass of this ere pure spirits will make it a mite wus. It al'ays cures me of everything." Uncle Simon helped himself liberally, and soon became more loquacious than ever. "Does Miss Thorne enjoy pretty good health, parson?"

"Not remarkably good, sir."

"Well, I must say I hope she'll be spared to you. It's a great undertakin' for a man to git married ag'in; and at my time of life it's awful resky business. Miss Quint was a dreadful loss to me. I've lost all sorts of critters off the farm, but I never in my life had anything cut me up like that. I've had to pay a dollar a week for a housekeeper ever sence she died; and thar ain't one in ten that'll aim their board. I made up my mind L'd better git married, and I sot out to marry the widder Sally Pike more'n a year ago, but my son 'Bijah broke it up. He flared some when I told him I was goin' to marry Widder Perkins; but after I showed him how I'd got things fixed, he shot right up; he couldn't say a word ag'in it. I believe," continued Uncle Simon, growing more confidential, "I'll tell you what a cute bargain I've made. I've agreed to give Miss Quint fifty cents a week as long as she's able to do the work. Then, in case she outlives me, she's to have four cows, a dozen sheep, and a privilege in the house; but if she don't outlive me, she's got to pay her own doctor's bill and funeral expenses. She held out a good while when we come to talk about that; but she's finally agreed to it, and I got it all writ down in black and white; and now if she flounces and kicks ever so hard, she can't do a mite of harm. I've got to be an old man, parson, but I believe I'm just as keen at a bargain as ever, eh?"

"I do not doubt it," said Mr. Thorne.

"They had a pretty hot time down to the parish meetin' last night. I suppose you've heard all about it afore now. I told 'em we couldn't find a better man for the money than we'd got, and your preachin' was just as good as anybody's. But betwixt you and I, parson, I believe I would try and give a dollar more a year if you'd al'ays write your sermons."

"Then you don't like to hear me extemporize?"

"Well, not exactly that; but when we pay a pretty stiff salary, we rather expect the minister to give us a written sarmon."

"Yes, I understand you perfectly," said Mr. Thorne, rising from his chair.

"Hold on, parson! hold on a minit!" exclaimed Uncle Simon, rising also with great alacrity, and plunging his hand deep into his pantaloons pocket. "There, parson," said he, drawing forth a coin, which he deposited in Mr. Thorne's hand, "that's what I call money pretty easy ained. When I git a dollar, I have to dig for it. But you ministers get along mighty easy. I wanted to make a preacher of 'Bijah; but he seemed to have no notion that way; he's all for farmin'."

Mr. Thorne thanked Uncle Simon, and bade him "good-night." At the door he met the bride, who timidly handed him a small parcel, containing wedding-cake for Mrs. Thorne and the children. When he reached home, he tossed a bright silver dollar into his wife's lap.

"That isn't all?" said she, with an incredulous look.

"Yes, that is all!"

The next Sunday another vacant seat was observed in church. It was no other than Miss Marantha's. Before the week ended, it was whispered to Mr. Thorne that on that day she was an attentive listener to old Mr. Baker, whose sermon so expanded her benevolence that upon returning home she dispatched a note to him requesting his acceptance of an inclosed fifty dollars, in order to make himself life member of the "Society for promoting Christianity among the Heathen."

About this time, also, a letter was received from Miss Croft, who in the interval of an ague fit penned a bitter lament for her hasty removal "out west," where troubles unheard of at the east constantly assailed her. She entreated Mr. Thorne's influence to aid her in repurchasing the "Parsonage," where she hoped at last to end her days in peace.

When Squire Wentworth, after an absence of three months, returned home he at once hastened to the parsonage, the inmates of which had become inexpressibly dear to him. He was both surprised and grieved to mark the deep dejection of Mr. Thorne, whom he found confined to his room by a severe nervous attack. Mrs. Thorne, with tearful eyes, grasped his hand, but the trembling lips refused to utter the welcome her warm heart dictated.

"Why, my dear Mrs. Thorne," said the Squire, "I've been all day impatient as a child, because I couldn't reach you sooner. I fancied you wreathed in smiles at my approach, as you surely would be, if you could imagine the half of what I'm about to reveal."

"You were always a dispenser of sunshine, Squire Wentworth, but in your long absence, the clouds have gathered so quickly about us, that I fear even your magic wand will fail to dispel them."

"I trust it has not lost all its potency. But we shall see," said the Squire. "Let us sit here by Mr. Thorne, that he may listen without effort. I should have returned last week, but hearing Alice and her husband had taken passage home, I was desirous of being in the city when they arrived. They landed yesterday; and I saw them just long enough to assure myself they were well and happy, delighted with their residence abroad; and yet more delighted to find themselves again at their old home. As soon as Alice recovers from her fatigue, she will visit us. You remember Savelli?"

"Indeed I do!" exclaimed Mrs. Thorne; "he is too closely associated with dear Roxy Croft to allow of his being forgotten."

"Well, while my children were at Florence, they were introduced to Count Savelli, one of the most distinguished noblemen of that region. In him Alice recognized no other than her old music-teacher. The recognition was mutual; and the last days of their sojourn there were spent at his palace, where is concentrated everything that can delight the senses. Alice says the attentions they received there were such as only the closest intimacy might anticipate. Of the Countess she cannot sufficiently express her admiration. With the dignity and energy of an Englishwoman are united all the beauty and grace of an Italian. Besides this, surrounded by pomp and luxury, she devotes herself with zeal to the relief of suffering."

"But where did Savelli find so rare a gem?" asked Mr. Thorne.

"That I do not remember. Alice says he inquired after you both with the deepest interest, and spoke of being under weighty obligations, etc.; but here is a package he has sent, which, I presume, will explain all."

Mr. Thorne took it, and hastily breaking the seals, disclosed a letter, besides several smaller parcels directed to himself, his wife, and each of the children. "I do not understand this," said he; "Cora, open yours, and let us see what it contains."

Mrs. Thorne opened her package, and held up to view a set of exquisite mosaics. The children's presents were also rare and costly; and when Mr. Thorne displayed for his gift a well-filled purse of gold, he could scarcely conceal his agitation. "Squire Wentworth," said he, "this puzzles me beyond measure. Were you not an old and well-tryed friend, I should suspect you of an attempt to practise on my credulity. For Savelli I always entertained a respect, but all the civilities that ever passed between us scarcely entitle me to an expression of remembrance from him; but here is one more than sufficient to relieve me from all embarrassments, a golden key, that unlocks at once my prison doors."

"Is it not wonderful!" said Mrs. Thorne. "And the story of his reverses, to which I gave so little credit, was, it seems, no fiction. O! Mr. Thorne, how thankful we ought to be to our Heavenly Father for this unexpected relief!"

"Yes, Cora, I have always felt we should not be utterly forsaken; and if I have ever for an instant allowed distrust to creep into my heart, may I be forgiven, and ever bear in mind the lesson now taught me. Shall I read the letter now? I long to have the mystery of Savelli's generosity explained."

"By all means. I am as eager for the explanation as yourself. Wait, Squire Wentworth, till he has read the letter. As you have never refused to listen to our troubles, so now you must participate in our joys."

MY DEAR FRIENDS: When your little ones gather around you for a story, do you ever tell them of a poor orphan girl, once a recipient of your bounty and a sharer in your love, who, after being loaded with favors, without a word of explanation, or even an expression of thanks, suddenly withdrew from your protection, leaving you in ignorance of her fate? Do not brand as ungrateful one who has been guilty of all this; but let these lines convince you that the remembrance of your favors is treasured in a heart always loving and grateful. To reconcile a seeming contradiction, let me revert to the period when you left me on your visit to Boston. From that instant I found myself plunged again into the abyss of misery from which your kindness had partially extricated me, and my position the more aggravated by Miss Croft's assertion that, upon your return, she should oblige you to seek a home elsewhere, thus depriving me of your farther protection. Her brutality, for I can call it by no other name, reached its height the evening Savelli came to give me my last lesson. When I entered her room, decently attired for the occasion, she at once opened upon me a torrent of abuse. I had been at work all day in the scorching sun; I was weary and disheartened, and attempted a reply. This so exasperated her that she gave me a blow, which instantly felled me to the floor. As soon as I could recover myself I hastened to the parlor, and lighting a lamp, beheld, to my astonishment, Savelli already seated there. The door had been left open, and he had entered unobserved, and been a silent witness of the whole affair. Wretched and humiliated beyond measure at the sight of him, my tears flowed afresh.

"Poor child!" said he, compassionately. "Have you no other home than this? Is there no one to shield you from that woman's violence?"

"No one," replied I. "There is no one to care for me but Mr. and Mrs. Thorne, and Miss Croft isn't going to let them stay here any longer. Oh, Mr. Savelli," I exclaimed in the bitterness of my heart, "I wish I were dead!"

"Roxy," said he, "be calm, and listen to me. I once had a very dear relative, to whom you bear a striking resemblance. I noticed it the first time I beheld you. But she and all her family are dead, and I am left an exile and wanderer, without one in the world to claim kindred with me. To-morrow I am going away from here, and I cannot bear the thought of leaving one so like my sainted cousin in such cruel hands. Will you go with me? Will you be my child? Do not answer until you hear my plan. It is one that has often occurred to me; but I never dreamed of putting it into execution. I propose to take you to England, where I will place you at school for three years. By that time, if my hopes are realized, I shall be able to offer you a home in my own country. But in case they are not, I shall wish you to be prepared for a teacher, which will give you an independence anywhere. Your voice alone, with proper cultivation, will insure you a fortune. Roxy, will you go?"

"I will!" said I, without hesitation.

"You do not fear then to trust your fate to my hands?"

"Why should I, when you ask me to become your child?"

"To effect your escape," continued he, "it will be necessary to resort to some artifice; for Miss Croft will never consent to give you up. I will leave a carpet-bag at your gate to-night, in which you will find a disguise, together with money sufficient to pay your fare in the stage. If anything happens to detain you in the morning, I will wait for you in Bridgeton another day."

I assented to his proposition, every faculty of my soul being absorbed in the one idea of escape. After Miss Croft had retired for the night, I crept cautiously down stairs, and secured the bag Savelli promised to leave me. I cannot describe the hopes and fears which alternately agitated me during the long sleepless night that followed. But when morning dawned, I went out from Miss Croft's, no longer a timid, shrinking girl, but at heart a desperate woman, ready to brave all dangers. I did not venture to stop until I reached the Cross Roads. There I met Uncle Jack, who, in the well-dressed lad that passed him, failed to recognize in me an old acquaintance. On the very spot where Annita and I held our last conversation, I sat down and waited the coming of the stage. As it drew near, I hailed the driver. He stopped; and as I was preparing to seat myself beside him, Savelli threw open the door, and said: "There's room for the boy inside." I silently obeyed his motions, and not a word passed between us until we reached the end of our stage route. As soon as practicable I doffed my disguise, and then ventured to ask Savelli that he would drop the hated name of Roxy, and, in future, call me by my rightful one, "Teresa."

A week later found us on the broad ocean, bound for Liverpool. Our voyage was rough and tedious, and I suffered greatly from seasickness. No father ever watched his child with greater solicitude than my kind protector manifested for me. Every day increased my respect and gratitude; yet I could never divest myself of a constraint I had always felt in his presence; and in his conversations with me, my replies were limited to the briefest monosyllables. Immediately upon landing, we hastened to the beautiful town of Warwick. There, in the establishment of Mrs. Middleton, I was placed as a pupil, and introduced as the ward of Savelli. Here, also, two of his old friends found employment as professors of music and Italian; and I learned afterwards it was this circumstance that induced him to locate me here. To Mrs. Middleton he disclosed his plans regarding me, and made provision for my remaining with her the three coming years. Nothing could restrain me from expressing my grief at his departure; and when I bade him farewell, it was with the secret conviction that I should never again behold him. When, however, my feelings became more composed, and I began to reflect on the magnitude of my obligations, I entered upon my duties with a zeal which nothing could abate. In Mrs. Middleton I found a kind friend; and if ever I incurred her disapprobation, it was that I would allow myself no time for recreation. But this my previous habits had taught me to dispense with, and neither the allurements of pleasure nor weariness of mind could for an instant divert me from the goal of my ambition. From her my guardian received a yearly report of my progress; but, as he had requested, our correspondence was frequent and uninterrupted, and afforded to both infinitely more satisfaction than my constrained conversation had permitted. As the specified time drew near its close, Mrs. Middleton was so well satisfied with my attainments that she proposed my remaining with her as an assistant, upon a salary far exceeding my expectations. I at once agreed to her proposal, provided it met with the sanction of my guardian, whom I was then daily expecting.

When, a few days after, it was announced that a gentleman in the parlor desired my presence, I felt it could be no other than he. All at once a fear that I should not meet his expectations threatened to envelop me in my old constraint; but quickly banishing such thoughts, I hastened to his presence, and with a fluency equal to his own welcomed him in his native tongue. He seemed both surprised and agitated at the sight of me.

"Teresa!" he exclaimed, "if the grave could yield up its dead, and restore them to us in renewed youth and beauty, I should believe I saw before me the companion of my childhood! But no! It cannot be! This is not an age of miracles!"

I sank beneath his earnest gaze, unable to account for his emotion, and without power to reply. He observed it, and quickly recovering himself, drew me to his side, and commenced a free and animated conversation in which I participated without reserve. I unfolded to him my plans for the future, which I trusted would meet his approbation. He listened with attention; but I fancied was not so impressed with their brilliancy as I had hoped. In return, he gave me a brief sketch of his own life, of which before I had known nothing. It seems that, during one of these political agitations which so frequently occur in this country, he and Count Parini, who had married Savelli's cousin, were suspected of disloyalty to the government. Their estates were confiscated, and themselves compelled to seek safety in a foreign country. Parini, with his wife and child, fled to England, where Savelli intended following them; but circumstances preventing, he sailed for America. As soon as he landed, he dispatched letters to England, informing them of his locality. But receiving no replies, and becoming uneasy, he at length determined to seek them. Accordingly, he took passage for England; but upon reaching L—, the place of their destination, he found nothing of them. After diligent inquiry, however, he learned that a young Italian woman and child, answering perfectly to the description of Teresa and her child, had resided there a short time; but that the woman died, and the child was removed to a neighboring town, where it was believed it did not long survive its mother. Failing to learn anything more definite, he proceeded to London. There he met an old acquaintance, who informed him that Parini died before reaching England, and also corroborated the information he obtained in L— of Parini's wife and child. Sick at heart, he returned to America, determining to remain there until the excitement in his country should subside, when through the influence of friends he hoped his innocence would be established, and his estates and honors restored. It was at this period he met Squire Wentworth, who induced him to go to Oakfield and undertake the duties of a music-teacher. He remained there until letters recalled him to Italy. But first he disposed of his new charge in the way I have already explained to you. Justice, though long delayed, was at length awarded him; and at the present time he told me he was in possession of all his rights.

Finally, I did not accept Mrs. Middleton's proposal. Savelli offered me one, which he insisted was far worthier my consideration; and unworthy as I felt myself for the position, I did not leave Warwick until in the Protestant chapel I had taken upon myself the vows of a wife! Two days later, in accordance with the wishes of my husband, the ceremony was repeated in the Cathedral at London. I must pass over the incidents of our journey to Italy, for I fear your patience is already exhausted.

No sooner had I crossed the threshold of my new home, than a host of vague recollections crowded upon me. "Francisco!" exclaimed I, "it seems as if from a long and painful dream I had at last awakened to reality. I feel now that I am truly at home."

"And so you are, my love," said he, with a gratified smile.

"But," continued I, "everything about me appears so strangely familiar, that, did I not know the contrary, I should believe I had been here before."

"It is easily accounted for," replied he; "my frequent descriptions have doubtless familiarized you with these scenes."

I acquiesced in the truth of the suggestion, yet remained unsatisfied. Day after day I traversed the spacious apartments. I wandered through the long galleries, whose portraits seemed to look down upon me with a kindly greeting, haunted by dim remembrances, which grew oppressive as they mocked my efforts to solve them.

One day I strolled into the library where Francisco was busily arranging his private papers. "Teresa," said he, on my approach, "I was just on the point of seeking you to show you the miniature of my lost cousin, whom you so closely resemble."

I drew near him. "Good heavens!" I exclaimed; "that is my mother's picture!"

"What mean you, Teresa? Explain yourself!" said he, looking bewildered.

I could not. I was speechless. Seizing him by the hand, I flew to my dressing-room, and opening a trunk, from its lowest depths drew forth the counterpart of the miniature he held in his hand.

"Teresa," said he, in a voice trembling with emotion, "why did you never show me this before?"

"I cannot tell," said I; "I have never shown it to any one but Mr. Thorne and his wife. I felt it too sacred to be unfeelingly gazed upon; but why I never thought to show it to you is certainly unaccountable."

Before our marriage I had confided to him the secret of my supposed gypsy origin; but I shrank from entering into the details of my early life. Now I sat down and minutely related them. My resemblance to Teresa, Savelli's attraction towards me, my own vague recollections were all explained; and we were convinced beyond doubt that I was no other than the child of Teresa, whose fate was never definitely ascertained. Together we mingled our tears of joy! together we bowed in silent adoration of that Unseen Hand which, through a dark, mysterious path, had finally led the wanderer home! If anything was needed to complete my happiness, it was granted when, a few months after, I beheld my old friend Alice, and from her received intelligence of my benefactors in America. Alice has told me all—your joys and your troubles; and my greatest desire now is to behold once more your kind faces. Francisco smiles doubtfully when I express a wish to see Miss Croft; but to her also I owe a debt of gratitude, for, had she treated me with a particle of sympathy, I might to this day have remained her faithful servant.

Accept from Francisco and myself the accompanying package as a slight token of our grateful acknowledgments. He promises me, if our lives are spared, to visit America in another year. Until then, adieu.

From your ever grateful TERESA.

THE BONAPARTE FAMILY REGISTER.

THE register of the Imperial family, on which has been inscribed the procès-verbal of the birth of Prince Napoleon's son, is a large folio volume, bound in red velvet, and having at the corners ornaments of silver-gilt, with the family cipher "N" in the centre. It was commenced in 1806, and the first entry made was the adoption of Prince Eugene by the Emperor. The second, made the same year, relates to the adoption of the Princess Stephanie de Beauharnais, who recently died Grand Duchess of Baden, and who was cousin of the Empress Josephine. Next comes the marriage of the Emperor Napoleon I.; then several certificates of the birth of Princes of the family, and lastly of the King of Rome, which closes the series of the certificates inscribed under the reign of the First Emperor. This register was confided to the care of the Count Regnault de Saint-Jean d'Angely, Minister and Councillor of State, and Secretary of the Imperial family. It was to him, under the First Empire, as it is now to the Minister of State under the Second, that was reserved the duty of drawing up the procès-verbeaux of the great acts relative to Napoleon. At the fall of the First Empire, Count Regnault de Saint-Jean d'Angely carefully preserved the book, which after his death passed into the hands of the Countess, his widow. That lady handed it over to the President of the Republic when Louis Napoleon was called by universal suffrage to the Imperial throne. In this same register, continued by the Second Empire, may be seen the certificates of the marriage of the Emperor Napoleon III., and of that of the Princess Clotilde; of the birth of the Prince Imperial; of the death of Prince Jerome; and, lastly, of the birth of the Prince Napoleon Victor Jerome Frederic, just born. The name of Napoleon commemorates that of the head of the dynasty; that of Victor is in remembrance of the house of Savoy; Jerome is that of his paternal grandfather; and Frederic was given in compliment to the family of Wurtemberg.

AUNT SOPHIE'S VISITS.—NO. XIV.

BY LUCY N. GODFREY.

It was a fresh, bright June morning. All the windows in Aunt Sophie's home had been thrown open to the sweet summer air. She had laid aside her work, and knelt by her favorite window, absorbing, with every sense, the joys which nature offered, while her soul expanded in worship beneath the genial influence, and her lips murmured: "And God saw everything that He had made, and behold it was very good," as the radiant smile upon her face showed that the sacred words were echoing with new power in her consciousness. Emma and Carrie were pouring forth their exuberant gladness in an anthem whose spirit at least seemed to be echoed by the canaries and the wild birds that carolled in the maple tops. The gardener was whistling cheerily, the housemaid humming at her work, children were shouting, and dogs were barking at a distance; yet all sounds were harmonious in her ear, since all expressed joy or praise.

Soon Henry came, eagerly calling, as he caught sight of her: "Oh, mother, mother! father says come down in the back porch and see the horses play; Willie and Edward have them out."

Mr. Laselle came and stood at her side to watch his noble, spirited pets; but their talk was in exclamations till the horses were led away. Then Uncle Charles said suddenly, clapping his palms for emphasis: "Come, mother, let's go somewhere this glorious weather!"

"I'm ready; shall we all go to Norton Pond for a day?" responded Aunt Sophie.

"Oh pshaw! no; we will go far enough to try Colonel and Major's mettle, I don't care if it is a thousand miles. Where shall it be? Whom do you want to see?"

"I know somebody that wants to see her and me, too," said Carrie, as her mother hesitated.

"You refer to your cousin, Sophie Carr, do you not?" asked Mrs. Laselle.

"Yes, mother; she begged me for a visit in every letter since she was here, two summers ago."

"Pretty well thought of, I think," replied Uncle Charles. "I shall be right glad to visit sister Lora and her family; so let us make arrangements, for it is a long way, and we must start soon to be home in time to welcome Rose Wilmot here."

The next morning, the family carriage having received Mr. and Mrs. Laselle, Carrie, Edward and Henry, Colonel and Major trotted briskly away, followed soon by a light carriage, which had been hired for Willie and Emma, for it had been decided that all the family should go as far as Niagara, that the children might view that wondrous masterpiece of nature, and the parents renew the reverent emotions its sublimity had long ago inspired.

It would take us long to tell of the beautiful succession of luxuriant landscapes, ever-varying cloud-pictures, neat villages, and quaint farm-houses which gladdened their observing eyes, and were laid among the sweet pictures which memory might hold ever ready for reason or fancy's draughts, as they journeyed through the Empire State. The parents, with their quick sight and cultivated love of beauty, were ready sympathizers with the fresh, social natures of the children, which found such frequent vent in exclamations of delight or surprise, or in eager, interested inquiries which drew from their father or mother scraps of knowledge they would remember longer than any they had gathered from books.

All their voices were silenced by reverent awe as they viewed the mighty Niagara amid the roar of its majestic thunderings. Then heart and lips were hushed; but afterward, many a lofty soul-flight was winged by the impressions received at that time. Their stay was not long, lest incongruous elements might be mingled in the perfect mental pictures.

Willie, Emma, and Henry proceeded directly home, while the remainder of the party went on, to make their contemplated visit in Ohio. A letter had preceded them; so eager eyes were watching for them when they arrived three days later. Carrie and her cousin, Sophie, were most enthusiastic in their expressions of delight at meeting; yet a competent observer would have seen that the joy of their elders was to theirs as a deep, rippling river compared with a babbling brook.

The coming of these dear friends from among their native New England hills was like moving back their sun of life to the morning hours of promise, to Lionel and Lora Carr. Association brought before them many a scene of youthful joy, which had long been dimmed by the dust of everyday labor and the cobwebs of daily care, and they saw them now, even brighter, from memory's gilding, than they had been in passing. It was rare happiness also to hear of the participants in those long gone delights, and Uncle Charles and Aunt Sophie had their thoughts quickened by interested questions, till they seemed to gain new wealth of experiences of life in that there was so much in their memories they had not realized. Old acquaintances, who had not been thought of for years, came in association's train to suggest bright thoughts of the holy home awaiting a glad reunion, or sad ones of earth's changes. This first evening was devoted to the past, for the morrow would be soon enough for the ladies to chat of their children, their housekeeping, and present surroundings; and for the gentlemen to interchange opinions concerning business and politics, since these later topics had engrossed the recent letters. Long after Carrie and her cousin had fallen asleep, sitting both upright, with each an arm about the other, their parents talked unweariedly. Uncle Charles and Aunt Sophie disclaimed all unusual fatigue, as well they might, since travellers who have pleasant companions, an easy carriage, and horses to be indulged in long and frequent rests, as family pets, should be exhilarated rather than overworn by journeying. Colonel and Major pranced as gayly, as they were led into Mr. Carr's barn, as they had done on the morning before leaving home, though their proud owner took no credit for extra care of them, since he fancied he came leisurely, merely to gratify the tastes and ensure the comfort of his wife.

It is not our purpose to give a detailed account of this visit of our friends. We pass over many interesting conversations and pleasant excursions to places of interest, or natural beauty in the vicinity, to note part of a morning's talk and some of its results.

"Where does Ella keep herself of late? I am afraid the child isn't well, she is so unusually quiet," said Mrs. Carr.

"I think you need not be particularly alarmed about her," replied Jennie, with a half sarcastic smile, "as long as she can sit and read from morning till night. She reads in our room since Aunt Sophie came."

"Ah! that is it, is it?" said the mother. Then, turning to Mrs. Laselle, she continued, with an intonation of satisfaction in her voice: "I expect Ella will be the scholar of the family. Though she is not yet thirteen, she has read more books than all the rest of us, I believe; and the more she reads, the more she wants to."

"What does she read?" asked Aunt Sophie, quietly.

"Oh, everything she can get; nothing comes amiss with her, I think; and everybody in the neighborhood is willing to lend to her, for she never injures a volume. She has a new stock now, I see, from a family who have lately moved into the place, and I suppose she will not have a thought for anything else till she has been through them all. It tries my patience sometimes; but I am glad to see the child improving herself."

"I hope you do not forget that not all books are sources of improvement, and that a mere taste for reading is not always a test of scholarship," responded Aunt Sophie.

Mrs. Carr hesitated before she replied. She had an indistinct remembrance of the warnings against bad books she had heard long ago. They seemed very unreal to her, since she had never been tempted in that way. She had never formed any decided taste for reading of any kind; but from the days when, as a child, she had been mortified by her accustomed place at the foot of her class, she had felt an earnest admiration for scholarship. Intellectual attainments had never been within the scope of her practical powers, but she was not the less ambitious that some one of her children should excel in them; hence her maternal pride had been gratified, in that the more abundant leisure which had been allowed to Ella, as the youngest daughter, had fostered a love for reading which she did not suppose could prove a source of anything save reasonable pleasure and improvement. Not having an intelligent appreciation of the advantages and resources of a well-disciplined and wisely stored mind, she had not craved such a possession for all her children; but had been well content to leave their mental culture to chance, which had so far favored her. The western township, in which her husband had located himself a few months before marriage, had been settled by New Englanders, who had brought their system of common schools with them, and also established an academy at an early date. Her children had profited by these educational advantages, and the older ones were intelligent and teachable, without being remarkable as scholars.

A six months' stay among friends at the East, two years before the time of which we write, had been of great advantage to the eldest daughter, and, through her, to the younger members of the family. She came into the room with Carrie just as Mrs. Carr was saying, in response to Mrs. Laselle's last remark :

"I know that one has to guard against bad books where they are plenty, but I suspect one could not find enough of any kind in this town to harm her."

"It isn't the quantity, but the quality that harms," said Aunt Sophie, looking involuntarily at the speaking face of her namesake.

"I know it right well," responded the girl, "and we have just found Ella crying over a yellow-covered novel that you would no sooner let her read than you would feed her with arsenic, Carrie says."

"What do you say?" said Mrs. Carr. "Where did she get the book?"

"Of Angelina Potter, and she has borrowed a half dozen of the same style, with a promise of more when those are read."

"Call her, Jennie; tell her to bring the book she is reading, directly."

Very soon poor Ella came in, holding one hand before her tear-stained face, and looking like a convicted culprit, though she said in a pleading tone, as she handed the book to her mother :

"Please, mother, let me finish reading it; it is not so bad as Carrie and Sophia think it is, and I do so want to see how it comes out."

"Perhaps we can tell you that, dear," said Aunt Sophie, who pitied the child.

Mrs. Carr looked at the book an instant, then saying, in a tone which made Ella extend her hand to take it :

"It is founded on fact." She passed it to Mrs. Laselle, who remarked, as she glanced over its pages :

"Yes, it professes to be founded on fact, but I pity the author who could pass by all the pure and beautiful facts of life, to feed his fancy upon a morbid and distorted reality, as I would pity the artist who should ignore all beauty and healthy development upon his canvas to find his satisfaction in representing festering sores, deformed limbs, blasted flowers, and decaying fruit. A fact may be a very unwholesome thing for little girls, so I think our little Ella will be content to let her mother return the dear, delightful books that make her cry, to their owner, for we can tell her that at the end, she would find the bad all killed, the good all pleased, and herself wearied and irritable from over-excitement." Noticing that the child still eyed the book greedily, Aunt Sophie saw that its spell must be broken, or its haunting power would linger over the susceptible mind. For a moment she was at a loss, but after a closer examination of the book, she asked Ella to tell her how far she had read. With nervous eagerness the little fingers turned the leaves, glancing more frequently as she advanced, till, at about the middle, she said :

"Here is my place, and I do so want to see how Emilia will escape from that wicked Claudio."

"Well, child, you shall know. If you will tell us the story so far, I will tell you the remainder. Just commence. I will prompt you from the book, and I doubt not the girls will be exceedingly interested."

"That we shall," said Carrie, encouragingly, "and mother will tell almost all the story, if you will only get her to begin."

"Perhaps I had better begin," responded Aunt Sophie, as Ella still hesitated, and glancing at the first page, she commenced, in a style even more verbose and extravagant than the author's, a description of the heroine. She mingled incongruous and ridiculous, put high sounding epithets occasionally, for the sport of the elders, but she went on so fluently, that Ella was lost in admiration, and soon exclaimed :

"Why, Aunt Sophie, you have read it yourself, hav'n't you?"

"No, dear; you will find I need a deal of prompting, if I am to tell the story, but I can put big words together beautifully, when I have a pattern."

"O, yes, she can tell us how gracefully the timorous, intrepid maiden perambulated the periphery of her father's luxuriant, closely-cropped lawn, while reclining upon the verdant, gray rock where the mignonette shed its delightful fragrance," said Carrie, her eyes sparkling with mischief.

"You did not say that, did you, auntie?" said Ella, half indignantly.

"I think I said some things quite as absurd, even if the author does not, but certainly one should be held excusable for some nonsense, if he must write more than three hundred closely-printed, double-columned pages like these, with neither purpose nor sound ideas to ennoble his work," replied Aunt Sophie gently, and then continued: "However, we must not forget that we have undertaken to tell this story. When I relate, you must correct me, and when you take up the account, I will look out for your mistakes. We must be very watchful of each other, and not let these girls discover a flaw that we do not. Will you go on?"

"I wish you would," said Ella, timidly.

"Very well, I will until one of the others notices a blunder that you do not; you will need to watch closely, for Carrie has a quick ear, when I am likely to be caught tampering with the Queen's English."

Aunt Sophie altered her style, as she commenced again, choosing words within Ella's comprehension, when she intended to blunder, and soon hearing the story became like a lively game, in which their quick wits were taxed to the utmost in finding phrases to be substituted for those to which they objected. After a few hearty laughs, the story was of far less importance in Ella's eyes, and as Aunt Sophie insisted upon her taking her turn, she found long chapters, which she could dismiss with a sentence. Then there were various, romantic moonshiny episodes, which proved exceedingly ridiculous, when subjected to the keen, mirth-provoking comments of Carrie and her cousins. The pathetic scenes, too, which had called forth Ella's tears, being held up in the light of cold criticism, lost their semblance of reality, and the child did not wonder at Jennie's asking if she were not ashamed to have cried so much over such nonsense. She was heartily ashamed of herself and the book, of which the heroine and her companions were now mere puppets to her, concerning whose fate she was indifferent. Aunt Sophie saw that it was time to stop the sport, which was becoming bitter to the little girl, so she checked the older girls, and briefly and soberly showed Ella the bare plot of the story, and its probable ending; then talked earnestly with all her companions of the folly of devoting precious time to such silly novels. Ella voluntarily brought the remainder of her borrowed store. Mrs. Laselle glanced over them and said:

"It was evidently your good fortune, my dear, to chance upon the least objectionable of these books. Emilia's story is only silly and shallow; these are foul and despicable. Impulse prompts me to throw them all in the fire, but it belongs to the owner to do that, as I should certainly advise her, Lora, upon returning them. However, let me warn my nieces against becoming in any way intimate with a young lady who would own or lend such trash. Neighborly kindness may prompt occasional calls, and you can lend her your books, but do not again borrow of her, or expose yourselves to her influence. I am glad to see that Ella loves to read; but she must be careful that this taste remain a healthful appetite for mental food rather than a morbid craving for mental stimulus. Your father has many of the old English classics; they have to me the flavor of delicious winter-apples, juicy and nourishing so long after the winter snows have covered the boughs which bore them. You have the Bible, too, which is the very Bread of Life. With these, and your school-books for meat, your minds will not lack nourishment, though you may sometimes wish for the lighter productions of the day, which we may compare to the smaller fruits and berries with which a provident house-keeper so loves to vary her family's diet. Do you understand the comparison well enough to remember it, Ella?"

The little girl looking somewhat puzzled, Aunt Sophie glanced inquiringly at Jennie, who said: "I do, auntie. We have minds which must have food; so we have the Bible for bread, school-books for meat—some of them are tough and gristly, I am thinking—and then we have Goldsmith, Addison, Shakspeare, Plutarch, Pollok, Young, Pope, and dear Mrs. Hemans; besides some children's stories for goodies, and besides we have father's newspaper, what's that?—potatoes I guess. Well, I am not going hungry."

"If you are hungry, don't try adulterated brandy in the shape of Angelina Potter's novels," said Carrie, roguishly.

"My child!" spoke Aunt Sophie, in a tone of grave rebuke, which sobered her daughter instantly, who blushed as she said:

"Oh, I beg pardon, Ella. I know you were not to blame, since nobody had told you they were bad. I will never plague you about them again."

"Nor I, either," said Aunt Sophie. "We ought to be obliged to them for bringing the subject into our talk. Don't let us drop it yet."

"You don't object to all novels, Aunt Sophie? How are we to tell the good from the bad—by the binding? Shall we discard all in paper covers, and accept those in cloth or leather?"

"You may answer, Carrie," said Aunt Sophie, smiling, as she glanced at her daughter's animated face.

"I only wanted to say, mother, that that would not do at all, for then we should lose or have to wait for late editions of dear Miss Bremer's charming stories; delightful David Copperfield, your favorite John Halifax, and others almost as good. I should say throw all yellow covers to the flames, and read the brown."

"Ah, ha! confidently spoken, and very conclusive, if we could only be sure that you know the whole story," responded Aunt Sophie, laughing.

"Well, is it not the way you do, mother?" asked the girl, a little abashed.

"And what do I do with the blue, green, and purple?"

"I don't know," replied Carrie, frankly, after a moment's thought.

"No, darling; neither you nor I am sufficiently acquainted with the cheap literature of the day to speak concerning it with perfect confidence. You have taken, from me very likely, a strong prejudice against yellow-covered literature; but the brown is not all unexceptionable, because most excellent John Halifax has been put in that livery."

"Would it not," asked Mrs. Carr, "be safest and best to discard novels altogether? I know many good people used to suppose that, as a class, they were pernicious."

"Novels are not one class, but many," replied Aunt Sophie. "Fiction is doing a noble work in the world as well as an evil one. Our sources of pure pleasure are multiplied many fold by its bright creations. Our minds and our hearts are enlarged by sympathy with its noble ideals. Every great teacher knows that the feelings move quicker than the reason; that when these have been won to sympathy with the right and the true, a point has been gained, and the genial novel-writer wins this sympathy. You have told little bits of improvised novelettes to your children, I presume, with excellent effect."

"How so?"

"Did you never tell a little one, hugging an apple or an orange to himself in undisguised selfishness, of the happy little generous boy till his sympathy and admiration made him beg you to divide his treasure among his brothers and sisters to the satisfaction of all? Or did you never tell a naughty child of one whose fault had been like his own, until he saw himself in the ideal, and sobbed in penitence?"

"O yes! when they were so young they could not criticize the stories," replied Mrs. Carr, smiling.

"Then you can understand how the earnest novel-writer, looking abroad upon all mankind as the children of his Father, sees their weakness and their evil pityingly, as you see them in your children, and strives to so picture the pure joys of life that their sympathies shall be won, or touches with tender probe their sin-sore hearts that they may be healed. The fiction writer should love truth, purity, and virtue, as the painter should love nature and its beauty; if he does not, his works are not fit to be placed in the hands of the young."

"But how can one tell? How do you tell what books to let your children read? and how shall I, who have so little time for reading, and fall asleep over my book when I have time?" said Mrs. Carr, earnestly.

"We must both depend somewhat upon others," replied Aunt Sophie; "you would find the book notices, in the magazine I spoke of last night, an assistance, since no book will be recommended there which is not safe for all. And your Sophie is old enough now, so that you can depend very much upon her judgment. She has not learned to crave the frivolous and the false, and now there is little danger of her forming the taste."

"Thank you for the compliment, auntie," replied Sophie, continuing earnestly; "but you have not told us how you do. I want to know for myself, and I really need to know, if I am to direct Ella's reading."

"You must take care lest you rate my opinions too highly," replied Aunt Sophie. "My children have scarcely felt a restriction in their reading, since I never object to their perusing any book which they may find in our home library. Little folks may get beyond their depth in Ruskin, Channing, or Beecher; but the waters are clear, and they will lose no vigor in them. Then there are many writers whom I have learned to know and love through their works. The children hear me speak of these, and I place their writings in the hands of my daughters as confidently as I would trust a little child for an hour with the friend of years. For instance, I have never seen Miss Muloch, Miss Sewell, Mrs. Hale, Mrs. Haven, or a multitude of others I might name, yet I have just as truly recognized them as earnest, Christian women."

"You mention only ladies; do you object to men's novels?" asked Jennie.

"O no indeed! Those of Scott, whom we admire and reverence for his mighty intellect, and love for his noble heart and bright sense of honor, are a valuable library of themselves; then there is our pure-minded Irving, our genial Holmes, and very many others, whose mental creations may well be admitted to that ampler world of the imagination which we love to recognize."

"And how about Dickens?" inquired Sophie.

"I am afraid he has 'touched pitch and been defiled,'" replied her aunt.

"Dickens' portrayals are exquisite; not mere outside pictures of living men and women, but true portraits down to their very hearts, as his gifted, sympathetic eyes have seen them. I acknowledge his wonderful genius: I gratefully remember the pleasant hours whose delights were due to his charming fancies; and I realize that he has been as an eloquent and beneficent lay preacher, blessing and benefiting multitudes, who could never have been reached through lectures, essays, or sermons; but I have not sufficient confidence in the man to give a book of his to a child without first reading it, or hearing it recommended by some one whom I can trust."

"But do you read them yourself?" asked Sophie.

"Yes, when I have time and opportunity, which has been rarely of late, since I can make a dozen chances for reading something I know will do me good where I can find the vacant hours waiting for me to read a doubtful story. When I want to enter the domain of fiction for mere amusement, I like a guide whom I can wholly trust. However, we can make no rule for you from my experience, since I have much the larger range of reading from which to choose. You will, at present, find time for all you can obtain which is not objectionable. Remember that a few good books, read carefully, nourish the mind more than any amount of superficial reading. Ella's fancy is so lively that she can read poems with pleasure; these and histories will be of advantage to her. I think that she will not forget that there are books which are worse than none, and your anxiety to guide yourself and sisters rightly will prevent your going far wrong."

Mrs. Laselle and her sister had another brief conversation on this subject upon the latter's returning from carrying home Miss Potter's books, the next afternoon. She found that young lady reclining upon the lounge, with hair uncombed and untidy dress, reading a book similar in its appearance to those she had lent. Mrs. Potter was evidently mortified, and the call was somewhat stiff and constrained; Mrs. Carr explaining that she had brought back the books, since they were such as she could not allow her daughters to read. Her neighbor exclaimed:

"There, Angelina, do you hear that? You know how much I tell you that it cannot do you any good to keep stuffing your head with such nonsense."

Angelina deigned no reply except a scornful glance, and Mrs. Carr, with ready suavity, assured the mother that it was only natural that young girls, with a passion for reading, should be glad of any books they might be able to obtain, and thus sometimes get objectionable ones; then offered to lend the young lady such as she had, hoping she might find them pleasant as well as profitable.

Mrs. Carr came home with a far deeper realization of the danger of indiscriminate reading than Aunt Sophie's words alone would have been likely to awake. She listened now to Mrs. Laselle's suggestions with interest similar to that her daughter had manifested the day previous. She began to see that her family had thriven, not because of any judicious care she had exercised over them, but because they had been alike fortunate in having furnished for them wholesome food for their bodies and minds. Now she resolved to try to provide them, or have them provided with suitable books, and to use her influence among her friends and those of her children in preventing evil effects from the introduction of evil books and unwholesome newspapers into their neighborhood, and, in the months that followed, her resolution was frequently remembered with profit to others.

For a time, Jennie and Ella rung the changes upon Aunt Sophie's comparison of physical and mental food most amusingly. Every volume found its counterpart in edibles, while magazines and newspapers were fresh fruit or berries, and even a bon mot or repartee was a currant, grape, or raisin. Gradually they won their mother to an appreciation of their rare epicurean fare, and listening to their reading became one of her best pleasures.

At the close of a letter to Carrie, some two years later, Jennie wrote—

"Angelina Potter still continues to feed on her Apples of Sodom. She calls herself romantic—she certainly is not sensible. Only last week she answered a matrimonial advertisement. I don't know what she will do next. Her mother is a slave to her, waiting upon her as humbly as a menial might do, and making, washing, and mending the clothes she is only too glad to see her daughter dress herself properly in, since the cruel creature cannot always be persuaded to do even so little as this, without a stronger motive than the gratification of her parents. I am sure I heartily pity her, as you will do; but I cannot tell you more of the foolish things she has said and done, for Ella is calling me to join mother and her in a feast of canned peaches—otherwise you will understand, a volume of Tennyson. By the way, the child is beginning to think of 'putting away childish things,' and then don't you pity us?—we shall have no little girl. She is intending to don long dresses soon, when she says we must partly drop this habit, in which we have indulged most too freely, of depreciating our darling, precious books, by likening them to mere gratifications for the palate. She is right in our case, but I wish everybody could enjoy a wholesome mental feast, even as well as a favorite article of food, don't you? It is strange that people don't know what is good, and that all are so completely satisfied with their particular tastes. It would be laughable, if it were not so sad; but you will say I am no better than the rest, if I will be content with mental joys, and ignore purer, perennial, spiritual ones. But, dear Carrie, we will ignore none of the capacities of our noble natures; let us gratefully recognize the joys of sense, and make them ministers unto mental delight, while sense and intellect both shall, through healthful growth and action, so serve our immortal souls that, when we shall wake in that clime where each shall see himself clearly, we shall not find that our earth life has been empty and void of all sweet fruit.

But sis is impatient; so please write soon to your loving cousin

JENNIE.

Carrie was scarcely astonished when, a few weeks afterward, she received, in another letter from her cousin, a graphic account of the distress of poor Mrs. Potter at the elopement of Angelina with a stranger of whom various dishonorable reports had been circulated during his short stay in town. Well might the mother bemoan the fate of the weak misguided child, who had been so wholly unfitted for any sphere of life by unwholesome reading and injudicious indulgence. Of the poor girl's subsequent fate little was known. A few years after she left home, her father received a pitiful request that he would come to her in New York city. He went, and for a few days the mother had her daughter again; then there was a funeral, and the sod was laid over all that remained of the poor human wreck, while the pitifully developed and sin-scarred repentant soul entered an untried life. A little bright-faced boy was left to take her place in her father's home; for him Mrs. Potter works and worries, and she will see to it that he is not reared to self-indulgence and folly. May she, and all the grandmothers who have like task and like sad memories, be blessed in their work!

As the passing years disinclined Mr. Carr to his usual activity, and increasing wealth warranted the expense, it proved a very easy thing for his wife and daughters to turn his attention to the collection of valuable books, for he was fond of reading, as well as ready to gratify their tastes; so it happened that at later visits in Ohio, Aunt Sophie found good books and periodicals abundant in the home of her friends.

THE CASKET OF THE YEAR.

BY WILLIE E. PARON.

Pearl the Sixth.—June.

The leafy month of June has come,
Sing welcome!

The bird with song, the bee with hum,
Sing welcome!

It is our lot to greet to-day
The sunny sister of the May;
To welcome unto earthly bowers
The gentle goddess of the flowers;
Sing welcome!

Her forehead with syringa crowned,
Sing welcome!

The rose is on her bosom found,
Sing welcome!

The sparkling waters laugh and leap,
And murmur. As a bride asleep
Murmurs endearing tokens, so
The ripples as they come and go,
Sing welcome!

The maidens bending o'er the brooks
Sing welcome!

The students looking from their books
Sing welcome!

The sick child tossing on his bed
By fancy's hand is onward led
Till on a leafy couch he lies,
Where, pillowing his head, he cries,
Sing welcome!

The honeysuckles line the road,
Sing welcome!

That leads us to her sweet abode,
Sing welcome!

Then touch the harp and strike the lyre,
And unto purer strains aspire,
And waken all the echoes till
We hear from plain, from vale, from hill,
Sing welcome!

The leafy month of June! Oh, lips,
Sing welcome!

What if the May is in eclipse,
Sing welcome!

Let young and old, let rich and poor—
They who rejoice, they who endure—
The grave, the gay, the good, the fair
Upon the warm and odorous air,
Sing welcome.

READING.—The amusement of reading is among the greatest consolations of life; it is the nurse of virtue, the upholder in adversity, the prop of independence, the support of a just pride, the strengthener of elevated opinions: it is the repeller of the scoff and the knave's poison.

CHAPTER XII.

A YEAR and five months had passed away since the evening when Lewis Hammond held his conscience-stricken wife upon his knee, and told her—in fervid words that singularly belied his calm and even demeanor at other times—of his faith in and love for her, and his abhorrence of the sin she felt in her trembling soul that she had committed. Yet she had not the superhuman courage required to contradict a trust like this. There was no alternative but to keep up the weary, wicked mockery unto the end.

"But in all these months she must have learned to care for him!" cries Mrs. Common Sense. "There is nothing disagreeable about the man. He is not brilliant; yet he has intelligence and feeling, and is certainly attached to his wife. I have no doubt but that he indulges her in every reasonable request, and comports himself in all respects like an exemplary husband."

Granted, to each and every head of your description, my dear madam! But for all that his obdurate wife had not come to love him. I blush to say it; but while we are stripping hearts let us not be squeamish! There had been seasons, lasting sometimes for weeks, when her existence was a continual warfare between repugnance to him and her sense of duty; when she dreaded to hear his step in the hall, and shrank inwardly from his caress; watched and fought, until strength and mind were well-nigh gone. Mark me! I do not deny that this was as irrational as it was reprehensible; but I have never held up my poor Sarah as a model of reason or propriety. From the beginning, I have made her case a warning. The Fates forbid that I should commend it to any as an example for imitation! A passionate, proud, reticent girl; a trusting, loving, deceived woman; a hopeless, desperate bride—whose heart lay like a pulseless stone in her breast at the most ardent love-words of her husband, and throbbed with wild, uncontrollable emotion at the fraternal tone and kiss of her last and only love—I have no plea for her, save the words of Infinite compassion and Divine knowledge of human nature and human woe: "Let him that is without sin among you cast the first stone at her!"

The highly respectable firm, of which Mr. Hammond was the junior member, was adding, if not field to field, thousand to thousand, of the wherewithal for the purchase of fields, or, what was better still, city lots. Mrs. Lewis Hammond had set up her carriage about a year after her marriage; said equipage being a gift from her generous husband on the occasion of the first airing of the little "Baby Belle," as she was always called in the family. Not until subsequent events had endowed it with deeper and saddest interest did Sarah read Aldrich's beautiful poem bearing the above title. Lewis's mother's name was Isabella. Her grandchild received the same, which became "Belle" on the mother's tongue, and then because it was natural to say "Baby" too, the pretty alliteration was adopted.

To a man of Lewis's domestic tastes the advent of this child was a source of the liveliest pleasure, and the tiny inmate of his household was another and a powerful tie, binding him to a home already dear. But to the mother's lonely life, so bare of real comfort or joy—haunted by memory and darkened by remorse—the precious gift came, like a ray of Heaven's purest light, a strain of angel music, saying to care "Sleep!" to hope "Awake, the morning cometh!" Beneath the sunshine of so much love, the infant thrived finely, and without being a greater prodigy than the nine hundred and ninety-nine miracles of beauty and sprightliness who, with it, composed the thousand "blessed babies" of the day, was still a pretty, engaging creature, whose gurgling laugh and communicative "coo" beguiled the mother's solitude, and made cheerful the lately silent house.

It was late in the June afternoon, and arrayed in clean white frock, broad sash, and shoulder-knots of pink ribbon, the small lady sat on her mother's lap at the front window, awaiting the appearance of the husband and father. Sarah had altered much since her marriage; "improved wonderfully," said her acquaintances. There was still in her mien a touch of haughtiness; in her countenance the look that spoke profound thought and introspection. Still, when in repose, her brow had a cast of seriousness that bordered on melancholy; but over her features had passed a change like that wrought by the sculptor's last stroke to the statue. The mould was the same—the chiselling more clear and fine. Especially after the birth of her child was this refining process most apparent in its effects. There was a softness in her smile, a gentle sweetness in her voice, as she now talked to the babe, directing its attention to the window, lest the father's approach should be unnoticed, and he disappointed in his shout of welcome.

"How affected! gotten up for show!" sneered the childless Mrs. Bond, as she rolled by in her carriage, on her way to her handsome, cheerless home and its cross master.

"She has chosen her position well, at all events," rejoined her companion, a neighbor and gossip, who had taken Lucy's place in Victoria's confidence.

"Ridiculous!" She spat out the ejaculation from the overflowing of her spleen. "I could laugh at her airs, if they did not make me mad! One would think to see her, as she sits there, that she had decked herself and the child to please a man that she doated upon—like the good wives we read of in novels, Irving's 'Wife,' for example!"

"And why shouldn't she be fond of him? He is a good-hearted fellow, and lets her do pretty much as she pleases, I imagine, besides waiting on her like any lover. I often meet them riding out together. That is more than your husband or mine ever does, my dear."

"They go quite as often as we desire their company, I fancy. Mine does, I know. Perhaps, if we had the reason for parading our conjugal devotion that Mrs. Hammond has, we might wheedle our lawful lords into taking a seat alongside of us, once in a while. There's nothing like keeping up appearances, particularly if the reality is lacking. If Lewis Hammond knew some of the pretty stories I could tell him, about his Sarah's love-scrapes, he would not look so sublimely contented with his three-story paradise. The elegant clothes he piles upon that squaw of his are preposterous, and she carries them off as if she had dressed well all her days. I tell you she never looked decent until she put on her wedding-dress. You have heard of the fainting scene that took place that morning, I suppose? Old Mother Hunt said it was 'sensibility,' and 'nervous agitation;' the company laid it to the heat of the room; and I laughed in my sleeve, and said nothing. If that woman aggravates me much more, I will remind her of some passages in her experience she does not dream that I know."

"Do tell me what you mean? I am dying of curiosity! Did she flirt very hard before she was married?"

"She never had the chance. Lewis Hammond was her only offer."

"What was the matter, then?"

"I can't tell you now. It is too long a story. The next time she frets me, as she does whenever she crosses my path, maybe you will hear the romance. Shall I set you down at your door, or will you enliven me by spending the evening with me? I do not expect other company, and George falls asleep over his newspaper as soon as he has dispatched his dinner. Come in, and I will show you the loveliest sofa-pillow you ever beheld; a new pattern I have just finished."

"Thank you! I would accept it with pleasure, but I have not been home since breakfast, and James makes such a fuss if he does not find me in the nursery, tending that whimpering baby, when he comes up at night, that it is as much as my life is worth to stay out after six o'clock. Anything for peace, you know; and since we wives are slaves, it is best to keep on the blind side of our masters."

The day had been warm down town, and as Lewis Hammond stepped from the stage at the corner nearest his house, he felt jaded and dispirited—a physical depression, augmented by a slight headache. A business question which he had talked over with Mr. Marlow, before leaving the store, contributed its weight of thoughtfulness, and he was not conscious how near he was to his dwelling until aroused by a sharp tap upon the window-pane; he glanced up at the animated tableau framed by the sash—the smiling mother, and the babe leaping and laughing, and stretching its hands towards him.

"This is the sweetest refreshment a man can ask after his day of toil," he said, when, having kissed wife and child, he took the latter in his arms. He was not addicted to complimentary speeches, and while his esteem and attachment for his chosen partner were even stronger than they had been in the heart of the month old bridegroom, he was less apt to express them to her now than then. In one respect, and only one, his wedded life had brought him disappointment. Unreserved confidence and demonstrative affection on his side had failed to draw forth similar exhibitions of feeling from Sarah. Kind, thoughtful, dutiful, scrupulously faithful to him and his interests in word, look, and deed, she ever was. Yet he saw that she was a changed being from the fond, impulsive daughter, whose ministry in her father's sick-room had won for her a husband's love. Her reception of his affectionate advances was passive—a reception merely, without apparent return. Never, and he had ceased now to ask it, had she once said to him the phrase he craved to hear—"I love you!" Yet he would as soon have questioned the reality of his existence as that she did love him. He held inviolate his trust in the motive that had induced her to become his wife, and in this calm confidence he was fain to rest, in the absence of protestations that would have gladdened his soul, while they could hardly have strengthened his faith in her affection.

Few wives, however loving, have been more truly cherished than was Sarah, and of this she was partially aware. If she had remained ignorant of Lewis's sentiments and wishes with regard to herself until the grieved and unrequited love had subsided into the dull aching that does not, like a green wound, create, by its very smart, a species of excitement that helps one bear the pain; had he glided gradually into the joyless routine of her life's duties, and bided his time of speaking until he had made himself necessary to her comfort and peace, he might have won a willing bride. But what omniscient spirit was there to instruct and caution him? He met and loved her, supposing her to be as free as himself; like an honest, upright man, he told that love, and without a misgiving, placed his honor and his happiness in her hands.

Sarah could not have told why she revolved all this in her unquiet mind as he sat near her, playing with their child; yet she did think of their strange sad history, and from the review arose a feeling of pity, sincere, almost tender, for him, so worthy and so deceived. She remembered with abaseness of spirit how often she had been ready to hate him as the instrument of her bondage; how wrathful words had arisen to her lips at the moment of his greatest kindness; how patiently he had borne her coldness; how unflagging was his care of and for her. Over the dark, turbulent gulf of the unforgotten past that sundered their hearts, she longed, as she had never done before, to call to him, and confessing her sin against Heaven and against him, to implore pardon for the sake of the spotless babe that smiled into the father's face with its mother's eyes. Would he be merciful? Slowly and emphatically memory repeated in her ear his denunciation of the unloving wife, and courage died before the menaced curse.

"Fudge! Fiddlesticks! what frippery nonsense!" cry out, in a vehement storm of indignation, a bevy of the common sense connection. "Are we not staid and respectable matrons all? Do we not rear our daughters virtuously, and teach our sons to honor father as well as mother? Yet who of us troubles herself with raking in the cold ashes of her 'long ago' for the bones of some dead and gone love—a girlish folly of which she would be ashamed now? What cares Mr. Common Sense, among his day-books and ledgers in his study or in his office, how many times his now correct helpmeet pledged eternal fidelity to other lovers before she put her last crop of wild oats into the ground, and settled for life with him? What if some of us, maybe all, if driven hard, should admit that when we stood up before the minister we underwent certain qualms—call them pangs, if you like—at the thought of Tom This, or Harry That, or Dick The Other, who, if circumstances had permitted, we would have preferred should occupy the place of 'the man whom we actually held by the hand!' While men can choose their mates, and women can only take such as propose to them, these things will happen. After all, who is hurt?" You aver that none of you are, mesdames, and we would not call your word in question. Ladies so conscientious must, of necessity, be veracious, even in love affairs.

"I am a thoughtless animal!" said Lewis, at the dinner-table. "There is a letter from Lucy! Open it—don't mind me! I will crack your nuts for you while you read it."

There was a troubled look in Sarah's eye, when she laid it down. "Lucy says they are certainly coming North this year—that we may look for them in a week from the date of this. This is rather sooner than mother expected them. Her house-cleaning is late this season, in consequence of her rheumatic spell in May."

"Let them come straight here! What should prevent them? There is an abundance of room for them—baby, nurse, and all. It will be a grand arrangement!" said Lewis, heartily.

Sarah was backward in replying. "Father and mother may object. I would not wound them by interference with their guests."

"I will answer that mother will thank us to take care of them until her scrubbing and scalding are done. And Lucy would not be willing to risk her baby's health in a damp house."

"I will go and see mother to-morrow about it," concluded Sarah. She still appeared dubious as to the expediency of the proposed step, a thoughtfulness that did not wear away during the whole evening.

The Bensons had not visited New York the preceding year. They were detained at the South by a combination of causes, the principal of which was the long and fatal illness of Philip's mother. Lucy had written repeatedly of her intense desire to see her home once more, declaiming against the providences that had thwarted their projects, like an impatient, unreasonable child.

"Philip says it is not convenient for him to go just yet," said her letter to her sister, "and that our part of the country is as healthy as Saratoga itself; but I have vowed that I will not wait one day beyond the time I have set. It sets me wild to think of being in Broadway again—of visiting and shopping, and seeing you all. We have been so dull here since Mrs. Benson's death, and Philip is as solemn as a judge. One of his married sisters will stay with the old gentleman while we are away. Oh, Sarah! I am sick of housekeeping and baby-nursing! It will do well enough for me when I need spectacles and a wig; but now, while I am young enough to enjoy life, it is insufferable!"

"Not very domestic, is she?" observed Lewis, folding up the letter, which Sarah had handed him. "Ah! it is not every man who has such a gem of a wife as I have! It appears to me that the married women of these days are not satisfied unless they have a string of beaux as long as that of a popular single belle. How is it, little one? Do you ever catch yourself wishing that your husband were not such an old-fashioned piece of constancy, and would give some other fellow a chance to say a pretty thing, when you are in company?"

"I do not complain," said Sarah, demurely.

"Not in words, perhaps; your patience is wonderful in everything. But how do you feel when you see your old neighbor, Mrs. Bond, waltzing every set with the gayest gallant in the ball-room, while your jailor does not like to have you 'polk' at all, and favors your dancing only with men whom he knows to be respectable?"

"I feel that Mr. Hammond is a sensible man, and careful of his wife's reputation, even in trifles, while Mr. Bond—"

"Go on! finish your sentence!"

"And his lady are a well-matched pair!"

Much as she disliked Victoria, and knowing that she was hated still by her, Sarah deemed it a necessary and common act of courtesy to her sister's friend to call and apprise her of Lucy's probable visit.

"It is not convenient for mother to receive them for a week yet, on account of certain household arrangements," she stated, in making known the object of her visit to her ancient enemy. "So you will find Lucy at our house, where her friends will be received as if they were my own."

"You are very polite, I am sure!" replied Mrs. Bond, smothering her displeasure at Sarah's studied civility, and noting, with her quick, reptile perceptions, that she was to be tolerated as she fancied Sarah would imply, merely as Lucy's early associate. "And the Bensons are to be with you! I shall call immediately upon their arrival. Poor, dear Lucy! I long to see her. She has had a vast deal of trouble since her marriage—has she not?"

"Except the death of her mother-in-law, she has had nothing to trouble her that I have heard of," answered Sarah, rising to go.

"My dear creature! what do you call the wear and tear of managing a husband, and a pack of unruly servants, and looking after a baby? And she was such a belle! I wonder if she is much broken!"

"Come and see!"

Mrs. Hammond was at the parlor door.

"I will—most assuredly! How do you like their being quartered upon you? What does that pattern husband of yours say to this?"

"Madam!" said Sarah, surprised and offended by the rude query.

"Oh! I don't mean that it would not be very delightful for you to have your sister with you; but there was a foolish rumor, about the time of your marriage, that you and Mr. Benson had had some kind of a love-passage, down in the country; and I thought that Mr. Hammond, with his particularly nice notions, might retain an unpleasant recollection of the story, which would prevent him from being on brotherly terms with his old rival. Men are terribly un-asonable mortals, and perfect Turks in jealousy! We cannot be too careful not to provoke their suspicions."

Not for the universe would Sarah have betrayed any feeling at this insolence, save a righteous and dignified resentment at its base insinuations; but the ungovernable blood streamed in crimson violence to her temples, and her voice shook when she would have held it firm.

"Mr. Hammond is not one to be influenced by malicious gossip, Mrs. Bond, if, indeed, the report you have taken the liberty of repeating was ever circulated except by its author. I cannot thank you for your warning, as I recognize no occasion for jealousy in my conduct or character. I am accountable for my actions to my conscience and my husband, and I release you from what you have assumed to be your duty of watching and criticizing my personal affairs. Good morning."

"I struck the sore spot! no doubt of that!" soliloquized Mrs. Bond, recalling Sarah's start of pain and blush at the indelicate allusion to Philip Benson. "That woman stirs up all the bile in my system if I talk two minutes with her. If there were half the material to work upon in that vain, weak Lucy, that there is in this sister, I would have my revenge. As for Lewis Hammond, he is a love-sick fool!"

Sarah's cheeks had not lost their flush, nor had her heart ceased its angry throbblings, when she reached home. In the solitude of her chamber, she summoned strength and resolution to ask herself the question, so long avoided, shunned, as she had imagined, in prudence, as she now began to fear, in dread of a truthful reply.

When she married Lewis Hammond, she loved another. Fearful as was this sin, it would be yet more terrible were she now to discover a lurking fondness, an unconquered weakness for that other, in the heart of the trusted wife, the mother who, from that guilty bosom, nourished the little being that was, as yet, the embodiment of unsullied purity. It was a trying and a perilous task to unfold deliberately; to pry searchingly into the record of that one short month that had held all the bloom and fragrance of her life's spring season; to linger over souvenirs and compare sensations—a painful and revolting process; but, alas! the revulsion was not at memories of that olden time; and as this appalling conviction dawned upon her, her heart died within her.

The nurse was arranging Baby Belle for the possible reception of her unknown aunt and uncle, that afternoon, when Mrs. Hammond came into the nursery, her face as pale and set as marble, and silently lifted the child from the girl's lap to her own. For one instant her cheek was laid against the velvet of the babe's; the ringlets of fair hair mingled with her dark locks, before she set about completing its unfinished toilette. With a nicety and care that would have seemed overstrained, had other than the mother's hands been busied in the work, the stockings and slippers were fitted on the plump feet; the sunny curls rolled around the fingers of the tiring woman, and brushed back from the brow; the worked cambric robe lowered cautiously over the head, lest the effect of the coiffure should be marred; the sleeves looped up with bands of coral and gold; a necklace, belonging to the same set, clasped around the baby's white throat, and she was ready for survey.

"Now, Baby Belle and mamma will go down to meet papa!"

And with the little one still clinging to her neck, she met, in the lower hall, her husband ushering in Lucy and Philip Benson.

CHAPTER XIII.

BREAKFAST was kept back an hour next morning to await Lucy's tardy appearance. "She was sadly wearied with her journey," apologized Philip, and Sarah begged that she would keep her room and have her meals sent up to her—an hospitable offer, which Mr. Benson negatived.

Lucy did look tired and unrefreshed, and, to speak more plainly, very cross. Her hair, in its driest state of pale yellow, was combed straight back above her temples; her skin was sallow; her wrapper carelessly put on, and its dead white unrelieved by even a bow of ribbon at the throat. Involuntarily Lewis glanced from the uninviting picture to his household deity, in her neat breakfast-dress of gray silk faced with pink, her glossy hair and tranquil features, and said to himself, in secret triumph, "Which is now the beauty? None of your trumpery ornamental articles for me!"

Philip's eyes were as keen as his host's, and the probability is that he instituted a similar comparison, however well his pride succeeded in concealing the act and its result. Cutting short his wife's querulous complaints of the discomforts of travel, and the horrors of nervous sleeplessness, he opened a conversation with Mr. Hammond in the subdued, perfectly-managed tones Sarah remembered so well, selecting such topics as would interest a business man and a citizen of a commercial metropolis. Lucy panted, and applied herself for consolation to her breakfast.

With a strange mingling of emotions, Sarah listened to the dialogue between the gentlemen. She was anxious that Lewis should acquit himself creditably. Brilliant, like Philip, he could never be; but in sterling sense, not many men were his superiors. She had never had cause to be ashamed of him; for one so unpretending and judicious was not liable to make himself ridiculous. Whence, then, the solicitude with which she hung upon his every word? her disappointment when he did not equal the ideal reply she had fashioned, as she heard the words that called it forth? Several times she joined in the conversation, invariably to corroborate Lewis's assertions, or to supply something he had omitted to state. Philip Benson was a student of human nature. Was his mind sufficiently abstracted from his domestic annoyances to divine the motive that Sarah herself only perceived afterwards in solitary self-examination? Not love of or admiration for the intrinsic excellence of the man whose name she bore; not fear lest his modesty should lessen his merits in the eyes of others; but a selfish dread that his acute interlocutor, discerning in him nothing likely to attract or win the affection of a woman such as he knew her to be, might guess her true reason for marrying Mr. Hammond. The timorous progeny of one guilty secret can only be numbered by the minutes during which it is borne in the bosom. Like the fabled Lacedæmonian boy, Sarah carried the gnawing horror with a fortitude that looked like cheerfulness. Habit cannot lighten the weight of a clinging curse; but strength and hardness come in time, if the burdened one is not early crushed by his load.

The sisters spent most of the day in Lucy's room; the latter stretched upon the lounge, as she declared, "completely used up." Mrs. Hunt came around early in the forenoon, and into her sympathizing ears the spoiled child poured the story of her woes and wrongs; Sarah sitting by with a swelling, rebellious heart. With indecorous contempt for one of the most binding laws of the married state—inviolable secrecy as to the faults of the other party to the momentous compact—mother and daughter compared notes upon their husbands, and criticized the class generally as the most wrong-headed, perverse, and dictatorial of all the necessary evils of society.

Mrs. Benson, the elder, and her pleasure-loving daughter-in-law had differed seriously several months before the death of the former. Philip, while espousing his wife's cause to the rest of his family, had, in private, taken her to task for what he considered objectionable in her conduct; her heads of offence being mainly extravagant love of gay company, and the gallant attentions of gentleman-visitors; neglect of dress, and all efforts to please, when there was no company by; and a decided indisposition to share in the household duties, which his mother's increasing feebleness made onerous to her.

"Ah, mother!" sighed the interesting complainant, raising herself to shake up her pillow, then sinking again upon it. "If girls only realized what is before them when they marry, few would be brave enough to change their condition. When I picture to myself what I was at home—a petted darling—never allowed to inconvenience myself when it could possibly be avoided; courted in society; free as air and light-hearted as a child; and then think of all that I have endured from the unkindness of strangers, and the—well—the want of sympathy in him for whom I had given up my dear old home and friends—I ask myself why I did not remain single!"

The prudent matchmaker shook her head. "Marriage is a lottery, they say, my dear; but I am very sure that single life is a blank. You had no fortune, and in the event of your father's death would have been almost destitute. I am sorry that your father did not insist upon Mr. Benson's giving you your own establishment at once. I hope, now the old lady is out of the way, you will have things more according to your notions."

"Don't you believe that! As if there were not two sisters-in-law, living but four miles off, and driving over every other day to 'see how pa is.' That means, to see whether Lucy is letting things go to wreck and ruin. I understand their spiteful ways! Philip shuts his ears when I talk about them; but I am determined that I will not bear much more meddling!"

Decidedly, Lucy Benson married was a woeful declension from the seraphic spinster depicted in our earlier chapters; but, as in time past, so in time present and to come, the sparkling sugar, whose integrity and sweetness appeared indestructible, while it was kept dry and cool, if dampened, undergoes an acetous fermentation, and the delicate sweetmeat, exposed to the air at a high temperature, becomes speedily a frothing mass, evolving pungent gases. The pretty doll who anticipates, in the connubial state, one long fête-day of adoration received, and benign condescension dispensed, is as certain to awake from this dream as from any other, and upon the temper in which she sustains the disenchantment, depends a vast proportion of her future welfare and peace.

Lucy's behavior to her babe was a mixture of childish fondling and neglect. Fortunately, the little "Hunt's" special attendant was an elderly woman, long established as "Maumer" in the Benson family, and her devotion to her charge prevented any present evil effects from his mother's incompetence or carelessness. Philip's pride in, and love for his boy were extreme. When he came in that evening, Sarah chanced to be in the nursery adjoining her chamber, watching and inciting the two babies to a game of romps. She held one on each knee, the nurses standing by in amused gratification.

"That 's surely my little man's voice!" said Philip, as he and Lewis came up the stairs.

"Let me see!"—and Mr. Hammond peeped into the play-room. "Walk in!" he continued, throwing the door wide open. "Isn't there a pair of them?"

"And a nurse worthy of the twain!" replied Philip. He stooped to the invitation of the lifted arms, fluttering, as if the owner would fly to his embrace. "What do you say of him, aunty? Is he not a passable boy?"

"More than passable! he is a noble-looking fellow. He resembles you, I think," said Sarah, quietly.

"Do you hear that, Hammond? Your wife pronounces me 'more than passable—a noble-looking fellow!' So much for an adroit hint. Is she given to flattery?"

"Not she!" returned Lewis, laughing. "She never said as much as that for my looks in all her life. I have one consolation, however; the less she says, the more she means!" He went into the dressing-room, and Philip, still holding the child, seated himself by Sarah.

"How odd, yet how familiar it seems, to be with you once more, my good sister! What a succession of mischances has made us virtual strangers for many months past! I had almost despaired of ever holding friendly converse with you again. I wonder if your recollections of our visit to Aunt Sarah are as vivid as mine. Do you remember that last sad, yet dear day on the Deal Beach?"

Baby Belle was standing in her mother's lap, her soft, warm arms about her neck; and around the frail, sinking human heart invisible arms, as warm and close, were upholding and strengthening it in the moment of mortal weakness.

"Very distinctly. Many changes have come to us both since then."

"To me very many! I have grown older in heart than in years." Then, evidently fearing that she might otherwise interpret his meaning, he subjoined: "We have had a heavy bereavement in our household, you know. Your changes have all been happy ones. The enthusiastic, restless girl has ripened into the more sedate, yet more blessed wife and mother."

Press your sweet mouth to the convulsed lips, Baby Belle! veil with your silky curls the tell-tale features, whose agitation would bewilder if not betray! Philip was stroking the head of his boy, and did not see the uneasiness of his companion.

"Have you heard of Uncle Nathan's death?" she asked, clearing her throat.

He looked surprised at the inquiry. "Yes! Aunt Sarah wrote immediately to my father."

"Ah! I had forgotten that they were brothers. My memory is treacherous. Excuse me! I am wanted in the dining-room!"

Lewis met her just outside the door, and stopped her to bestow the evening kiss he had not cared to offer in Philip's presence.

"Why, you are as rosy as a peony!" he said, jestingly. "Has Benson been paying you compliments, in return for yours to him? I must look after you two, if you carry on at this rate."

With a look he had reason subsequently to recall, but which only pleased him at the time, she raised his hand to her lips—a look of humility, gratitude, and appeal, such as one might cast upon a slighted benefactor—and vanished.

A merry family party gathered around the Hammond's generous table, that afternoon. All the Hunts were there—from the father down to Jeannie, who was fast shooting up into a tall girl, somewhat pert in manner, but lovable despite this, at times, unpleasant foible.

"Sister Lucy," she said, after an interval of silence, "Ellen West said, at school, to-day, that you were a great belle when you were a young lady; were you?"

"You must not ask me, Jeannie!" The old smile of conscious beauty stole into Lucy's cheeks.

"Was she, sister?" Jeannie referred the case to Sarah.

"Yes, my dear, she was very beautiful," replied the latter, simply.

"She isn't now—not so very handsome, I mean—no handsomer than you are, sister!"

"Jeannie! you forget yourself!" interposed Mrs. Hunt.

"Why, mamma, I did not intend to be rude!

Only I thought that belles were always the prettiest ladies that could be found anywhere."

"By no means!" corrected Lewis, willing to help his wife's pet out of a scrape. "There are many descriptions of belles, Jeannie: handsome, rich, fast, and intellectual.

"And as papa was not rich, I suppose you were either fast or intellectual, sister Lucy!" persisted the child.

"I thought her pretty fast when I tried to catch her," said Philip. "Mrs. Hunt, Mrs. Hammond, Mrs. Benson, have you ladies decided in the course of to-day's congress what watering-place is to be made the fashion by our clique next month?"

Mrs. Hunt replied that they inclined to Newport; principally on account of Lucy and the children, who would all be benefited by the bathing.

Lucy was sure that she should tire of Saratoga or the Catskills in a week, whereas she adored the ocean.

"What says Madame Discretion?" said Lewis, merrily, to his wife.

"Except that it would break up the family party, I had rather stay at home as long as it is prudent to keep the baby in town; then, if you could go with us, spend a month at some mountain farm-house or sea-side cottage," she answered.

"Hear! hear!" commanded Philip. "Behold a modern wedded dame who prefers seclusion with her liege lord to gayety without him! The age of miracles is returning!"

"Is the case, then, so anomalous?" retorted Sarah, the red spot in her cheek alone testifying to her embarrassment. "Are your Southern matrons all public characters?"

"I can answer that!" said Lucy. "They are slaves! housekeeping machines—nothing better!"

"How many more weak places are there in this crust of family chit-chat, I should like to be informed!" thought the annoyed and uninitiated Hammond. "Here goes for the spot where there is no danger of anybody's breaking in!" He spoke aloud. "A tempting proposal was made to me this morning. It is considered advisable for one of our firm to go abroad for a couple of months, perhaps longer, to divide his time among the principal manufacturing districts of England, Scotland, and France. Expenses paid by the firm, and the term of absence indefinitely prolonged, if the traveller wishes it. Mr. Marlow is tired of crossing the ocean, and presses me to accept the mission."

"What did you tell him?"

It was Sarah who spoke in a startled voice that drew general notice to her alarmed face. Her concern was a delicious tribute to her husband's self-love, if he possessed such a quality. At least he loved her well enough to be pleased at her manifest reluctance to have him leave her.

"I told him that I must ask my wife," said he, in a meek tone, belied by the humorous twinkle in his eye, and a loving half smile about his mouth. "See what it is to be one under authority, Benson! A man dare not conclude an ordinary business transaction without the approval of the powers that be."

When Sarah accompanied her sister to her chamber that night, the passée belle put a direct question.

"Tell me, Sarah, are you as much in love with Mr. Hammond as you seem to be, or is it all put on for the benefit of outsiders?"

"I am not apt to do anything for the sake of mere show; nor do I care for the opinion of 'outsiders,' as you call them," rejoined Sarah, amazed at the cool audacity of the inquiry, and disposed to resent Lucy's confident expectation that she would avow the cheat, if such there were, in her deportment.

"You used to be shockingly independent, I know. What a ridiculously honest little puss you were! How you despised all our pretty arts and necessary affectations! How you hated our economical mother's second-best furniture and dinners! I don't believe Victoria West has ever forgiven you for the way in which you used to take to pieces what you styled our 'surface talk and surface life!' I thought, however, that you had discovered by this time, that one cannot live in the world without deceiving herself or other people; I prefer making fools to being one. Heigh-ho! this life is a very unsatisfactory business at the best. What a heavenly collar that is of yours! One thing I do wish, and that is—that my husband were half as fond of me, or as good to me, as Lewis is to you!"

(To be continued.)

BEAUTY.—After all, the truest beauty is not that which suddenly dazzles and fascinates, but that which steals upon us insensibly. Let us each call up to memory the faces that have been most pleasant to us—those that we have loved best to look upon, that now rise most vividly before us in solitude, and oftenest haunt our slumbers—and we shall usually find them not the most perfect in form, but the sweetest in expression.

WIDOWS: PART IV.

POOR WIDOWS.

"God bless all our gains," say we;
But "may God bless all our losses"
Better suits with our degree.

MRS. BROWNING.

WE knew a young lady once, who was wont devoutly to exclaim, "I am thankful for two things: that I am not black, and that I am not a man!" Though all of the fair sisterhood may not fully sympathize with this grateful damsel, there was some root of reason in her whimsical thanksgiving. In this world of trial, a woman may be glad that she is of the gentler sex for one reason, at least, without offence to the lords of creation. A man can't wear a bonnet and veil—a real bonnet, we mean, one that shelters the face, not frames it with a border of lace and roses, or rises above it in true Gothic style. And, as for a veil, be he bridegroom or widower, lover or mourner, at church or in the street, in the graveyard or on change, no matter where a man is, no matter what he is feeling, no friendly drapery may shield him from critical observers. Everybody knows whether he cried or did not cry in the midst of that touching sermon, the Sunday after his wife died. The very children who met him on his return from the funeral, can tell whether his eyes were red, or how cheerful an expression lurked round the corners of his mouth.

Of all the inventions of a refined civilization, perhaps there is not one more appropriate and welcome than the widow's veil. Many a stricken woman could not be persuaded to go beyond the threshold of her desolated home but for this welcome screen, which gives her the sacred seclusion she craves, while she moves once more among the busy, indifferent crowd. How she clings to it! How she hesitates to lay it aside, even when her kindly friends remind that her allotted years of such weeds of mourning are over.

It has been said that in this country there is no style of dress which is peculiar to any state or condition of life. Bridget and the American Miss Vere de Vere, on a gala day, are attired much after the same fashion, though connoisseurs in matters of the toilet can distinguish the ermine and diamonds of the one from the rabbit-skin and glass of the other. The general effect, however, is much the same to the uninitiated.

In the midst of the universal aping and caricaturing of the ways and wearing apparel of the "upper ten," it is a little singular that the widow's veil is so seldom worn in the humbler spheres of life. Where you see such a veil, you expect to find somewhat of refinement, something that marks an elevation above the masses who toil with hard hands for daily bread. Woolly, soft, and of a "rusty black" may be the limp folds of that drooping, well-worn veil, and yet it has about it a savor of gentility, a smack of "better days." Too often it marks that most irresistible of petitioners who prevailed over even the "unjust judge," the Poor Widow, pinched and straitened, and forced to push onward, when she would far rather sit down by the wayside and die.

It is of these sad, veiled mourners, nursed in prosperity and guarded by love, then turned out on the cold world to stand and struggle alone, that we to-day are thinking. There may come a time when the bare, broad, but tear-washed faces of the lowly sharers of the same sorrow will claim our attention. For the present, we leave them and their John Rogers' share of olive branches quite out of mind.

This is a pitifully matter-of-fact world. The lover must have other food than his own sweet thoughts, or he will die; the poet has his poor physical wants to call him back from dream-land, and even the sentimental young lady, herself, cannot live wholly upon moonlight. Meals are cooked and eaten in the house of mourning. The heart-broken widow must stand up to have her black clothing fitted, and dry her tears to look over puzzling business papers, cheek by jowl with a phlegmatic lawyer.

Hardly has the tomb closed over the master of the house when its sorrowing mistress must decide upon her future course, and know what provision has been made for her wants. At the very time when she shrinks from the common companionships of life, she often must face strangers, and pass through interviews at once wounding to her delicacy and painful to her pride. She has so lately been a petted "Picciola," she cannot yet believe herself a mere weed 'twixt the paving-stones of the great thoroughfare of life. She is still precious in her own eyes, as having been "dear to some one else," and her every slight and mortification seems to her a disrespect to him who is gone. The path of privation and loneliness she sees opening before her, wins an added gloom, because he would have so grieved to have her tread this weary way. Yet tread it she must; common-place people talked of it as a certain thing, the very day of the funeral, and wondered "what she would do for a living."

She may shut her eyes for a while, and, like Micawber, hope "something will turn up" that will sow golden dust, rather than iron to work with, and iron to be pined with along her future way. She may shut her eyes, but she will open them in a time of dreary discomfort, a time of wanting to economize without knowing the way, of trying to make her little supernaturally last, until she finds out too surely that the days of miracles are over, and her "barrel of meal" is empty, and her "widow's cruse of oil" drained to the last drop. What shall she do now? She might better have asked herself the question at first, for it was sure to come, and with double pungency for the delay.

If a man's house be his castle, a woman's seems to her a refuge even more sure. Under her own roof she is still protected. Surrounded by the furniture her mother gave her, treading the very carpets where her feet have stepped so joyously, she is not yet fairly turned out upon the cold highway of life. Thus sheltered, thus surrounded by familiar objects, she can yet thrust her frail arm as a bolt, and keep out the gaunt, threatening face of poverty at the door. She will not go forth to struggle with the world; she will let a little of it in to her, and make the intruders pay in hard coin for robbing her of her privacy.

In plain English, the Poor Widow resolves to take boarders. At the table where she has enjoyed those cheerful meals with her husband and children, strangers shall gather—the newly-married couple living on love and a salary, the smart clerk, the odd, snuffy old bachelor, and that "queer woman," who always goes to the new boarding-house, and never stays long at any.

She begins with her old notions of hospitality. She must make her "inmates," as she calls them, comfortable. Their tastes and wishes are consulted. With a sensitive anxiety she watches for their approval. Perhaps some low-minded dolt sniffs and complains of his fare to her very face, or significant whispers from the other end of the table reach her ears and make them tingle. She redoubles her efforts, she buys every expensive delicacy, her house is a model of neatness.

On some unlucky morning she discovers that she is not "making ends meet." This boarding-house, this disagreeable resource that was to be a kind of condensed California, turns out a losing investment. The horrors of debt are clustering around her. What studying of the account-books now begins! What adding up on scraps of paper! What forlorn attempts at retrenchment! What struggles between a naturally liberal spirit and a sense of what is due to herself and her children!

Go keep a boarding-house, ye who are hard upon the widows who are reckoned "managing, close-fisted women!" It is no easy thing, after living in comfort, without pecuniary care, to reckon every day how much must be allowed for the "butcher and the baker," and that endless train, even down to the "candlestick-maker."

My widowed friend, if you open a boarding-house, don't expect to make money. You may earn the privilege of living with your children under your own roof; but if you lay up anything, it will be more likely to be bad debts from your boarders, and too good debts to your creditors, rather than bank-stock or rouleaux of gold.

The Poor Widow, what can she do? Do something she must. We have seen her try the boarding-house; is there no other field of labor open to her?

The Poor Widow may teach if she has the education, she may write if anybody will publish for her, she may keep a store if she can borrow the capital, she may paint or engrave if she has the requisite talent and skill, she may act as a clerk if she can command a neat pen, as a saleswoman if she has a strong back and can make change, she may sew, she may even wash; and tenderly nurtured women have done all, even the last of these, rather than cringe in miserable dependence.

Mem. We do not call it dependence when strong family affection knits in its close bonds the giver and the recipient. Under such circumstances, it is meet that they who are of one blood should share one common purse, no matter in whose pocket it may chance to be found.

The Poor Widow need neither beg nor starve, if she have health, energy, and industry. Somewhere and somehow she can earn daily bread for herself and her little ones. Yet even to the most cheerful and industrious spirit, however prospered in a struggle for a livelihood, there will come dark days, days when she does not want to work, she wants to be guarded, and sheltered, and cared for. She craves the woman's true place, with the strong arm to lean upon, and the strong head or hand to labor for her. She must have her real discouragements and her disappointments, her times of sickness and weariness of body and mind, of loathing for the jostling and scrambling of this work-a-day world. It is not the happiest lot for a woman to be earning her own living, no matter how the stony path may seem to be strewn with roses.

Thanks be unto God, there is a blessed drop which can sweeten the bitter cup—the Poor Widow must daily drink! There is a sunshine which can gild all her toil! Her means of support may be made means of usefulness; her field of labor a missionary field. She may be working for and with her Heavenly Master. She may be spreading abroad the sweet spirit of love and cheerfulness, and by the “word fitly spoken,” or the surer voice of example, lead the strangers with whom she is thrown Home to her Father’s House! Whether she teaches or keep boarders, writes or stands behind the counter, washes or sews, she is in an honorable vocation, she is one of the Lord’s workers, and for her there is laid up a good reward, an everlasting crown.

We have hitherto spoken only of those widows to whom poverty and affliction have come like twin sisters, hand-in-hand. There is, however, a large class who pass by slow stages from comparative comfort down to the uneasy couch of her who has debts to pay and bread to buy, without the wherewithal to change an eagle. How is it that so many widows, who have at first a modest competency, must in the end see their homes sold, their children scattered, and their little all vanished to the winds?

Bad management! Extravagance! Thriftlessness! Shiftlessness! So say the wise ones, and they say too truly. But where shall we lay the blame? Is it the fault of the sorrow-stricken woman who, utterly ignorant of business, finds herself suddenly without the adviser, who has been to her as the head, while she willingly has acted as the humble hand? Shall we reproach her because her expenses have exceeded her income, until that income has slowly dwindled in spite of her desperate efforts at retrenchment and economy? Shall we not rather carry home the reproof where it is due, and ring it in the ears of the unwise parents who trained her?

Let us go back to her childhood to find that half-learned multiplication table, that slipshod dawdling over the good old four rules of arithmetic! Was she taught to keep accounts in her girlhood? Did she early learn the value and right use of money? O no! She might buy ad libitum at “the store,” having everything charged; but never for a single year did she keep any memorandum, or make any estimate of her own expenses. Money was a thing with which she had little to do. Papa and mamma provided her with everything, without allowing her even enough gold and silver to chink in her purse, and teach her the joy of self-denial for the pleasure of giving. She neither learned economy nor liberality! She was sent forth as a wife, with about as little an idea of the practical affairs of business life as of the intricacies of the Sanscrit! What wonder that she has frittered away the rightful inheritance of her children, and must look forward to an old age of perhaps bitter want, and surely of bitter self-reproach!

Let us deal gently with her, but win from her a valuable lesson for the training of our own daughters. While we cry “God grant that the woes of widowhood may never fall on them!” let us see to it that they are so educated that they may be prepared for any emergency, and equal to any trust.

The truly feminine character develops most perfectly by the hearthstone, ’neath the fostering shelter of the home. It is like the wild wood-flower, which is sweetest in its native shades, and is known only to strangers when they seek it in its own mossy retreat, where it peeps up at the blue sky ’twixt the twining branches of its leafy screen.

Every true woman dreads the influence of the unnatural exposure to collision with the rough world, which is the lot of the Poor Widow. Sadly she sometimes looks forward and draws a gloomy picture of what years in the turmoil of life may make her. “I shall become accustomed after awhile,” she says, “to what is now so painful to me. My sensibilities will become blunted, as I go steadily on struggling for my children, and every year will take from me some delicate characteristic of womanhood. I shall grow cold, and hard, and worldly, and unlovely. Men will laugh at me, and call me masculine; and my own sex will grow shy of me, and stand off from me as some peculiar thing. I shall pass through the harsh, hardening process, and a thick, unpleasant crust will form over all that was ever tender in my nature.”

“Yet, even then,” something whispers, “there will be one fount within you unchilled. Your mother’s heart will be warm and true. There will be one circle where you will be rightly prized. The sons whom you have struggled to educate will know how to honor you. The daughters you have screened from the cares that have harassed you will be ready to smooth lovingly your gray hairs, and sweeten your few remaining years by their devoted affection.”

Yes! hear these words of comfort, toiling widow! Fear not to put on the harness! "For God and my children!" is your watchword! You must come off conqueror! That gaunt, unlovely phantom of your imagination need never scowl on you from your looking-glass. You need not grow hard, and stern, and worn with anxious care. You need not contend and jostle, and give and take unkindly blows in the battle of life. Cheerful industry alone is required of you. Leave all else to your heavenly champion. Your cause is His! "A Father to the fatherless, and a Judge of the widow is God in his holy habitation!" The Lord of Hosts is King in all the earth!

The Christian widow has a sure portion!

The wrath and unfaithfulness of man cannot hurt her. An Almighty deliverer is pledged for her rescue. The birds of the air, the beasts of the forest, have for her their message of comfort. The hoar frost and the timely dews are her pledges. He who so careth for plant and soulless creature "will much more care for her!"

Fire may destroy, banks may fail, floods may desolate, ships may sink, and universal ruin overwhelm the world of trade, yet the Christian widow need not fear. Her bread is sure! Her labor shall prosper, and her children shall call her blessed! The Eternal God is her refuge, and underneath are his everlasting arms!

LETTERS FROM AUNT BETSY BROOMCORN.

LETTER VI.

DEAR MR. GODEY: The way I happened to go back to Pendle Holler visitin' was this. Archie was agoin' away to Spindleville beyond the Holler, with an empty wagin, and Susan reckoned I wouldn't git a better chance right away, and so I'd best go with Archy, and run my risk of gettin' home agin. Well, I fixed up my best frocks and had my bunnit trimmed over with pink ribbin, and artificials, and a bran new shawl that Archy give me to wear Sundays and a parasaul, the very first I ever had in my hull life; and I can tell you I felt as if I was wonderful fine. It was about the last of June, when the strawberries was beginnin' to git ripe, and looked so nice a growin' in the grass along the road. You know, then, they always look bigger and better than they really are, when you jest git a glimpse so, and then the young winter greens grew with them too. It was real tantalizin' to see 'em. The laurels, and wild roses, and ever so many more posies was as thick as they could be, too. When we come out of the woods, the men was hoin' in the cornfields, and the bright sheets of tin whirlin' round and round for scarecrows, and the old straw and rag men stuck up to watch the corn, made quite a pieter. Every bit as handsome as some of Miss Goldbalse's "conty diners," as she calls 'em, in her big furrin pieter. Brewster says "Fudge" to it, jest as he always does, but then he orter know. He says, "what's the difference between sheep's gray rags, and ragged sheep skins," and that's all I can git him to say.

When we got to the Holler, I declare I felt glad, it looked so nateral and home-like. The very geese and goslings along the side of the road seemed like old friends, and there was Square Kinyon comin' in from the barn, and, would you believe it, his close was all feathers agin, jest as they was the first time I see him. Elder Jones nodded to me as I went by, and Miss Pendle come clear out to the gate to meet me, and tried to coax Archy to stop, too, but couldn't.

When Miss Pendle got me sot down in a chair at the table takin' a "bite of somethin'," as she called it, and it was a considerable of different things, baked beans, cold veal, bread, pie, and cake enough for four or five, she begun to tell me how glad she was I'd come. Says she, "Betsy, it's drefle lucky you've come jist now. Everybody is all took up with the great celebration we're goin' to have here Fourth of July. Now I say you shall be one of the gals to wear a white frock and carry a flag and call yourself one of the States. Lemme see, there's nobody stan's for Michygan yit. Guess you'll have to be Michygan. I'll help ye git reddey. There's goin' to be a great time, I'spect; firing guns in the mornin' (Old Seth Wormley's lent 'em an anvil), and marchin' in procession with flags aflyin', all the gals in white, with green sprigs on their frocks, singin', and readin', and a great oration by Major Todd, and then a reg'lar dinner in the bushes back of the buryin' ground. I hope to massey it won't rain. Now, ain't you glad you come jest as you did?" I said I was, for I never 'd been to a big celebration in my life. "Wall, now," says she, "you'll be jest suited. I'm goin' to keep ye here till it comes off. The deacon is jest as tickled as a boy with the notion, and he's been and helped 'em make the tables and seats, and he's goin' to kill a couple of pigs, and ever so many chickens, and Darkis Blinn is comin' to help me cook two hull days beforehand. Now you and I will run over to the elders and find out about it this evenin' and settle what you're to wear, and I reckon Nat Stowers'll want to fetch you the princess pine to trim your frock with. I'll let him know you're here." So she run on every minit she got about the celebration. Then the deacon come home with his saw, and augers, and chisels on his arms, and hove 'em down by the door. He fairly hopped when Miss Pendle told him I'd come. He run right in and shook hands, and said he reckoned I'd be over when I come to hear about their celebration. "The more the merrier," says he; "there's room for ever so many more jestlike you. Besides, I want somebody to try to write us some verses to sing. If only we had Tilda Button here now, she'd slap us off a dozen on a sheet of wrappin' paper or birch bark, or anything handy, jest as soon as you asked her about it. Now why can't you git up somethin' of that sort, hey?" "Oh," says I, "couldn't do it, any way. I don't know how." "Shaw," says he, "you don't want to know how. I've hearn say you couldn't learn a body to make rhymes, but it comes nateral. So you don't want to know how. Come now, I put you down for a dozen or two of verses.

Somethin' like 'Hail Columby,' only ruther different meter. Say 'Hail Columby, land of glory, where the oppressed shall go free.' Why, hello, I've 'most made a varse myself. Now, if I could only jest git the mate to it. Don't rattle your dishes round so, Miss Pendle—'land o' glory—glory—glory.' Then it comes in agin. 'Hail ye heroes'—then! I've got it—'Hail ye heroes famed in story.' What's next, 'free, shall go free—tea—sea—bottee—libertee. Who fought and bled for libertee.' There, I told you so. You don't want to learn verse makin'. Jest listen:—

'Hail Columby, land of glory,
Where the oppressed shall go free;
Hail ye heroes famed in story,
Who fought and bled for libertee.'

And Deacon Pendle tipped back in his chair, and laughed right out. "La," says Miss Pendle, "you needn't laugh, deacon. I can remember when you use to talk a good deal of poetry, whether you made it, or read it, I don't know." "Did I?" says the deacon, laughin' louder than ever; "that was shortly before you was married, I reckon, Miss Pendle." "Sho, you go along," says Miss Pendle, a slappin' the deacon's straw hat onto his head, and clean down over his eyes, and flutterin' out doors with her tablecloth, leavin' the deacon to make his verses in the shadder of his hat-band.

Well, we went over to Elder Jones's, and Miss Jones bein' one of the committee, agreed to send Liddy Stowers down to Deacon Pendle's next day to help a little about my frock. We 'd got to have our sleeves short and all alike, and there wa'n't but five days more, besides Sunday, before the Fourth come round, and there was the bower house to make over the platform where the Major would stan', and all the rest of the cookin' and fixin' that was to be done. Miss Jones wanted to know if I 'd seen Miss Kinyon yet; "because," says she, "if you don't ask her what you 'd better do, she 'll up and tell you before everybody that your frock ain't right, or your hair, or you wa'n't asked to be one of the States. It's wonderful," says she, "how we contrived to get along before Miss Kinyon come here to live. She's a real bustlin', schemy, drivin' woman jest like her mother, and I shouldn't wonder if she thought we couldn't git up anything without her; but we 'll manage this affair without her, any way."

Well, for a couple of days we was busy enough; then come Sunday, and then Monday we all got together to fix up the bower house and the platform. There was all the young folks in Pendle Holler, and the boys brought a hull wagon-load of cedar, and hemlock, and spruce trees, with ever so much rope and scantlin's. I never see a merrier lot, and we made as fine a Temple of Liberty as ever was built. The pillars was scantlin's, all wound 'round with cedars, and the ruff was cedars, too, laid on flat. We had a pattern that Mr. Jones made with a pencil on a piece of paper; and there was an eagle made of green sprigs, tacked on a board covered with white paper up in the front, over the heads of the folks that was to sit inside. The ropes was braided with green bushes, and hung from one tree to another, all 'round the edges of the place where the seats was laid, and when we got done, you never see anything look hansomer than it did, with the sunshine comin' through chinks in the leaves overhead, and ripplin' over the moss and bushes growin' on the ground. Nat Stowers went home with me and Liddy, and we showed him about what things we wanted him to bring from the piney woods on the hills for us to trim our frocks with. He promised to bring us a bushel-basketful next day early. "Oh," says he, "Cousin Liddy, I wish to massy the gals was big enuff to wear green things on their frocks along with the rest of you. It would be such a grand thing to think about arterwards. Why, I bet there 'll be a hundred folks a lookin' at you all at once. What 'll you dew, gals, ef you should want to laugh? 'Twon't dew to laugh. You must jest put on your face along with your frock, 'n' wear it as ef 'twas a part of your dress-up. Lemme see, Michygan orter look sum like an Injin. 'Sposin' you jest brown your face a little, schoolma'am, 'n' stick a few hawks' fethers in yer hair, 'n' wear moggasins. Then Liddy's goin' to be Varmout. She orter wear a pine bush in her hair; that 's the way Ethan Allen's boys use to dew." "We 're all a-goin' to wear green 'reaths on our heads, Nat," says Liddy. "Oh, be you?" says he; "that 's good. I guess you 'll look as grand as kings 'n' queens. Wish to massy Forth of July come faster 'n' lasted longer 'n it does. Wall, I 'll run hum. Father's got to go down with the committee to meet Major Todd, 'n' 'scort him up to Square Kinyon's, where I 'speat they 'll keep him on cookies 'n' plum sass, 'n' make him sleep on a stack of feather beds as big as a haystack. Wish to massy I was Major Todd."

So Nat went off; but next day, sure enuff, he come with the princess pines, ground pines, and patridge vines in a big corn basket. Darkis Blinn come, too, to help Miss Pendle do her cookin', and they was runnin' out and in every few minits with somethin' for us to look at or taste, and a-jokin' and laughin' as ef they was only little girls. How well I remember that day! and how nice Liddy and I fixed up our frocks, with two rows of fresh ground pine basted on to the skirt like flounces, and the little bright green partridge vines on the waist and sleeves, and a wreath of 'em for our heads. When they was all done and laid out on the bed, Deacon Pendle come in to look at 'em. "Liddy," says he, after he 'd looked 'em all over, "I shouldn't wonder ef Miss Broomcorn was to catch a beau with this here mess of bushes on her frock, makin' her look so much like an angel, should you now, Liddy?" "Deacon Pendle," says I, "have you got your verses done, so 's we can jest sing 'em over before Liddy goes hum? Come, now, what comes after 'Hail Columby, land of glory?'" "Sho!" says he; and, catchin' up his hat, he trotted out doors, leavin' us to laugh at him as much as we liked.

Wall, after a deal of tronble, and worry, and frettin', we got about ready the night, before the Fourth. Major Todd had come in Square Kinyon's shay, with a half a dozen others trailin' through the dust behind them; but they all went off hum and left the Major to eat the cookies and plum sass Nat had promised us he 'd get, and everybody in the Holler was at home, and as still as bees in a hive jest afore swarmin' time.

We was waked up next mornin' before daylight by an awful bang. I heard the Deacon holler from down stairs, "Hooror! there goes the guns!" Sure enough, there they did go. I should think there was fifty muskits, rifles, pistols, and popguns, all a-tryin' to get off at once, but scamperin' along like a flock of sheep, big and little. The hills 'round follered 'em up with a roarin' like distant thunder. Somebody begun to ring the meetin'-house bell, and five or six drums and as many more fifes come a-thumpin' and squeelin' down the road from the Kimble Settlement, and another lot, with Gran'ther Humble's old bugle along, from the other road, and every now and then they touched off Seth Wormley's old anvil, and that fairly made the hills beller. Every time they loaded up their guns they 'd let 'em off agin in the greatest hurry, till it seemed as if we might be havin' Bunker Hill over agin. There wasn't any let up to the noise; so I got up, and dressed me, and opened the winder. The sky in the east was all pink and yellow like the inside of a great shell. Only a few stars showed themselves like bright specks in the sky, and the moon, faint and white, was jest a dippin' down behind the edge of Maple Hill. The shadders of the woods looked a dark blue, and over the grove, where the men was firin' their guns, a thin waverin' cloud of white smoke kept rollin' up like fog from a pond. There was somethin' wild and stirrin' to the blood in the noise of the guns rattlin' off so fast, and the rollin' of the drums, and the screamin' of the fifes, and the bugle that sounded so mournful it seemed to be lamentin'. Why shouldn't it? It was blowed at Yorktown, Valley Forge, and 'most everywhere General Lee had a fight; and maybe there was some echo of the old life that it used to see a-stirrin' in its noise yet. Then the meetin'-house bell was ringin' as fiercely as if there was danger at hand, and it was callin' the people together for their defence. It was ruther pleasant to hear all this now; but I couldn't help a-thinkin' of the time mother used to tell us about, when she see her brothers with guns upon their shoulders go out of their father's door in the glory of a summer mornin', and start for the army, with the boom of the enemy's cannon a-soundin' in their ears. The boy of sixteen would leap forrard like an eager hound, and his brothers break into a run at every one of those holler sounds that roared and thundered among the hills, and shook the glass in the winder where she stood, and looked after 'em till they was quite out of sight. They was goin' to fling their separate lives into the balance that was a-waitin', tremblin' up and down either side, to be turned at last and forever by the noble souls that threw their strong arms and brave hearts into it, just as them boys did on that summer mornin'. Well, that time was gone, and we had a right to be glad, to ring bells, and blow horns, and "act like simpletons if we wanted to," as Deacon Pendle said when I went down stairs. Says he: "I allers feel jest so, Betsy, and I wish I had a passle of boys to help me do it." "Never mind, Deacon," says I, "you 'll have boys and girls enough to help you to-day, certain." "'Spect I shall! 'spect I shall. Come, Miss Pendle, less fly round and get things out of 'he way before nine o'clock. Them airy chaps has gone hum for breakfast, and so we 'll have ours."

The folks was all goin' to the meetin'-house first, and from there to the grove. Liddy and Keziar Stowers come over to Deacon Pendle's early in a one horse shay, with Nat to drive, and brought their fixin's in a big bandbox, and we helped one another dress. Pretty soon the wagons begun to come rumblin' along toward the meetin'-house, loaded with folks all in their best close, and as merry as a passle of boys. When we got ready, we went down stairs, and Nat looked ~~at us~~ for ever so long without sayin' a word. At last he took off his hat, and laid it down on the floor. Says he: "Gals, you're most as pooty as a general muster." Liddy said she thought we ought to look better than a-trainin; but Nat didn't, though he reckoned we looked as grand as any queen would without her crown on. Without that he 'spected they wasn't anything uncommon.

After Miss Pendle and Darkis got their vittles sent off up to the grove, we went all together over to the meetin'-house. That was the first time I'd seen Miss Kinyon since I come to the Holler, and she was flyin' 'round among the girls, with a little flag in her hand with "Massachusetts" on it in big letters. She was tryin' to scold 'em into doin' something she would have done any way, and the way she switched and switched her flag was jest as if she'd like to have it a good stout stick and be able to use it. She come right up to us, and says she: "I want you to change flags with me, Keziar." "What for?" says Keziah. "Well, jest for fun: you know it don't make no difference." "Well, I don't care," says Keziah. So she give Miss Kinyon her flag that had "Connecticut" on it, and took the "Massachusetts" flag. Puddy soon we found out that there 'd been a quarrel about their places in the percession. Miss Kinyon would have it accordin' to the alfybet; so she'd got C, and that would take the lead of M. It was a good while before we was ready to start; but after Major Todd, and Elder Jones, and Square Kinyon, and the committee was ready, the signal was given for startin', and off we sailed. Major Todd and Elder Jones, Square Kinyon and Square Damerill, the committee, representatives, girls in white, representatives, boys pretty much in black, follered by the rest, permiscuous. Of course we couldn't see ourselves; but we felt as if we made a show worth lookin' at. The bell was rung, and guns fired, and the twelve little drums, and the four great ones, and the twenty fifes, and the bugle, that I forgot to say walked ahead of us all, made such a noise, that if every woman there had screamed as loud as ever they could, I don't believe anybody would have heard them at all. Well, we went up the road and across Square Kinyon's medder, where they 'd mowed a wide path through the clover for us to march in, and around the buryin'- ground into the grove. Then Major Todd and the rest of them went up into the Temple of Liberty, and sot down; the representatives on the front seats, and so on. There was a terrible crowd of folks, and all the seats was full, and ever so many sot on the ground, and the boys climbed trees. There was as much noise as ever till Square Kinyon got up and come forward with a strip of white paper in his hand. He was dressed up with a bran new blue coat, with bright buttons, a yeller vest, and drab trowsers, and every hair on his head pasted down into its place, except the ends that was rolled up like drake's tails. He looked round a minit, spread out the paper, made a bobbin' bow, haumed, and said he would read the "Programmy of the Order of Proceedin's of the patrotic cityzens of Pendletown in celebratin' the glorious Fourth of July." First:—

Readin' the Programmy, by Timothy Kinyon, Esquire.

Singin' by the chore.

Prayer by the Reverend Guy Jones.

Singin' by the chore.

Readin' the Declaration of Indypendence, by Timothy Kinyon, Esquire.

Singin' by the chore.

Oration by Major Pelletiar Todd.

Singin' by the chore.

Firin' a salute, and marchin' in percession to the table, where dinner will be sarved up free gratis to all such as partake of the hospitality of Pendle Holler.

With another bobbin' bow, the Square went and sot down; and Elihu Blinn, and the two Wormleys, the Stowers girls, Dr. Stirrup, and four or five young folks from the Kemble Settlement that made up Square Kinyon's "chore," sung "Hail Columby." Elder Jones made a prayer suitable, I 'spose; for I remember it was full of batels, and victories, and triumphs, and glories, and all such words. Then we had a little more singin' by the chore, durin' which there was a good many folks come, and the boys took advantage of the noise to get a little higher up, and farther out on the trees. Then Square Kinyon spread his wings like the American eagle, a-readin' the Declaration of Independence. He wasn't the best hand at readin' ever was, and we was all glad when he come to "our lives, our fortins, and our sackerd honors."

All this time Major Todd had set in a chair with his hands over his head, and his long legs stretched out before him, in the awkwardest shape he could git into, a settin' on the small of his back, his head poked forward, and his sholders hunched up, till you couldn't tell whether he was awake enough to know what was goin' on only for his eyes that looked mighty observin'.

Right in the middle of the singin', pop come a little bundle of beech leaves right into my face. I brushed 'em out of my lap, but in a minit more down come another. I couldn't help lookin' up toward the boys in the trees. There was Nat Stower's lyin' out his hull length on a big lim jest to throw things at me, but the minit I caught his eye he straitened up and begun to motion to me to look over toward the other side of the grove, but I couldn't see anything for the crowd of heads there. Nat grew red in the face, and almost tumbled out of the tree a tryin' to motion somethin' to me. At last he took his jack knife out of his pocket and cut a button off his coat, and pitched it into my lap. I was further than ever from findin' out what he meant, but as the noise of the singin' was over and the oration jest agoin' to begin' I dassent look that way agin. Major Todd unlocked his hands, took 'em down, and drew up his feet, stood up on 'em, and smoothed out the kink in his back made by settin' on it, flung his hair up in a pile on top of his head and come forrad and bowed to the folks, kind of a long swingin' bow. He was tall, most too tall, for our Temple of Liberty, but his head didn't quite touch the ruff, which was a great escape.

I've hearn Brewstir tell about the reporter that Gabriel let into Heaven unknown to Peter, and accordin' to what Brewstir says a reporter would have writ down that oration jest as fast as Major Todd talked it off, but I can't even remember any of it, only a comfortable kind of feelin' after it was over, a kind of a "thank goodness I was born a Yankee," and a shudderin' sense of what an awful thing it would be to be a furriner, and a confused notion of mountains, and cataracts, and mighty rivers, broad prayrees, brave men, beautiful women, and sorin' ideas, mixed up along with heroes, statesmen, Bunker Hill, admirin' worlds, children's children and generations to come. I took a sly peep at Nat right in the middle of it. He set in the notch of a big gnarly beech, with his eyes and mouth wide open, adrinkin' in every word as if it was gospel. I don't 'spose he thought of anybody, or anything else while it lasted.

When Major Todd wound up his speech with a great flourish about the generations to come, somebody mistook the time and teched off the anvil. Oh if you could have seen the folks jump, and heard the squalls right on the top of all that sublime talk, and a little of the swearin' that was whispered round among the men, but they got over it in a minit, and we had the last of the singin' done by the chore. I could hear them hammerin' away at the anvil, a loadin' up agin, so I was lookin' out for another bang, when Nat begun to throw leaves at me agin. I thought he must be goin' crazy, for he grinned and clapped his hands and swung his hat, and motioned to somebody over on the other side, and then back to me agin. Jest before they fired he slid down offer the tree, and dodged out of sight. Well, they fired agin, a regular thunder clap, but, as the folks was expectin' it, they didn't make so much fuss about it as they did before, but begun to bustle round for the procession to the table. Miss Kinyon scolded and figated, and wondered "what on earth Mr. Kinyon could be about that he didn't get things agoin'." She reckoned she could if she was only a man, and I don't believe she 'd objected to takin' the lead if they 'd only been likely to let her. Before she got over her fret they got started for the table, jest as we come up from the meetin' house to the grove, only we worked along through a lane of folks that was crowded up on every side. All at once, I heard loud laughin', and talkin', and see somebody shakin' hands with Bethuel Button, who was laughin' and almost cryin' as he talked. Everybody looked, and stared, and begun to whisper, but kept movin' along. Pretty soon I see Nat a little ahead of us lookin' out for Liddy and me, and oh, such a face as he had! It was all over smiles and blushes, and looked so glad something had happened. The next minit I knew it all. There was Tilda Button lookin' jest as nateral as ever standin' by the side of her husband, I suppose, a dark man with handsome dark brown hair, and a little strip of haid on his upper lip. She smiled and nodded to me with a comical look as if she enjoyed surprisin' us so much. I had a great mind to run right out of the line to git to her, but she seemed to know it, and motioned me back with her hand and a shake of her head. Her mother was there with her, lookin' as if she 'd been acryin' a little, but laughin' a good deal more. After that it was hard work to keep along with the rest. I 'd lost my interest in everything but Tilda's affairs, and every one was whisperin' about it, around me, till it seemed as if we might have come then to Tilda Button's weddin' dinner. But then in spite of all that, they contrived to git round the tables, and to eat as if their part of the proceedin's was mostly eatin'. I could see Tilda at an other table with her father and mother and husband, and I could hear Miss Kinyon talkin' about her too, and Miss Moody right behind me doin' the same. "It's a burn-in' shame," says Miss Moody, "for that impudent critter to come back with her beau to mortify her father and mother afore folks." "Jest like her," says Polly Mariar. "She never could behave respectable. I'll warrant now she sets herself up for a lady jest because she's been away from hum, but them that knows her won't git took in by her." Jest then Nat come up behind me, says he in a whisper, "guess what Tilda's name is." I shook my head, and he whispered again softly. "It's long and crooked; you can't guess it alone; so I'll tell you. It's Vandervere. There now, won't Polly Mariar feel edgeways?"—and Nat laughed and went among the folks, and was out of sight in a munit.

Major Todd made a little speech, and Elder Jones another, and Square Damerill tried it, but didn't make out much, because jest then the drums and fifes that had been still so long was in a fever to make a little noise, and havin' had a comfortable dinner of roast pig, briled chicken, pork and beans, puddin' and pies, didn't feel like bein' put down any longer; so they strained up the drums, wet the fifes, and went at it. It was plain to see that a great deal of noise had been accumulatin', and further delay in lettin' it off might be dangerous; so they was let alone, and we had Yankee Doodle on a brand new plan, with scatterin' shots to fetch out the parts nicely. Then the Kimble Settlement folks geared up to go hum, and the company begun to thin out till the Major and committee went off together, and then it was everybody for himself. I jest took Liddy by the hand, and we worked round to where we could see Bethuel Button's white coat, and found Tilda there a-shakin' hands with everybody that she used to know. She seemed mighty glad to see us, and introduced us to her husband, and promised to see us next day; but there was so many folks there that we was ashamed to stay any longer, and cum right off hum to Deacon Pendle. Nat come a-runnin' after us, and sot down on a bench in the bird-cage to tell us about Tilda's comin'. Says he: "I seen Bethuel and his wife a-comin' along the road, with their old gray hoss 'n' shay behind that I didn't know. Bethuel sot up crank 'n' held his whip straight over his shoulder. Says I, suthin' 's turned up. Bethuel use to be all lopped down 'n' shiffis-lookin, 'n' now he 's as chirk as Square Kinyon when Marm Moody's 'round. I thought of everything but jest Tilda; but you see I'd gin her up long ago. Well, sir, I wish I mayn't ever see anything I was gladder to see than Tild's face when she come along 'n' bent down 'n' peeked out at me. Says she: 'Why, Nat!' 'n' held out her hand, 'n' when I come up, says she, 'My husband, Mr. Vandervere,' 'n' turnin' round to him, said that I was the boy that seen the ghost, 'n' he laughed, 'n' wanted to shake hands with me, too. Oh, I tell ye I'm drest glad she 's come back, for everybody was sartin she was as good as dead. I'm glad on it, 'cause now Bethuel kin feel easy in his mind, 'n' his wife won't have to be twitted on it every time she sees Miss Moody. Don't you think now, gals, you'd a leetle ruther have sich a chap for a husband than one like Square Kinyon. Don't you now, hey?" Nat told us that Tilda come the night before to her father's, and not a single soul knew it till they went to the celebration. After awhile Nat went off and we begun to feel so tired, we was glad to take off our fixin's and go to bed. Seems to me nothin' is so like cold ashes as the fine close; and rubbish soiled, touselled, and wuthless that 's left after such a time as this. I couldn't bear to think of them afterwards.

The next day Tilda come over to Deacon Pendle's with her husband, and they told us all about their goin' off together. They had been livin' with Mr. Vandervere's gran'mother, but she was dead now, and they'd come back to the Holler as soon as they could. Tilda told me she had been readin' with her husband all winter and summer, and she hoped she should not ever be so proud of a little knowledge as she used to be. Her husband was a poor boy, brought up by his gran'mother, that was so queer that nobody could suit her. She give them jest money enough to keep 'em from starvin', and said it would do 'em good to work, and that was one of their arrants to the Holler, makin' picters of the trees, and hills, and brooks, and woods around it, to paint up into picters to see. It looked to me as if it was a poor business; but then they orter know better than I, of course.

I staid at the Holler a'most a week after that, and I see Miss Vandervere most every day. She use to tell me that when she went away she hadn't a thought of stayin' so long, and didn't once dream how much trouble it would be to her mother and father, and she didn't dare to write to 'em for ever so long, on account of offendin' the grandmother.

Miss Kinyon never asked 'em to her house, or me either. Folks said she managed the deacon first rate, and he wouldn't venter to do anything contrary to orders. She was a smart economikle housekeeper, and that was enough to excuse all the rest.

I wish I had time to tell you all Ma'am Jinks troubles with Gran'ther Jinks, and Reuben, and Dolly. Some of 'em was forever sick, and so her hairb dish was always a bilin', and they had such oncommon ailin's too; never heard of anything like it in the world before. I went to see the Stowerses, and begun to think Nat wouldn't want to burn the old house after all, it looked so bright and pleasant.

At last, when I'd been there three hull weeks, Susan begun to be lonesome, and Archy come over after me, and that ended my second visit to Pendle Holler. They 'lected Major Todd to Congress the very next fall; and Tilda and her husband have been in Rome, where Walter Smith went, for ever so many years. I s'pose you know where Rome is, so I needn't try to tell you. Painters go there to learn to grind out colors, or somethin' I don't exactly know what, but 'tain't particular any way, so Good-by. Yours obedient,

BETSY BROOMCORN.

EXPAND THE CHEST.—Those in easy circumstances, or those who pursue sedentary, indoor employment, use their lungs but little, breathe but little air into the chest, and thus, independent of position, contract a wretchedly small chest, and lay the foundation of the loss of health and beauty. All this can be perfectly obviated by a little attention to the manner of breathing. Recollect that the lungs are like a bladder in their construction, and can be stretched open to double their size with perfect safety, giving a noble chest, and perfect immunity from consumption. The agent, and the only agent we require, is the common air we breathe, supposing, however, that no obstacle exists, external to the chest, such as tying it round with stays, or having the shoulders lying upon it. On arising from your bed in the morning, place yourself in an erect position, the shoulder thrown off the chest; now inhale all the air you can, so that no more can be got in; now hold your breath and throw your arms off behind, holding your breath, as long as possible. Repeat these long breaths as much as you please. Done in a cold room is much better, because the air is much denser, and will act much more powerfully in expanding the chest. Exercising the chest in this manner will enlarge the capability and size of the lungs.

OUR BABE.

BY M. A. DENISON.

Upon her little bed she sleeps;
Pink-blossomed cheeks, and brow whose snow
Lies under clouded gold—her lips
Two buds with coral flush aglow.

Upon her little bed she sleeps;
Lithe limbs, so late to the music set
Of rippling laughter, lie with the white
Still grace of a marble statuette.

I never thought with steady will
Upon the mystery of a life,
The revelation of a soul,
Until she came to us, sweet wife.

I dared to sneer with skeptic breath;
The checkered aisles of doubt I trod,
In slumb'rous dreams my spirit lay
Like one unconscious of a God,

Until I held her dimpled hands,
Looked in her eyes as in a river,
And saw a revelation there
That told the Deity of the giver.

And now I lift my hands to pray
In benison for this new life;
Come, kneel with me, we'll thank our God
Together for this gift, sweet wife.

OUR COTTAGE HOME.

BY DAISY.

O the joyous, happy hours
Floating down the stream of time!
Life passes like a tranquil dream
In this quiet home of mine.
We have not wealth, or splendid halls
With frescoed dome or pictured walls.
But God is good, he gives us love!
The heaven-sent angel from above;
And happy hearts shall ever fill
Our cottage home upon the hill.

Bright summer smiles around us here;
At morn we list the wild bird's song,
The rose trees wave upon the breeze,
The day seems never sad or long;
Evening comes on. The silent night
Slowly unfolds her gems of light;
Then with the birds we go to rest,
As light of heart as they, and blest,
While moonlight silvers soft and still
Our cottage home upon the hill.

O golden hours! O pleasant time!
Linger awhile ye fleeting years,
For age they tell me brings to all
A mingled web of smiles and tears.
Yet coward heart look up to God,
And should he smite thee, "kiss the rod."
May every tender household grace
Within our dwelling find a place,
So grateful hearts shall ever fill
Our cottage home upon the hill.

FRONT AND BACK VIEW OF SHIRT FOR A BOY.

CARRIAGE-BAG, IN CANVAS WORK.

Materials.—Chalk-white and black beads, No. 2; scarlet and emerald-green wool, Penelope canvas; and, if to be made up at home, a frame, with leather top and handles; also one and a half yards emerald cord.

THE entire pattern of this bag is done in beads, the ground being filled in with wool, in stripes. From the manner in which it is engraved, the design may be copied from it on the canvas; the squares representing beads on stitches, as the case may be. The stripes are alternately of scarlet with a pattern in black beads, and of green with white. They should be sewed on with very strong thread, of the same color as the beads. The ground is filled in in cross-stitch.

When made up, a silk cord should conceal the joining of the edge of the canvas and the leather at the sides.

MOSAIC KNITTING FOR A PIANO OR SOFA MAT.

Materials.—The larger the pins and the coarser the fleece, the handsomer the mat will look. When finished, a band of cloth, the color of the darkest wool, must be sewed round. Two distinct colors in wool are necessary, and these should match the hangings of the rooms.

First, as a trial with, say green wool; cast on 12 stitches, and pearl a row; these will make four patterns: each pattern consists of 3 stitches.

1st row.—Green wool; wool forward; K 2 † (or together) * wool forward, K 3 plain; pull the first of those three plain over the two last; repeat from * to the end; there will be one stitch left; bring the wool forward and knit (there are 13 loops now on the pin).

2d.—With Magenta wool, fasten on and pearl a row.

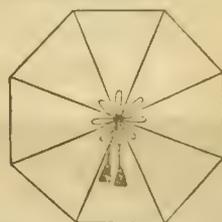

3d.—Bring wool forward; K 2 †; and without bringing the wool forward, K 3 plain, and pull the 3d stitch (reckoning backwards) over the two last; * wool forward; K 3 plain; pull the 1st over the two last; repeat from * till the end of the row (12 loops now on the pin).

4th.—Green wool; pearl a row (12 loops on the pin). This also can be calculated by measurement for the article required.

TO MAKE A HASSOCK.

THIS pretty and useful foot cushion is so easily made of scraps of delaine, merino, fancy flannel, or bits of carpeting, that no family should be without one or more.

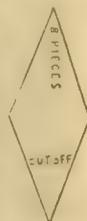

Cut of paper a circle about 22 inches in diameter; fold this pattern in half, fourths, and eighths, and then cut straight from corner to corner on the outer edge, thus making, when unfolded, an octagonal instead of a circular pattern. By this cut two pieces of stout cloth for the bag to hold the stuffing; sew these together all around except one side; turn it through this opening, and stuff it with split corn shucks, or moss, such as is used for mattresses; fill it quite full, and close the open side. From the pattern cut out separately two of the wedge-shaped divisions made by the folds; fasten these two together by their outer edges, thus giving a very long diamond-shaped piece. Cut off about one-fourth of the length of the diamond. By this shape cut four pieces of one color, and four of another, which contrasts well; sew these together, alternately, being careful to make the points meet accurately in the centre; press open the seams; lay it over the stuffed cushion, and on the wrong side fasten each outer corner of cover to the cushion. Turn the cover over the cushion, and hem on the under side of cushion with stout thread.

Take some fancy cord and sew loops around the centre, leaving tasselled ends. Pass a strong twine up through the centre, and over the crossings of cord—pass back, and, drawing tight, tie securely.

The figure is cut out of scarlet cloth, stitched on and braided with gold-colored braid. The veins of the leaf are worked with gold-colored silk.

KNITTING PATTERN FOR VARIOUS PURPOSES.

This Pattern is suitable for making many useful little articles. It is pretty for babies' berceauette blankets or cot covers, lined with silk, or knitted in very coarse wool for travelling rugs. Different kinds of wool must, of course, be selected, according to the purpose for which the knitting is intended. We will give our readers the directions for knitting the stitch, and they can then make use of it for either of the articles just mentioned. We would advise them to select, for a baby's blanket, white fleecy wool; for a cot cover, double Berlin; and for a travelling rug, 8-thread fleecy. The following directions will be found correct for knitting the stitch: Cast on any number of stitches that will divide by 4, and allow besides 1 for each end. 1st row: Slip 1, * make 1, slip 1, knit 3, draw the slipped stitch over the 3 knitted ones, repeat from *, knit 1. 2d: Knit 1, purl all out the last stitch, which knit plain. 3d: Same as 1st. 4th: Same as 2d. It will be seen that the pattern is very easy to knit, and is very quickly executed.

TO MAKE A RUG.

A VERY economical rug may be made of odds and ends of dresses, etc. that are good for nothing else. For a foundation, take gunny cloth, such as coffee-sacks, and with thread trace the size desired; fasten this upon a rough frame made of strips of lath. Trace a design in the centre—for instance, a diamond—and a waved or pointed border, with circles in the corners. Geometrical designs are more suitable, far better than those miserable, stiff masses called flowers. Having the material's for use, cut in strips half an inch wide, and wound in lengths upon balls. Take a large hook, somewhat like a crochet hook, but a longer point, and not so deep a hook (one can readily be made of a piece of large wire). Put the strip to be worked underneath, and insert the hook from the upper side; catch the strip below, and draw it up through the foundation about one half an inch, making a loop; put the hook through the next diagonal space, and draw up another loop; proceed in this way, following the outline of centre design; three times around is sufficient with the outlining color; fill up the figure in the same manner, but with a contrasting color; then work the outline of the border, and fill up the margin with a dark color. Next, work the corners, and fill up the ground with a dark color. Remove from frame, and hem the edges underneath the work. Bright or light colors are preferable for the pattern; dark ones for the ground. Old or new material can be used, and will wear a long time.

POINT LACE.

11.

12.

10. Point d'Alençon is the common herringbone stitch; the needle must be twisted twice, or oftener, according to the space and strength of the work.

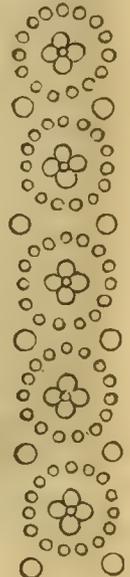

11. English Bars. These bars are very useful bars for filling up any space between two pieces of braid that is edged with either Brussels or Venetian edging; it is worked by passing the thread from side to side through two opposite loops or stitches, taking care that the needle passes from the under side of one stitch and the upper side of the other.

12. English Rosette. This is worked on four, five, or more threads according to the space and effect required. Begin by making Sorrento bars across the space from side to side; then commence from the centre by passing the needle under and over the alternate threads until the proper size is obtained; afterwards fasten off by passing your needle round the last bar, and into the braid, with two or three button-hole stitches.

Receipts, &c.

DIRECTIONS FOR PRESERVING FRUITS, ETC.

It has been our custom every year, during the months of June, July and August, to publish a large number of useful receipts suited to the preserving season. Having many new subscribers this year, we republish the collection, with the addition of many new ones, which will be found very valuable.

OBSERVATIONS ON PRESERVING.

A very common discovery made by those who preserve fruits, etc., is, that the preserve either ferments, grows mouldy, or becomes caudied.

These three effects arise from three separate causes. The first from insufficient boiling; the second from being kept in a damp place, assisted in some degree by the first cause; and the third from being too quick and too long boiling.

Preserves of all kinds should be kept entirely secluded from the air and in a dry place. In ranging them on the shelves of a store-closet, they should not be suffered to come in contact with the wall. Moisture in winter and spring exudes from some of the driest walls, and preserves invariably imbibe it, both in dampness and taste. It is necessary occasionally to look at them, and if they have been attacked by mould, boil them up gently again. To prevent all risks, it is always as well to lay a brandy paper over the fruit before tying down. This may be renewed in the spring.

Fruit jellies are made in the ratio of a quart of fruit to two pounds of sugar. They must not be boiled quick, nor very long. Practice, and a general discretion, will be found the best guides to regulate the exact time, which necessarily must be affected, more or less, by local causes.

If you do not possess a drying-stove, the fruit may be dried in the sun on flagstones, taking care that insects are not suffered to approach it; a garden glass to cover the preserves will keep them off. If dried in an oven, it must be of gentle warmth, and they must be done slowly.

TO PRESERVE STRAWBERRIES.—To two pounds of fine large strawberries, add two pounds of powdered sugar, and put them in a preserving kettle, over a slow fire, till the sugar is melted; then boil them precisely twenty minutes, as fast as possible; have ready a number of small jars, and put the fruit in boiling hot. Cork and seal the jars immediately, and keep them through the summer in a cold, dry cellar. The jars must be heated before the hot fruit is poured in, otherwise they will break.

TO PRESERVE STRAWBERRIES WHOLE.—Choose the finest scarlet strawberries, with their stalks on, before they are too ripe; weigh them first, then lay them separately upon a dish. Pound and sift finely twice their weight of the best loaf sugar, which strew over them. Then take some ripe strawberries, crush them and put them into a jar with an equal weight of sugar, crushed small, cover them close, and let them stand in a kettle of boiling water until they are soft and the syrup has come out of them; then strain through a piece of muslin into a preserving pan. Boil and skim it well. When cold, put in the whole strawberries, and set them over the fire until they are milk-warm; then take them off, and let them stand until they are quite cold, then set them on again and make them a little hotter. Do this several times until they look clear, but take care not to let them boil, for then the stalks will come off. When the strawberries are quite cold, put them into jelly-glasses with their stalks downwards, and fill up the glasses with the syrup. Tie them down with braided papers over them. These look extremely pretty in clear jellies.

TO PRESERVE STRAWBERRIES IN WINE.—Put a quantity of the finest large strawberries into a gooseberry-bottle, and strew over them three large spoonfuls of fine sugar; fill up with Madeira wine or sherry.

STRAWBERRY JELLY.—Express the juice from the fruit through a cloth, strain it clear, weigh, and stir it to an equal proportion of the finest sugar dried and reduced to powder; when this is dissolved, place the preserving-pan over a very clear fire, and stir the jelly often until it boils; clear it carefully from scum, and boil it quickly from fifteen to twenty-five minutes. This receipt is for a moderate quantity of the preserve; a very small portion will require much less time.

RASPBERRIES.—These may be preserved wet, bottled, or made jam or marmalade of, the same as strawberries. Raspberries are very good dried in the sun or in a warm oven. They are very delicious stewed for table or tarts.

RASPBERRY JAM.—Weigh the fruit, and add three-quarters of the weight of sugar; put the former into a preserving-pan, boil, and break it; stir constantly, and let it boil very quickly; when the juice has boiled an hour, add the sugar and simmer half an hour. In this way the jam is superior in color and flavor to that which is made by putting the sugar in first.

CHERRIES PRESERVED.—Take fine large cherries, not very ripe; take off the stems, and take out the stones; save whatever juice runs from them; take an equal weight of white sugar; make the syrup of a teacup of water for each pound, set it over the fire until it is dissolved and boiling hot, then put in the juice and cherries, boil them gently until clear throughout; take them from the syrup with a skimmer, and spread them on flat dishes to cool; let the syrup boil until it is rich and quite thick; set it to cool and settle; take the fruit into jars and pots, and pour the syrup carefully over; let them remain open till the next day; then cover as directed. Sweet cherries are improved by the addition of a pint of red currant-juice, and half a pound of sugar to it, for four or five pounds of cherries.

COMPOTE OF MORELLO CHERRIES.—Boil together, for fifteen minutes, five ounces of sugar with half a pint of water; add a pound and a quarter of ripe Morello cherries, and simmer them very softly from five to seven minutes. This is a delicious compote.

CHERRY JAM.—Stone four pounds of cherries, and put them in a preserving-pan, with two pounds of fine white sugar and a pint of red currant-juice; boil the whole together rather fast, until it stiffens, and then put it into pots for use.

CHERRY JELLY.—Have three-quarters of a pound of ripe red cherries, take the stones out, put them with the cherries into a basin, pour over them, boiling hot, a syrup made with a pint of water and five ounces of lump sugar; let them stand two or three hours, stirring gently once or twice, strain carefully through a muslin bag, taking care not to make the juice thick. Pour half of it over three quarters of an ounce of isinglass, let it dissolve and just boil, then mix it with the remaining juice; add a little citric acid, which gives it a beautiful color.

CURRANTS PRESERVED.—Take ripe currants free from stems; weigh them, and take the same weight of sugar; put a teaspoon of sugar to each pound of it; boil the syrup until it is hot and clear; then turn it over the fruit; let it remain one night; then set it over the fire, and boil gently until they are cooked and clear; take them into the jars or pots with a skimmer; boil the syrup until rich and thick, then pour it over the fruit. Currants may be preserved with ten pounds of fruit to seven of sugar. Take the stems from seven pounds of the currants, and crush and press the juice from the remaining three pounds; put them into the hot syrup, and boil until thick and rich; put it in pots or jars, and the next day secure as directed.

CURRANT JELLY.—Pick fine red, but long ripe, currants from the stems; bruise them, and strain the juice from a quart at a time through a thin muslin; wring it gently, to get all the liquid; put a pound of white sugar to each pound of juice; stir it until it is all dissolved; set it over a gentle fire; let it become hot, and boil for fifteen minutes; then try it by taking a spoonful into a saucer; when cold, if it is not quite firm enough, boil it for a few minutes longer.

CURRANT JAM OF ALL COLORS.—Strip your currants, and put them into your pan, with three-quarters of a pound of sugar to a pound of fruit; add your sugar after your fruit has boiled a few minutes; boil all together, mashing your fruit with a wooden spoon; boil all gently for half an hour, then fill your jars.

COMPUTE OF GREEN CURRANTS.—Half a pint of spring water, five ounces of sugar, boiled together ten minutes; one pint of green currants stripped from the stalks; simmer from three to five minutes.

GOOSEBERRIES.—Put one quart of red currant juice to five pounds of loaf-sugar; set it on the fire, and when the sugar is dissolved put in eight pounds of red, rough, ripe gooseberries, let them boil half an hour, then put them into an earthen pan and leave them stand for two days; then boil them again until they look clear; put them into pots and let them stand a week to dry a little at the top, then cover them with brandy papers.

GOOSEBERRY JELLY.—Take three quarts of ripe rough gooseberries; after picking them boil them in a quart of water, till the entire juice is out of the gooseberry; then put the whole in a flannel jelly bag, and let it gently drip without pressure till a quart of liquid is obtained; then boil this with a pound and a quarter of loaf sugar for a quarter of an hour, well skimming off the scum which arises.

GREEN GOOSEBERRY JAM.—Take green gooseberries, and, after the tops and tails are removed, put them in pie dishes in an oven until soft; then add to every pound of gooseberries three-quarters of a pound of crushed loaf-sugar; let it stand after being mixed until the next day, then boil for half an hour.

GOOSEBERRY FOOL.—Scald a quart of berries, and pass them through a sieve, make the pulp sweet, and let it stand to cool; beat up the yolks of three eggs, strain to a quart of milk, set it over a clear fire, and keep stirring it till it boils; remove, stir till cold, and then add the fruit to it gradually.

PRESERVED RHUBARB.—Peel one pound of the finest rhubarb, and cut into pieces of one inch in length. Add three-quarters of a pound of white sugar, and the rind and juice of half a lemon, the rind to be cut into narrow strips. Put all into a preserving-kettle, and simmer gently, until the rhubarb is quite soft. Take it out carefully with a silver spoon, and put it into jars; then boil the syrup a sufficient time to keep it well, say one hour; and pour it over the fruit. When cold, put it into a jar with paper soaked in brandy over it, and tie the jars down with a bladder to exclude the air.

TO PRESERVE RHUBARB.—To one and a quarter pound of rhubarb add one pound of sugar, half an ounce of bitter almonds blanched and chopped very fine; half the peel of a lemon also chopped very fine; boil all together rather longer than other fruit, or till it will set firm. If the fruit is not quite young, the sticks should be peeled, being first wiped quite dry.

RHUBARB FOOL.—Boil a quart or more of rhubarb nicely peeled, and cut into pieces an inch long. Pass through a sieve, sweeten, and let it stand to cool. Put a pint of cream, or new milk, into a stew pan, with a stick of cinnamon, a small piece of lemon-peel, a few cloves, coriander-seeds, and sugar to taste; boil ten minutes. Beat up the yolks of four eggs, and a little flour; stir into the cream, set it over the fire till it boils, stirring all the time; remove, and let it stand till cold. Mix the fruit and cream together, and add a little grated nutmeg.

RHUBARB JAM.—To every pound of rhubarb add one pound and a quarter of loaf sugar, let the rhubarb boil gently quite an hour before the sugar is put in, and then well boil altogether for half an hour or more, until it nicely thickens.

APPLE JELLY.—Boil your apples in water till they are quite to a mash; then put them through a flannel bag to drip. To every pint of the juice, put one pound of sugar; boil till it jellies; season with lemon-juice and peel to your taste a little before it is finished. I may as well add that I can say, from experience, that this jelly is excellent, and of a beautiful color.

CARROT JAM (EQUAL TO APRICOT).—Choose deep-colored carrots, and boil them until quite tender, rub them through a cullender, and afterwards through a sieve. To one pound of pulp add one pound of white sugar. Boil the sugar and carrots together until they have the consistency of jam, and when nearly cold, add the juice of two lemons, and the rinds grated very fine.

ORANGE JELLY.—Grate the rind of four oranges and two lemons, the rind to be put into the juice; one pound of fine sugar and a pint of water to be boiled to a syrup, which put into a bowl, and when cold add the juice to it. Boil two and a half ounces of isinglass in one pint of water; when it is all melted, stir it until almost cold, then add the syrup and juice. Strain the whole through a jelly-bag.

TO PRESERVE FRUITS WITHOUT SELF-SEALING CANS.

CONTRIBUTED BY A LADY.

PREPARE a cement of one ounce resin, one ounce mutton-shellac, and a cubic inch of beeswax; put them in a tin cup, and melt slowly—too high or quick a heat may cause it to scorch.

Place the jars where they will become warm while the fruit is cooking. If they are gradually heated, there is no danger of breaking.

As soon as the fruit is thoroughly heated, and while boiling hot, fill the jars full, letting the juice cover the fruit entirely. Have ready some circular pieces of stout, thick cotton or linen cloth, and spread over with cement a space sufficient to cover the mouth and rim of the jar.

Wipe the rim perfectly dry, and apply the cloth while warm, putting the cement side down, bring the cover over the rim, and secure it firmly with a string; then spread a coating of cement over the upper surface. As the contents of the jar cool, the pressure of the air will depress the cover, and give positive proof that all is safe.

The cheapest, as well as most suitable jars for this use cost (quart size) $1 50 per dozen. Queens or yellow ware has imperfect glazing, and the moisture is forced through the sides of the jar. Self-sealing cans that have failed can be pressed into service; stone jars, common bottles, tin cans, and various vessels that every housekeeper has on hand can be made to answer; only be sure that the fruit is boiling hot, and the cover properly adjusted. Many think that sugar is essential to enable the fruit to keep. This is not so. "Berries and peaches" are better put up without it. Sugar strewn over them, an hour before eating, gives them more the flavor of fresh fruit. Cook only sufficient to fill two jars at once, to avoid crushing tender berries. Pears and quinces are best cooked in water till tender, putting in as many as will cover the top of the water at one time; when clear and tender, remove them, and to the water add sugar to taste; as soon as boiling hot, put in the fruit, and when it is penetrated with syrup, put it in jars, and fill up with syrup boiling hot. Seal as directed. Apples the same way, or cooked in water only, and secured. Let them be in quarters, for, if mashed, the pulp will hold so many air-bubbles, it will not keep.

Grapes.—Pulp and cook till the pulps are melted; strain out the seeds; put in the skins, and, when well cooked, add sugar to taste. When the syrup is sufficiently thick, seal.

Cherries and plums are put up without pits or with, as one chooses.

Tomatoes are cooked till all lumps are dissolved, and the mass quite thick.

Sweetmeats of any kind, secured in this way, will keep for years. If required for transportation, perhaps it would be well to use close-fitting corks, cut off even with the top of the jar, and then covered with the cemented cloth, otherwise corks are not necessary.

Vegetables.—Squash is steamed in pieces.

Cauliflower cooked as for the table; fill jars while the articles are hot, and fill up with boiling water; let the jars remain in a kettle of boiling water for a while to expel any air that may have lodged while filling. When no air escapes, seal up with the jars in the kettle; when cool, remove them.

Green peas and green corn seem to possess a fermenting principle, which is not destroyed by a degree of heat sufficient to secure them apparently as well as other fruit. To keep these, I have tried various methods; all fail except drying or putting in salt.

By this method of self-sealing, provision can be made in years of plenty for those times when fruit fails, and with less labor, and a certainty of success that no other method as simple as this possesses.

MISCELLANEOUS.

DIRECTIONS FOR FIXING PENCIL DRAWINGS.—Dissolve a small quantity of isinglass, and dilute it with warm water, till so thin that, when spread upon paper and dry, it shall be free from those sparkling particles which never fail to appear, if too thick. Take a broad camel-hair brush set in tin, fill it plentifully with the solution, and draw it lightly over the work to be fixed, once or twice, or according as the size of the picture may require; it must be very carefully done, to prevent disturbing the sharpness of the pencil work. When dry it will be found to resist the effects of India-rubber. It is advantageous to sponge the back of the paper, or Bristol board, before applying the solution, in order that the paper may dry level, as it is apt to contract when only one side is wet. If there be a margin round the drawing, it is not requisite to sponge the back.

EFFECTS OF SUGAR ON THE TEETH.—The children of sugar-growing countries have good teeth, although they almost live upon sugar in one form or other. The stigma can be disproved by abundant evidence. Frugal housekeepers must spare their allowance of sugar on some other ground than this. Children crave for it, and ought to have a liberal supply, as it is a highly nutritious substance. It has also balsamic properties, and assists the respiratory functions. An inordinate quantity, of course, might derange the stomach.

TO PREVENT RUST.—Melt together three parts of lard, and one part of resin. A very thin coating will preserve ironwork, such as stoves and grates, from rusting during summer, even in damp situations.

SUN BONNETS FOR THE GARDEN.—Pretty and comfortable sun bonnets may be made cheap after the following fashion: Cut in pasteboard the pattern of the front of any bonnet that pleases, cover it with silk, print a pique, and form a crown either with a bit of the same silk lined with stiff muslin, or with a little handkerchief hanging over the back of the head. Finish up with strings and a deep full curtain. Simple head gear of this kind may be varied at pleasure, and will be found convenient and handy.

CURE FOR EAR-ACHE.—Take a small piece of cotton batting or cotton wool, make a depression in the centre with the finger, and fill it up with as much ground pepper as will rest on a five cent piece; gather it into a ball and tie it up; dip the ball into sweet oil, and insert it in the ear, covering the latter with cotton wool, and use a bandage or cap to retain it in its place. Almost instant relief will be experienced, and the application is so gentle that an infant will not be injured by it, but experience relief as well as adults.

REMEDY FOR STUTTERING.—A lady in Belgravia is stated to have discovered a remedy for stuttering. It is simply the act of reading in a whisper, and gradually augmenting the whisper to a louder tone.

TO TAKE RUST OUT OF STEEL.—Cover the steel with oil well rubbed on. In forty-eight hours rub with finely powdered unslacked lime until the rust disappears.

TO REMOVE STAINS FROM BOOKS.—To remove ink spots, apply a solution of oxalic, citric, or tartaric acid. To remove spots of grease, wax, oil, or fat, wash the injured part with ether, and place it between white blotting-paper. Then, with a hot iron, press above the part stained.

TO MAKE YEAST.—A housekeeper says: "Take a tumbler full of hop beer or ale, and stir in wheat flour until it is about as thick as batter for griddle cakes, and let it stand for two hours, and you will then have as good yeast as you can get in good weather."

To remove any unpleasant smell from jars, scald them with strong hot ley, filling them up to the top, and letting the ley remain in them until cold.

WOMAN!

HER HOME LIFE.

A woman that feareth the Lord, she shall be praised.
Prov. XXXI. 30.

ONE of the surest proofs of the truth of Divine Revelation is its consistency. The plan announced in Genesis after the Fall, has never been varied; the principles established by that plan have never been changed; the way of safety and happiness for mankind has never been altered.

The sorrows of woman, and the sacrifices for sin made by "her seed" was the way. The principles established were that the Holiness of God's Law, violated by human disobedience, could not be re-established or atoned for by the sufferings of woman or the works of man; Divine Love only could cancel the debt of the sinner and make forgiveness possible. And this plan of salvation by the Son of God, "made of a woman," is the burden of all Scripture, from the closing of the gates of Eden to the coming down of the New Jerusalem "out of Heaven."

The inspired writers are never at variance in their testimony to the holiness of God and to his requirement of holiness in men. They all bear witness of human wickedness and all teach of a Mediator. And just as certainly do all these writers bear witness to the earthliness of men when, left by the Holy Spirit, they follow the workings of their own depraved will and selfish passions; when these have brought, as, sooner or later sin will bring its punishment, its sore troubles and hopeless miseries, then the inspired recorders of God's providence, as faithfully show, on the blackness of darkness which man's wickedness has spread over the horizon, the diamond points of woman's moral influence and religious faith, shining out like stars of hope on a despairing world.

It was woman who kept the promise of the Saviour in her heart throughout all the old Testament history; and her faith kindled anew the light of Divine Faith when it seemed lost or waning in the hands of man. In this faith Eve welcomed the birth of Seth; Sarah secured the inheritance for Isaac; Rebecca gained the blessing for Jacob; and Moses—over his cradle three feminine souls are bound together like a cluster of light, faith, love which saved, nurtured, educated this the greatest and best of all men.

Another remarkable characteristic of the distinguished women of the Bible is, that this self-sacrifice is always for their sons, or husbands, their faith or their people. Not a "strong-minded woman," in the usual significance of the term, is found among all the daughters of Israel. No one is seeking her own ease, interest, or exaltation; nor does any one claim the greatness, which worldly honors, wealth, or position confer on men, as her right. Even Deborah "the prophetess," whom God exalted as "Judge over Israel," when the men were so hopelessly demoralized that even Barak, whom she selected as the best and bravest in the land, would not go up to battle against Sisera and his host, unless she would go with him;—Deborah only styles herself by the tender, womanly title of "a mother in Israel."

And thus Hannah, Naomi, and Ruth, the mother of Samson, and the widow of Sarepta, Huldah and Esther, all are single-hearted, self-sacrificing women, walking by faith, seeking to serve God, and promote the welfare of those they loved on earth better than themselves; each, in her turn, carrying onward the torch of faith in the promises of God, and teaching by her humble example the true way, when the darkness of idolatry and sin had all but extinguished among men the light of divine truth.

Yet these beautiful Bible examples of love and faith are all sad, because woman's photograph is only taken in dark shadows, when she is a sufferer for those she would save from suffering, or in times of national distress and degradation, when her lot is always wretchedness. So, also, when looking through the mists of past ages, from the Deluge to the Crucifixion, we see among all the nations of earth, except God's chosen people, that the "enmity" of Satan to the woman had triumphed; it had, by idolatry and lust, by unjust laws and wicked customs, crushed out her moral loveliness, ruined her innocent home happiness, and destroyed every hope of her enlightened companionship with man, who held her earthly destiny in his keeping. Heathenism has no hope for woman.

Thanks be to God, one perfect picture of happy Home Life has been left us, limned by divine inspiration, and set in the only true Book! It is proof of what the "help meet for man" was by her Creator intended to be to him and to humanity. Let us examine its characteristics.

"Who can find a virtuous woman? for her price is far above rubies.

"The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her, so that he shall have no need of spoil.

"She shall do him good, and not evil, all the days of her life.

"She riseth while it is yet night, and giveth meat to her household, and a portion to her maidens.

"She stretcheth out her hand to the poor—yea, she reacheth forth her hand to the needy.

"She is not afraid of the snow for her household: for all her household are clothed in scarlet.

"She maketh herself coverings of tapestry; her clothing is silk and purple.

"Her husband is known in the gates, when he sitteth among the elders of the land.

"Strength and honor are her clothing; and she shall rejoice in time to come.

"She openeth her mouth with wisdom; and in her tongue is the law of kindness.

"She looketh well to the ways of her household, and eateth not the bread of idleness.

"Her children arise up and call her blessed: her husband also, and he praiseth her.

"Favor is deceitful and beauty is vain, but a woman that feareth the Lord, she shall be praised.

"Give her of the fruit of her hands; and let her own works praise her in the gates."

This full-length likeness is the representative Woman* whose Home Life should be the type and model for her sex.

Who does not see the sweet perfection of character, of manners, and of personal attractions blended in the description? We feel that if she were not gifted with remarkable beauty, still she did possess the natural attractiveness which goodness makes so lovely. All the appointments of her household show the lady of * Read the 31st Chapter of Proverbs, from the 10th verse to the close.

rank, wealth, and influence; and yet how careful is the inspired limner to represent the duties of daily life as under her personal superintendence. And this attention to "small things" does not hinder her mind from acquiring a large and spiritual development. She can "judge righteously;" her conversation is "wisdom;" are not these powers of a high order, proving that her intellectual gifts are suited to sustain the pure moral graces of her feminine nature? That she is "A perfect woman, nobly planned,

To warn, to comfort, and to command;
And yet a spirit, still and bright,
With something of an angel light?"

It is, however, as Mother, Wife, and Worshipper of the true God that this exalted woman of the Old Testament has her most beautiful traits of character delineated. At first we may be inclined to say she does too much; she performs business that should be done by her husband; she "buys a field," and sees that it is cultivated. Yet how carefully are the softened shades of the feminine nature preserved. The labor on the field is not done in her department; it is not the work of her hands, but the fruit of her hands which "planteth the vineyard." Her forethought, economy, "fine needlework," and other domestic appliances of woman's ingenuity and industry—these have helped to the desired prosperity. She is "the Angel in the house."

Her husband knows that his "heart may safely trust in her." He can go abroad where his duties as a man require his presence, nor feel any fear that his interests or honor, his happiness or the welfare of his family will suffer detriment at home. "She will do him good and not evil all the days of her life." And even "while he sits in the gates, among the elders of the land," he is proud—ay, better, he is thankful that as "her husband he is known," that he has the glory of being the protector of his wife, whose "value is far above rubies."

Do not these two seem as one? And yet, although in mutual confidence, esteem and love their hearts and interests are perfectly in unison, they could not exchange duties. He could not be the Preserver, Inspirer, Teacher and Exemplar in his household; nor could she be the Worker, Provider, Protector and Law-giver, which his will and strength, power and mechanical skill, fitted "to subdue the earth," enable him to be, in the outer world, while watching over the welfare and happiness of his own family. And yet it is the wife in her tender love and hopeful piety, happy in the inner world of home if her heart is satisfied in its affections and her soul steadfast in its trust on God, who not only watches over, but makes the best happiness of her husband and children on earth and leads them, by the aid of Divine Grace, up to the bliss of heaven. No wonder "her children call her blessed," and "her husband praiseth her."

Moral goodness is the same in all ages of the world and in all conditions of life. Moral happiness is eternal in its essence; it is the elixir of humanity. The happy Home Life, wherever found, arises from the same qualities of mind and virtues of heart which are illustrated in this picture drawn nearly three thousand years ago. The true marriage and the true obedience to duty which made this Hebrew family so blessed and glorious must now be found in our American homes, if these are happy and radiant with the honor which active goodness and true faithfulness in all the relations of life require. In such a home one influence always predominates; one presence is always felt; one light must be visible—"a woman that feareth the Lord" makes the home.

LONG STORIES.

AUTHORS of established fame, whose genius seizes and controls public taste, often choose to play fantastic tricks with their patrons and their publishers. One of these is the now prevailing practice of giving out long stories in small parcels; unwinding the thread of narrative through tiny passages, month after month, and, in some cases, year after year. Thus an amount of tediousness is swallowed by the reader, taken in these small doses, which would never be tolerated if presented at once in a thick volume.

We are told by high authority that "sometimes Homer nods." Great writers are liable to the same infirmity, and knowing that short fits of drowsiness will be pardoned when a constant lethargy would not be endured, they do not scruple to indulge the dreamy mood at their periodical visits to the reading world. As unity of design is not to be expected in works, both written and read in a disjointed way, it would be hardly possible that the author should trouble himself with strict congruity and nice finish. Notwithstanding all these objections, the kings and queens of literature compel us to take their serial novels, and read them too, lest we should lose the wit, fancy, philosophy, interest, and real wealth of thought and truth of sentiment they give us. We grumble often at the tax of time we pay for this enjoyment, but we do pay it nevertheless, for the sake of the benefit we derive from the works of real genius.

With the multitude of inferior or unpractised writers it is quite another matter. They must take pains to please; they must not be tedious and heavy, or they will be allowed to sink without rescue. Those who are not sure of superior powers, or are new in literary efforts, should beware of trying the reader's patience. Almost any other fault will be more easily pardoned. A piquant incident, worked up into a pleasant little story to be read at one sitting, will often give delight in its perusal and cause the writer to be remembered with favor; but if all the piquancy be deluged by a washy sea of unmeaning sentences, flowery descriptions, a needless multiplicity of characters, and the story "to be continued," no reader of taste and discretion will continue the perusal. The reader will finish, if the writer does not.

It is recorded that Pericles, before speaking in public, always made a prayer to the gods that he might finish when he had done. The significance of this example should be impressed on every young and inexperienced writer—at least.

A NEW POEM,* AND A NEW PLEASURE FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.—This beautiful poem is already so widely known that, perhaps, few of our readers are ignorant of its title; if they have not read it, we counsel them to do so and enjoy a new pleasure.

Mr. Janvier has been a favorite for a long time with the nice judging few who love the poetry that, having been elaborated with care, shows the marks of high culture as well as the genius of the true poet.

This "Sleeping Sentinel" is patriotic and pathetic, and has taken the heart of our great public by storm. Founded on a real and deeply interesting incident of the war, it appeals to popular sympathies, and when read in public, as it has often been to crowded audiences, few listen to the end with dry eyes. The description of home life is, in the moral beauty of domestic affections, an exquisite picture, and the admission to the Saviour's love and mercy is sublime poetry and heavenly truth.

FLOWERS.

HEAVEN'S pale, June stars from the ether blue,

Look down with their twinkling eyes,
And earth's star-flowers, of every hue,
With their beautiful eyelids bathed in dew,
Look up to the evening-skies;

Look up to the floating lilies fair,
In the calm blue lake above,
And their censurs, swung by the evening air,
Sweet incense blend with day's vesper prayer,

As it floats to the throne of Love
We fancy that earth's green vales were first
By wandering angels trod,
And whence they stepped from the greenward burst
Bright buds of beauty, by dew-drops nursed,
And warmed by the smile of God.

And mortal dwellers on earth below
May walk like the angels there,
And beneath their footsteps, whenever they go,
Bright flowers of mercy and love may blow,
And sweeten life's desert air.

While 'round our footsteps where'er we rove,
Earth's beautiful blossoms be,
May we tend and scatter sweet buds of love,
And hope, and truth, for the fields above,
Where flowers ne'er fade or die.

IN MEMORIAM.

PHILA ANN, the beloved Wife of William E. Pabor, oblit January 1, 1863, aged 22 years, 5 months, 1 day.

"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they SHALL SEE GOD."

OUR readers are familiar with the name of the poet who has contributed the lays, in our Book of this volume, entitled "The Casket of the Year." To say that the "In Memoriam" is the most perfect and beautiful poem William Pabor has written, would be feeble praise. It is worthy of being ranked among the best of its kind. The tenderness of the lover-husband, and the sorrow of the bereaved-husband are most touchingly and delicately expressed. The rhythm, measure, and fit expression in words seem almost to make mournful music, as though the reader heard the sweetly plaintive strain of an Eolian harp. No true woman can read this "In Memoriam" without deep sympathy and gratitude to the waver who has honored all women by this warm devotion of Genius to the memory of one—his wife. When Mr. Pabor has finished his "Casket of the Year" we hope he will make up a book, including this "In Memoriam" with his other poems. It will form a volume of pure and beautiful poetry, worthy of love and praise.

A STOLEN POEM.—We have received several interesting letters, and three copies of "The Long Ago" and thank the friends of the real author, who is a true poet, for their information. Next month the subject will receive special notice.

TASTE IN DRESS.—"Young women who neglect their toilet, indicate in this very particular a disregard of order: a deficiency of taste, and the qualities which inspire love. The girl of eighteen years who does not desire to please in so obvious a matter as dress, will be a slut, and probably a shrew, at twenty-five."

So wrote the good Leviter, an eminent clergyman and Christian philosopher, as well as physiognomist; his opinion is worthy of special attention.

VOL. LXVI.—46

Mrs. JANE G. SWISSHOLM, of Malu, has lately been appointed to a position in the War Department, with a salary of $1000 per annum.

MISS S. J. HALL'S BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES, 1526 Rittenhouse Square, Philadelphia, Penna.

This school has now entered on its seventh year. The success and present prosperity are very satisfactory to its friends.

The design of the Principal is to give a thorough and liberal English education, to furnish the best facilities for acquiring the French language, and the best instruction in music and the other accomplishments. The Assistants employed are of the first class and highest merit. French is taught by an experienced instructress, a lady lately from France who resides in the family; and thus the pupils have ample opportunities of acquiring the accomplishment of speaking the language.

Particular and continued attention is paid to the moral training, and also to the health and physical development of the young ladies.

Circulars will be sent whenever required.

TO OUR CORRESPONDENTS.—The following articles are accepted: "The River"—"The Old Barn at Home"—"A Sonnet"—"Love"—"To Mrs. —, an Acrostic" (we do not admire this form of poetical compliment, but special excellence is an exception, so we give it place)—"The Revenge of a Noble Mind."

These articles are declined: "Lord Farrell's Wooing"—"Alice Black"—"Edward Huntington: a Story of College Life" (too long)—"Lelia" (to be returned when stamps are sent)—"The Long Storm"—"The Broken Engagement" (send stamps, it will be returned)—"The Latest Fashion"—"Spring" (well written, but we have many poems on the subject)—"A Woman's History"—"Ida May" (pretty, but not perfectly finished)—"Miscellaneous of an Absent-minded Man"—"Zanize Gray"—"Memories" (would be accepted if we had room)—"Last Year"—"A Farewell to Hope"—"The Future Excellence of Language"—"Is it right to Revenge?"—"My last new Bonnet"—"Above Suspicion"—and "Kitty Ray's Wedding-dress."

The Grammar alluded to by R. B. will be welcome.

Health Department.

BY JNO. STAINBACK WILSON, M. D.

POSITION OF CHILDREN IN SLEEP.—The position of a child in sleep is a matter of no little importance. The practice of placing children on the back when asleep has several very serious objections: 1st. The fluids secreted by the mouth and throat are apt to find their way into the air-passages, thus impeding respiration, and arousing the little sleeper by a violent fit of coughing. And 2d. A still more serious objection presents itself. The bones of an infant's head are very yielding and compressible, and this is especially the case with the bone forming the back part of the head; this bone being so placed that it is liable to be pushed in upon the brain by the weight of the head, when the child lies on the back. Now, recent researches go to show that this pressure upon the brain is a cause of that most serious and generally fatal affection—the lock-jaw of infants. Children, then, should not be allowed to rest habitually on the back; and for the first three or four months, until the bones of the head become consolidated, the position on the side should be preferred during sleep. But the child should not be confined to one side. It should be changed from side to side, and may be allowed to rest for a short time on the back. By pursuing this course the dangers to which we have referred will be avoided, and also any deformity or arrest of growth that might arise from interference with the circulation by pressure long continued on one side, or part of the body.

Position, etc., as an Indication of Disease.—In health young children sleep the longer portion of the time, and the sleep is tranquil and deep, the countenance wears a calm placid expression, the breathing is slow, soft and full, the limbs are relaxed, and the body is gently curved forward, if resting on the side, or is extended full length, or the feet are drawn up a little, if resting on the back. In short, there is an appearance of perfect ease, and an absence of all rigidity or constraint in every position, and in every movement. But in disease they are quite different—the rest is disturbed, the brow is contracted, the respiration is noisy, or slow, or short and quick, the countenance is distorted, etc. The pain of inflammatory affections often causes the infant to avoid all movement, or, in inflammation of any part of a limb, all motion of the affected member. In severe abdominal inflammation, the child lies quiet, with the knees bent and drawn upwards, twisting about, however, and uttering loud cries, on the accession of the spasmodic griping pains that accompany disorders of the stomach and bowels. In convulsions the head is drawn backwards, or one arm becomes rigid, or a leg is drawn upwards, and the little sufferer utters a piercing cry. In great prostration from any cause, the child lies entirely motionless, or it may fail to move a leg, an arm, or one side of the body, indicating partial paralysis. And so every disease has its peculiar and specific symptoms which will be noticed in connection with each disease.

Literary Notices.

OWING to the immense increase in the price of books, we will not receive further orders to send by mail. It never was a source of profit to us, but generally a loss, on account of the postage we had to pay.

FROM PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—
THE TRAPPER'S DAUGHTER. A Story of the Rocky Mountains. By Gustave Aimard, author of "The Prairie Flower," "The Indian Scout," etc. etc. Aimard seems to rival Damas in his capacity for writing an endless story. "The Trapper's Daughter" takes up his characters as left in "The Pirates of the Prairies," and after carrying them through an interesting series of adventures, leaves them to be disposed of in "The Tiger Slayer," and subsequent works.

FROM D. APPLETON & CO., New York, through W. P. HAZARD, Philadelphia:—

MADGE; or, Night and Morning. By H. B. G. This book, evidently the work of a young author, is unfortunate in treating of a hackneyed theme. The public have seen so many pauper children, in novels, raised, from the depths of degradation through their own efforts and the extraordinary kindness of disinterested friends, to become ornaments of society, that they are somewhat weary of the whole subject. The book is carefully, and if we are understood rightly, we may say, almost too finely written. Its moral is excellent, and its influence on the young reader cannot be otherwise than good.

ON THE ORIGIN OF SPECIES: or, The Causes of the Phenomena of Organic Nature. By Thomas H. Huxley, F. R. S., F. L. S., Professor of Natural History in the Jermyn Street School of Mines. This book is divided into six lectures delivered by the author for the benefit of working men. They are filled with highly important and practical information.

THE NEW AND COMPLETE TAX-PAYER'S MANUAL. This book contains the direct and excise taxes, with the recent amendments by Congress, and the decisions of the Commissioner; also complete marginal references, and an analytical index showing all the items of taxation, the mode of proceeding, and the duties of the officers.

MAN'S CRY, AND GOD'S GRACIOUS ANSWER. A Contribution toward the Defence of the Faith. By the Rev. B. Franklin. This little book has been called forth by the assaults recently made upon the faith in the English Church. It is divided into two essays respectively on "Theism" and "Christianity."

FROM HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

AFRICAN HUNTING FROM NATAL TO THE ZAMBEZI; including Lake Ngami, the Kalahari Desert, etc., from 1852 to 1860. By William Charles Baldwin, Esq., F. R. G. S. With illustrations by James Wolf and J. B. Zwecker. Mr. Baldwin is a born hunter and adventurer, and we doubt if all the training in the world could have made anything else of him. His book is one of the most interesting accounts of African travel and exploration, and abounds with narrations of perilous undertakings through desert and wilderness, and hair-breadth escapes from wild animals and wounded and infuriated game, enough to satisfy the greatest lover of the marvellous.

SYLVIA'S LOVERS: A Novel. By Mrs. Gaskell, author of "Mary Barton," "A Dark Night's Work," etc. etc. Mrs. Gaskell is not a sensation writer, but there is sterling merit in her productions. The scene of this story is laid in Yorkshire, and the date, the close of the last century, when the press-gang system, with all its enormities, was in full operation in England. The main incidents in the story are derived from the workings of this system.

FROM DICK & FITZGERALD, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

THE SCARLET FLOWER: A Novel. By Pierce Egan, Esq., author of "Imogene; or, The Marble Heart," "Flower of the Flock," etc. This is a story of the sixteenth century, and is full of mystery, both natural and supernatural, wicked deeds, and wonderful escapes. Admirers of sensational reading will undoubtedly find the book to their taste.

FROM TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston, through T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

MEDITATIONS ON DEATH AND ETERNITY. Translated from the German by Frederica Rowan. In noticing this work we cannot do better than to quote from the preface to the English edition: "The Meditations contained in this volume form part of the well-known devotional work Stunden der Anacht, published in the beginning of the present century, and generally ascribed to Zschucke. They have been selected for translation by one [Queen Victoria] to whom, in deep and overwhelming sorrow, they have proved a source of comfort and edification." The American publishers add that they have issued this volume in this country, where so many afflicted hearts need consolation, in the belief that the "Meditations" will carry comfort wherever they are read.

TWO FRIENDS. By the author of "The Patience of Hope," and "A Present Heaven." This book contains many pleasing analogies, drawn from Nature and Art, for the illustration of Christian principles. Its ideas are noble and elevated, but its division into dialogue, while adding neither beauty nor interest to the style, deteriorates much from its strength. The introductory chapter especially is highly imaginative, sometimes even to graudeur.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

GODEY FOR JUNE.—This is the last number of the sixty-sixth volume of the Lady's Book—the thirty-third year of our editorial life. Is there any falling off, good reader, in our efforts to please those who have so long continued with us? Look at the plates and the reading matter in this number. First we have "The Little Tease," another of our very superior steel engravings which have never been equalled in this country.

Next our very beautiful Fashion-plate, containing six figures, and that which will please the married ladies is that three of them are children's dresses. It is a beautiful plate, and suited to the season. Follow on to the next—that poor Doctor wakened from his sleep on a snowy night to go some miles, perhaps to see Johnny, who may, perhaps, be well by the time he gets there. Probably it had been said Johnny's birthday, and he had been treated to doughnuts and a drink of cider before going to bed. Alas! for the life of a Country Doctor.

In this number will be found fashions furnished for the Lady's Book by Messrs. A. T. Stewart & Co. of New York. They are from the latest arrivals, and bring the fashions up to the time of going to press. No other magazines shares in this advantage. The arrangement is only with the Lady's Book. The materials for all these dresses and those in the Colored Fashion-plate can be found at Messrs. Stewart & Co's. We presume all our subscribers read the description of this palatial establishment in our May number, written by Mrs. Alice B. Haven.

"Husks."—This admirable story is continued in this number, and meets with the greatest praise both from the press and our subscribers. The other stories in this number will be favorites with our readers.

BOOKS BY MAIL.—On account of the increase in the price, we do not send any books by mail other than our own publications.

OUR MUSICAL COLUMN.

New Musical Monthly.—The second number of this beautiful and already favorite periodical is now ready. It contains an exquisite nocturne by Riche, very highly commended by that famous critical authority, the London Attention; a spirited and brilliant Mars on Mountaine by Glover; and a beautiful ballad, in my Wild Mountain Valley, from Jules Benedict's new opera, now all the rage in London, The Lily of Killarney. Yearly subscribers to the Monthly, it will be remembered, get all this new and beautiful music for 25 cents; and it is printed and issued in a style of elegance far in advance of any other sheet music published. The Musical Monthly is already an established success. Letters reach us by every mail, from all parts of the country, bearing testimony to the beauty of the publication, the value and excellence of the music furnished, and its unparalleled cheapness. Every lady and gentleman whose purchases of music amount to three dollars during a year should become a subscriber, and get four or five times the amount for the price. The terms are three dollars per annum in advance. Single numbers are fifty cents; but those who would like to examine the two numbers published, can have them sent free by mail on receipt of seventy-five cents. All remittances must be made to the publisher direct, J. Starr Holloway, Box Post Office, Philadelphia.

Those who desire to have full sets, for binding, should send in their subscriptions without delay.

New Sheet Music.—William Hall & Son, New York, publish several songs, etc. from W. Vincent Wallace's opera, Love's Triumph; Wayward Fortune is a delightful aria, 50 cents; My Poor Young Friend, is a duet of some length, 75; Patience, Prudence, Circumspection, is a lively aria, full of brilliant points, 60; all from the same opera. La Primavera, the springtime is a sweet aria, with Italian and English words, 50. The Sleep of Joy, and The Sleep of Sorrow are two songs by W. V. Wallace, each 30. Little Willie's Grave, new song by J. R. Thomas, 30.

The same publishers issue two new and brilliant mazurkas by Wallace, Victoire, and Une Fleur de Pologne, each 50. Also, at the same price, Marietta Polka Mazurka, by Fradel. Romanesca is a showy ballet piece by Wallace, 30. The Battle, by Francis H. Brown, is a brilliant descriptive fantasia, requiring skilful execution, and admirably suited to the advanced performer, 75.

H. Tolman & Co., Boston, publish Ode to Liberty, an effective quartette for four male voices, 25; Hymn to Liberty, with portrait of Burnsides, 35. No Flag but the Red, White, and Blue, new patriotic song, 25.

Also, Belle of the Evening Polka, 25. Elegant Mazourka, by Stefanone, 25. Progressive Sonatas, by Clementi, admirable studies, 25. Fortuna Waltz, Baninbach, 30. Plinie de Diamants Schottische, very pretty, 30; Adaleta Waltz, 35. Also a beautiful arrangement of Balfe's new opera, The Puritan's Daughter, containing much exquisite music, by Brinley Richards, 75.

Horace Waters, New York, publishes three beautiful new songs by M. Keller, One Single Kiss, Moorish serenade: Evening Blessing, Vesper song; Mother's Love is True; each 25. The Love I bear to Thee, new song Foster, 25. They Worked me all the Day, contraband's song, 25.

The Musical Editor will purchase and mail any of the foregoing, on receipt of price. Address, at Philadelphia, J. STARR HOLLOWAY.

DESCRIPTION of some of the principal dresses worn at the wedding of the Prince of Wales with the Princess Alexandra:—

The dress of the Princess Alexandra was a petticoat of white satin, trimmed with chateclains of orange blossoms, myrtle, and bouffants of tulle, with Honiton lace. The train of silver moire antique, trimmed with bouffants of tulle, Honiton lace, and bouquets of orange blossom and myrtle. The body of the dress trimmed to correspond. Her Royal Highness wore a veil of Honiton lace and a wreath of orange blossom and myrtle. The necklace, earrings and brooch of pearls and diamonds were the gift of the Prince of Wales; rivers of diamonds, given by the corporation of London: opal and diamond bracelet given by the Queen; diamond bracelet, given by the ladies of Leeds; an opal and diamond bracelet, given by the ladies of Manchester. The bouquet was composed of orange blossoms, white rose buds, lilies of the valley, and rare and beautiful orchideous flowers, interspersed with sprigs of myrtle sent especially from Osborne, by command of the Queen, the myrtle having been reared from that used in the bridal bouquet of her Royal Highness the Princess Royal. The bouquet was supplied by Mr. Veitch. The bridal bouquet holder of her Royal Highness was the marriage present of the Maharajah Dhuleep Singh, and was a truly princely gift. The upper part receiving the flowers was carved out of rock crystal, and has taken the lapidary some months to execute. It is trumpet shaped, the crystal being inlaid with large emeralds and diamonds, relieved with pink coral and oriental pearls. The shaft contains four plumes of feathers composed of brilliants, and under each the letter "A" in rubies, also four times repeated; a crystal ball, set with rubies, terminated the shaft or handle, and by an ingenious piece of mechanism was made to fly up and releasing the four side forms four supports or stands. Around the centre was a ring, arranged as the princess's coronet, and to which was attached a chain of large pearls and gold, having a hoop of pearls to wear on the finger—the only delicate allusion to the donor being a small star of India in diamonds, introduced in the ornamentation.

The wreaths of the bridesmaids were formed of blush roses, shamrocks and white heather, with long veils of tulle falling from the back of the wreath. The dresses of white tulle over white glacé were trimmed to correspond.

Princess Christian of Denmark wore a train of royal blue velvet trimmed with gold lace. The petticoat of white satin trimmed with puffings of tulle and gold blond. Headdress, white feathers, gold lappets and diamond ornaments.

The Princess Mary of Cambridge wore a train of lilac silver moire, trimmed with white Honiton lace. Petticoat of white satin, with Honiton lace tunic and bands of lilac velvet. Diadem of diamonds. Stomacher, neck-lace and earrings of diamonds. Headdress, white feathers and tulle veil.

The Duchess of Cambridge wore a violet velvet train, trimmed with ermine. Petticoat of violet satin, trimmed with black lace, covered with a tunic of Honiton lace, a tiara of pearls and diamonds; necklace and stomacher to match.

The Princess Helena wore a train of white silk, with bouquets of the rose, shamrock and thistle, tied with silver cord, manufactured by Lewis and Allenby, trimmed with tulle, and bouquets of lilacs, white and lilac. Petticoat of white tulle over white glacé, striped with ribbons of rose, shamrock and thistle; bouquet of lilac. Headdress wreath of lilacs, white feathers, and blond lappets; diamond ornaments.

Princess Louise and Princess Beatrice, dress of white tulle over white glacé, striped with ribbons of rose, shamrock and thistle, tied with silver cord, trimmed with bouquets of lilacs. Headdress, wreaths of lilacs (white and lilac); pearl ornaments.

The Duchess of Brabant wore a train of blue moire antique, embroidered with gold.

CARLETON of New York is a successful publisher.

The success of several of his later publications is worthy of notice. "Among the Pines" has reached the enormous sale of 35,000 copies. The great public has patronized "Artemas Ward" to the extent of nearly 15,000 copies of his comicalities; and has taken 120,000 volumes of "Les Misérables." "The Great Consumption," the sequel to "The Great Tribulation," by Dr. Cummings, has also had an extensive circulation in this country and Canada; while "Rutledge" and "The Sutherlands" have reached their thirtieth thousand. In the way of Poetry, Mr. Carleton has made two hits—in "The King's Bell," by Stoddard, and in "Aldriche's Poems," in blue and gold; two large editions of which have already been disposed of.

L. A. GODEY, SIR: I am at this time in need of a receipt to color black with extract of logwood, which will give the material a bright glossy appearance, for which I would be greatly favored if some of your numerous contributors would give a receipt through your book.

Respectfully etc., N. S. D.

MUSIC RECEIVED.—Duet Vesper; music by T. Lawrence. Song of the 25th Regiment; words and music by one of the regiment. Oh, Could I but recall the Hours; words by J. T. Morris, music for the piano by Mr. Swaim.

We have received the above music from Horace Waters, 481 Broadway, New York. And from Lee & Walker, 722 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia: Oh Give us a Navy of Iron! the words very pretty and suitable, by O. Brainard Williams, music by James W. Porter. Mr. Williams is an admirable writer of songs for music, and all his efforts are very popular. They are sung everywhere.

TO COLOR PHOTOGRAPHS.—A new preparation called Newton's Prepared Colors for Albumen pictures is for sale by J. E. Tilton & Co., Boston. Price, with a bottle of Reducing Liquid complete, with full directions for painting, so that any person, though not an artist, may paint in a most beautiful manner, and very rapidly, the cartes de visite and photographs, etc., $3 25.

There has been offered for sale a worthless imitation that will injure the photograph. See that the box obtained has the name and seal of J. E. Tilton & Co., Boston, who are sole agents for the United States.

J. E. T. & Co. have also beautiful copies of flowers from nature (photographs) for coloring with these colors, or for copies for drawing and painting, which they will send by mail for 25 cents each. Also, cartes de visite of all distinguished persons.

THE RULING PASSION.—A broker in State Street, deeply absorbed in speculation, being asked, the other morning, "How do you do?" replied abruptly, "About two per cent. a month!"

EDUCATION: MISS HALE'S SCHOOL.—We wish to draw the attention of our readers to the advertisement of this school in the Editors' Table. We are certainly interested in a seminary conducted by a daughter of our old friend and associate, Mrs. Hale, and where our own daughter is receiving her education. But though interested we are not swayed by such considerations in what we say now on this subject.

Miss Hale's school is situated in the very best location that could be found in Philadelphia for the purpose. Close by the regions of fashion, and remote from the dust and confusion of business, it is yet in almost country seclusion, fronting a beautiful park, whose verdure in the season of green, which lasts here a long time, refreshes the eye, while its extent affords a healthful circulation of air. We do not hesitate to say that few boarding-schools, if any, have such judicious system and regulation, and receive the same faithful care from the Principal.

The best part of education comes from the influence of contact, and the morals as well as the manners are insensibly affected by the circle in which we dwell. How important it is, then, for children and young girls who leave their parents' control to be habitually under the supervision of the lady who undertakes the office of parental training! The ladies who assist Miss Hale in the French and English departments are experienced in teaching, and perfectly understand what young ladies require for the development of the understanding and the heart.

Philadelphia, it is unnecessary to say, is not surpassed by any city for its professors and teachers in the arts, sciences, and foreign languages; therefore every advantage for the attainment of accomplishments will be within the reach of Miss Hale's scholars.

L. A. GODEY.

Messrs. J. E. Tilton & Co., Boston, have for sale all materials for the different styles of Painting and Drawing taught in their book, ART RECREATIONS. They will send a price list, if requested, and answer necessary questions, and will send, post paid, the book for $1 75. It teaches Pencil and Crayon Drawing, Oil Painting of every kind, Wax-work, Leather-work, Water Color Painting, and hundreds of fancy kinds of drawing, painting, etc. etc.

THE Lady's Book is a wonderful success in procuring receipts. In a late number we mentioned that a lady wished to procure General Twigg's receipt for the hair. We have received over twenty letters upon the subject, and we thank the writers of them all. We once advertised for a particular number of the Lady's Book, an old one, saying that we would send one of the current ones for it. We came near exhausting a whole edition, and had to stop the exchange as soon as possible. Here is the receipt:—

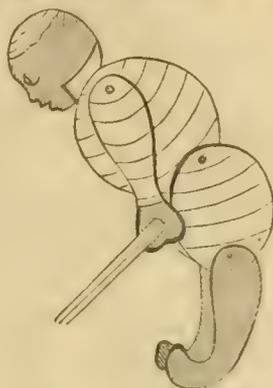

One drachm lac sulphur, half a drachm sugar lead, four ounces rosewater. Mix them, and shake the vial on using the mixture, and bathe the hair twice each day for a week, or longer if necessary. It does not dye the hair, but seems to operate upon the roots, and restore the natural color.

THINKING AND SPEAKING.—"Indeed, you are very handsome," said a gentleman to his mistress. "Phoo, phoo!" said she; "so you'd say if you did not think so." "And so you'd think," he answered, "if I did not say so."

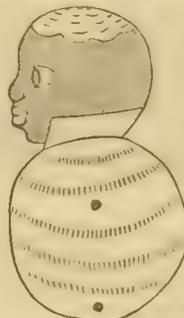

JUVENILE DEPARTMENT.

THE DANCING ETHIOPIAN.

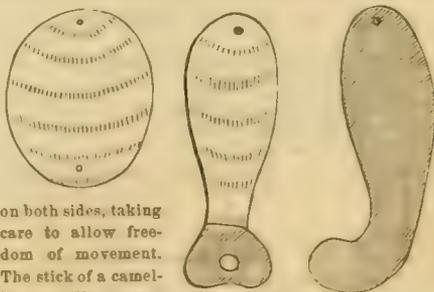

The accompanying figures should be cut out in cardboard, but larger than represented. Of course, two will be required, except the head portion, the shaded parts being painted black, and the clothing may be striped with some bright color. Pinholes being made where the black dots are placed, the limbs should be attached by passing thin twine through and knotting it on both sides, taking care to allow freedom of movement.

The stick of a camel-hair pencil, or something similar, being thrust tightly through the holes in the hands, which should be pushed a little apart, the figure can easily be made to dance to any tune, turn head over heels, and execute sundry movements—lively, if not graceful.

It may be remarked that though the contour of the figure is certainly not copied from any of the masterpieces of sculpture, it is nevertheless better adapted for summersaults and other sprightly performances.

RURAL RESIDENCE.

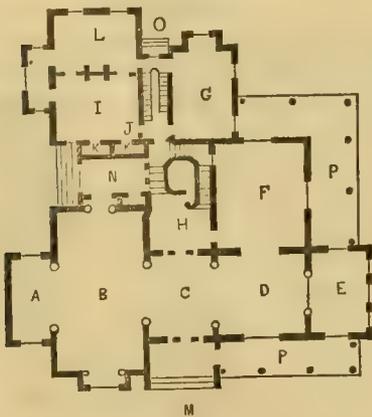

Designed expressly for Godey's Lady's Book by ISAAC H. HOBBS, Architect, Philadelphia.

PERSPECTIVE VIEW.

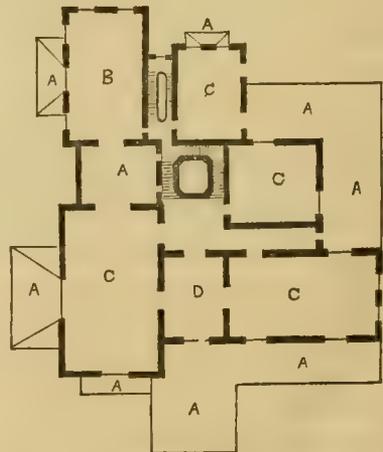

THE plan of the above design cannot be equalled for grandeur of interior effect, and the exterior is capable of the highest tone of architectural beauty.

dining-room, H stair hall, I breakfast-room, J dumb waiter, K china closet, L servant's room, M carriage porch, N general entrance, O rear entrance, P porticoes.

FIRST STORY.

First Story.—A piano room, B parlor, C vestibule, D parlor, E conservatory. (It will be observed that these are all separated by drapery, which being pushed aside one magnificent parlor is formed.) F sitting-room, G

SECOND STORY.

Second Story.—A roof, B nursery, C chambers, D dressing-room.

GROVER AND BAKER'S SEWING-MACHINES.—We have frequently and strongly recommended these useful articles to our subscribers; we have done so because we know and have tested them both in our homes and elsewhere. There are two necessary things for house-keepers—one of Grover and Baker's sewing-machines and Godsey's Lady's Book. It is not housekeeping without them. Send to them for one of their catalogues, 730 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, and see to what various uses in sewing they can be applied. The very finest and the coarsest sewing may be done on them. We have to chronicle a matter connected with this firm which shows their generosity. They have lately presented to the "Foster Home," in this city, an entirely new sewing-machine, and mended their old one which has been used in that establishment for many years without having had the slightest repair until now. When we consider that, in an establishment where there are so many children, their clothes and the repairs had to be done on this instrument, we think we can pay no higher compliment than to say, that it has lasted through such an immense amount of work without getting out of order.

A WORD TO WRITERS.—The great length of many of the articles on hand prevents our giving them an early insertion. If writers would send us short articles, they would be published much sooner. Racy and to the point, not abounding in description about the beauty of the parties, which most persons skip, but go into the story at once, and, if possible, avoid making the heroine a school-teacher or a governess.

THE PARLOR GARDENER.—A complete illustrated guide to the cultivation of house plants, care of green-houses, aquariums, and instructions to many new and beautiful methods of growing plants, of grafting, budding, etc. etc. Price 65 cents. By mail, 70 cents. J. E. Tilton & Co., Boston, Publishers.

RIDING-DRESS OF THE EMPRESS OF FRANCE.—A dark blue riding habit, made with full sleeves and ample basques, and on her head a low-crowned hat and plume of white feathers.

WHAT OUR FASHION EDITOR CAN SUPPLY. Address Fashion Editor, care L. A. Godsey, Philadelphia. Mrs. Hale is not the fashion editress.

Hair-work, patterns for all kinds of garments, and for women and children, jewelry, caps, bonnets, cloaks, mantillas, talmas, mantles, headdresses, shawls, head-work, materials for wax and paper flowers, embroidery, collars, capes, worsteds, Shetland wool, infants' ward-ropes or patterns for the same, stamped collars, orné balls, canvas for working, etc. etc.

PHILADELPHIA AGENCY.

No order attended to unless the cash accompanies it.

All persons requiring answers by mail must send a post-office stamp; and for all articles that are to be sent by mail, stamps must be sent to pay return postage.

Be particular, when writing, to mention the town, county, and State you reside in. Nothing can be made out of post-marks.

Mrs. J. M.—Sent full braiding patterns for child's talma 10th.

Mrs. W. B. F.—We can braid it if you desire it.

Mrs. P. S.—Humming-birds are decidedly the most fashionable trimming for a bonnet. The year of various prices; the brown with golden breasts the most expensive.

Miss M. C. G.—Religieuse is the name of the new style of sleeve, they can be sent by mail.

Mrs. C. H.—Black braid washes well, and is the prettiest for either white or buff piqué.

Subscriber, Cincinnati, Ohio.—Address Fashion Editress in all such cases, inclosing a stamp with your name, and she will reply. We cannot notice anonymous inquiries. By the time you get the reply in this department the information would be of no use to you.

Miss E. A. M.—We must decline republishing any story. Woodstock, N. B.—It is enough for us to lose the extra number, without having to pay ten cents postage. In this instance the number was sent.

E. R. P.—Glycerine is the best remedy for chapped hands.

A. R.—MSS. intended for publication must be written only on one side of the paper.

Miss G. H.—Yours is a singular question: "Is it unladylike to catch eels?" We think it is a matter of taste entirely. How is a lady to know whether she will catch an eel if she goes fishing?

Miss E. L. G.—It is not improper to accept a gentleman's arm in the evening.

S. T. O.—The lady rises from the table at the proper time, and the other ladies follow her lead from the room.

Mrs. H. R.—We do not send duplicate numbers unless applied for immediately. Your numbers may have been lost by lending. It is preposterous to suppose you would not have applied for them before.

J. S. P.—Different designs have different terms of abbreviation; we have endeavored at times to publish all, and have done so—cannot refer you to the numbers; but if there is any particular "term" that you wish explained, we will try to do so. We thank you for your very kind and complimentary letter.

Chemistry for the Young.

LESSON XXIII.—(Continued.)

561. Take a wax or composition candle. Having trimmed it to an even and moderately short wick, try to produce a flame made up of two cones, the apex of the internal one being represented by (a), of the external one by (b). Possibly, the whole of the original flame may not be driven laterally into the horizontal cones. This matters little, provided the cones themselves be of the right quality, the outside one being little more in color than a faint halo, the inside one terminating at (a) in a sharp blue point. This point (a) is the hottest part of a blowpipe flame, which, when projected a little downward into a depression excavated on the side of a piece of charcoal, produces a most powerful mimic furnace, in which little pieces of silver can be melted with great facility—may even copper and iron, by a dextrous experimenter.

562. The flame, when employed for analytical purposes, should not be ragged, noisy, and uneven, but clear, tranquil, and well-defined. Occasionally a noisy, roaring, and uneven flame is employed in glass-blowing operations, but never for the purposes of analysis. It is made by removing the jet of the blowpipe some distance from the flame, and blowing rather strongly. Its appearance is like the representation subjoined.

563. Hold a small needle by the eye by means of a pair of forceps, and fuse it from the point backward—as far as you can—by continuously directing upon it the conical tip (a). If this operation causes the slightest fatigue, it is a sign of your not yet having acquired the art. When mastered, breathing may be maintained with the greatest facility.

564. Hold a small piece of English flint-glass (a variety which contains oxide of lead) in the blowpipe flame at (a). Remark how black the tube becomes, and how this blackness is within the substance of the glass, not externally; it depends on the removal of oxygen from oxide of lead, metallic lead being left behind. Now heat this blackened glass in the flame at (b), or between (a) and (b); after a time the blackness becomes removed, metallic lead being reconverted into oxide. Hence, remember generally, that the external cone adds oxygen to substances; the internal one takes it away from them. This is very important.

565. Scoop out a depression about the size of a pea in the side of a piece of charcoal; into it put a bit of metallic lead the size of a grain of wheat. Direct sharply down upon it the outside cone of the blowpipe flame; observe how the lead is rapidly converted into a yellow oxide, which diffuses itself over the charcoal in concentric rings. This appearance is indicative of lead; nothing but lead being capable of imparting it. Remark, too, that the oxide of lead melts before the subliming into a vapor—consequently if we were to place in contact with it a spongy body, not affected by the lead, the fused oxide would be all absorbed.

566. Take a piece of silver about the size of a pin's head; treat it precisely as the lead was treated in the last instance, except that it must be fused at the point (a). When once fused it may be retained in fusion at the point (b). Observe that the silver remains quite bright, not generating any oxide, as the lead did.

Fashions.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

HAVING had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editor of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Spring and autumn bonnets, materials for dresses, jewelry, envelops, hair-work, worsteds, children's wardrobes, mantillas, and mantelets, will be chosen with a view to economy, as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godey, Esq.

No order will be attended to unless the money is first received. Neither the Editor nor Publisher will be accountable for losses that may occur in remitting.

The Publisher of the Lady's Book has no interest in this department, and knows nothing of the transactions; and whether the person sending the order is or is not a subscriber to the Lady's Book, the Fashion editor does not know.

Instructions to be as minute as is possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice. Dress goods from Evans & Co.'s; mourning goods from Besson & Son; cloaks, mantillas, or talmas, from Brodie's, 51 Canal Street, New York; bonnets from the most celebrated establishments; jewelry from Wriggens & Warden, or Caldwell's, Philadelphia.

When goods are ordered, the fashions that prevail here govern the purchase; therefore, no articles will be taken back. When the goods are sent, the transaction must be considered final.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION-PLATE FOR JUNE.

Fig. 1.—Dress of white grenadine, with scarf mantle to match. The dress and scarf are trimmed with a fluting of green silk, and the sash is of graduated green silk, with heavily fringed ends. The hat is of white chip, trimmed with a long white ostrich feather and a short green one.

Fig. 2.—White silk dress, with double skirt. The upper skirt is slashed at intervals to the depth of half a yard. The ends are folded over and caught by a black lace bow. The sleeves are trimmed in the same style. The corsage is plain, and pointed both back and front. A black lace scarf is pointed at the back to form a berth, crosses in front and is tied at the back, where it falls in long streamers. Straw hat, edged with black lace, and trimmed with black velvet and a black feather.

Fig. 3.—A purple grenadine robe dress, with scarf, made over purple silk. The corsage is made with a jockey at the back, and revers in front. The mantle is trimmed with two rows of rich lace. White chip bonnet, trimmed with green ribbon and a white feather.

Fig. 4.—Little boy's dress of white piqué, richly braided above the hem and up the front in the tunic style.

Fig. 5.—Dress of cur-colored alpaca, with Zouave of the same, trimmed with braid and drop buttons. The skirt is a repl to form a corset in front. Leghorn hat, trimmed with flowers and grass.

Fig. 6.—Dress of thin blue Mozambique, barred with black, and trimmed with a fluting of blue ribbon sewed in waves just above the hem. The corsage is low and square, and worn with a muslin guspare.

NEW SPRING DRESSES.

From A. T. Stewart's Establishment, corner of Broadway and Tenth St. New York.

(See engravings, pages 510, 511, 512, 513.)

Fig. 1.—A pearl-colored percale dress, stamped in tunic form to imitate rich embroidery in back. The design, reduced, is on the Zouave and sleeves. The hat is of fine white straw, trimmed with pearl-color and black feathers, and black velvet ribbon.

Fig. 2.—A dress of cur-colored wool taffetas, barred with black, and a rich design woven as a bordering on the skirt. The design is also woven on the Zouave and sleeves. White Leghorn hat, trimmed with black velvet, loops of white ribbon, and a single white feather.

Fig. 3.—Another pretty robe dress, with sack to match, very suitable for travelling. This style of dress is to be had in percales of neutral tints, and in wool goods, such as taffetas and alpacas.

Fig. 4.—Organza robe, a white ground, with tiny red figures. The odd design on the flounces is of scarlet and black, the effect of which is charming in the original.

NEW COIFFURES.

Fig. 1.—This coiffure is composed of puffed ribbon and bows mounted on a wire, with flowers at the side and a lace barbe looped behind and fastened with ornamental pins. The color of the ribbon should correspond with the dress with which it is worn, or should form a decided contrast.

Fig. 2.—The hair is dressed with three rolls on each side of the face. The wreath is made very full in front, and has a gold cord and tassel trimmed in with it. It gradually diminishes in size towards the back, small buds forming pendants behind.

CHITCHAT UPON NEW YORK AND PHILADELPHIA FASHIONS FOR JUNE.

There is a charming little French tale, which fascinated our childish imagination, in which a band of young girls were to choose and wear a wreath of their favorite flower, and a prize was to be given to the one who had made the loveliest selection. The prize was won by the lily of the valley, twined as a garland, with a few dark green forest leaves. We recalled this story of our childhood while standing a few days since among the delicate creations of Madame Tilman's opening spring partee. Our eyes rested on a bridal wreath, consisting of a coronet of pure white Narcissus with their golden centres, surrounded by orange-buds and lilies of the valley. A cordon of orange buds surrounded the veil, caught together at the side by a rich blossom of Narcissus, and terminating in two floating sprays of lilies of the valley, trailing over the shoulder. The wreath was mounted with Mme. Tilman's own peculiar grace; no arbitrary arrangement, but studied to suit the style of the bride for whom it was destined. The wreath was part of a bridal garniture, which composed a garland for the skirt, and a bouquet to be worn quite to the left, rather than the centre of the corsage.

A pretty novelty appeared in the wreaths intended for the six bridesmaids. They were each of the simplest flowers, lightly mounted with grass to form, on each wreath a different flower. Buttercups, wild roses, the downy white tops of the dandelions, with blades of grass spangled with dew, violets, and garden roses, made up this novel and charming set of decorations for one of the most fashionable weddings that the daily prints have chronicled this "season of flowers."

Of Mme. Tilman's bonnets, we may say that in shape as well as style, they are entirely different from those of any other house. The general effect as to shape is as though the front of the brim drooped beneath the rich trimming of lace, crêpe, and flowers which is placed upon it. The charm of simplicity as well as of unity and richness, belonged to all that came under our review. We mention a few of them. One was of white crin, with a garniture on the brim, of rich French moss, on which a butterfly was most gracefully posed. The inside trimming was of the moss and clusters of rose-buds; the cap was of pink crêpe, lined with tulle. Another of white crêpe had a cordon of violets of three shades, bordering the front, and drooping over the forehead, forming a complete Marie Stuart.

Nor must we pass the most stylish of all, made solely of the straw edging of its black velvet bands, the delicacy of its trailing lace ornaments, ending in a cluster of black ox-heart cherries and shining ivy leaves.

For a general guidance, we might say that lace, rich plain ribbon of delicate shades, or black combined with high colors, crêpe, a profusion of lovely flowers and butterflies, are the materials chiefly used in the decoration of summer straws.

We are also indebted to the same lady, whose address is 148 east Ninth Street, New York, for some new styles of round hats. The Francis L. looped up at the right by bits of black velvet, edged with straw, and decorated with field flowers and grass, drooping like a plume at the back of the hat, is decidedly the most piquant. The Andalusians, high sloping crowns trimmed with feathers, flowers, lace scrolls, and humming-birds, will also be very popular. A novelty to us, though long known in Paris, has just been introduced for the opera. It is a round hat of Maison, the crown laid in folds, and the brim a mass of pathos. A silk scarf is tied at the back of the hat, and a cluster of moss rose-buds, among which nestles a charming crested humming-bird, is placed directly in front.

In this connection, we would commend the tasteful selection of Mr. Myers, 303 Canal Street, Reynolds's Bazaar, for children. He has introduced the humming-birds, of which we have before spoken, among the pretty flowers with which the hats are ornamented. He has also an excellent array of natural ostrich plumes, more serviceable than pure white ones for little people. The styles are varied and becoming, and the combinations tasteful.

We have been busily engaged in gleanings all the information we could respecting new dresses. Fashion is always creating a thousand novelties or new and charming arrangements of old materials.

Fluted ruffles are much in favor for every kind of material. It is true, ruffles are old, but what trimming is more becoming? and the present season they are arranged with other trimmings, which greatly improves their style.

Alpaca of all shades is universally adopted, made with wraps of the same, most of them being talmas, though one of our distinguished modestes is making only short tight-fitting sacks for the robes en suite.

Strolling through the salons of Mme. Penchon, of Bleecker Street, we saw the richest and most extravagant assortment of dresses we have yet beheld. At no previous season do we recollect having seen such a collection of elegant dresses, not of expensive materials, but so elaborately trimmed that, for bariges and grenadines, prices ranged from $50 to $100.

For elegant full dress, suitable for matrons, were rich black silks, trimmed in every variety of style with white silk, in bands or flounces, covered by black French lace, price $200. The skirts and sleeves alone of the dresses were made, the waist being arranged to suit the purchaser. The sleeves were all shaped from the elbow, and trimmed to correspond with the skirt.

A cuir-colored barige, figured with black, was trimmed with one fluted ruffle four inches deep; and heading this was a band of rich French lace of a new style, bordered on each edge like a barbe. Another dress of the same color was somewhat similar, only heavy bands of the lace three inches wide, bordered on each side with a fluting of the material down each side.

Many of the dresses were trimmed with silk, cut out in various devices, and stitched on; for instance, rings of silk or velvet linked, scrolls, triangles, and other styles. A buff alpaca was cut in deep scallops, and trimmed with six rows of black and white braid; from under this came a fluted ruffle, which formed the edge of the skirt. The dresses were all faced half a yard deep with a white corded material.

A black ground Foulard, figured with colors, was trimmed with linked rings of various-colored silks, forming a charming bordering. This robe was made postillion waist, with the swallow-tailed jockey at the back. Zouaves are rather shorter than last season, just reaching the waist. The gray and cuir alpacas were either trimmed with silk, or braid of the same shade, or else with black velvet. We noticed a gray, with a plain upright Grecian of black velvet, through which ran a straight band of velvet, and at the distance of every half yard, the pattern formed a pyramid.

Bands of narrow ribbon, graduated from the sides of each breadth to the centre, formed a very pretty trimming. We must not omit a charming dress, suitable for a young lady. This was of white barige, spotted with tiny blue dots. On the edge of the skirt was a fluted ruffle, simply hemmed, then bands of blue ribbon, sewed on bias, and just reaching a second ruffle. Then another bordering of ribbons, sewed on the reverse way, and above this was another fluted ruffle, extending up the front en tunique. The space between the tunic ruffles in front being filled in with ribbons, pointed in the centre.

The wraps were very full talmas, bias at the back, with a seam down the centre. Many of the black ones being trimmed with velvet and steel buttons, chenille fringe, lace, and futings. Those of the same material as the dress were trimmed to correspond. Bariges and grenadines are also made with scraps of the same.

The styles this season are so various that we can but touch on them, feeling that the pen is feeble, and the artist's pencil can best describe some of them. We, therefore, refer our readers to our wood-cuts for some of Stewart's new robes, hoping in our next number to give still others.

Braiding is still in vogue, and for that purpose, we have the tiniest of all velvets in all colors, which braid charmingly.

Most of the new robes are stamped to imitate braiding; some en tablier, others as a bordering round the skirt. Delicate percales of neutral tints of this style form charming morning robes, and, en passant, we may remark, that all the morning robes have the skirts closed.

Wool taffetas, alpacas, and other goods are to be had in this robe style, also bariges; but in the latter, the pattern is varied, having rich leaves and palms thrown carelessly though the graceful braiding pattern. Other bariges are chain-stitched in various designs, and have shawls embroidered to match.

The Foulards this year are particularly rich, resembling heavy silks, both in style and price. They are bordered the same as the other goods, but the designs are richer and more artistic. Then there are the beautiful twisted silk grenadines, white grounds, with the daintiest little colored sprigs, or black grounds, figured with the most gorgeous colors.

Among the pretty little accessories to the toilet are the colored cravats, or scarfs for ladies, made of a netted silk, double and finished with tassels. These are carelessly knotted round the throat, or passed under the collar.

The Religious sleeve is now the rage. It is an under-sleeve with a deep wristband, about five inches deep, turned down, and sufficiently large to pass the hand through easily. In some cases the ends are rounded, and in others the cuff is sewed to the edge. Collars are larger, made with deep points in front. This style is called the Shakespeare, the cuffs to correspond are very deep, and fastened with four gold buttons. We have noticed linen cuffs made with a very deep point on top, others straight on top, with long, pointed ends.

The display of parasols this season is very good. The most elegant being of moiré, trimmed with marabout feathers, or lace, or else lively shades of mauve, pink, or green taffetas, with Brussels or point appliqué coverings. More simple styles are dotted with pearl, jet, or steel beads, or have a fanciful bordering formed of beads. Others are of a light, or white silk, lined with colors, and chain-stitched in a pattern of the same color as the lining. In these the handles are either ivory or gilt, but in the more expensive styles, the handles are perfect gems of art, being richly carved out of coral or pearl.

Here perhaps we ought to stop; but when once we begin to gossip with our readers, we find it difficult to leave off. And we cannot help a passing allusion (although it belongs more appropriately to another part of our Chat) to what is probably the most superb dress, which will be seen during this year, at least in the great world of fashion on either side of the water. We speak of the Brussels lace dress which was one of the bridal gifts to "Denmark's fair daughter." It was, indeed, a royal gift, worthy of the royal donor, the King of the Belgians. The designs of the lace, we are informed, are splendid groups of roses, fuchsias, forget-me-nots, etc. The ground work is filled in with small English crowns, with the initial letter of the Princess Alexandra embroidered beneath them. In portions of the composition the style of the Fifteenth Century is revived, and houses in an oval frame and a bird defending its nest of eggs from the attack of a serpent, are represented in a style which is half Chinese.
